We say "in their way," because there are certain qualities which we must not look for in Velasquez; these are, elevated style, traditional convention, as it was understood by Nicolas Poussin, and that nobleness in the choice of the contour, which, surpassing mere correctness, actually goes so far as to substitute for the forms presented by nature the refinements invented by genius or by taste. Velasquez never pays, save in the coin of Spain; that is to say, he reduces the heroes and the scenes of the most elevated description to types of a kind of trivial haughtiness. In his eyes, the gods of Olympus are merely men, and, for him, a man is the first comer, whether he be the muleteer who passes along whistling as he goes, or yonder beggar majestically draped in his tattered cloak. We must not, therefore, expect to find in "Vulcan's Forge" that slim and elegant Apollo whom the ancient sculptor produced from the marble, radiant with grace, beauty, and youth, and gliding lightly over the ground with the step of a god. No—in the picture painted by Velasquez, Latona's son, when he comes to inform Vulcan of the infidelity of Venus, is merely a young blacksmith's apprentice, who would be very much surprised could he see the aureola of splendour with which his head is encircled. In spite of the laurel branch which crowns this apprentice, disguised as the God of Art, the scene is one of the most common description, and takes place in some village inn, or, we may say, blacksmith's shed, where Velasquez once, perhaps, saw the mules of the Spanish king being shod, for, most assuredly, neither the shield of Achilles nor the armour of Æneas was ever forged in such a place. But, on the other hand, if we once accept the vulgar treatment of the subject, what an assemblage of brilliant qualities must we not acknowledge! How simple, how forcible is the expression, both in the pantomime of Vulcan, more astonished than he should be at the infidelity of Venus, as well as in the naive looks of the three assistant smiths, who have temporarily interrupted the measured blows of their hammers, and left the anvil to repose! All that a French painter would have sought in poetic inspiration, Velasquez seeks in simple reality. In place of the contrast of the two natures, the divine and the human, it is the contrast of the two lights, the fire of the brazier and the light of heaven. How correct is the anatomy of those superb bodies illuminated by the sun, of those supple and nervous arms, so well set and so admirably foreshortened! Why should the artist divorce himself from nature, when he can espouse her with so much passion and when she is so fruitful?

Velasquez returned from Italy as much a Spaniard, as much Velasquez as ever. The study of the antique had not elevated his style to the height of the ideal. His destiny was to reign exclusively in the domain of reality. If he did not possess wings to soar into the clouds and seize there the expression of superhuman nature, he was, perhaps, the greatest of all those whose feet touch the earth. From its strongly-marked character, his painting became sublime, and frequently, when seeking merely truth, he found poetry. He would imbue a simple portrait with more poetry than others would throw into a sacred or historical composition. But then what painter ever had more splendid models from which his genius might draw inspiration? The models copied by Velasquez were not of that heavy, thick, and fleshy nature that were to be found in the painting-rooms of the Flemish and Dutch painters, but specimens of Spanish individuality, exuberant with life and passion, and full of courage, devotion, and pride. When he was placed before one of these chivalrous beings, whose countenance was as haughty as his own, his model increased in importance as he worked, till the moment arrived when the portrait became transformed into a historical picture!

The portrait of the Count-Duke of Olivares, his patron, is an example of this. Velasquez represented him encased in a suit of armour inlaid with gold, with a hat surmounted by a flowing plume, and with the staff of a commander in his hand. He is mounted on an Andalusian charger of the finest breed, flying to the fight, while his face appears bathed in perspiration from fatigue and the weight of his arms. In the background we perceive the shock of two bodies of cavalry meeting. Never was any one more successful in rendering the movement and beauty of the horses as well as the ardour and truthfulness of action. Palomino Velasco,* who has written with such care the lives of the Spanish painters, is unable to repress his emotion when speaking of this picture. "We see," he says, "the thick clouds of dust and smoke rolling before our eyes; we hear the clash of weapons; we are present at the carnage."†

In instances like this, Velasquez becomes the equal of Titian and Vandyck. No one is better acquainted than he is with the build, the motions, the skeleton, and the appearance of the horse. Vandyck has, perhaps, made his horses more elegant, but Velasquez has succeeded in bringing out their various muscles more prominently, and imbuing them with more fire, especially their heads, which possess a rare amount of nobleness and beauty. Nothing can be more dignified and more manly than that cavalier, with his mustachios twisted up, who, with his face turned towards the spectator, while his horse is carrying him off into the midst of the action, is ordering the charge, and appears to command not only in virtue of his rank, but in virtue of his courage as well. Was it not this picture which inspired the French painter with the idea of his "Capitaine des Guides?" Was it not the recollection of the heroic picture painted by Velasquez which caused Géricault to hit upon another manner of becoming sublime?

We recollect visiting, in 1836, the gallery of the Prince of Orange, since King of Holland, at Brussels. After admiring a great number of chefs-d'œuvre, and among others an astonishing landscape by Rubens, in which the barking of the dogs in a boar-hunt was, so to speak, audible, some figures by Perugino, and some admirable heads by Francesco Penni, unnamed Il Fattore, we were introduced into an empty room, no one side of which was hung the "Belle Anversoise," by Vandyck, and the portrait of a Burgomaster clad in black, and wearing a fine collar with small plaits, while, on the other side, were suspended the portraits of the Count-Duke d'Olivares and of Philip IV. by Velasquez. Never did any pictures produce a more profound sensation on any young and ardent admirer of art. Those who were visiting the gallery with us having gone on, we remained alone for some moments in presence of these four full-length figures that stood drawn up before us. The gravity of their fixed expressions inspired us with respect, and involuntarily we assumed their noble attitude. Wavering, however, between these two grand painters, and dazzled by both, we felt our enthusiasm pass from Vandyck to Velasquez, and from Velasquez to Vandyck, while each, in turn, obtained the preference. The skilful and rich pencil of the pupil of Rubens had not more fascination for us than the frank, vigorous, and sober style of the Spanish painter. The one caused us to admire Art, while the other concealed it, and showed us merely Nature.

Philip IV. had awaited the return of Velasquez with impatience. The painter's society was a necessity for him, for Velasquez was one of those intimate friends who were styled, in the language of the court, parientes del Rey. During his absence, Philip IV. would not sit to any other painter, although he had in his service such men as Caxes, Carducho, and Nardi. Being a passionate admirer of art, and delighted that it lay in his power to discover, at all hours, its naive manifestations, its various stages, and its different secrets, the king caused a painting-room to be constructed for his favourite in the gallery del Cierzo, keeping for himself a second key, with the right of entering whenever he chose, of surprising the artist's ideas in all their crudity, and of amusing himself by following the development of each thought, and the progress of each picture, from the moment that it appeared only as a confused and shapeless sketch, until it had received the highest finish of execution. It was to the family of Philip IV. that Velasquez first devoted himself on his return. He painted, in succession, the Infants and Infantas. In the museum of the Louvre, at Paris, before the heirs of the ex-king, Louis Philippe, had them removed, there might be seen some specimens of this series of paintings, too sincere and free to be the work of a courtier. Mounted upon their high heels, or tied to long rapiers, these little princely personages, no higher than their spaniel, presented us with a picture of quasi-royal solemnity, which was not without its charm, namely, that of historical truth.

In the museum at Madrid are preserved the large equestrian and the full-length portraits of the Infant Don Balhazar Carlos. In the latter (p. 129), Velasquez has represented him holding his carbine in his hand with a bold dashing air, surrounded by his dogs, with his small hat placed knowingly on his head, and standing in the midst of one of those undulating landscapes which, we believe, are to be found nowhere else but in the works of Collantes; in the former, he has depicted him on an Andalusian horse, which seems as if it were about to spring out from the canvas at full gallop. Nothing can be more interesting than this embryo cavalier, with his large black eyes, who is seated so calmly, so naively, and so much at his ease, on his fiery steed, with his legs encased in large leather boots as becomes a hunter already a first-rate adept in equestrian.*

Velasquez attacks without the slightest hesitation, and reproduces without the least difficulty, all the varied effects of nature observed at hazard, and all the phenomena of light, from the intensity of a mid-day sun to the most transient and doubtful gleam. Nothing embarrasses, nothing astonishes this great master, as long as there is no question of idealising his model. It is as easy for him to group a number of persons in the perumbra, as to dash off a single individual in the midst of an open country. If he happens to visit a manufactory of tapestry, where he sees a number of women working half-naked, on account of the excessive heat, in a light decolorized by the external hangings, he will be struck by the charm of this chiaro-oscuro, and represent the spinners, "Las Hilanderas," carelessly exposing their naked forms to the half-light, while ladies more completely dressed, and bargaining for tapestry that is ready for sale, are merely placed there as objects which the painter makes use of to exhibit the miracles which his incomparable pencil is capable of producing, to augment the illusion of the perspective, and to afford scope for the effects of a subdued and carefully-managed light. Were we actually to go, and, through some secret opening, look into the interior of a manufactory of this description—were we to surprise a number of half-dressed workmen, listlessly engaged at their work, while the mild daylight is caressing their shoulders, which appear bathed in the warm air of the south—we should behold nothing more nor less than the very fac-simile of the Spanish painter's picture. This was felt by Raphael Mengs, who, when speaking of this particular work, and of the portraits painted by Velasquez, exclaims, "It seems as if his hand had had no share in the execution of his paintings, but that everything about them was created by a simple act of volition."

For some time Philip IV. had entertained the project of establishing a public academy of fine arts at Madrid; but to do this it was necessary to possess some models. The king commissioned Velasquez to travel through Italy, and to select, at the cost of the Spanish Government, whatever might strike him as worth being purchased. In obedience to the royal command, the painter left Madrid in the month of November, 1648, and embarked at Malaga, in company with the Duke de Naxera, who was charged to proceed to Trent and receive the Queen Maria-Anne of Austria. But Velasquez was so impatient to revisit Venice, whither he was attracted by his old recollections and by so many marvellous colourists, that he would not await the arrival of the queen. This second voyage of Velasquez was one which proved highly beneficial to his native land. Whenever he heard of any fine pictures to be sold, he bought them for the king; whenever he met with any celebrated fresco-painters, such, for instance, as Colonna, or the Metelli, of Bologna, he represented to them that Spain was a country where they would find a glorious and profitable field for the exercise of their talent. At Florence, Velasquez feasted his eyes on the masterpieces of Andreas del Sarto, and at Parma on those of Correggio. At Modena he was received with great distinction by the duke, who remembered that when he was at Madrid he had once sat to our painter. Fatigued, however, with the honours that were everywhere paid to the agent of Philip IV., he proceeded incognito to Rome, and thence to Naples, where he was to concert measures with the Viceroy, who had orders to supply the palazzo reale with all he required. At this period, Ribera was a person of great importance at Naples. Velasquez was naturally desirous of meeting his illustrious countryman. He was able really and truly to admire the works of this great master, being made to inspire jealousy in others, but never giving way to it himself.

Velasquez was compelled, however, to return to Rome, where the Pope Innocent X. received him in a most magnificent manner, which was immediately imitated by the Cardinal, his nephew, and the rest of the Sacred College. The Cavalier Bernini, l'Algarde, and Pietro de Cortona, paid the Spanish artist every possible mark of respect, which was changed into enthusiasm as soon as he had painted the pope's portrait. It was one of the prodigies of art, and its success was most triumphant. It was carried with great pomp in procession, and had the honour of being crowned. It renewed the illusion formerly produced by the famous portraits painted by Raphael and Titian, those of Leon X. and Paul III. respectively. That priest with the ruddy forehead in a red enamel, seated in a red arm-chair, and stretching out from the red hangings, was in reality the sovereign pontiff himself. A halo of ermine round the purple cap, and a few feathers boldly dashed in on the luminous points of the vest, the check-bow, and the forehead, had been sufficient to give this surprising feat of artistic strength, and imbue the picture with relief, roundness, accent, and life. The Pope presented him with a medal, and the academicians of Saint Luke elected him a member of their body, and forwarded his diploma after him to Spain.

During this time, Philip IV. was suffering impatiently the absence of Velasquez. He ruled the daily presence and conversation of the artist, for, as we have said, he liked to see him at work in the silence of his studio of the Cierzo, and which he, Philip, could alone enter at all hours, as Charles V. used to do into that of Titian. The monarch's admiration was remarked by a courtier, Don Fernand Ruiz de Contreras, who wrote to Velasquez on the subject. But resorting court to return to Madrid, however, the intended emissary of art remembered that, on the occasion of his first journey, he had ordered a picture of a herd of the twelve best painters of Italy, and that he had to carry back with him to Madrid those time, and that we find them occupying very nearly the same position in public opinion which they did two centuries ago?

The war which Mazarin was then waging against Spain prevented Velasquez from traversing France and visiting Paris. He re-crossed the sea with his rich store of statues, and art, and with the king of Spain at his side, seventeen years of his life had glided so quickly by. Possessing a straightforward character and an honest open heart, the Andalusian painter was not one of those courtiers who await the signal of their master before they dare entertain a single busts, and pictures, and was accompanied by Jerome Ferrer, easter in bronze, as well as by the sculptor, Dominic de Rioja. Philip rewarded Velasquez by conferring on him the title of Grand Chamberlain of the Palace, Aposentador Mayor; his salary was increased to a thousand ducats a year, and he once more returned to that studio where, in company with nature thought. The Duke d'Olivares having fallen into disgrace, Velasquez hastened to give his old protector fresh proofs of his gratitude, a feeling which others would have reckoned it dangerous to manifest. Velasquez had known the Marquis de Spinola, who had taken him on board his vessel when he embarked at Barcelona. Our artist consecrated one of his greatest pictures, a masterpiece, to the glory of the illustrious commander. "The Surrender of Breda," called in Spain the "Picture of the Lances," represents the Marquis landing in front of his troops to receive, with all the grace and dignity of a generous conqueror, the keys of the fortress from the hands of the vanquished general. On one side are drawn up the light-haired, well-fed Flemings, with their open, ruddy countenances; on the other stand the grave, pale, bilious-looking Spaniards, slight in form, but with a natural haughtiness peering through their attitude. Among them, under a large slouched hat, in one corner of the picture, may be seen a noble and manly face, which is that of Velasquez himself. Between the two armies lies an apparently boundless landscape. We appear to feel the very breeze that fans it; we seem as if we could step in it, walk in it, breathe in it!

The only poetry, the sole Muse acknowledged by Velasquez, was Truth! He never troubles himself with embellishing Nature, he lets her do that herself. Whatever crosses his imagination is but a part of his recollections; he only invents what he has seen. But then, what an eye is his! How it embraces every object both in its fullest extent and in its minutest details! How he penetrates to the very core of all things—how he touches them! How he seizes the positive, the exact, or rather the apparent tone of everything, for that is the only correct one! Nothing escapes his piercing reason and his unfailing certainty of execution! He measures the distance of the various bodies by the degree of intensity alone which is given to the colours by the interposition of the radiant air! Nothing can deceive the eye of Velasquez; but, on the contrary, it is he who deceives that of everyone else!

On traversing the Palace of Madrid, the visitor will meet Velasquez, and go up and speak to him, for he is there in person standing at his easel painting the Infanta Marie-Marguerite of Austria. Decked out in black lace, and lost in a gown of light silk, which bulges out at the bottom like a bell, the blonde Infanta, with her chubby cheeks and round eyes, is in the act of taking in her little hand a little cup of Japan china, that is, doubtless to amuse her, offered by a maid of honour. At the side of the future empress are two dwarfs, very celebrated in the annals of the ante-chamber, Marie Babel and Nicolas Pertusano. The latter, who is dressed exactly like a Knave of Spades, is worrying a large dog that is lying down motionless in the foreground. Before the spectator extends a long gallery, and, at its extreme end, there is a door which opens on the gardens, letting in the rays of the sun, and showing, on a flight of steps beyond, the gentleman who has just opened it. Near this door, through which the sun penetrates with dazzling splendour, there is a glass in which the reflection of the figures of Philip IV. and his wife occupies the neighbourhood of those royal personages. Never has a human pencil, either before or afterwards, obtained such a degree of magical illusion. As far as simple imitation is concerned, this picture is the op plus ultra of art, and, if it were not for the frame which surrounds it, we should with difficulty believe it to be a painting. "It seems," says Francesco Prezioso, director of the Spanish Academy at Rome, "that we are in the same room with this group of children and dwarfs, and that they are all alive." We know that when Charles II. showed this family picture to Luca Giordano, who had recently come to Spain, the Italian painter exclaimed enthusiastically: "It is the Theology of Painting!" thus placing the work of Velasquez in the same rank that theology holds amongst the sciences.

The picture still preserves the name bestowed on it by Luca Giordano. After Velasquez had finished it, he presented it to his friend the king, and asked him whether there was anything wanting. "Yes, one thing," said Philip IV., taking the palette from the painter's hands, and drawing upon the breast of the artist, who is represented in the picture, the cross of the order of Santiago. The cross has remained up to the present day exactly as it was painted by the royal hand. This is a charming trait on the part of the Spanish king, and proves that he possessed the delicacy and good taste of a true gentleman. Velasquez was not regularly invested with the order until some time afterwards. When the president, according to the usual custom observed on the reception of a new knight, was about to investigate our artist's family pretensions, and asked for his genealogical papers, Philip IV., who was present, said with a smile: "Give him the order, for I know his noble birth and the right he has to it." In order to afford a still more convincing proof how high Velasquez stood in the estimation of his royal patron, the investiture took place in full court, on the festival of San Prospero, amidst general rejoicing, festivity, and magnificence.

A great and important ceremony now brought the Grand Chamberlain, Aposentador Mayor of Philip IV., conspicuously into public notice. The Treaty of the Pyrenees, signed the 7th of November, 1659, put an end to the war between France and Spain. Louis XIV. was to marry the Infanta, Maria Theresa, and it was agreed that the princess should be delivered, at Irun by Philip IV., into the hands of the young king's representatives. Velasquez, in virtue of his office, set out in the month of March, 1660, to prepare lodgings for the Court, and it was he who arranged the tent in which the two monarchs met, in the Isle of Pheasants, since called the Isle of the Conference. Charles Lebrun has chosen this ceremony as the subject of a grand picture in the Museum of Versailles. Velasquez figures in it among the other personages, for the French artist has taken care not to omit him. The Spanish painter is represented as old and harassed, for he was no longer what he once was when he painted the admirable portrait of himself, which Monsieur Taylor succeeded in obtaining for the Spanish gallery of the Louvre at Paris. How often have we stood wrapped in contemplation before this head, which is one of the marvels of the painter's art! The glance is so searching that it penetrates into our very souls! It is altogether a priceless work, in which, by a rare combination, firmness of touch is united to the most beautiful softness. The form is distinct, and yet it is impossible to distinguish the outline. The model is most perfectly exact, and stands out in astonishing relief, and yet we are totally unable to say where the light finishes, and where the shade begins. It contains a whole theory of painting.

It is but too true that, in 1660, Velasquez had aged quite as much as he is represented to have done in Lebrun's picture. The fatigue incidental to his office and travels had weakened a constitution that, in spite of the energy of his face, was naturally delicate, as we may see by the peculiar fineness of the skin. On his return to Madrid, his family were afflicted by the alteration visible in his features. Philip IV., on hearing of the state of his friend's health, lost no time in sending the royal physicians to attend upon him, but Velasquez survived a few days only; he breathed his last on the 7th August, 1660. The grandees of Spain, the court, and the knights of all the different orders, took part in his funeral. His widow died of grief at the expiration of a week, and was buried by his side in the Church of San Juan.

If painting were merely a second process of creation, Velasquez, without doubt, would be the greatest painter that ever lived. As portrait painters, Vandyck, Rubens, and Titian equalled, but did not excel him. His design was correct, his colouring true, even to sublimity; there was not a single illusion of physical nature which could escape his power of imitation. He began by merely reproducing his model upon the canvas dryly and crudely; he then took into account the phenomena of the visible world; he perceived that form is not abstract, but that it is modified by the presence of the atmosphere, and that the colour of all objects depends upon their distance, and the greater or less degree of light in which they are placed. He now painted nature as she appears to us, so as not to wound but please the view. At last, when he had reached the utmost limits of perfection, he suppressed all signs of art, so that nature alone was all that remained upon the canvases. In the works of Velasquez, we must neither look for the profound thought of Poussin, the exquisite feeling of Le Sueur, the fine style of the antique, nor the idealism of the Florentine school of the fifteenth century. Velasquez saw in heaven only men, and in men he beheld merely Spaniards,—that is to say, so many beings moved by the empire of the passions, and existing around him. His works, consequently, are deficient in style; but, to make up for this, they are invariably remarkable for one great characteristic quality, and that is, Truth.

In order to form an exact idea of the genius of Velasquez, we must study it in the Museo del Rey, in presence of his sixty-four pictures there, for we may safely say that, with the exception of a few rare specimens which are to be found out of Spain—either from having been given away by the magnificence of different kings, or from having been the spoil of victorious armies—all the works of this eminent artist are in the Museum at Madrid.

Velasquez attempted, and succeeded in, every branch of his art. He has painted sacred and profane history, historical and other landscapes, full-lengths as well as equestrian portraits of men and women, of extreme youth and of old age; hunting-scenes, battles, animals, interiors, flowers, and fruit.

Among his picturesque landscapes, the most celebrated are, "A View of the Prado," and "A View of Aranjuez." In the first of these two compositions he has represented a boar-hunt, with all its tumultuous and confused crowd of men, dogs, and horses; in the second, he has depicted "The Queen's Walk" (la Calle de la Reina), which is still so celebrated. Among his historical landscapes, we must mention "The Visit of Saint Anthony to Saint Paul, the Hermit." The canvas in this picture is scarcely covered. The ground, trees, and sky, when looked at nearly, are all massed together without any apparent attention to the separate objects, but if we retire four steps, everything becomes clear and full of animation.

It is at Madrid that we find the portrait of Philip IV. on horseback, in the midst of a naked country. Its effect is perfectly bewildering; it is impossible for illusion to be carried further. The portraits of the queens, Elizabeth of France and Marianne of Austria, as well as of the Infanta, Margaret, and of the Infant, Balthazar, who at one time is represented galloping on an Andalusian charger, and at another, in the pose of a young king, excite our admiration in an equal degree. We must likewise mention the portrait of the Count-Duke d'Olivares, on horseback and armed for a campaign; the Marquis de Pesquiere, the Alcade Ronquillo, the Corsair, Barberossa, and, lastly, a little male dwarf and a monstrous female dwarf.

Among the sacred paintings, there are at Madrid only two painted by Velasquez: "The Martyrdom of Saint Stephen," and "A Christ upon the Cross."

His profane subjects are tolerably numerous. The Museum possesses five of the best; the one called "The Spinners" (las Hilanderas), representing the interior of a tapestry manufactory, is a most remarkable work on account of its perspective and the management of the light. Next comes "Vulcan's Forge" (la Fragua de Vulcano), a composition full of air and depth. We must also mention "The Surrender of Breda," commonly called "The picture of the Lances" (el Cuadro de las Lanças), and "The Drinkers" (los Bebedores or Borrachos), two very remarkable works, despite the different styles to which they belong. The one charms us by the grandeur and magnificence of its general arrangement, and the other by the astonishing truthfulness of the different personages and the disposition of the groups. The French Government, on the proposal made by M. Charles Blanc, who was then Director of Fine Arts, charged an artist of merit, M. Portier, with the task of copying these two pictures. The copies are at present exposed to view in the Palais des Beaux Arts.

As a mere imitation of nature, there is another picture still more remarkable, perhaps, than "The Drinkers;" this is the one which represents "The Family of Philip IV.," and in which the artist has painted his own portrait. It is perhaps the most important work ever produced by Velasquez.

The old Spanish gallery in the Louvre at Paris, contains, as we all know, two pictures by Velasquez: "Don Juan of Austria," and the "Palace of the Escurial."

The Museum of the Louvre possesses three pictures by Velasquez; a three-quarter portrait of the "Infanta Marguerite-Theresa," presumed to be the study for the picture representing the Family of Philip IV.; and the last one mentioned as forming part of the collection of the Museum of Madrid: "The Portrait of a Monk," a well-painted picture, but one which the administration of the Museum need not have given themselves any trouble to acquire; and, lastly, a "Re-union of Artists" (p. 124), a well-grouped composition, full of atmospheric effect, but restored, and badly restored. The first is said to have cost £160, and the second, £90.

The Gallery of the Belvedere, at Vienna, prides itself on possessing six pictures by Velasquez: "A Countryman laughing, and holding a flower in his right hand," a half-length; "The Painter's Family," a composition of twelve figures, size of life, three-quarter length; "The Portrait of Philip IV.," three-quarter length; "The Portrait of the Infanta, Marguerite-Theresa," that of her sister, "Marie-Theresa," and that of "Don Balthazar Carlos."

The Pinakothek at Munich is said to contain an equal number: "The Portrait of the Artist," "A Beggar," "The Portrait of Cardinal Rastigliosi," and three other portraits.

In the Gallery at Dresden is preserved a "Portrait of the Duke d'Olivares," holding a paper in his hand.

At the Hermitage of St. Petersburg there are thirteen pictures which have the great name of Velasquez attached to them. We think, however, that the majority of them might be looked upon as apocryphal. The exceptions are the two famous portraits purchased by the emperor, in 1859, at the sale of the late William the Second, King of Holland; one of them is a full-length "Portrait of Philip IV.," and the other that of the "Count-Duke d'Olivares." The cost of the two, including the expense of the sale, was £3,542. We may also account as genuine three studies: "A Young Peasant laughing;" the first "Sketch for the Portrait of Innocent X.;" the "Bust of the Count-Duke d'Olivares;" and, perhaps, the two views, one of "Saragossa," and one of "La Caraca."

"Lot and his Daughters;" formerly in the Old man's Collection, now at Cheltenham. Lord Northwick.

"The Finding of Moses;" at Castle Howard. Earl of Carlisle.

"Head of John the Baptist in a charger." Lord Northwick.

"St. Francis Borgia arriving at the Jesuits' College," a composition of eight figures, Bessington, Stafford House. Duke of Sutherland.

"Los Borrachos," composition of six figures; the first study for the celebrated picture; at Hexton House, Wiltshire. Lord Hextonbury.

"Las Meninas, or the Maids of Honour," a finished sketch for the celebrated picture, by some considered to be a small repetition; at Kingston Hall, Dorsetshire. G. Beales, Esq.

"The Alcade Ronquillo," called the Fighting Jailer, who was sent to reduce Seville in the year of the Conquest, in 1520. He is standing, in a dark one, on a floor paved with brown and white marble, with his hand resting on a walking-stick. London. James Hall, Esq.

"El Aguador de Sevilla, the Water-carrier of Seville," engraved by B. Ametler; at Aspley House. Duke of Wellington.

"The Signing of the Marriage-Contract between the Infanta Margherita Maria, daughter of Philip IV., and the Emperor Leopold;" an unfinished picture, and probably the last, in the hand of Velasquez. In the hands of a dealer.

Three small studies; "a Repast," "a Man with Dogs," and "an Equestrian Portrait of Philip IV." London. Lord Cowley.

"An incident in the life of St. Charles Borromeo;" a sketch. Stafford House. Duke of Sutherland.

We have now to mention the prices fetched by the pictures of Velasquez at public sales. As the reader may easily suppose, their number is extremely limited.

At the sale of the Duke de Choiseul, in 1772, two pictures by Velasquez were put up to public competition; a Danae, which was knocked down for £24, and "Mars and Venus," which fetched £14 12s. 6d. They were again brought to the hammer, at the sale of the Prince de Conty, when the former only fetched £18 8s. 4d., and the latter £24.

After this period, in order to obtain any trace of the pictures of Velasquez at public sales, we must go as far back as 1817. At M. Laperrière's sale, a head of Philip IV. fetched £98, while that of a Cardinal was knocked down for only £18. In 1823, at a second sale of the same connoisseur, "A full-length Portrait of Philip IV. in a hunting dress" fetched £300; "another Portrait of the same Monarch, in a satin suit," £311; the "Portrait of the Duke d'Olivares," £161, "a Hunter," £10; and the "Portrait of a Young Princess," £5.

At M. Erard's sale, in 1832, a "Portrait of Don Diego Rodriguez de Citray" fetched £72.

At M. Dubois' sale, in 1840, "The Portrait of Philip IV." was knocked down for £94 8s. 4d.; that of the Queen, his Wife, for £114; and that of his Brother, for £206.

M. Aguado possessed seventeen pictures by Velasquez in his gallery. At the sale of his collection, in 1843, the following is a list of the prices obtained for the best ones: "The Young Girl and the Negro," £18; "The Lady with the Fan," which was engraved by Leroux, £582; the full-length "Portrait of a Corregidor," £64; and a "Scene of Beggars," £48 8s. 4d.

The only other pictures that we have to mention, are those possessed by the late King of Holland, William II., which were sold in 1850. We have already said that the portraits of Philip IV. and of the Duke d'Olivares were knocked down to the Emperor of Russia for the sum of £5,512. The Portrait of a Woman fetched only £53, and that of a Young Girl, £71.

THE DRINKERS. FROM A PAINTING BY VELASQUEZ.

BENJAMIN ROBERT HAYDON.

On January 25th, 1786, the father of the ill-fated artist, whose biography we propose briefly to sketch, enters in his diary which he seems to have kept as religiously as his more celebrated son, that "Sally was taken in labour, and at nine at night was delivered of a fine boy." This is the first entry we find concerning our hero, and the little circumstance here narrated appears to have taken place in Plymouth. Haydon's ancestors were loyal, public-spirited men. His father loved his church and king, believed England to be the only great country in the world, swore Napoleon won all his battles by bribery, did not believe there was poet, painter, musician, soldier, sailor, general, or statesman out of England, and at any time would have knocked down any man who dared to disbelieve him, or have been burnt in Smithfield for the glory of his principles. In time, these principles, with some very slight modifications, became the hereditary property of his son.

In common with most artists, young Haydon early displayed an overpowering love of art. Self-willed, passionate, in the moment of his wildest fury he was always pacified when his mother entered the room with a book of engravings in her hand. Soon he began to draw himself. One of his favourite studies was drawing the guillotine, with Louis taking leave of the people. His schoolmaster, Dr. Billake, encouraged his talent in this way. At thirteen Haydon was removed to Plympton grammar school, where Sir Joshua Reynolds was brought up. Here drawing was still pursued as usual, and here his classical schooling, which does not appear to have been very extensive, was completed. He was then sent to Exeter to study book-keeping, and at the end of six months was bound to his father for seven years. Young Haydon, of course, made a wretched tradesman. He insulted the customers: he hated the town and the people in it. He was determined to be an artist or nothing. His father remonstrated, his friends reasoned, his mother wept—all was in vain; as usual, self-will won the day. Haydon collected his books and colours, packed up his things, and took his place in the mail for London, 13th May, 1804. He took lodgings at 312, Strand, and the next day was hard at work drawing from the round, studying Albinus, and breathing aspirations for high art. For nine months he saw nothing but his books, his casts, and his drawings. His enthusiasm was immense; his devotion to study that of a martyr. He rose when he woke at three, four, or five; drew at anatomy until eight, in chalk from nine till one, and from half-past one till five; then walked, dined, and to anatomy again from seven to ten and eleven. Haydon had come up from Devonshire armed with an introduction to Prince Hoare, who introduced him to Northcote, Opie, and Fuseli; and the latter got him into the Academy of which he was keeper. Here he associated with Sachom and Wilkie, and by means of his intimacy with the former, got a commission from Lord Mulgrave for "Dentatus." By means of Wilkie, he became intimate with Sir G. Beaumont, who appears, according to Haydon's version, to have taken a pleasure in bringing geniuses out and leaving them to sink or swim. In reality, he seems to have acted the part of a kind and consistent friend. In 1807, Haydon's first picture of "Joseph and Mary resting on the road to Egypt," appeared; and when the season opened the artist started as a fashionable man, lived at the Admiralty, attended routs, mingled in a circle of ministers and ladies, generals and lord chamberlains, men with genius and without. In 1808, he ventured upon taking a first floor at 11, Great Marlborough Street, and commenced his "Dentatus" in earnest. At this time also he first saw the Elgin marbles; the effect they produced on him was overpowering. "I felt the future," he writes in his memoirs, "I foretold that they would prove themselves the finest things on earth—that they would overturn the false beau ideal where nature was nothing, and would establish the true beau ideal of which nature alone is the basis. I felt as if a divine truth had blazed inwardly upon my mind, and I knew they would at last rouse the art of Europe from its slumber in the darkness." The "Dentatus" finished, notwithstanding it was badly hung, Haydon's vanity grew greater than ever. "I walked about my room," he writes, "looked into the glass, anticipated what the foreign ambassadors would say, studied my French for a good accent, believed that all the sovereigns of Europe would hail an English youth with delight who could paint a heroic picture." His next work was a "Macbeth," for Sir G. Beaumont. His "Dentatus" had brought him a prize of one hundred guineas from the British Institution, and the "Macbeth" he was determined should win the three hundred guinea prize offered by the directors of the same institution; and truly he needed the money. His father had done all he could for him. He then commenced that system of getting into debt and borrowing which was the curse of his whole after-life. "Macbeth" did not get the prize, and Haydon relieved himself by quarrelling with the Academy, and painting "Solomon." His difficulties at this time were great—he traded, lived, and clothed himself on trust; yet he had friends, some of them equally talented and more fortunate than himself. His usual companions were Hazlitt, the Hunts, Barnes (of the Times), Wilkie, Jackson, C. Lamb, and John Scott (of the Champion). His "Solomon" achieved a temporary success. It was sold for six hundred guineas. It was praised by the nobility. The British Institution voted one hundred guineas to him as a mark of their admiration of it, and he was also presented with the freedom of his native town. Canova paid him a visit, and Wordsworth wrote sonnets in his praise. Haydon's painting room was attended by the beauty and fashion of the metropolis, and the academicians, whom he had beaten by his defence of the Elgin marbles, when he met them at a conversation or a rout, stood by pale and contemptible, holding out a finger as they passed." In 1810 the "Entry of Christ into Jerusalem" was completed and exhibited. While the enthusiasm was at its height, a gentleman asked if a thousand pounds would buy it. "No," was the reply. Lord Ashburnham gave Haydon one hundred pounds as an expression of his high esteem of so beautiful a picture. By exhibiting it in town he made a clear profit of £1,298. In Edinburgh and Glasgow, also, nearly another thousand pounds was raised. Haydon then returned to town to finish "Christ in the Garden," for which Sir G. Phillips had generously advanced the sum of five hundred guineas, and to sketch his "Lazarus," which he determined should be his grandest and largest work. But before the picture was completed he had much to go through. He was in love and unsettled, he was in debt and arrested. He managed to get free and get married. For a short time we find him happy—leading a more peaceful life, breathing a purer air. On the last day of 1821 he thus wrote: "I don't know how it is, but I get less reflective as I get older. I seem to take things as they come, without much care. In early life everything being new excites thought. As nothing is new when a man is thirty-five, one thinks less. Or, perhaps, being married to my dearest Mary, and having no longer anything to hope in love, I get more contented with my lot, which God knows is rapturous beyond imagination. Here I sit sketching, with the loveliest face before me smiling and laughing, and solitude is not. Marriage has increased my happiness beyond expression. In the intervals of study, a few minutes' conversation with a creature one loves is the greatest of all reliefs. God bless us both. My pecuniary difficulties are still great; but my love is intense, my ambition intense, and my hope in God's protection cheering." Unhappily this sunshine lasted not long. Happy in his wife—in his aim—burning with noble aspirations for English art—thus twelve months passed away, and then Haydon's career again became stormy—antagonistic—darker and darker every year. No wonder that Haydon revelled in such philosophic formulae as these:—"Art long, time swift, life short, and law despotic."

In 1823, "Lazarus" was finished, and the proceeds of the exhibition did not this time keep the wolf from the door. In April we find him dating from the King's Bench. His friends rallied round him; Brougham presented his petition to the House of Commons. In July, he passed through the Insolvent Debtors' Court, and got free to commence dunning ministerial ears with plans in favour of public employment for artists. In vain were ministerial replies, curt, cold, unsatisfactory—from the letters of Sir C. Long to Sir Robert Peel. Haydon persisted, and the result was the statues and frescoes and oil pictures in the new Houses of Parliament. Haydon now took to portrait-painting: had he taken to it more kindly he would have been a happier man. How much of degradation and dependence would he have missed. A Mr. Kearsey for a little time engages to allow Haydon £300, on condition that he sticks to that lucrative branch of art. But the agreement over, again Haydon plunged into difficulty and debt. In 1826, "Pharaoh" was finished, and "Venus appearing to Anchises" begun and finished; and "the finest subject on earth," "Alexander taming Bucephalus," begun. Lord Egremont gave him a commission for the work. In 1827, "Euclid" was painted, and, for a wonder, in cabinet size—"the darling size of England"—for which Lord Egremont again generously gave him a commission. Another arrest for debt also took place this year; and, at the suggestion of Mr. Lockhart, a public meeting was held at the "Crown and Anchor," Lord Francis Leveson Gower in the chair, "for the purpose of raising a subscription to restore Mr. Haydon to his family and pursuits, he having been imprisoned one month in consequence of embarrassments arising from an over-eagerness to pay off old debts, from which he was exonerated, and the want of employment for eight months." The result was Haydon's release. Also the "March Election," which was sold to George IV. next year, and the "March Chaining," the net receipts from which two pictures, including the produce of the exhibition and the sale of drawings, amounted to £1,596—"a sum," observes Haydon, "which, in better circumstances, and less expense, would have been a comfortable independence for the year." Truly many a better man than he has been compelled to manage to live with less. "Punch" was painted in 1820. In 1830, another arrest takes place. Haydon begs and borrows, as usual; and gets an order from Sir R. Peel for a picture of Napoleon at St. Helena. He seems to have considered it unpardonable that the Minister of England should have mistaken a fragment of the Elgin Marbles for the Torso of Apollonius. In 1831, Haydon was absorbed in politics, yet he painted "Walters" for the Times, and again had recourse to the pen. This paved the way for his picture of "The Reform Banquet" in Guildhall, for which he received a commission from Earl Grey. The occupation suited his taste, because he had access to the leaders of the reform movement, and felt himself one of them.

The destruction of the Houses of Parliament by fire of course led to fresh activity on Haydon's part in pressing upon the ministry the propriety of some arrangement for art decoration in the new building; but to Haydon himself nothing seems to have brought pecuniary ease. He painted the Duke, Achilles, Cassandra; and began lecturing in 1835 at the Mechanics' Institution, in Southampton-buildings. The Lecture was a success, and was speedily repeated at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester, Leeds, and elsewhere. Dr. Birkbeck said, as they went out, "You have succeeded; it is a hit." Haydon was delighted. At length an English community would do him justice, and English art would be reformed. But his hopes now were greater than his powers. He had become worn and wary. He had been wasted in the battle of life. Time was lost in hunting up money—in putting off creditors—in the fashions and gambles of May Fair. His next ten years of life were a fearful struggle. In spite of his aspirations, his paintings were careless, unworthy of his fame—mere potboilers, to use a technical term, with which men of Haydon's class are but too familiar. Yet all was vain; for again we find him in the King's Bench. The year 1843 brought still heavier sorrow. It brought the consummation of what Haydon had so long wished for—a competition of native artists to prove their capability of executing great monumental and decorative works; but with this came his own bitter disappointment at not being among the competitors. His cartoons were not among those selected for reward. He professed to have been prepared for the disappointment; but it was great and terrible, nevertheless. It revived all the old horrors of arrest, execution, and debt. His beloved and loving wife felt the misery of the blow. When Haydon told her he was not included, her expression was a study, as she mournfully exclaimed, "We shall all be ruined!" In 1846 the curse came; the cloud grew darker—the anguish more intense. On Monday morning, the 22nd of June, Haydon wrote in his diary:—

"God forgive me! Amen.

B. R. Haydon.

"Stretch me no longer on the rough world."—Levee.

End of twenty-sixth volume."

"Before eleven," says Mr. Taylor, "the hand that wrote it was stiff and cold in self-inflicted death." On the morning of that Monday Haydon rose early and went out, returning apparently fatigued at nine. He then wrote. At ten he entered his painting-room, and soon after saw his wife, then dressing to visit a friend at Brixton by her husband's especial desire. He embraced her fervently, and returned to his painting-room. About a quarter to eleven his wife and daughter heard the report of fire-arms, but took little notice of it, as they supposed it to proceed from the troops then exercising in the park. Mrs. Haydon went out. About an hour after Miss Haydon entered the painting-room, and found her father stretched out dead before the easel, on which stood his unfinished picture of "Alfred and the first British Jury;" his white hairs dabbled in blood, a half-open razor smeared with blood at his side, near it a small pistol recently discharged, in his throat a frightful gash, and a bullet wound in his skull. A portrait of his wife stood on a small easel facing his large picture. On a table near were his diary, open at the page of that last entry, his watch, a prayer-book open to the gospel for the Sixth Sunday after the Epiphany, letters addressed to his wife and children, and this paper, headed, "Last Thoughts of B. R. Haydon, half-past ten."

"No man should use certain evil for probable good, however great the object. Evil is the prerogative of the Deity. I create good. I create evil. The Lord do these things. Wellington never used evil if the good was not certain. Napoleon had no such scruples, and I fear the glitter of his genius rather dazzled me; but had I been encouraged, nothing but good would have come from me, because when encouraged, I paid everybody. 'God forgive the evil for the sake of the good.' Amen." Besides this paper was a will, which began as follows: "In the name of Jesus Christ our Saviour, in the efficacy of whose atonement I firmly and conscientiously believe, I make my last will this day, June 22, 1846, being clear in my intellect, and decided in my resolution of purpose." The coroner's jury found that the self-destroyer was in an unsound state of mind when he committed the act. The debts at death amounted to about £2,000, the assets were inconsiderable. The bereaved family and widow received the sympathy and help of friends, and especially of one whose private career seems to have been as much marked by generosity as his public was by patriotism. The reader will at once guess the honoured name of Peel. Many an unhappy child of genius has shared a similar bounty from the same liberal hand. Yet the world gave him little credit for it. Sir Robert did not his alms before men; his right hand knew not what his left hand did.

We have thus watched Haydon's career from his cradle to his grave. The great secret of Haydon's failure was pecuniary embarrassment. He was always in danger, always pestered by lawyers and arrests. He had a high notion of art; but it was not the highest—his idea was, that the nation should keep him, Robert Haydon; that if the nation would not keep him the nobility should; and that if neither the nobility nor the nation did their duty, he was to beg and borrow of whom he could. On half Haydon's income many a better man than he has lived. Barry lived on infinitely less; but Haydon must mix in high life. Hence he was always poor, and always in trouble.

As a man Haydon was self-willed, inordinately vain, unscrupulous in conduct, yet sometimes religious in feeling; that he did good none can deny. He lived to see his teaching sanctioned by the Academy and parliament, and his pupils—such as Eastlake and Landseer—rising up to honour and wealth. The "Judgment of Solomon" is his finest work as an artist. "His art," says Mr. G. F. Watts, "is defective in principle and wanting in attractiveness; not possessing those qualities of exact imitation which attract, amuse, give confidence, and even flatter, because they take the spectator into partnership and make him feel as if they were almost suggestions of his own. I cannot find that he strikes upon any chord that is the basis of a true harmony. To particularise I should say that his touch is generally woolly and his surface disagreeable; that the dabs of white on the lights, and the dabs of red in the shadows are untrue and displeasing; that his draperies are deficient in richness and dignity, and his general effect much less good than one would expect from the goodness of parts, which, I think, arises principally from the coarseness of the handling; that his expressions of anxiety and general perception of form are the best by far that I have seen in the English school, and I feel even a desire to study his modelling that is only to be found in Phidias. But this is not true invariably; his proportion is very often faulty, especially in the arms of his figures; and his details and feet, though well understood, are often dulleth and uninteresting." Haydon's fame as a theorist and lecturer will last longer than as a painter. His great historical works are chiefly nearly forgotten by the public; but if the public and the government could only see what they never did but rarely do, national emendation, and if art and its professors be benefited in consequence, the consummation is one almost attributable to Haydon alone.

GODFREY OF BOUILLON.

THE present King of Belgium is making praiseworthy efforts to foster the spirit of nationality in his prosperous kingdom, by reviving, in every way in his power, reminiscences of the past glories of old Flanders, and of the distinguished part it played in ancient times in all the great movements of the continent under the Dukes of Burgundy, so famous in war, and love, and romance. No one amongst them all was better worthy of a place in the midst of the capital than that grand old Fleming, Godfrey de Bouillon, so brave, so modest, so mighty arm; how wisely he ruled over Jerusalem; what sagacity he displayed in the famous Assizes, which he caused to be enacted for the government of his new kingdom; how piously he died, and how he was buried on Mount Calvary close to the tomb of Christ; and how the Christians all wept for him as a father, and friend, and strong deliverer, and the Mussulmans as a beneficent and just ruler? His very name recalls all the virtues and all the beauties of the heroic age in which he lived.

devout, the very type of chivalry, the model and predecessor of Bayard and Gaston de Foix: Who has not heard how, when sick unto death, he made a vow to deliver the Holy Sepulchre from the infidels, and when he recovered how he sold a large part of his dominions and his seigniorial rights to defray the expenses of the expedition; what discipline and order he preserved amongst his forces on the march; how he starved himself that the starving women of the camp might have food; what an enormous number of Saracen giants he slew; what visions from heaven appeared to him and encouraged him; what a commanding countenance he had, what a ladies, what dress they wore at noon, when about to take their lessons on the harpsichord, or receive the visits of the gallant officers or gay cavaliers who at that hour called upon them clothed in black from head to foot. Francis Mieris also shows us, as in a mirror, this same elegance, these same domestic comforts, the same carved furniture, the same polished lustres, the same splendid glasses glittering with golden liqueurs. He paints for us, in his own way, and with certain peculiarities of his own, manners in which he certainly did not partake. There was this singularity in Mieris, that while his pictures bore the expression of refined thoughts, his habits did not. His works, instead of revealing his life, concealed it.

The equestrian statue, represented in our engraving, was inaugurated in August, 1848. It stands in the Place Royale of Brussels, on the spot formerly occupied by that of Charles of Lorraine, which was erected by the States of Brabant, but which was destroyed by the French in 1794. It was cast in bronze by M. Soyer, of Paris, after a model by Eugene Simonis, which was one of the most striking objects in the Great Exhibition of 1851. The great crusader is represented holding the banner of the cross in his right hand, his left curbs his impatient charger, and his eyes are raised to heaven as if invoking the Divine benediction on his army.

This celebrated painter was the son of a lapidary. He was born at Leyden, on the 11th of April, 1635. "Perceiving his taste for painting," said Houbraken, "his father placed him under the tuition of Abraham Torenvliet, a famous painter on glass and a good designer. Thence he entered the school of Gerard Douw, where in a very short time he surpassed all his companions, and thus gained the affection of his master, who called him the prince of his scholars. After the lapse of some years, his father removed him to study under Abraham Van Tempel, an historical painter; but he did not remain long with him, as his natural inclination led him to adopt Gerard Douw's manner, which was extremely delicate, and required extraordinary care."

This Abraham Van Tempel was a man of large and powerful intellect, if we may judge from those of his paintings which we have seen at the Hague. His full-length portraits have a bold outline, and he was admirably calculated to inspire Mieris with a taste for historical painting; but the fact that the latter let slip this opportunity of enlarging his style—and we were going to say his thoughts—proves beyond doubt that he perceived from the first that his true road to success lay in the track of his old master, Gerard Douw. He, therefore, returned to the studio of the latter, and continued to labour under his eye with all a pupil's modesty, often taking his advice when he was himself far more competent to judge. However, there were at Leyden several amateurs, who admired him greatly, and frequently expressed to him their surprise that he did not begin to work upon his own account and shake off the dust of the school, since he had already surpassed his master. As they were warm friends who held this language to him, he would probably have put it down to pardonable partiality, and have continued his old course, if one of them, Professor Silvius, had not volunteered, in proof of his sincerity, to purchase every painting that came from his pencil.

So flattering a proposal had the desired effect. Miéris left Gerard Douw, and began to work for himself, and, thanks to the friendship of Silvius, he was soon enabled to make a striking display of his talents. The archduke Leopold William was passionately fond of painting; Silvius persuaded him, without difficulty, to give Miéris an order, assuring him that he would receive a chef-d'œuvre. The artist did honour to his friend's recommendation. It was, in fact, upon this occasion that he executed the famous work so well known in Germany as "Die Seidenhändlerinn," The Silk-mercer. It is, in truth, a gem of art. In it Miéris put into practice everything that Gerard Douw had taught him; he was perfectly competent to render the rich fabrics in all their varieties of shade and hue, lustring, satin, and velvet; he knew how to arrange the light so as to throw out the figures and the most remarkable objects into strong relief, leaving all else buried in deep but transparent shade. By tricks of the brush he was able to render the nature of each substance evident at a glance—the down upon feathers, the polish of steel; it seems as if we could touch with our finger the silky hair of a spaniel, as well as the rich woof of a Turkey carpet. Miéris knew how, in short, to lend to the actors in a scene borrowed from ordinary life all the finesse of expression necessary to relieve the simplicity of such a subject, and give piquancy to a matter of such slender interest.

The painting executed for the archduke represented a silk-mercer's shop, attended by a young woman of passing beauty. A nobleman, elegantly dressed, with feathers in his hat and a sword at his side, has entered, and, struck by the charms of the fair owner of the shop, cannot resist the temptation of touching her lightly under the chin with his fingers, with all the polite impertinence of a gay man of the world. The lady blushes, smiles, and continues to turn over the pieces of silk; but the gentleman is far less occupied with the richness of the articles he has come to purchase than the charms of her who shows them. At the further end of the shop, before a large fireplace, sits a man, most likely the jealous husband of the fair mercer. He has caught the stranger's movement with the corner of his eye, but not daring to give vent to his feelings before so dashing a customer, contents himself with shaking his finger ominously at his wife, as if threatening a curtain lecture of no ordinary severity. The archduke was delighted. He paid Miéris a thousand florins, and offered him a pension of a thousand six-dollars if he would consent to go to Vienna, and work there for the court, in which case his labours would be liberally recompensed. But the artist politely declined, alleging as an excuse the disinclination of his wife to leave her native country.

Henceforward the painter of Leyden found himself eagerly sought after by the amateurs. All strove which should have his works at any price. Cornelius Praats, whose son was alderman of the town of Leyden, and who had himself taken some lessons from Francis Miéris, entered into an agreement to pay him a ducat of gold for every hour it might take him to execute a painting representing the "Swooning of a Young Girl." Miéris discharged his task in Praat's house, and received not less than fifteen hundred florins. The grand duke of Tuscany having come to Leyden, on seeing this painting was so charmed with it, that he offered Praats three thousand florins for it, but the latter would not part with it upon any terms, nor with a portrait of Madame Praats, painted also by Miéris. The same thing has probably never occurred with regard to any family portrait as with regard to this. Attempts were made to purchase it while the original was still living, as if the excellence of the work itself was sufficient to supply the want of any interest in the subject.

Not being able to meet with any amateur who would sell him a Miéris, the grand duke paid a visit to the painter himself, and amongst the works which he found in his studio in an unfinished state, was a very fine sketch, which he begged of him to complete—"An Assemblage of Ladies." Houbraken somewhere calls Metzua a painter of fashions. This singular appellation might, in this instance at least, be applied to Francis Miéris, but not in a bad sense; though there is no doubt that here the dress, or the materials of which it is composed, has an undue importance given it. If his figures were not so handsome, we might imagine that they were but a pretext for making a gorgeous display of velvet jackets, of satin petticoats, and furs. In fact, every conceivable device of luxury, every grace and elegance of fashion, appear in this work. In the background, in a sort of gallery, magnificently decorated, appear a lady and cavalier promenading up and down, and evidently engaged in agreeable chit-chat. Here a young girl, in a rich mantle of purple velvet trimmed with fur, is raising to her head a glass of some delicate wine, while a page stands before her with a silver salver; there a lady in white satin stands up with a lute in her hand, as if about to play. Opposite these splendidly attired ladies, Miéris painted a young man, wearing a short cloak of black velvet. Splendid carpets, glittering plate, a dish of bonbons, which a mischievous little monkey is eating by stealth, half-hidden under the folds of a curtain of lustring, complete the composition, which certainly displays no great depth of imagination; but the rendering of each object is marvellous, and if the hands had not been drawn in the style of Metzua and Vandyke, and had there been less distinction in the choice of the heads, one might have thought that Francis Miéris himself kept a silk-shop, like the pretty woman of his first painting, and that, unlike the gentleman in the same composition, he was more occupied with the beauties of dress than beauty of face or figure.

The search after the beautiful is one of the points in which Miéris distinguished himself, and it is upon this that his renown rests. Certainly the art of imitating dress, of polishing it by the aid of the pencil, is not sufficient to lend lustre to a painter's name, unless, indeed, he were to reach such a pitch of perfection in it as has never yet been witnessed. Paintings live only upon condition of being well executed and well touched, just as books live only on condition of being well written. But this mere excellence in form or outline is not sufficient; there must be food for the mind, and something to excite some emotion in the heart. Sometimes, we admit, when the form is exquisite, and the style of the book is piquant, though it treats of nothing—when the painter's touch is charming, and, if we may use the expression, intelligent, as in the case of a basket of strawberries, or a simple glass of water glittering with purity and freshness—it may happen that mere form will supply the want of other qualities. Thus Chardin and Metzua knew how to lend interest to the simplest scenes and incidents; but we must confess that their style is so charming, that the subtlest portion of their ability, the very essence of their character, seems to have passed into their painting; and it is in this sense that we may attribute to them great talent in execution. But if the artist has not reached this stage in his art, at which the most refined feelings of his heart drop from the point of his pencil, it is difficult for his works to survive him in the absence of some happy, animating thought. Why, then, are the works of Miéris valued as much and more at the present day than they were two hundred years ago? Because of that endeavour after the beautiful of which we just now spoke. Amongst so many Dutch painters who have chosen to copy nature at random, it is pleasant to find one who thought it not beneath him to select models, and who, preferring grace to ugliness, has preferred painting handsome women, elegantly dressed, to sketching grotesque country wenches. This is the great secret of Miéris' success, as of that of Gaspar Netscher, of Schalcken, and some others.

The grand duke of Tuscany gave a thousand rixdollars for "The Assembly of Ladies," but was not content with this alone. He wanted also, not his own portrait by Miéris, but that of Miéris by himself. The artist executed it with a good will. He painted himself showing one of his works, representing one of those subjects with which he was most familiar, "A young Girl taking her Lesson at the Harpsichord." This portrait of Miéris, which was in reality the mirror of his person and the coloured definition of his talent, was looked upon as an able work; but, according to Houbraken, the price was not this time proportioned to the value. The grand duke, at the instigation of some of his courtiers whom Miéris had offended, sent so small a sum, that the artist took umbrage at it, and refused to execute any works ever after for the Tuscan court.

Campo Weyermann relates, in the same way as Arnold Houbraken, the story of Miéris' rupture with the grand duke; but Gerard de Laïresse, in his "Great Book of the Painters," explains it differently. He says, "He who has executed works on a large scale, may afterwards execute them on a small scale if he wish; whilst those who are always occupied with little things, cannot pass to great ones but with difficulty. Miéris, who was so justly celebrated for works on a small scale, has lost all the esteem in which the grand duke of Tuscany, his Mediceas, held him, through attempting to paint portraits in life-size; and it is the same with many others." It is not difficult to believe Gerard de Laïresse in this matter, not only because he was a man of distinguished abilities, who made no assertion lightly, but because he was on terms of intimacy with Miéris. He had, in fact, undertaken the education of one of the artist's sons, John Miéris, who went to practise painting in Italy, where he died. By a fortunate, but curious coincidence in his character, Francis, whom the example of Jan Steen had led into habits of tippling, detested the vice in others. So Gerard de Laïresse, grave and solemn in his looks, was a bit of a libertine in his manners, and for this reason Miéris removed his son from his care, lest his example should corrupt the youth's morals.

This contrast between their lives and their works is a comparatively rare feature in the history of painters. Miéris, who devoted his whole talents to search after beauty, or to the delineation of the interior of the luxurious abodes of the middle classes of Holland, than the richest and yet most austere in the world, was,—we are sorry to say it—a drunkard. He was on terms of close intimacy with a painter of Leyden, the famous Jan Steen, an amusing philosopher and a professed tippler. Steen's lively conversation, his jovial disposition, his witty sallies, his careless, joyous way of living without a thought of the morrow, had a seductive influence upon Miéris, who, at last, was so fascinated that he could never tear himself away from his company. Steen having become a tavern-keeper, Miéris became one of his best customers, and the two often passed the night drinking and carousing with John Lievens, Ary de Voys, and some others. Steen was soon ruined and obliged to take down his sign, and then Miéris accompanied him to other taverns, and the two artists and their old companions often protracted their revels far on in the night.

Houbraken tells a curious anecdote regarding one of these merry-makings. One night, after a very joyous meeting, Miéris set out to come home alone, and in crossing a narrow bridge fell off it into a deep stream. He was quite tumbled, and as it was not likely that there was any one near at such a late hour, there was every prospect of his career coming to an inglorious end. However, he roared lustily, and as good luck would have it, there was a cobbler living close at hand, and was still at work, singing and hammering away. His wife heard Miéris' cries, and having called her husband's attention to them, they both took a light and ran in the direction from which the sound came. There they found our painter, gorgeously dressed, with gold buttons on his coat, stuck fast in the mud. They dragged him out, took him to their house, and, having dried his garments, sent him home. Miéris was thoroughly sobered by the time of his release, but was so much ashamed of the adventure that he concealed his name.

Being, however, very kind-hearted, the painter determined to reward the poor people for the kindness they had shown him, and what better token of gratitude could an artist bestow than one of his paintings. He, accordingly, set to work upon one, the subject of which has not reached us, but as he could only labour at it at intervals, it was not finished for two years. As soon as he had given it the last touch, he went one evening to the cobbler's, with his canvas concealed under his cloak. He found nobody there but the wife, and having entered into conversation with her, found that she really did not know the name of the man whom they had rescued. He then produced the picture and presented it to her, telling her to keep it as an acknowledgment of the service which rendered him in getting him out of the drain. "But if," he added, "you would prefer money, take it to M. Praats." He then disappeared abruptly, without saying who he was. The woman showed the present to several of her neighbours, all of whom assured her it was very valuable. Her curiosity was at last thoroughly roused, and she took the picture to Jacob Vandermaas, burgo-master, residing in the Hooygraft, in whose house she had lived as a servant, who was surprised to see an article of such value in her possession, and at once recognised it as the work of Miéris, and valued it at one hundred ducatoons. "I would give that sum myself, but first go to so and so," said he, mentioning the names of some of the amateurs, "and ask eight hundred florins, and you will be sure to get them." She did as he directed, and was successful.

We have many times heard connoisseurs, in talking of painting, place Gabriel Metzua above Miéris. It seems to us that Miéris' touch is sometimes painful, and even scraped and dragged, when compared with the light and intellectual touch of Metzua. There is a picture of the former in the Dresden Gallery, which well illustrates the excellences of Miéris' style, and proves beyond doubt that the works of every artist, however great his genius, vary vastly in quality. In this, of which we present our readers with an engraving, (p. 136) a young girl, of light character, is listening to the proposals of an old matron. The subject is in itself rather gross, but the painter has treated it with great delicacy. The thought is clearly indicated, and yet there is nothing to shock us in the expression of it. The careless attitude of the young woman is so distingue, if we may be allowed the word, that it atones for the plainness of the meaning, and there is an indescribable air of voluptuous modesty about it, which interests us in the highest degree. Without showing her handsome face, except in profile, to save her the embarrassment which a little stretch of fancy will induce us to believe the full view of the spectator at such a moment would cause her, she leaves her beauty to our imagination, but lets us see her grace. The light falls upon her ear, and extends slightly upon her cheek, leaving the greater part of it in transparent shadow. Nothing can be more charming than the turn of her neck, and the knot in which her auburn hair is fastened, with pearls intermingled with the tresses. She wears a satin robe, and a sort of jacket, embroidered with gold. Her fine head leans languidly upon her left hand, which is set of beauteous and done, the other falls gracefully over the back of the chair, and between her fingers she crumples a letter, which she has just been reading. Upon the table, on which her elbow is resting, we see a book and a manubria. In the background appears the exterior of a palace, but within the apartment, a little to the left, may be seen a piece of furniture in the shape of an altar, on which is written the word Amour. The whole is finished with such exquisite delicacy, that one might fancy it was executed upon ivory. As it is considered very valuable, it is placed under glass, which gives it the appearance of a large miniature. No other painting could give on this picture without losing the fascinating influence of female charms stealing over him.

Gerard de Lairesse, in the chapter in which he speaks of painters on a small scale, and mainly of Miéris, has put several opinions upon record, which we feel it to be our duty to combat here, notwithstanding the weight they must have in coming from such a quarter. "We must remember," says he, "that objects painted on a small scale cannot be truth, nor even the appearance of truth; for there can be no doubt that paintings which represent objects thus should only be considered as nature seen from a distance, through a door or window, whether within or without a building, so that they ought to be painted in such wise that on being hung against a artist who paints diminutive pieces, as Miéris, intends not to exhibit distant objects, but, on the contrary, to bring them nearer that they may be better seen; and if he diminishes their real size, it is in order that the spectator by approaching as closely to the picture as he pleases may be enabled to seize upon the minutest details. In the distance we see nothing but large masses; the various parts appear confused and undecided, the contour is lost; the angles are softened down, the precise shape of an object, and a fortiori, the small points in its physiognomy escape the eye completely. If, then, the painter executes his work under these conditions — that wall, they may not appear to be a panel or painted canvas, but that they should truly resemble a window, through which one really sees nature; a result which cannot be obtained by warm shadows or brilliant colouring, but by soft and feeble colouring, broken by the interposition of the surrounding air, according as it is serene or loaded with vapour."

To this "laying down of the law" we take exception, and, in our humble opinion, a painter, who acted upon such principles, would be sure to go astray. If it were admitted that a small painting should represent nature as she appears in the distance, the painter would plainly defeat his object. An is, with that weakening of the tone which aerial perspective demands—what follows? Why, the spectator, by an inexplicable delusion, will see things close at hand which ought to be lost in the indistinctness of distance, and touch with his finger objects which, nevertheless, should escape him, being two hundred yards off. Is not this, then, a monstrous contradiction between the actual effect of a picture and its intention? Why does the amateur delight in the works of Gerard Douw, of Slengelandt, and Miéris? Because he wants to have in the narrow limits of his own abode an epitome of all the wonders of the pencil, an entire gallery in a space twelve feet square. To satisfy him you must give him the incidents and characters of the outer world, condensed, as it were, into the smallest possible dimensions, the heroes of everyday life (some of them might readily be comprised within a frame of twelve inches square); and, if this be true, what becomes of Laïresse's theory? Would the fortunate owner of these masterpieces in miniature be content to see these figures, which he wished to have within easy eye-reach, fading dimly in the shifting hues of the atmosphere, and flying altogether from the tranquil but confined abode in which he wished to retain them, that he might feed his eyes

Molière, Richelieu, Louis XIII., and other "glasses of fashion" at that period. He has painted himself under various aspects—sometimes as a soldier, at others as a simple citizen. The Museum at the Hague exhibits him in the interior of his own house, in his everyday dress, leaning over his wife, and amusing himself by pulling the ears of a little spaniel that his wife holds upon her knees. (See our engraving, p. 132.) The Dresden Gallery contains not less than three pictures, in which Miéris has given his own portrait with great complaisance. In one we find him in his studio conversing with a handsome girl, of whom we, however, see upon them? These observations of Gerard de Laïresse are all the more surprising as coming from the pen of a painter, for it would be impossible to execute a picture in accordance with them, since it would have no foreground except the frame. Think of a picture without a foreground! It must be confessed that if Miéris did not know how to execute works upon a large scale, Laïresse did not know how to talk of pictures on a small one.

If we may judge by the portraits which Miéris has left us of himself, he had a handsome face, gay-looking, but the expression slightly sensual, a brilliant eye, a prominent mouth, overhung by a soft moustache worn in the style adopted by nothing but her back, who has come to sit for her portrait, but her face appears on the canvas as in a mirror. Both the painter and the model are dressed with a richness and coquettishness which happily the graver is able to render almost with as much accuracy as the colours of the master himself, as may be seen by the example which we furnish (p. 144). Miéris is dressed in black velvet, with tight silk breeches of bright blue, fastened below the knees with garters ornamented by rosettes, and ribbon shoe-ties. Nothing can be more elegant or recherché than his appearance. Stultz could not surpass it. While the model is resting, a servant is bringing in refreshments. In another Miéris has evidently made himself rather the subject for a painting than the original of a portrait. It is evidently himself whom we see dressed as a trumpeter in the picture bearing that name. (See our engraving, p. 110.) This was, no doubt, executed to have the pleasure of painting himself in the magnificent uniform worn by the Spanish soldiers who were sent into the Low Countries to suppress the insurrection. The costume certainly is very picturesque. If the head were not in this instance full of life and vigour and intelligence, one would think that "The Trumpeter" was chosen merely for the display of a dashing uniform. A tight blue jacket, covered with trappings, and furnished with yellow sleeves, a mezzotine cap of the same colour as the jacket, green gaiters with golden fringes, and a sword with glittering hilt—such is the uniform. And whether Miéris exhibit himself in warlike panoply or by the side of his easel, he is still ever in the midst of luxury. All the objects which make up the learned confusion of a studio contend, we will not say for the spectator's attention, but for whatever of it he has to spare after having bestowed sufficient upon the principal figure. A violoncello resting against a piece of furniture, covered with a curtain, announces the fact, that the painter solaces his labours by occasional performances upon it.

One would imagine that if Miéris displayed in his house as much luxury and magnificence as he affects in his paintings, he would soon have been ruined, in spite of the high price which he put upon his works. Add to this, that owing to the extraordinary delicacy of finish which he bestowed upon all his pictures, he could execute comparatively a small number only, not to speak of the indolent habits which he acquired from his friend Steen. Accordingly we find in many works in which he is mentioned, and notably in the "Catalogue de Lorangère," by Gersaint, his conduct was anything but orderly. His habits were expensive, and involved him in a number of debts, for which he was several times put in prison. One of his creditors kept him there a long time, and when his friends urged him to paint something that would procure his release, he replied, "that the sight of the bar and the sound of the bolts rendered the imagination sterile." Gersaint travelled a good deal in Holland, and while there picked up much information regarding the painters; and it is, therefore, not unlikely that he learnt some of these details from Miéris' own friends. Certainly neither Houbraken nor Campo Weyermann make mention of this circumstance.

Francis Miéris died in 1681, at the age of forty-six, leaving two sons, John and William; the last of whom imitated his manner with considerable ability, and maintained the celebrity of the name. Francis exhausted life rapidly. As a painter his sentiment of the beautiful was lively; as a man he was ever tending towards the bad and degrading. He loved what was tasteful and distinguished, but lived in a public-house; he loved luxury and ruined himself by it. By dint of admiring Steen's wit, he came to imitate his joyous indolence, and his wicked and dishonest carelessness; laughing, glass in hand, at the amount of his debts. But in spite of this gross existence, Miéris always preserved enough love of the beautiful and elegant to impel him to the choice of fine features, delicate complexions, handsome heads, graceful attitudes, and tasteful dress, and those splendid fabrics which were indispensable in his painting, since he never dared to paint the naked figure.

It is not difficult to decide what rank Miéris should assume among painters of familiar scenes. The distinction between the various masters, Terburg, Metz, Gerard Douw, and Miéris, consists rather in shades of talent than degrees of merit. If we examine them closely, we shall find that Miéris is rather below his three rivals. As compared to his master, Gerard Douw, he has, without doubt, a more brilliant colouring, and is more delicate than he in the common features. His celebrated picture, "The Strolling Tinker" in the Dresden Gallery, proves, beyond doubt, that he was able to give great delicacy to the most vulgar physiognomies. It is not easy to forget, when once seen, the expression on the face of this tinker, as he raises a riddle between him and the light, to enable him to see the cracks, with an air worthy of a learned antiquary who is trying to decipher a precious manuscript, or to verify the enamelling of a piece of old armour, while the woman who owns the article stands at the door of her tavern, shaded by a vine-branch, and awaits the result of the investigation with anxious impatience. But though delicate as Douw, Miéris has not the same nobility and elevation of mind. He could never have painted pictures so full of pathos and simple dignity as "The Dropsical Woman," and "The Reading of the Bible." His works, in short, always make us desire more sentiment and less satire.

Miéris always ably availed himself of the resources of chiaro-scuro to subordinate the accessories, and give full prominence to the principal objects. He could soften down unpleasant details by great masses of shadow. He was skilled also in the properties of chiaro-scuro, if we may be allowed the expression: as, for example, when he painted a faulx nymph buried in sleep, her head resting on cushions, and disclosing through her open corset a bosom of snowy whiteness, at the further end of the room an old dwarf, who is receiving money from a cavalier, with his hat pulled down over his eyes; he reserves all the light for the sleeping beauty, and casts the act of the old woman into the shade, as if he saw some connexion between the chiaro-scuro of morality and of art. But as regards touch, Terburg and Metz seem to us superior to Miéris. Without doubt, the execution of the latter painter is valuable. He impresses his character on each object; he renders the flesh, the silk, the ermine, the velvet, the marble, the ebony, all the drapery, the substances, and it seems at first as if it was perfection itself. At the same time, if we compare Miéris with Terburg, and, above all, with Metz, we perceive all at once that there is still a degree above merit of this sort.

We have stated that Miéris was, par excellence, the painter of the Dutch middle classes. Accordingly, many of his subjects are drawn from scenes in their life, and illustrate their costume and manners. "The Lady with the Parrot" (p. 111), now in the collection of Sir Robert Peel, is one of the best, and decidedly the most celebrated of this class. There is an air of pleasant and abstracted reverie about her face as she feeds her favourite. In the dress Miéris displays all his great powers of imitation. The painting first became celebrated as the "Red Corset."

In "The Philosopher," which we have engraved, Miéris gives evidence of a much higher kind of talent than he has displayed in his other works. In this the elaboration of details, though still carefully attended to, occupies only a secondary position. The main interest of the piece is centred in the principal figure. The old man's head is a fine expression of the idea of calm clear-headedness, of deep thought, and of a life far removed from the petty passions, tumults, and turmoil of the world without.

Finishing is not the great difficulty in painting, if we understand by this the mixing of colours, and the polish obtained by patience and a scraped, the extreme care bestowed upon all the details, and a certain propriety of pencil which never errs through negligence or oversight. Many Dutch masters have given what was then called the fine finish: but the real finish is that which is not perceptible, giving the work the final touches without suffering the trouble bestowed on it to be visible—those expressive touches, we mean, which lend it an air of freedom and boldness. Finishing, in the right acceptance of the word, is rubbing out by a light, graceful, and eloquent touch that wearisome propriety, that solemn uniformity, as fatiguing for the spectator to see as for the painter to create. To finish is to give character to a plan, shading to an outline, and to the essentials of a painting—to the flat parts of the face, for example, or the rendering of a hand—that last emphasis which is life.

Considering that he lived only forty-six years, and finished all his works with extraordinary care, it was impossible that Miéris could have produced a great number. Smith, in his "Catalogue Raisonné" of the most eminent Dutch, Flemish, and French painters, enumerates one hundred and fifty-six works known to be Miéris'. We shall proceed to mention the principal galleries and collections in Europe in which they are to be found.

In the Belvedere Gallery at Vienna.—“A Sick Girl,” a doctor feeling her pulse. Small figures as far as the knees, signed Fransz Miéris, f. 1656.

“The Silkmereer” of which we have previously spoken at length—a young woman exhibiting her wares, and a cavalier with his hand on her chin, signed F. Van Miéris, 1660. The Pinacotheca of Munich contains sixteen of Miéris’ works, amongst which may be seen his portrait, in which he represents himself wearing a red cap with ostrich feathers; “A Lady playing with her Parrot, and another Lady with her Dog;” “A Breakfast of Oysters;” and, last of all, the celebrated painting known as “The Sick Woman,” one of his masterpieces. It represents a lady fainting away in the presence of her physician. This was a favourite subject with Miéris, as well as that of the woman with the parrot and dog.

In the Dresden Gallery we find twelve of this master’s works. Of these we shall mention “Tempting Proposals,” a splendid work, to which we have already alluded at some length. This is sometimes called “The Teller of Good Fortune,” but from what we have said above it will be seen that this title is hardly appropriate. “The Tinker,” a composition containing several figures. “A Young Soldier smoking his Pipe;” “The Painter’s Studio,” p. 141: in this Miéris is represented with a young lady, whose portrait appears on the canvas. Another “Painter’s Studio;” in this the artist, with his palette in his hand, is standing beside a visitor showing him a picture which he has just commenced.

The Hermitage at St. Petersburg.—“The Dutch Rising,” a lady rising and playing with her little dog.

The Leuchtenburg Gallery.—“A Woman holding a cage open upon the table, and giving liberty to a bird.” “A Lady walking on a garden terrace,” accompanied by a cavalier, who holds his hat in his hand, and followed by a little dog; painted on wood, and signed F. Van Miéris, 1675; these two paintings have been etched by Muxel.

The Florence Gallery.—“The Shopper,” “A Young Man with a Bird,” “An Old Man offering Money to a Young Woman,” and a “Portrait of the Painter.”

The Mauritien Gallery.—“The Pearl Stringer,” a young girl seated before a table covered with a rich cloth; to the left, in a cozzinto, a young waiting woman.

In the Louvre there are four of Miéris’ works.

“The Interior of a Household.”

“Portrait of a Man,” signed Fransz Miéris.

In Sir Robert Peel’s collection, a young woman feeding her parrot (p. 141), a work of great beauty, of which we gave an engraving. It was purchased by Sir Robert for the sum of 500 guineas.

The Leicestershire Gallery.—“A Young Woman at her toilet, dressed in a blue satin habit, and having her cap tied under her chin.”

In the possession of Queen Victoria, in Buckingham Palace, there are four of Miéris’ works.

“A Woman with a Parrot;” in this the same red corsage appears which we see at Munich and in Sir Robert Peel’s collection.

Mr. T. Hope’s collection.—“A Gentleman wearing a brown cap with blue feathers, in a coat of olive green; before him is a bottle of wine, and a viola resting against the window. A young woman with her back to the spectator writes down the bill. The painting is dated 1660. This is one of the chef-d’œuvre of the master.

Gallery of the Marquis of Bute at Sutton House.—“The Discovered Letter.” A mother reproaching her daughter, who stands in tears with a letter in her hand.

Miéris’ drawings are very scarce. They are extremely delicate. There are some studies of heads, sketched with black lead, known to be his, executed with the utmost care. They are often washed in Indian ink; the truth of the flesh and the excellent rendering of the draperies are as remarkable in the drawings as in the paintings.

Miéris had under his tuition Peter Lermans, Karlede Moor, and his two sons, John and William Miéris; the last was known as the younger Miéris. In the last century, a grandson of Francis was still living, who had been the pupil of his father William, and who was the author of many works, a list of which he himself gave to Argenville, from whom we borrow it:—“A Description of the Episcopal Seals and Coins of the Bishops of Utrecht.”

“History of the Princes of the Houses of Bavaria, of Burgundy, and of Austria, who have reigned over the Low Countries,” 3 vols. folio; with more than a thousand medals drawn by the author from the originals.

“Dissertations upon Feudal Law in Holland,” Leyden, 1748. 8vo.

“The Great Book of the Charter of the Counts of Holland,” Leyden, 1753. 4 vols. folio.

“The Privileges and Customs of the Country of Deventer.”

Great numbers of engravers have reproduced Miéris’ works. Amongst those best known are

Bary—“The Drunken Woman Asleep.”

Basan—“The Dutch Rising,” “The Dutch Breakfast.”

“The Lace-worker” of the old gallery of Brühl. “The Fair Gardener,” “The Dutch Nap.”

Blotting—“The Portrait of Miéris.”

Greenwood has engraved “The Portraits of Miéris at His Wife, and the Little Dog,” in the same style.

Ignonet—“The Flemish Market-woman.”

Migneret—“A young Girl giving milk.”

Haid—“The Trumpeter awaiting orders,” a painting in the Burghaus collection. “The Surgeon,” in the Knoke collection at Angsburg.

Villain—“The young Man with Birds,” in the Hermitage Gallery.

Wille has engraved six copies of Miéris’ “The Dutch Knitter,” which, however, has been purchased by Basan. “The Alison O’Leary,” in the Hermitage collection, which we have engraved, a boy looking at a young woman who is passing outside, with an English translation of “The Dutch Cook.”

In England, as we have seen, there are remarkably few engravings of Miéris’ pictures, and indeed, of the same artist, with the exception of the “Dutch Knitter,” which we have engraved, a boy looking at a young woman who is passing outside, with an English translation of “The Dutch Cook.”

"A Lady in a scarlet dressing-gown," trimmed with white ermine, and a straw-coloured petticoat. She is giving some cake to her parrot. This is the famous "Red Corset," of which we have already spoken, and of which we give an engraving p. 141, now in the collection of Sir

COPPER-PLATE ENGRAVING.

ENGRAVING is an art essentially popular. It diffuses the beauties of painting without lessening them. It prevents their remaining exclusively in the possession of the wealthy and the fortunate, and places them within the reach of the poorest. It elevates the masses by making them participate in the ennobling thoughts which arise out of the contemplation of the masterpieces of great minds. What printing has done for science, engraving has done for art. These two splendid discoveries, which have shed abroad beauty and enlightenment, ideas and forms, have this peculiarity—that we cannot conceive them separate, and that they seem to be born, if we may use the expression, of one another. Thus printing, which seems to owe its origin to wood engraving, in its turn produced engraving on metals, by the facilities which it exhibited for the production of prints.

There are several kinds of engraving: copper-plate, etching, aqua-tinta, dotted, stippling, outline; but it is copper-plate engraving alone which may be called classical; and with it we shall occupy ourselves here.

Most people know that copper-plate engraving consists in cutting the copper with a sharp instrument called the graver, or burin, and thus tracing upon it clean, regular, and divided lines, which, on being impressed on paper, after receiving a coating of ink, not only produce the sum of black and white sketched in the drawing, but, by their direction, their turn, their form, their thickness or attenuation, indicate the character of the objects they represent—the shading and morbidezza of the flesh, the polish of metal, the softness of drapery, the airy lightness of feathers, the weight and hardness of marble. Stroke engraving, or rather the art of taking proof impressions from engraved steel or copper-plates, only dates from about the middle of the fifteenth century; and it is somewhat surprising that the ancients, who understood dis-sinking and cutting-reliefs both on stone and metal so well, should never have thought of taking impressions of their works upon paper, or parchment, or papyrus. What treasures would have come down to us if the art of engraving had been known in the time of Pericles! Although its origin is rather obscure, it appears to be tolerably well ascertained that engraving, or rather the idea of printing engravings, first saw the light in the workshop of a Florentine goldsmith, Maso Finiguerra, who first learned to take impressions from niello—that is, of the little ornaments placed on gold and silver plates by stamping; but the word niello properly signifies black enamel (nigellum), which was melted and poured into the hollows of the engraving, to make them stand in higher relief.

There are many curious stories told of the origin of the invention. According to one, a laundress, having by chance placed some wet linen upon a vessel which Finiguerra had just engraved, was surprised to find on removing it that it bore a distinct impression of the ornaments upon which it had been resting, and upon her master's hearing of it, it furnished him with the key to the new branch of art, that of taking impressions of engravings. We say of taking impressions, because there is no doubt that the art of engraving, of damaskeening, of inlaying, was known to the ancients; and previously to his discovery, Finiguerra himself, according to Vasari, had engraved for the church of St. John the Baptiste, at Florence, little figures of the Passion upon those silver patens, then called peaces, because upon them the faithful bestowed the kiss of peace at religious festivals. In the year 1452, also, the same year in which Guttenberg and Faust printed their first Latin Bible at Mayence, Finiguerra having engraved the peaces of which we have just spoken, and wishing to ascertain the state of his plate, having poured the niello upon it, took an impression of it with plaster, in accordance with the usual custom of goldsmiths. Upon this plaster, the lines of which were in relief, he poured sulphur, and in the hollows of the sulphur he passed smoke black, which produced the same outward appearance as niello.*

But in order that he might see the effect upon a clearer ground, and thus judge of it better, he bethought him of taking proofs upon moist paper, as was the custom with engravers on wood. This experiment was repeated with more durable ink upon the silver paten as the work advanced, and the impressions thus obtained were the first engravings. One of these proofs, a relic of inestimable value, is preserved in the Cabinet des Estampes in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris, where it was discovered about half a century ago, by the Abbé Zani, who, after diligent research and careful comparison, at last put his hand upon the earliest productions of the art.

He also found by a happy accident that the peaces engraved and enamelled by Finiguerra for St. John's Church at Florence were still there, as also the register in which the sum paid to the artist is recorded, and which enabled him to fix the date of the work with accuracy—1452. There are extant, also, besides this proof on paper in the Cabinet des Estampes, two proofs in sulphur, which belonged to the famous amateurs, Serrati and Durazzo, so that there is no gap in our knowledge regarding this curious process.

The invention had hardly issued from the laboratory of its author, when it began to spread abroad; but still its progress was not rapid. The peaces of Finiguerra were remarkable for beauty of execution, delicacy of outline, and the expression of the figures, to the number of forty-two, symmetrically grouped according to the usage of the time, and representing the "Assumption of the Virgin." But Baldini and Sandro Boticello, to whom Finiguerra first confided the results of his discovery, were slow in following it up. The plates which the two artists produced, and which were drawn by Boticello and engraved by Baldini, representing principally scenes in Dante's "Divina Comedia," bear all the marks of inexperience and simplicity. Nevertheless, at the same time that Italy produced engraving, Martin Schongauer, a painter and goldsmith, and a native of Culmbach, in Germany, about the year 1460, produced some pieces displaying the utmost finish and delicacy, and great firmness and clearness in the lines,—and altogether so admirable, that it was almost certain that these were not the first results of the kind obtained in Germany; and their beauty has been adduced as a proof that Germany, and not Italy, was entitled to the honour of having first produced the new art.

The second half of the fifteenth century saw a number of engravers appear, who, with better materials and greater experience, would have risen to sublimity. We do not here speak of Pollajuolo only, who foreshadowed historical engraving in those large plates in which he imitated the easy play of the brush; but, above all, of Andrew Montegna, who, with a process which was still but rudimentary, revived the Greek style in those gems of his which breathe all the fragrant odour of antiquity. The truth is, however, that the glories of engraving did not begin until the sixteenth century, the age in which Albert Durer, Lucas de Leyden, and Mark Antony flourished. If we take, for example, the engraving of "St. Jerome," we must acknowledge that in it Albert Durer has pushed both variety and precision to their limits. What originality, what harmony, what delicacy there is in every line of this work, though traced more than three centuries ago! A bright light enters by two glass windows into the anchorite's chamber, and throws the trembling shadow of the frame upon the embrasures. The saint, whose head displays great character, is seated before his pulpit, and appears buried in the study of the Scriptures. A multitude of objects enter into the composition, and yet, for the first time perhaps, each of them preserves its own physiognomy. A fir plank is rendered with marvellous truth. A lion and a fox crouching in the foreground are treated in such a manner as to express well the fine hair of the one, and the coarse and shaggy covering of the other. The lines are throughout delicate and close without meagreness, and so drawn as to mark the perspective, the form, and the nature of the thing delineated; and the copper is cut with a

* Of niello we have spoken in the ILLUSTRATED EXHIBITOR AND MAGAZINE OF ART, vol. I. p. 200, when describing a vase of that style now in the British Museum.

The history of this discovery of Zani may be found in a work which he published at Parma, in 1802, entitled, "Materiali per servire alla storia dell' Incisione in rame e in legno."

clearness and propriety which charm the eye. We might mention a great many other works of the same master, in which we know not which to admire most—the gloomy and fantastic genius which has suggested them, or the exquisite feeling which presided at their execution:—"The Armoury with the Death's Head," "The Cavalier and the Lady," and "Melancholy," in which, without mentioning the sublimity of the thought, he has so happily rendered substances so different—the polish of metals, the lightness of feathers, the hair of a sleeping dog; "The Prodigal Son," so remarkable by the exquisite rendering of the swine eating from the trough; "The Arms with Cock's Head," which in execution are perhaps amongst the highest efforts of art; "The Satyr," in which he has displayed so much talent in landscape; "St. Hubert," and lastly, the "Death's Horse," all unite numberless beautiful beauties, and the proofs of them, already so scarce, will soon be priceless.

As an engraver, Dürer fulfilled in aerial perspective. Lucas de Leyden, his contemporary, was the first who rightly applied its principles to the practice of the new art. From the age of fifty he engraved with facility etchings on copper-plate—compositions admirable not only for richness of arrangement and the expression of the figures, but also for the distribution of the light; and he first discovered the method of indicating the respective distance of objects by greater lightness or heaviness of touch. In valuable engravings, such as "The Fall of Haman," "Jesus on the Cross," "The Prodigal Son," in which great delicacy of execution is combined with the rare and simplicity of the gothic style, Lucas gives some lessons that painters themselves might learn with profit. "The varied colours of painting," says Vasari, "could hardly display in the different stages of a picture so much harmony and truth." During this time Mark Antony, although so distinguished by Dürer's engravings as to be tempted to imitate them, attacked the designs which he purposeful reproducing, whether his own or those of Raphael, with a ruder and more robust hand. Far from seeking to render, by nice or curious labour, the character of each object, the lightness of the hair for instance, the variety of dress and drapery, the softness of crinins, the brilliancy of steel, he contented himself with carrying the shade in great thick masses to the edge of the light, suppressing all minor tints, and scattering over the plate large patches of pure white, which gave the work an appearance of bold and energetic relief, and produced a very powerful effect. When applied to admirable designs, which could easily dispense with the niceties which Lucas de Leyden and Albert Dürer introduced into the accessories, this decided manner of Mark Antony dealing with a few forms of almost godlike beauty, was the means of introducing into the history of art one of its most brilliant phases, and at the same time first showed the capital importance of good drawing to the engraver.

Before passing to the most flourishing periods in the history of the art, we must not forget to name here those wonderful artists known as the masters. Albert Altdorfer, so clever in wood-engraving, Jacob Binck, Sebald Beham, George Pens, and Theodor de Bry, who put so much character, so much grandeur, and so much pure and masculine drawing into their diminutive works. Side by side with Lucas de Leyden, Dürer, and Mark Antony, or rather under their influence, there grew up a school of engraving in the Low Countries, the principal members of which were Dietrich von Starck, the Bronghels, Jerome Cock, in Italy, Mark or Rovenna, the favourite pupil of Marcus Antonius, Augustino Venturano, Lucas Nicols, Martin, who attempted to engrave in a small scale the last judgment of Michael Angelo, &c.

The second half of the sixteenth century witnessed several important revolutions in the art of engraving. A Dutchman who went to Venice to study painting was fortunate enough to labour under the eyes of Titian himself in reproducing the works of that great master. Colour was born of itself under his graver by the breadth, the freedom, the swelling or attenuation of the lines, or some strongly marked touch, or by able distribution of the light. Then came Augustino Carrichi, who, surpassing Cornelius Cort, whose pupil he was, executed real pictures with the graver, principally the "Virgin appearing to St. Jerome," after Titian's, an admirable work, the proofs of which are now very scarce, and which would almost lead us to believe that engraving had even then reached its limits. Augustino was, however, an exception. If painting could ever inspire engravers with a taste for richness of tone and finish, it would be the painting of the Venetian colourists, Giorgione, the Padani, Titian, Tintoretto, and Veronese; and it must nevertheless be acknowledged that in the engravings which were made of them, the predominant characteristics of these great masters were not preserved. The air and expression of the head were no doubt naturally rendered, but the general effect of the picture was lost; that is to say, the effect produced by the relation of tones, and the distribution of light and dark colours. The time was not yet come in which the Westermans and the Bolswerts, inspired by the genius of Rubens, introduced a complete gradation of tints between pure white and extreme black.

It was reserved for Rubens to give engraving its last and greatest impulse. This extraordinary man, of whom it might so truly be said that inhibere seipsum non potuit, and who seemed to display equal ability in all branches of art, personally directed the labour of Pontius Westermann, the two Bolswerts, Witduck, Peter de Joly, and taught them the proper colour contributions to the general effect of the chalcographie, because a light colour arms with it a mass of light, a dark colour a mass of shade. He taught them that they should not neglect local tone, which in his own paintings always played so prominent a part. He showed them, for instance, that Naples yellow, being a lighter colour than cinnabar, should be rendered in the engraving by a high stage of white. From this arose the colourist engravers, and a complete revolution in the art. Pontius and Westermann became warmer and more brilliant, and instead of showing outlines by a stroke merely, they merged them in the surrounding objects. Sometimes they revealed the colour by scattering here and there large lights, and at others by vigorous and bold lines. Sometimes, even, when the graver wrought in obedience to strong feeling, it imitated the pictorialness of etching. Bolswert was passionately fond of painting, and followed all the movements of the muscles, the form of the bones, and varied folds of drapery. As soon as the unbroken line became unsuitable, he substituted rough fragments of lines, and rows of dots and points; and by degrees, as he became more and more inspired by the fire of his model, he tarnished his work without hesitation, confused it, and made it contradictory by bold, firm touches, always intent not upon the graces of the burin, but the beauties of the plate.

The art had not yet reached its perfection, when, and in Germany above all, it began to manifest symptoms of decline. Henry Goltzius, an engraver of great talent, would have carried it to perfection, if perfection had consisted in the dexterous management of the burin. What boldness, what lightness, and yet what energy there was in his style! Unfortunately, however, his exploits in the use of the graver led him to neglect more important matters. He was a mannered imitator of Michael Angelo, sufficiently skilled in anatomy, but too fond of showing it, and being devoid of taste he gives to all the painters whom he copies his own stiff and barbarous style. He could never bring himself to represent the drawing, style, and expression of the painting he was reproducing. He forgot the character of the original, and became intent only upon showing his own dexterity. This great master, or great imitator, undoubtedly he was, but he set a very bad example—had taken the mechanism of art for art itself. John Muller, his pupil, carried the audacity of engraving to the highest degree, and at the same time the grandeur of feeling and finish of Lucas de Leyden, agreeably in his little works, exhibits the same vanity and the same defects in his larger ones. These two artists, following the example of their master, often employ but a single outline, and this gives their works an agreeable transparency; but as soon as they cross their lines, their manner becomes intolerable; their squares and lozenges, in place of indicating the flatness of flesh, resemble a piece of network thrown carelessly upon the plate, and each figure enveloped in it.

The example of Goltzius, Muller, Kilian, and Mathan was not without influence, and gave force to the tendency towards exaggeration which began to prevail in all the arts. In the seventeenth century the process acquired an extraordinary and excessive importance. Engraving became a separate and several excellent compositions. The "Holy Face," which he produced by means of a single line commencing at the end of the nose, is a unique specimen of his style, upon which some have bestowed too great a degree of admiration, and others too great a degree of depreciation; but which, in any case, fatigues the sight and leads the way to faults for which others could not make amends, as Mellan did, by excellent drawing and deep feeling. Schools of engraving began about this time to be opened, which rapidly degenerated into mere mechanical independent branch of art, with its own beauties, its own resources, its admirers, independently of the works which it reproduced, and the character of the masters with which it occupied itself. It now seemed as if the engravers were tired of spreading others' fame, and now aspired to acquire some for themselves. The singularities, the oddities, the tricks of hand, became a fashion. Then appeared Claude Mellan, who affected to engrave by means of single lines of greater or less depth; but who, nevertheless, was able by this to produce workshops, in which all the precepts taught and the rules laid down were arbitrary and often ridiculous. Our space will not permit us to enter into them.

All the artists did not, however, fall into this dry routine system. John Morin, the pupil of Philip de Champagne, reproduced all those austere, bold, and energetic portraits of the Jansenists, which his master had painted with a fine, bold, and irregular point, but, nevertheless, singularly expressive. Flesh, above all, he rendered with a liveliness, relief, and force, not to be found anywhere except perhaps in Vandyke's etchings. Jonas Suyderhoef, also, neglecting the cold regularity of lines, and occupied solely with painting his engravings, if we may use the expression, scratched and nibbled his plates, and reproduced the impastments and proud retouched lights of Rembrandt, the free manner of Huls, the touch of Ostade; whilst another artist, also superior to acquired rules, Wenceslaus Hollar, imitated with the fire point of the burin and with etching, splendid plates much sought after by amateurs, and the finest of which represent churches, skilful and bold style which has since made his works classical. He was a man of genius, possessing in the highest degree both ability in drawing and skill in cutting, the art and the dexterity of hand; he expresses in different ways the various beauties of Raphael, of Leonardo da Vinci, of Correggio, of Philip de Champagne, of Guido, of Lebrun, and of Jouvenet, and from the manner in which he translates the qualities of these great masters, one would imagine that he possessed them himself. What a fine time for engravers! While Rembrandt shut himself up in his studio, there to landscapes, animals, furs, insects—for instance, "Antwerp Cathedral," "Westminster Abbey," "Hunting," "Fishing," after Barlowe, "The Dead Mole," "The Hare," "The Muffs."

The seventeenth century was a brilliant era in the history of engraving. In it Cornelius Bloemart displayed talent previously unknown in managing the insensible transition from strong light to deep shade, and varying the tones according to the distance of the plans. In it Gerard Edelinck, invited to France by the great Colbert, taught there that dream over his mysterious and fantastic etchings, and while Prince Rupert, the nephew of Charles I., made his debut in the manipulation of the mezzotinto, of which it might be said he was the second inventor, copper-plate engraving pursued its slow and solemn march. Nanteuil, with a correct, ingenious, and delicate hand, gave a second life to the portraits of all the great men of that great age—made intellect, benevolence, and dignity shine out through their eyes—made their mouths breathe and smile, folded their collars neatly, and curled their flowing hair. Masson renewing, and even going beyond the fancies of Goltzius, gave his burin capricious and singular but expressive movements. Cornelius Wischer, though differing so widely from Edelinek, disputes the first rank with him; the Andrans produced masterpieces of art. One of them, Gerard, copied both on copper-plate with the burin and in etching, the splendid "Battles of Alexander" by Lebrun, and with so much skill as to make us sometimes doubt whether the painter's or the engraver's art was the greater.

It was not until a comparatively late period that the art began to flourish in England. The first engravings worthy of note which appeared in this country were those which accompanied an edition of "Vesaluri's Anatomy," about the year 1545, which were engraved by Thomas Geminius. They were, as might be expected, full of defects, but we can readily overlook these in consideration of its being a first attempt. The art was greatly patronised by Archbishop Parker, in the reign of Elizabeth, who constantly employed a painter and two engravers in his palace at Lambeth. One of the latter, Remigius Hogenbergh, engraved his head twice, and this is said to have been the first attempt at copper-plate engraving ever made in England. He was followed by Christopher Caxton, who undertook to make a complete set of maps of the counties of England and Wales; he engraved many of the plates himself, and they were the first set of county maps ever seen in England. But for nearly a hundred years after this, copper-plate engraving made no advance, but retained all its original coarseness and simplicity. Reginald Elstrich, who lived at the close of the sixteenth and the beginning of the seventeenth centuries, seems to have introduced a little more neatness of finish into his works than his predecessors, but none of them ever displayed a particle of taste. The art received another impulse in advance from foreigners—the family of the Passes, from Utrecht, who settled in England early in the seventeenth century. Simon de Passe was a man of literary tastes, and displayed indomitable industry. His labours formed the commencement of a new era. They displayed great neatness, clearness, and judgment, and were ably followed up by his sons, Crispin, William, and Simon, as well as by his daughter Magdalen. The native artists of his day were all below mediocrity, and limited themselves to maps, cuts, and small portraits for books.

The first English engraver of note was John Payne, a pupil of Simon de Passe. He possessed great talents, as his works testify; but they are not numerous, as he led an irregular life and died early. The principal are frontispieces and other book-cuts and portraits; he also executed a variety of other objects,—landscapes, animals, flowers, fruits, birds; but several of his portraits are very fine, and by far the best of his works; these he executed entirely with the graver, and in a fine open style, and they have a very pleasing effect. He also engraved a large print of a ship, called the "Royal Sovereign," on two plates, which, when joined, were three feet long by two feet two inches high. He died about the year 1648.

Charles I. was the first English monarch who was sufficiently alive to the beauty of engraving to appoint an engraver royal, and Robert Vander Voerst was the man on whom the honour was conferred. He engraved a portrait of the king's sister, and a plate from a picture painted by Vandyke, to supply the place of one of Titian's "Caesars," which by some accident had been lost or destroyed. He handled his graver in a bold, fine, and commanding style. The style of Vestermaun, a rival and contemporary of Voest, exhibits, however, more careful finishing and painter-like feeling, and must on the whole be allowed to be superior to that of his rival. He not only translated, but may be said to have stereotyped the great works of Rubens and Vandyke. His etchings, in particular, were excellent.

Paithorne is the next English engraver who merits our attention. He was a man of great genius, and being obliged to leave England during the civil war, he went to Paris, where he derived great advantage from the instructions of Nanteuil; and on his return to his native country, he executed a great number of portraits, and several historical subjects, in an excellent manner. He worked almost entirely with the graver. In the early part of his life he imitated the Dutch and Flemish manner; but on his return from France he greatly improved it. His best portraits are admirable, and are finished in a fine but delicate style, with much force of colour. His drawing of the human figure is by no means correct, nor in good taste; but as he dedicated so much of his time to portraits, the few historical works he has left are not fair specimens of his talents. His portraits are numerous, but not of equal merit; his best ones are very valuable.

He was followed by Robert White, who was born in London in 1645. Besides many portraits on vellum in black-lead, in which he was very successful, he has left many engravings of portraits, frontispieces, and book-decorations. His portraits are excellent, as they are all strong likenesses; but his engraving was far inferior. He had a son also an engraver, whose works display a good deal of merit, but nothing very striking. The palm was again destined to be carried off by a foreigner, Sir Nicholas Dorigny, a native of France, but educated in art at Rome. He there became known to several English noblemen and gentlemen, who persuaded him to come to England. On his arrival, he undertook to engrave the Cartoons, and presented two splendid sets of prints to George I. After having completed this great work, his sight began to grow dim, and he returned to France, where he was elected a member of the Academy, and died at the advanced age of eighty-nine. In copying Raphael's forms he has often lost much of their exquisite grace and chasteness, and has rendered the expression of the heads coarsely; yet there is a manly energy and freedom in his style bridled by simplicity: his shadows are full-toned, clear, and rich; the lines are often conducted over his draperies with great freedom and elegance, of which the figure of "St. Paul Preaching at Athens" is a good example; as also the same apostle in the cartoon of "Elymas, the Sorcerer, struck blind."

Vivares must be considered the founder of the English school of landscape engraving. He was a native of France, and learned the principles of his art from Chatelain, in London; but, being a man of great genius, he improved on the style of his master. He was followed by Woollett in the same department, whose works were models in beauty of execution and of style for landscape. Like Vivares, he carried his plates a considerable way with the point, and gave them the necessary depth with the graver, touching them up in the more delicate parts with the dry point. His works have all the delicacy and clearness of the French masters, with all the spirit and taste of Vivares. He likewise executed several historical plates and portraits with great success. His chief works are the large landscapes which he has engraved from R. Wilson and others; the death of General Wolfe, after West.

The next remarkable engraver we have to mention is Sir Robert Strange. He is greatly admired for the breadth of his effect, and the beauty of his execution; but his great excellency is the delicacy and softness of his female flesh. In this last he has seldom been equalled, and never surpassed, by any other master, as his engravings from the works of Titian, Guido, Corregio, and other painters of the Italian school, sufficiently show; but his drawing is extremely incorrect.

We shall pass over many junior celebrities and hurry on to Hogarth, whose works exhibit a walk of art untrodden before him by any. He made engraving an instrument of high moral teaching, and a vehicle for the keenest satire and the most brilliant humour. His execution was unrivalled for what it professed to be. Having on a former occasion spoken of him at considerable length, we shall not now dwell upon him any further. Since his time innumerable artists of the highest talents have appeared in every branch of engraving.

Some years ago a machine was invented by Mr. Lowry, of London, to facilitate the engraving of parallel lines. It has since undergone considerable improvement, and is now employed in most engravings, particularly in the sky, water, and the architectural parts. Wherever parallel lines are required, whether straight or circular, it executes them with elegance, accuracy, and facility. The efforts of copper-plate engravers, in more recent times, have chiefly been directed to the illustrations for books; steel having generally taken its place for all larger and more important works, owing to its greater durability.

In the year 1785, Alderman Boydell conceived the idea of establishing a Shakspeare Gallery, in London, for the exhibition of works of art, upon a grand scale. Designs were opened up to competition, a prize of one hundred guineas being offered for all accepted by the committee. They were painted by some of the most eminent artists of the day. The first engravers in England were employed to transfer them to copper; amongst others, Sharpe, Bartolozzi, Earlom, Shaw, Simon, Middmann, Watson, Tyttler, Wilson, and many others. Probably no plates ever had the same pains bestowed upon them. As much as five years was expended upon a single plate, and proof impressions were taken at every stage of the work for the subscribers. It was not completed till 1803, a period of twenty years from its commencement.

France has always been celebrated for her triumphs in this branch of engraving. The precision of copper-plate has always suited the character of French art better than the vagueness of dot engraving. During the eighteenth century the burin bore the sway, but there was always much to be desired in the drawing. The influence of David and Regnault, however, caused greater attention to be bestowed upon it, and its effects were soon perceived in engraving. The imperial epoch was remarkable for the extreme purity of style. It was at this period that Bervic executed those celebrated engravings known as the "Education of Achilles" and "Dejanira," and classical engraving was restored to the post of honour. To all the processes of the revolutionary period, to the fine point of Duplessis-Bertaux, to the stippling of Cossa, and the aqua-tinta which popularised the fine caricatures of Karl Vernet, succeeded the perfection of the academic lines, renewed from Edelinck, and Drenet, and Pelly. The breast of the Centaur, by Nessey, was copied by Bervic, the author of the "Laocoon," by means of very curious and delicate labours, which please the eye by their elegance and their symmetry, as well as by the skill which displays throughout the firmness of the flesh and the presence of the bones and sinews. Such excellence in the mechanical portion of the process was never before exhibited in combination with so much refined feeling.

The triumphs of the graver continued under the Restoration; at one time they were slightly interrupted by the movement known as Romanticism. The "Shipwreck of the Medusa" was engraved in the dotted style by Reynolds, and soon after the "Patrol of Smyrna" revived the recollection of Rembrandt; but the methods of this great master were far sooner learnt and understood than his genius. Innovations, variations, expeditious modes and plans became all the rage, but, nevertheless, the tradition of the old masters was upheld by Desnyer, Tardieu, and Richomme. The first applying himself to Raphael, translated him with great feeling in the "Belle Jardinière;" the second raised himself to the rank of master by his fine portrait of the Earl of Arundel, after Vandyke, and by the "Communion of St. Jerome," in which he preserved all the power and expression of Domenichino; and the third had courage to measure himself against Edelinck in his rendering of one of Raphael's Chiefs-d'œuvre.

After this rapid historical sketch, it may not be amiss to give a short outline of the observations which professors, books, and academics have made the code of engravers.

Generally the burin should follow in its course the hollows and the cavities of muscles and folds, and when the cutting as it approaches the light, and narrow them as it enters the shade, and finish the outlines without hardness. The various series of lines should be in union, although each object should be treated in its own style. It often happens, for example, that the line which is first in an open space may serve in returning to form the second, when in place of developing the muscle or fold, the engraver has only to strengthen the tone. He must neither indulge in odd and capricious turnings, nor adhere too closely to straightness of line, which though doubtless easier to make, has always a stiff and monotonous aspect.

With regard to draperies, care must be taken to distinguish them by the nature of the manipulation; in engraving linen, for example, it should be closer and more delicate than in the case of other cloths, and in most cases should be made by a single line; white cloth by two lines only, and with a breadth proportioned to the texture of the material; in shining substances, such as silk, the work should be straight, and the folds should be imitated by abrupt breaks, and also by an interline, slipped into the intervals of the main lines; woollen and silk velvet with an interline also, but with the principal lines strongly marked, and the second lighter, but still well sustained. The interline, which answers the purpose of producing a shining appearance, so well, may also be employed with success in rendering metals, gold and silver vases, and armour and weapons of polished steel.

In architecture the lines must obey the laws of perspective, and help to create the necessary optical illusion; that is, the lines which cover receding or diminishing objects must concentrate in the point of view; they must conform also to the direction in which the objects present the greatest dimensions. Entire columns, for example, are engraved by perpendicular lines, to avoid the disorder which would arise between the lines of the capital and those of the base. In sculpture care must be taken not to do too much. The work should be light, and appear reflected, as white marble and stone always does. There should be no point of light placed in the pupil of the eye; and the hair should not be represented, as in nature, in detached fibres, but in a mass. Landscape should be commenced by careful and discreet etching, so that, when giving it the finishing touches, the coarseness may be removed without totally destroying, in every place, the picturesque roughness. In earth, walls, trunks of trees, mountains, and rocks, the lines should be broken, interrupted abruptly, trembling, and should cross almost at right angles, to imitate the cold smoothness of the rocks; and should have a nibbled appearance, to imitate the rugosity of bark, and the inequalities of the ground or walls. The intervening air must also be taken into consideration, and allowance made for its influence by making objects close to the horizon very soft and delicate; and the aerial perspective found in the painting or drawing should be reproduced.

Water, if calm, should be represented by right lines parallel with the horizon, and with light interlines, and some breaks, which express very well the glitter and polish of the surface. By perpendicular seconds, the form of objects reflected in the water, and overhanging its banks, may be rendered, taking care to make their shape apparent, and to mark their relative distance from the spectator. If they are trees, their form can be best produced by a light outline, particularly if the water is quite clear. When the waters are agitated like the waves of the sea, the principal lines should be like the movement of the wave, and the interlines should be lozenge-shaped, as they best express the transparency of fluids. In cascades or waterfalls, the lines should follow the course of the fall, with interlines, and a good deal of abruptness in the lights. Clouds are rendered by horizontal lines; if they are those light, hanging vapours that lose themselves insensibly in the blue of the sky, care must be taken that the line, instead of forming a distinct edge all round the cloud, should verge towards the extremity, and disappear there gradually. If the clouds are tempestuous, murky, and agitated, the graver should give itself up to their forms without reserve. The crossings of the lines should be made lozenge-shaped, because this gives transparency and an appearance of motion; but the first should in every case be more prominent than the second. The lines must not be too wavy, because they give the cloud the appearance of a fleece of wool or a bundle of tow. The blue of the sky is rendered by straight, horizontal lines.

Care must be taken to engrave the flesh of women and children different from that of men, and to make the first part of the work close and thick, so as to represent the softness and delicacy of their skin. The square which expresses hardness must be avoided, as also the lozenge. In general, flesh should be produced by dots; that of men by long dots, such as are put at the end of lines or lozenges, intermingled with round that the thickness of the coating of wax deceives, from some cause or other, it sometimes happens that when the plate is duly bitten, in spite of all the regularity observed, they come out badly arranged, and if any attempt be made to set them dots, and that of women with round dots, prepared by etching, in order to avoid that rough labour produced by elongated dots. "The dots," says Abraham Bosse, "should be arranged like bricks in a wall; above all, great order and regularity should be observed in disposing them, for whether it is right with the graver, the flesh will appear as it covered with some cutaneous eruption." When the aquafortis produces them in the right place, however, and they are afterwards mingled with the long dots produced by the burin, the effect is excellent.

ADRIAN BRAUWER.

We do not know whether Vandyck lent his personages any of that dignity which he possessed in so large a degree him-

cloak so gracefully, could have been the painter of sottish peasants, debauchees, and low players. It must be confessed, that if the portrait be not flattering, the painter has not given us any means of forming an idea of his personal appearance from the figures he drew. But, unfortunately, it is only too true that his own habits were exactly those which he was fond of depicting, that he lived a drunkard, and died in an hospital, and that he was one of those prodigals who never think of returning, but to whom pardon is granted because they have loved painting not wisely but well.

Houbraken has recounted Brauwer's life in such a way as to surround him with interest, and make a full display of the accuracy and depth of his own information. A letter of Nicholas Lix, burgomaster, quoted by Houbraken, proves that Brauwer was born at Haarlem, and not at Oudenaarde as stated by Cornelius de Bie, the Flemish writer, and also by M. de Piles. He belonged to a poor family, and was possessed of a natural genius which his parents were unable to develop by education. Chance, however, brought it to light. His mother was milliner and dressmaker for the peasant women of the neighbourhood. Her son sketched for her with a pen the flowers, fruit, birds, and other little ornaments that she embroidered on the collars, caps, &c. A painter of considerable reputation, Francis Hals, was one day passing by their little shop, and saw little Brauwer designing, and struck by the ease and taste which his sketches exhibited, stepped in and asked him whether he would like to be a painter. The boy said he should, if his mother would allow him. The latter consented, but only on condition that his master should support him until he was able to support himself.

Hals agreed, took the boy home with him, and installed him in his studio, but kept his promises very badly. Perceiving very soon the advantage he might derive from talent displaying so much freedom and originality as that of Brauwer, he separated him from his other pupils, and shut him up in a little garret, where he made him work from morning till night without rest or relaxation, and gave him barely food enough to keep him alive. Adrian's disappearance, however, awakened the curiosity of his fellow-students, who seized an opportunity afforded them by their master's absence to pay a visit to the prisoner. They ascended to the garret in terror, and, by peeping in through a little window, were able to discover that he was executing very good pictures. One of them proposed to him to paint "The Five Senses," at two-pence each. Brauer accordingly completed a sketch, in which the subject, trite as it was, was treated in a manner entirely new, for he had never seen it from any other hand, and yet with great simplicity. Another ordered "The Twelve Months of the Year," also for two-pence each, but promising at the same time to increase the sum if he would work out his sketches.

It was a piece of rare good fortune for the poor recluse thus to find employment for such leisure moments as he was able to snatch without awakening the suspicions of his master. But Hals and his worthy spouse, who was, if possible, still more niggardly and hard-hearted than himself, soon began to perceive a falling off in the amount of Brauer's labours, and set a watch on him: so that he was compelled to fag away without ceasing, and, by way of punishment for past remissness, they diminished his rations. Happily it is with boys as with young ladies in love: if you want to give cunning and address to the simplest or most stolid, you have only to shut them up. So Brauer began to plan an escape. But here we shall let his biographer Descamps tell the tale:—

"He escaped, and ran through the whole town, without knowing where he should go, or what he should do. He at last went into a baker's shop, and laid in a store of ginger-bread, sufficient to last him the whole day, and ensconced himself under the organ-case of the Great Church. Whilst he was ruminating on his position and prospects, he was recognised by a passer-by, who frequented his master's house, and who readily guessed how matters stood from Brauer's forlorn aspect. He inquired what ailed him; Brauer, with his usual frankness, recounted everything that had happened, dwelling at length upon the covetousness of Hals and his wife, who, not content with the profit they drew from his labour, were letting him die of hunger and nakedness. The pallid looks and the rags of the narrator corroborated his statements, and interested his hearer to such a degree, that he took him back to his master, and promised him that he should receive better treatment in future."

The remonstrances of his new friend were not without their effect. He experienced more kindness, and was rigged out in a new suit of second-hand clothes. He now set to work with renewed vigour, but still for his master's benefit, who sold his little paintings at a high price, pretending they were the productions of a foreign but unknown painter, and thus stimulating the curiosity of the amateurs. Brauer, inspired with new vigour by his good clothes and good food, gave full vent to the inspirations of a talent of which he alone was ignorant, but which was already making a good deal of noise out of doors. Amongst his fellow-students was one destined afterwards to be a great painter, Adrian Van Ostade, who was better able than the others to appreciate Brauer's genius, and the delicacy, warmth and harmony displayed in his works. Ostade was indignant at the Hals' conduct, and told Brauer that he was a fool not to break loose from his servitude; that he was talented enough to live by his art, and draw from it, not profit only, but honour; that with a very little energy he might regain his liberty and make a name for himself; and advised him to go to Amsterdam and seek his fortune, where, as he was credibly informed, his paintings already sold at a high price. Brauer was easily persuaded, escaped a second time, and made his way to Amsterdam, where he had no friends, relatives, or any recommendation whatsoever. On his arrival, his good genius led him to the French Crown Inn, kept by a certain Van Sommeren, who had practised painting in his youth, and whose son, Henry Sommeren, executed very good landscapes and flower-pieces. He could not have fallen into better hands.

Our young vagabond, finding the cookery of the French Crown better than that of Madame Hals, took heart, and opening his haversack, took out his colours, and sketched some pieces which astonished his hosts, and induced them to make him a present of a fine copper-plate, upon which he was to display all the talent of which he was capable. He accordingly painted a gambling quarrel between some peasants and soldiers—representing the tables overturned, the cards scattered on the ground, the players throwing pots of beer at one another's heads; one of whom, badly wounded, lies foaming with rage upon the floor, half-dead, half-drunk. The picture was full of nerve, and executed in a warm tone, with great vivacity in the figures and truth of expression. He was at once recognised as the "foreign artist" of whom Hals had boasted so much. M. du Vermandois, a distinguished amateur, gave him no less than ten pounds for this work as soon as he saw it. Brauer could hardly believe his eyes—he who had begun by two-pence each picture! He took the money, lay down on his bed, and kicked and rolled for joy. After a little, he jumped up and ran out without saying a word. It was evident that so much wealth was burdensome to him, and that he was already longing to see the end of it. At the end of nine days he re-appeared, singing and laughing, and when asked what he had done with his money, exclaimed, "God be praised, I have got rid of it!"

This anecdote alone portrays Brauer's character to the life. His rude apprenticeship in Hals' garret, as well as the ardour of his own temperament, made him prone to the free enjoyment of life. Painting was in reality but a secondary passion with him. His chief aim was, to eat, drink, and be merry—we were going to say, his chief talent, for it was from this sort of life that he drew his inspirations, being able to paint drunkards all the better from being constantly in their society. His studio was the workshop which he made the scene of "The Gamblers' Quarrels," and the furniture of which consisted of a cask on which the clowns have just thrown down the four aces, a broom, a kettle, which the light fills with golden hues, and a bucket turned upside down, and upon it the smokers' chafing-dish, without reckoning the burden leaning against the wall, as we always see it in Teniers' pictures. It was from this locality, when harassed by his landlady for payment of her bill, that he sent his paintings for sale to the amateurs. If they did not bring the price he expected for them, he burnt them, and set to work anew upon others, upon which he bestowed more care, till at last he got what he wanted.

There is no species of pleasantry or facetiousness that the Flemish or Dutch biographers have not attributed to Brauer. C. melius de Bie states, that having been plundered by pirates on the coast of Holland, he bethought himself of getting a coat made of coarse brown holland, and on it painted flowers and foliage in imitation of Indian shawls. Having then given it a shining appearance with gum or varnish, he walked about the streets, attracting great attention from the ladies, who were in raptures with his costume, and were inquiring on all sides where they could procure this new stuff. He then went in the evening to the theatre, and at the close of the piece managed to mount upon the stage, where he walked up and down with a wet sponge in his hand, calling upon the audience to examine the material of his coat, of which he said, he was the sole maker, and carried the only piece in the world upon his back. Then, to the great astonishment of the pit, he rubbed off the painting with his sponge, and revealed the calico in its native coarseness, declaring it to be an emblem of human life, upon which one should place as little value as upon the wretched garment which a moment before had appeared so costly and beautiful. This "pointing of the moral," otherwise commonplace enough, was performed by him with a better grace upon another occasion. Some of his relatives invited him to a wedding, evidently, as he believed, because he had just got a new and very showy velvet coat. At dinner he took some of the greasiest and thickest sauce on the table, and smeared the coat with it, saying that the velvet had a right to the good cheer, inasmuch as it was the velvet which was invited. He then threw it into the fire, and went back to the tavern for his old rags.

James Houbraken, who ably engraved the portraits which illustrate his father's "Lives of the Painters," conceived the idea of placing a monkey beside Brauwer's portrait, to express that buffoon humour which, far from diminishing as age advanced, in Brauwer's case only increased and became more repulsive. In fact, what in the child might be called droleries, in the man were nothing but gross tawfooleries, which smelt of the places frequented by their author. Happily, Brauwer, during his lifetime, achieved better things than pasquinades and farces, and has rendered his name immortal by some masterpieces of expression, touch, and colouring, to which the graver of Visscher has lent new life. Their scarcity, too, has enhanced their value. What nerve, what life, and what a energy of observation do they not display! Nowhere else, save in the reality, do we find those grimaces, those red and bloated faces, that coarse merriment of tatterdemalions, and those indescribable attitudes and postures of beastly drunkenness. What imagination could conjure merely up by guess those physiognomies of the gamblers—the winner singing with all his might, the crest-fallen visage of his antagonist, and the bumpers which the spectators are engulfing in their huge throats in honour of the occasion? No one but an habitué of taverns could have risen to the height, or rather descended to the lowness, of scenes like these. In wine Brauwer found the truth of his sketches.—In vino veritas.

It would, doubtless, have been far better for such a painter if his life were wholly unknown to us, and nothing remained of him except these admirable little works, which might lead us only to suspect his taste for carousal. But it would seem as if history had a predilection for scandal, if we may judge from the complacency with which she records all the follies and weaknesses of her heroes, while she is silent regarding so many charming artists who needed nothing but the debit of a great vice to make them famous, and hand down their names to posterity. Brauwer lived at Amsterdam until, having earned a great deal, but spent more, he had to fly from his creditors. He took the road to Antwerp; but as he was not so well versed in the current politics of the day as in the gossip of the tap-room, he was imprudent enough to present himself at the gates of the town without a pass-port from the States General, which were then at war with Spain. He was arrested as a spy, and imprisoned in the citadel. He there met with the Duke of Aremberg, also a prisoner by order of the King of Spain. Taking him for the governor of the place, he recounted to him, with tears in his eyes, all the misfortunes which had befallen him, and assured him most solemnly that he was merely a painter, who had come to Antwerp to make use of his talents, and offered to prove his statements if he were furnished with a palette and brushes. The duke immediately sent a message to Rubens, asking him to forward the articles; and the latter forthwith sent back canvas, colours, and everything that was necessary. In the meantime, some Spanish soldiers had set themselves down to play at cards in the courtyard in front of the painter's window. Brauwer took them for the subject of his picture, and painted the group with extraordinary truth, exhibiting the minutest traits of character, attitude, and physiognomy in each. Behind them appeared an old soldier seated on his haunches, and watching the game. His face was striking and original, and between his half-open lips appeared the only two teeth that were left him. The artist had never succeeded so well—had never displayed so much fire and vigour. As soon as the duke saw the picture, he burst out laughing, and sent for Rubens to come and see if the work of his dauber was worth preserving. Rubens came, and had no sooner cast his eye upon it, than he exclaimed, "It's by Brauwer; no one else could paint subjects of this kind with such power and beauty." When pressed to value it, he named seventy pounds. "You are right in thinking it is not for sale," said the duke; "I intend it for my own collection, as much because of the singularity of the incident, as for its intrinsic excellence."

He went to the governor and succeeded in convincing him that the supposed spy was a painter of genius, and obtained his liberation, upon his becoming security that his probité was in reality what he said he was. He then took him home to his house, assigned him a chamber, a place at his table, and procured him suitable dress. But Brauwer, instead of being grateful for these acts of kindness, was only embarrassed by them. The libertine and riotous hero of tavern brawls and merriment felt but ill at ease in the well-ordered, sober, but elegant mansion of Rubens. In a few days our hero was heartily sick of it, and took to his heels, sold his clothes, and returned to his old haunts and associates, declaring that life under Rubens' roof was to him as insupportable as imprisonment in the citadel.

There was then at Antwerp a baker, named Joseph Van Craesbeck, a native of Brussels, who professed to be very fond of painting, and sometimes acted as a broker. Brauwer made his acquaintance, and seeing he had a handsome wife, conceived it to be incumbent upon him to fall in love with her. But, in accordance with the old saying that husbands generally pave the way for their own misfortunes, it so happened that Craesbeck offered Brauwer board and lodging, in case he taught him painting. This was exactly what the artist wanted, and he accordingly snatched at the proposal with the utmost eagerness. No two men were ever better matched. They had the same tastes, the same characteristics, and they soon had the same style. By dint of admiring and imitating Brauwer, Craesbeck began to display some talent, but he made no better use of it than his master, for he employed himself mostly in painting drunkenness, debauchery, and pots of beer. It appears that the two painters had, doubtless at the close of some carousal, some difference with the police, which obliged them to quit Belgium and take refuge in Paris. Brauwer did but little work there, and soon returned to Antwerp, carrying disease with him, and died miserably in the public hospital in that town, in 1690. He was buried in the cemetery of the plague-stricken, that is, on a straw bed, at the bottom of a well. On hearing of this sad end of a life of so much glory and shame, Rubens, it is said, was moved to tears. He was unwilling, however, that due respect should not be paid to art in the person of one of its great professors. Accordingly he caused the body of Brauwer to be exhumed, and paid the expense of the funeral rites, which he caused to be celebrated with great pomp. Roger de Piles has made the assertion that Rubens caused a magnificent tomb to be erected to Brauwer in the church in which he was buried. The truth is, that Rubens did entertain the idea of erecting such a monument, and sketched a design for it, but his own death prevented his carrying his intention into execution, and consequently the epitaph given by Cornelius de Bie, in Flemish verse, had no existence save in his own imagination.

The best proof of Brauwer's power and imagination lies in the fact, that, though Hals' pupil, his style differed completely from that of his master. Hals' is impetuous, and consists mainly in bold touch—so plain as to conceal the precision, often painful, of the sketch, and to produce an effect at a distance—and at a distance only. On the contrary, Brauwer's pencil is free and easy; he expresses so fully his objects without minuteness and without coldness. His pictures are only finished sketches—the immaterial is so thin that the painting of the canvas appears unperceivable. Besides this, Brauwer had another style, in which his figures are compressed and visible to the eye; in which his expressions are so arranged to firmness, and delicacy to finish. For instance, in the "Las Teniers, Brauwer is warm and bold, and shows more of reddish brown, and in this appearance Oribon and Rombaut. In a word, Brauwer is a more finished and more exact, and as his example is followed by his school, and by Ostade and Rembrandt, and by the latter, because they never seek to be so; while Brauwer, young, bold, and originally original, never seeks to be so, and is content to be what he is. He is a man, a workman, a painter, and a man, and the sight of a vagabond or ruffian engaged in his occupation. And, nevertheless, Brauwer, despite the coarseness of his model, the vulgarity of their acts, and the ugliness and repulsiveness of their visages, has succeeded, during two centuries, in delighting all lovers of art by the delicacy, the warmth, and the harmony of his works.

Brauer executed, with a good deal of skill, some etchings, of which M. Heinecke has furnished a list: they are nineteen in number:—

8, 9, 10.—“Two Peasants,” a piece marked, Abraham Brauer, fecit.

11.—“A Tall Man and a Little Woman with an Ape smoking,” with the inscription, Wat's dit roon en gedsicht.

12.—“A Peasant Girl making Cakes.”

13.—“A Peasant lighting his Pipe at a Chafing-dish held by a Woman.”

THE FIDDLER.—FROM A PAINTING BY BRAUER.

1.—“Four Peasants,” underneath, T'so vrienden.

2.—“A Peasant Girl playing a Flageolet, and two Peasants dancing”—Lustig spel.

3, 4, 5, 6.—“Three Peasants smoking”—W'er aent smoken.

7.—“A Peasant sleeping in the foreground, and in the background three Peasants drunk”—Brauer.

14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19.—“A series of Peasants and Peasant Girls;” six pieces without any mark: the first represents a “Woman asking Alms.”

The portrait of Brauer, painted by Vandyck (p. 115), has been engraved by Schelte; John Gole has also engraved it, and Boulonnais has copied it. Adrian Brauer is one of the Dutch painters who has been most engraved. The names of the principal engravers are Meyssens, Blooteling, MacArdell, Lebas, Basan, Bary, Brenden, Delfos, Demouchy, Wenceslas Hollar, John Gole, T. Major, Malceuvre, Mathan, Marinus, Nicholds, Ploos Van Amstel in his "Imitations of Drawings after the principal Flemish and Dutch Painters;" Riedel, father and son; Van Schagen, Seiler, Schenck, Van Sommer, Spilsburg, Spooner, Jonas Suyderhoef, Wallerant Vaillant, Le Vasseur, Verkoljje.

drinking. This painting, which we have reproduced (p. 148), is called in Holland "The Fiddler."

John de Visseher has also engraved, after Brauwer, a series of four tap-rooms, all of which are excellent, particularly in point of colouring.

This is not all; the famous Lucas Wostermann has engraved, after this master, "The Seven Mortal Sins," represented by half-length figures. Voluptuousness is there sketched in two ways, so that the seven sins form eight pieces. They bear

THE DRINKERS. FROM A PAINTING BY BRAUWER.

Amongst these we must distinguish, as beyond comparison, Blooteling, Lebas, Hollar, John Gole, and Suyderhoef, and we must add to the list the great name of Visseher. He has executed, after Brauwer, two pieces of the greatest beauty, and greatly sought after by amateurs. "A Surgeon dressing a Man's Foot," the first proofs of which bear the inscription, Vre, seca, purga, and a tap-room, in which one man is playing a fiddle and winking his eye, three others singing, and one the cipher V.; and the "Five Senses" — five pieces. We see in Brauwer's drawings a pen outline, aided by a little wash of Indian, and a few bold touches and hatchings of the pen, which produce all the effect that could be expected from them. The short, thick-set figures, their grimaces, and the appearance of their heads, covered with straight, stiff hair, in locate their author at a glance.

Lebrun informs us that David Teniers painted in his earlier style (not the fine silvery gray) some paintings which have been often attributed to Brauwer, in order to enhance their price, and because they did not seem handsome enough for Teniers himself.

The following are some of the prices which Brauwer's works have fetched:—

The Laroque Sale—Gersaint, 1745: A small landscape, in a gilt frame, 16s. 8d.; a small beginning certainly.

The Caulet d'Hauteville Sale, 1774: "A Dispute at Play, containing six figures, and forming a pendant to one of Cornelius Dusart's, was sold for £2 only. It is true that at the same sale a fine Rembrandt, engraved by MacArdell in the dotted manner, brought only £24.

Randon de Boisset Sale, 1777: "A Tap-room," representing a man sitting down and lighting his pipe by a live coal; another, leaning on the back of his chair, is puffing out smoke; a woman holds a pot—a fine painting, 498.

Burgraaf Sale, 1811: A little painting containing two peasants smoking beside an upturned cask, and a third in the background, £2 10s.

Erard Sale, 1832: "The interior of a Public House," on wood, from the Wille Cabinet; ten figures, 438.

Cardinal Fesch's Sale, 1845: "The Card Players;" four peasants seated upon upturned tubs; the game appears to be decided. A wooden partition divides the group from three other figures warming themselves at a large fire-place. £31.

There is but one of Adrian Brauwer's paintings in the Louvre, the "Interior of a Tap-room." A man seen from behind is asleep upon a table; a smoker is lighting his pipe, and another is kissing the maid. In the background two men are chatting with a little girl.

Amongst Brauwer's pupils were Gonzales, Craesbeck, Tilborg, Bernard Fouchers, and Jan Steen, who was also the pupil of Van Goyen. The following is his monogram:—

VAN HUYSUM'S SECRET.

THE setting sun was glittering on the windows of a small house in the suburbs of Amsterdam. In a balcony opening upon a parterre sown with anemones, tulips, roses, and may-flowers, stood a man whose pale and haggard features, bent figure, and white and scanty hair, but too clearly indicated the rapid approach of old age and decrepitude.

It was Van Huysum, the celebrated flower painter, whose pictures, treasured in all the collections of Spain, Switzerland, Holland, and Belgium, are distinguished from all others by a softness and freshness of which he alone seemed to possess the secret.

Before him lay a palette charged with colours, several brushes scattered about, and some sketches apparently just commenced, one of which he still held in his hand; though, as if forced to suspend his labour, he reclined in an arm-chair, his head leaning back, and his eyes half-closed, as if in a swoon. Suddenly a young girl made her appearance at the lower end of the gallery, ran towards him, and asked him with an anxious air what had happened to him.

"Nothing, nothing!" he muttered in reply—"a little weakness, but nothing more; it's over now. I have been trying in vain to set to work to finish those sketches that were promised so long ago; but I'm not able."

"The doctor has warned you, uncle," said the girl gently, "that you must take rest till you are better."

Van Huysum made a gesture of impatience and chagrin. "And when will that be?" he asked in feverish accents; "don't you see there is no sign of it, Gotta?"

"Patience, dear uncle," was her reply; "you see the fine days are coming back again."

"Yes," said the old man, raising himself with a look of animation, "the garden is beginning to bloom, and the birds are singing and building their nests, and the butterflies flitting about; but what avails all this when I can no longer paint them?"

"Oh, in a few weeks more," rejoined Gotta, "you will be able."

"A few weeks! do you know—or are you forgetting how time passes—that before the end of the month I must pay Vanbruk the next instalment of the price of this house, and that I was hoping to meet it by two paintings that I promised Salomon, and that the sketches are still upon the easel just as I left them three months ago? Vanbruk will call for his money in a day or two, and not getting it, will take possession of the house, and deprive me of my flowers and my sun. Delay, you see, is ruin and desolation."

Gotta stood motionless while the old man was speaking, and when he had done, after a short pause said softly, "Trust in God: I know he'll not desert you."

Van Huysum shook his head, and there was silence for some moments.

"And still," he added a moment afterwards, in a low voice, as if soliloquising, "and still, if I could get assistance, like other painters whose pupils help them."

"And so you can, uncle, whenever you please," said Gotta.

"Aye, and let them discover my secret," interrupted the painter, with an angry look, "so that no one could distinguish my works from theirs; no, no, the bouquets of Van Huysum shall always remain the only ones of their kind."

So saying, he closed the box containing his colours with testy haste, and drew the curtain over his canvas, and casting a suspicious glance at his niece, exclaimed, "I'll engage you would like to learn yourself, Gotta, what patience and perseverance have taught me. But no—if you please—you shan't know. When presents are too costly, the recipients are apt to be ungrateful. Find it out, my girl, find it out, as I found it out myself. Since I grew ill you have painted more than usual. Have you made much progress? Let me see, Gotta; show me your latest attempts."

"Oh, they're not worth your notice, uncle," said Gotta, blushing and looking rather embarrassed.

"Come, come, show them to me," replied Van Huysum. "I mustn't refuse you good advice; you have the stuff in you to make a good painter; but you must seek out your own style."

There was nothing for it but to comply; so Gotta went out and brought in a small square piece of canvas in a frame, and on it painted a bouquet of flowers, principally snowdrops and campanulas. Van Huysum examined it attentively, and at first his countenance darkened.

"Ah! you paint very well, Gotta," said he; "your tone is delicate, your drawing is correct and harmonious; here are some leaves which are absolutely perfect; it's a masterpiece, my dear; in the long run you'll form a school, and throw Van Huysum into the shade."

This was said in a tone half earnest, half ironical and bitter. It was evident that the painter's jealousy was struggling within him with the man's affection and generosity. He placed the picture at a little distance from him, that he might better observe its effect; and after looking at it in silence for some minutes, his face became lighted up with a smile.

"Yes," he said slowly to himself, "the little thing has some taste; but yet it's not my style, nor my colouring. Let us see, Gotta, how much will Salomon give you for this?"

"What he gave me for the former ones, I suppose, uncle—five ducats."

Van Huysum rubbed his hands with delight. "Good," said he; "I could sell one of the same size for fifty ducats. Ah, there's no doubt there's nobody like me; I alone can make the flowers grow out under the brush." Then, as if recurring to his former train of thought, he exclaimed—

"But what good does my skill do me if I can't use it! Miserable that I am! the mine of gold is there, but I have not strength to work it! What day of the month is it, Gotta?"

"The twenty-ninth, uncle."

"Twenty-ninth! is it possible? And Vanbruk will be here in two days—in two days! What shall I do? God has forsaken me. I'm ruined—hopelessly ruined!" he exclaimed, sinking back into his chair.

Gotta, thinking he was about to faint, administered some cordial, which had the effect of reviving him, and endeavoured to soothe and encourage him by kind words. At this moment the door opened, and Salomon the Jew appeared. Gotta uttered an exclamation of surprise, and waved her hand to him to retire; but it was too late, Van Huysum had seen him.

"There he is," said he, in a querulous, despairing tone; "there he is, coming for his pictures, and the money with him."

"Yes, master," replied the Jew, shaking the gold in a leathern bag and making it clink, "and in good Portuguese pieces, such as I know you like."

"Take them away," said the painter feebly; "don't come here to increase my trouble by the sight of money which I want, but am not able to earn."

The Jew removed his spectacles, and looked at him with an air of astonishment.

"What do you mean?" said he; "don't you want my money?"

"No; because I can't give you the paintings."

"But I've come to pay you for those which you have sent me."

Van Huysum looked at him fiercely—"That I sent you!" he exclaimed; "what do you mean?"

Gotta made several attempts to put a stop to the conversation, which was evidently fatiguing her uncle, and preventing any explanation; but he insisted upon having one.

"Faith," said the Jew, shrugging his shoulders, "it is easily given; your niece has given me two small pictures, for which I am about to pay you ten ducats, and a large one for which I shall pay you two hundred ducats."

"Pictures of mine!" repeated the painter.

"Yes," replied the Jew, "your large vase with the nest and the snail. It is a masterpiece; and I am now taking it to the Duke of Remberg."

"You have it with you then?" said Van Huysum.

"Yes, I have left it in the parlour."

"Show it to me; show it to me!"

The old painter rose and advanced towards one of the glass doors looking out upon the gallery. Salomon followed him, and on removing the cloth which covered a middle-sized picture, revealed to Van Huysum the work of which he spoke. The latter recognised at a glance one of the sketches which his illness had compelled him to abandon, but so well finished in his own style, and with the processes which he thought known only to himself, that on seeing it he started back with a cry of astonishment. A more minute examination, however, enabled him to discover certain touches which betrayed another hand.

"Who sold you that?" said he to Salomon, in a voice hoarse with anger. "Where is the villain that has stolen my secret?"

"Here, uncle," said a soft imploring voice beside him. He turned, and there was Gotta on her knees, her hands clasped together, and big tears coursing rapidly down her marble cheeks.

"You!" said Van Huysum; "this painting by you! How did you find out my method?"

"Quite unintentionally; by watching you while at work," replied the girl.

"So, all my precautions were useless," said the painter, "since I had a spy in my house. And how long have you known it?"

"A long time," murmured Gotta. Van Huysum looked at her steadily.

"And why, then, did you not make use of it sooner?" he asked.

"Because then I only should have profited by it," was her reply; "so long as you were able to hold the brush, I had no right to interfere with your discoveries; but when sickness came, and when I knew the time for paying Vanbruk the money due to him was approaching, and when I saw you careworn and anxious, I took courage, and thought that if I employed the knowledge I had stolen from you to give you comfort and repose, it would not be a theft, but a restitution. Forgive me, uncle, if I was mistaken; but let me continue to work while you are no longer able to do so, and as soon as you are recovered, I promise you I will forget all I have learnt."

Gotta raised her streaming eyes to his, and the tears that hung on the dark lashes glistened like pearls in the sunbeams that were reflected from the window. He took her tenderly by the hand, and thus proceeded:

"God, my child," said he, "has taught me a great lesson, by setting your example before me. He has taught me that our gifts, whatever they may be, should not be selfishly kept for ourselves alone, but that our true happiness should be in sharing them with others. Keep the brush which to-day has proved our salvation. Until now there was but one Van Huysum; henceforth, I am willing there should be two."

MR. BANVARD, THE AMERICAN PANORAMA PAINTER.

We are all by this time tolerably familiar with panoramas; but probably not many of our readers have seen one of the same dimensions as that which Mr. Banvard, an American artist, is said to have executed. It represents the mighty Mississippi, with the varied scenery through which it flows; and certainly, so far as mere size is concerned, must be no unworthy representation of that majestic river; for we are told it measures no less than three miles in length. The idea of travelling such a distance with the eye to get from the beginning to the end of a pictorial view, is quite a novelty to the steady-going inhabitants of the Old World. We are indebted to an American authority for the following account of the artist and his work, which we think will be read with interest, both as showing what ingenuity and perseverance can accomplish, and as a fresh chapter in the history of art.

There was a young lad of fifteen, a fatherless youth, to whom a very extraordinary idea occurred, as he was doating for the first time down the Mississippi. He had read in some foreign journal, that America could boast the most picturesque and magnificent scenery in the world, but that she had not yet produced an artist capable of delineating it.

On this thought he pondered and pondered, till his brain began to whirl; and as he glided along the shores of the stupendous river, gazing around him with wonder and delight, the boy resolved within himself that he would take away the reproach from his country—that he would paint the beauties and sublimities of his native land.

Some years passed away, and still John Banvard, for that was his name, dreamed of being a painter. What he was in his waking, working moments, we do not know—probably a mechanic. But at all events, he found time to turn over and over again the great thought that haunted him; till of length, before he had yet attained his twenty-first year, it assumed a distinct and tangible shape in his mind, and he devoted himself to its realisation.

No idea of profit was mingled with his ambition; and, indeed, strange to say, we can learn nothing of any aspirations he may have felt after artistic excellence. His grand object, as he himself informs us, was to satisfy the curiosity that America had no artists commensurate with the grandeur and extent of her scenery; and to accomplish this by producing the largest painting in the world.

John Banvard was born in New York, and "raised in Kentucky;" but he led a roving life, following the rich merchants of the one, or the wild enthusiasts of the other, who so soon has become a synonyme for all that is good, bold, and righteous in the American character. He was self-taught and self-employed; and when he determined to paint a picture of the shores of the Mississippi, which should be as superior to all others in point of size as that prodigious river is superior to the streams of Europe, he was obliged to take a long sail for some time, to trolling and boating upon the mighty stream, in order to raise funds for the purchase of materials. But this was at length accomplished, and the work begun. His first task was to make the necessary drawing, and in executing this he spent four hundred days in the manner thus described by himself:—

For this purpose he had to travel thousands of miles alone in an open skiff, crossing the rapid streams, in many places more than two miles in width, to select proper points of sight from which to take this sketch. His hands became hardened with constantly plying the oar, and his skin as tawny as an Indian's, from exposure to the rays of the sun and the vicissitudes of the weather.

He would be weeks together without speaking to a human being, having no other company than his rifle, which furnished him with his meat from the game of the woods or the fowls of the river.

When the preparatory drawings were completed, he erected a building at Louisville, in Kentucky, where he at length commenced his picture, which was to be a panorama of the Mississippi, painted on canvas three miles long; and it is noted, with a justifiable pride, that this proved to be a home production throughout, the cotton being grown in one of the southern states, and the fabric spun and woven by the factory girls of Lowell.

What the picture is, as a work of art, many thousands have had an opportunity of ascertaining personally; and we know that it received the warmest eulogiums from the most distinguished of his countrymen, and a testimony in favour of its correctness from the principal captains and pilots of the Mississippi.

At the meeting in Boston, his Excellency Governor Briggs, of Massachusetts, who was in the chair, talked of it with TAVERN BRAWL.—FROM A PAINTING BY BRAUWER.

When the sun began to sink behind the lofty bluffs, and evening to approach, he would select some secluded sandy cove, overshadowed by the lofty cottonwood, draw out his skiff from the water, and repair to the woods to hunt his supper. After killing his game, he would return, dress, cook, and, seated on some fallen log, would eat it with his biscuit, with no other beverage than the wholesome water of the noble river that glided by him.

Having finished his lonely meal, he would roll himself in his blanket, creep under his frail skiff, which he turned over to shield him from the night dews, and with his portfolio of drawings for his pillow, and the sand of the brink for his bed, would sleep soundly till the morning, when he would arise from his lowly couch, eat his breakfast before the rays of the rising sun had dispersed the humal mist from the surface of the river, and then start afresh to his task again.

enthusiasm, as a "wonderful and extraordinary production;" and Mr. Calhoun, president of the Senate, moved a series of resolutions expressive of "their high admiration of the boldness and originality of the conception, and the indefatigable perseverance of the young and talented artist in the execution of his herculean work;" and these being warmly seconded by Mr. Bradbury, speaker of the House of Representatives, were carried unanimously.

Soon after Banvard's panorama appeared, its popularity brought scores of rival panoramas before the public—Panorama of the Hudson, Panorama of a Voyage round the World, Panorama of the Rhine, and others without end. We should suppose at the present moment, that many artists thus employed, who might otherwise have languished in poverty, find panorama painting a great source of pecuniary profit.

RICHARD WESTALL.

RICHARD WESTALL, one of whose works we have reproduced, is best known to the public as an illustrator of British poetry

Cheapside. He was allowed to devote his evenings to attendance on the lectures at the Royal Academy, and here he certainly as delightful, if not as useful, a task as an artist can undertake. He was born in 1765, and was bound apprentice to an engraver of heraldry on silver, &c., in Gutter-lane, formed an acquaintance with Mr., afterwards Sir Thomas, Lawrence. This became so intimate, that as soon as Westall was out of his apprenticeship the two friends took a house together in Greek-street, Soho, dividing the doors between them—that opening out in Greek-street being Westall's, and the one in the square, Lawrence's.

The course upon which Westall entered in the practice of his art, was one well calculated to insure his popularity with the public, in the then state of taste and feeling, whatever we may think of its real excellence. The spirit of elegant sentiment, which afterwards gave birth to the "annuals" and "keepsakes," and made a great deal of poetry that is denominated "namby pamby" in the highest degree acceptable, was then abroad, and Westall was just the man to minister at its altar. His pencil, as well as his nature, was prone to elegance, grace, and refinement, though with a large amount of affectation. He sketched love and love scenes under every possible type and symbol; and a great many of the best or most artistic—if we may be allowed the expression—incidents in ancient mythology; Sappho in the Lesbian shades, the boar that killed Adonis brought before Venus, Calypso entertaining Telemachus in her grotto, the marriage procession on the shield of Achilles, and an immense number of Venuses in every variety of attitude, and attended by a large number of Cupids. The first production, however, which called public attention to him, was a picture exhibited in 1785, representing a scene from Chaucer's "January and May." Two years afterwards he again made his appearance with "Mary, Queen of Scots, taking leave of Andrew Marvel," "Esau asking for his Father's Blessing," and a "Scene from the Wife of Bath's Tale." His first great work, however, was illustrations of Milton and Shakspeare, which he was employed to execute by Alderman Boydell, the founder of the Shakspearian Gallery. In those of Milton he seems to have caught some measure of the poet's spirit, and in some instances he makes an approach to the poet's sublimity and grandeur; but in those of Shakspeare it can only be said that he is invariably correct, and that there is nothing to offend. For Bowyer he painted subjects from the history of England, and met with the same success.

He now came before the world as the painter of the proprieties of genteel and fashionable life par excellence. He was in art pretty much what Thomas Haynes Bayley was in poetry. He afterwards illustrated the various ceremonies of the church of England with a decorum, an accuracy, and solemnity that delighted the hearts of the large body of worshippers in that communion. He soon became one of the most popular book illustrators, and was greatly run after by the publishers; but all his drawings were wanting in vigour. He, however, ministered successfully to the public taste, and for any faults in his style he was not himself entirely to blame.

He was elected a member of the Academy in 1794, the year in which Lawrence and Stothard were also elected. In 1808 he published a volume of poems, entitled "A Day in Spring," which was illustrated with engravings by S. O. C. Heath from his own designs. He taught Queen Victoria drawing; and certainly, whatever were the merits of his works, his pupil does honour to his powers as an instructor.

Probably no man who was so conversant, as an artist must be, with works of art, could have been so miserably deceived in his speculations as Mr. Westall was in his picture dealing. The fact that he was ruined at it, is the most convincing proof that was ever afforded of the folly of connoisseurship. The art of imitating pictures—of giving them the tone of age, and the traces of certain masters' manner—has of late years been brought to the highest pitch of perfection; and to detect a fraud is a much more difficult matter than to discover excellence. The mistake of the connoisseurs is in laying claim to the greatest skill in both, and, in fact, proclaiming that the one is inseparable from the other. The great anxiety on the part of the public, of late years, to become possessed of the works of great masters, has created a corresponding anxiety on the part of the dealers to supply them. In the ease of cotton or calico this would not be a difficult matter; but the pictures of Titian or Giorgione do not admit of unlimited multiplication. When Westall entered the lists against dishonest imitators, he found himself completely outwitted. Chefs-d'œuvre, for which he thought himself only too happy to pay large prices, turned out to be clever copies. Before he had discovered the cheat he often spent large sums in restoring the colouring, in framing or regilding them. His handsome fortune was soon dissipated in this way, and the unfortunate man ended his days a pensioner on the fund set apart by the Royal Academy for the relief of any of their members who are reduced to destitution. His death took place on the 4th of December, 1836.

His "Peasant Boy," which we have engraved (p. 153), was one of the best of his works. The drawing is excellent, and there is an air of unaffected simplicity and contentment in the expression of the face, and the accessories are all in excellent keeping.

DR. FAUSTUS, AFTER REMBRANDT.

THE story of Dr. John Faustus, as it was popularly believed by our grandfathers, and upon which so much wit and ingenuity and research have been expended, ran pretty much as follows:—

He was born in Germany of poor parents. His father was unable to bring him up, but he had a brother living near him, who took a great fancy to his nephew, and resolved to make a scholar of him. So he put him to school, and afterwards entered him at the university to study divinity; but this was by no means to the youth's taste, and though he applied himself to it with tolerable diligence, he applied far more diligently to necromancy and magic, charms and sooth-saying, witchcraft, and the like. At last, he reached such a pitch of perfection in the black art, that he attained to the power of commanding the devil to appear whenever he pleased. One day he was walking in a wood near Wirtemberg with a friend, who expressed a desire to see some evidence of the doctor's art, and asked him, could he then and there bring the demon Mephistopheles before them. Upon the first call given by Faustus, the devil made a noise as if heaven and earth were coming together, and then made a roaring as if the wood had been full of wild beasts. The doctor then made a circle for him, and round it he ran with a noise like that of ten thousand waggons going at full speed over rough pavement.

After this, it thundered and lightened as if the whole world had been on fire. Faustus and his friend were amazed at this noise, and, tired with the devil's long tarrying, thought to leave the circle, whereupon the latter personage uttered such ravishing music as was never heard in this world.

After many other wonderful prodigies, the worthy doctor succeeded in so mastering the refractory spirit, that he bound him over to appear to him at his house by ten o'clock next day. Mephistopheles accordingly appeared, and Faustus informed him that he wished him henceforward to serve him with whatever he wanted. This was declined unless he signed an agreement with his own blood to deliver himself up to Lucifer, the Prince of Darkness, at the expiration of a certain date. After much bargaining and chaffering, the lust of power and enjoyment so overcame Faustus that he consented and signed the fatal bond.

When he had done so, he called Mephistopheles and delivered it to him, whereupon the spirit told him that if he did not repent of what had happened, he should enjoy all the pleasures his thoughts could conceive, and that he would immediately divert him. He caused a kennel of hounds to run down a hart in the hall, and immediately vanished; then a bull danced before Faustus; then appeared a fight between a lion and a bear; and then followed some most exquisite music, to the sound of which some hundreds of spirits danced. When these had disappeared, ten sacks of silver appeared on the floor, but it was so hot that no one but himself could handle it.

The report of what Dr. Faustus had done soon got abroad, and none of his neighbours would keep his company; but his attendant spirit was constantly with him, and executed his bidding in all things. Not far from his house lived the Duke of Bavaria, the Duke of Saxony, and the Bishop of Salisburg, whose houses and cellars Mephistopheles used to visit, and carry away the best of everything they contained. One day the Duke of Bavaria had invited most of the gentry of the country to dinner, for whose entertainment an abundance of provisions was got ready. The gentry being come, and all ready to sit down to dinner, in an instant of time Mephistopheles came and took all away with him, to their great terror and astonishment. If at any time Faustus had a longing for wild fowl, the spirit would call whole flocks in at the window, so that no lock or key could keep them out. He also taught Faustus to fly in the air, and perform a variety of other extraordinary tricks.

The worthy doctor was ere long favoured with a glimpse into the lower regions, and saw and heard all the unfortunates who suffered torments there. He found that the whole region was divided into a number of cells, or deep holes, and in every one of these there was a devil, whose duty it was to punish the inmates. He was much struck by the sight, and inquired of Mephistopheles what sort of people they were that lay in the first dark pit. He was told they were physicians, who had poisoned many thousands in trying experiments upon them, and were now treated in the same manner as they had treated their patients, though not with the same effect, for death never came to release them from their misery. Over their heads was a shelf laden with gallipots, full of poison. Having passed them, he came to a long entry, in which there was a great crowd, and he asked him what they were in the other world, and was told they were pickpockets, who loved to be in a crowd, and so, to content them, they were put in a crowd here. He saw many other varieties of evil-doers, in various stages of torment, which space will not permit us to enumerate.

The fame of Dr. Faustus having reached the emperor's ears, he expressed a desire to see him and some of his tricks and exploits. So the doctor paid a visit to court, and while conversing with the emperor, saw a nobleman looking out of a window. He instantly fastened a pair of horns on his head, so that he could not get his head in till Dr. Faustus took them off for him. But he was greatly enraged at being thus made the laughing-stock of the court, and resolved upon being revenged upon Faustus. He therefore lay in wait for him outside of the town, intending to stop him and chastise him on his return from the court. Faustus, coming by a wood-side, beheld the lord mounted on a prancing war-horse, and immediately ordered the spirit to whirl him aloft, and set him down in the emperor's palace with a pair of horns on his head, which he could never get off till his dying day.

On another occasion, the doctor was rambling through a field, and out of frolic devoured a load of hay in the presence of the farmer who owned it, and then placed it again on his cart in the twinkling of an eye. Looking out of a window, he saw some students fighting, thirteen against seven, and struck them all blind, so that they fought at random, and hit their friends, to the great amusement of the bystanders. As soon as they had separated, he restored them their eyesight. Another time he was disturbed by the shouting and bawling of some drunken clowns in an inn, so he made them all dumb. He found a young gentleman pining for love of a young lady, who stedfastly refused to receive his addresses, and gave him an enchanted ring, with instructions to slip it suddenly on the cruel fair one's finger. The moment it touched her, she began to burn with love for him whom before she had hated, and sought his company unceasingly, and when he again proposed to her, she accepted him joyfully. He also made a herd of unruly swine, whom their owner could not drive to market, go the whole way dancing and fiddling into the town; and performed a thousand other tricks, which are recorded by his chroniclers.

At last the inevitable hour drew near. The twenty-four years for which he had agreed to sell himself drew to an end, and the spirit served him with a solemn warning that he must prepare to fulfil his part of the compact. On the day following the receipt of this, in order to drive away dull care, he sent for the doctors and bachelors of art, and the other students, to dine with him, and provided fine music and entertainment for them. But all could not keep up his spirits, for the time was at hand. Whereupon his countenance changing, his guests inquired the cause of his uneasiness, and in reply he confessed all his transactions with the devil. He had no sooner finished his narration, than there came on a tremendous storm of thunder and lightning. Faustus then went into the great hall, the doctors and masters staying in the next room, intending to hear his end. About twelve o'clock the house shook terribly, as though it would have tumbled down about their ears; and suddenly all the windows were shaken violently and broken to pieces. Then came another great clap of thunder, and the door flew open, and a mighty rushing wind entered, with the hissing of serpents, and the most hideous and dreadful screams and cries, upon which they heard Faustus shrieking piteously, as if in the greatest agony, followed by dreadful roaring and blaspheming, and then all was silent. When daylight came, they mustered up courage to enter the hall, and found his brains beaten out against the wall, the floor sprinkled with blood, and his two eyeballs lying in it. They searched in vain for his body, but at last found it lying on a dunghill outside, smashed and torn to pieces. Out of respect to his learning and other qualifications, it received a decent burial.

Such was the story which one citizen whispered to another with white lips a century and a half ago. In a ballad, supposed to have appeared in 1670, and entitled "The Just Judgment of God upon one John Faustus, Doctor in Divinity," which was once popular in London in no small degree, the doctor is thus made to describe his fate, though how he came to publish his recollections in bad doggerel after his death, is more than we can well understand.

"Woe to the day of my nativity,
Woe to the time that once did foster me,
Woe to the hand that sealed the will,
And woe to myself, the cause of all my ill.

* * * * *

At last when I had but one hour to come,
I turned my glass for my last hour to run,
And called in learned men to comfort me,
But faith was gone, and none could comfort me.

By twelve o'clock my glass was almost out,
My grived conscience then began to doubt;
I wish the students stay in chamber by,
But while they staid they heard a doleful cry.

Then presently they came into the hall,
Whereas my brains was cast against the wall,
Both arms and legs in pieces torn they see,
My bowels gone, and this was the end of me."

Now for the moral—

"You computers and dreamers withes all,
Example take by my unhapp' fall;
Give not your souls and bodies into his hand,
See that the smallest hair you loose not fall."

The story of Faustus has furnished materials for the ingenuity and industry of numerous German writers, both in the last century and in this. And it has, as we all know, derived new and unlyring interest in having been the subject of Goethe's great drama. It has also been ably illustrated by Rembrandt, in an etching which we reproduce (p. 156). It is thus described in the Chevalier Claussin's Catalogue Raisonné of Rembrandt's works: "Faustus is standing up, his profile towards the spectator, dressed in a long robe and a white cap. His two hands are resting, the right upon a table, and the left behind the arm of a chair. He is in an attitude of reflection, and appears to be examining with attention several magic characters, which show him in a mirror, the hand only of which is visible to us. Lower down to the right appears the half of a globe." This is, however, simply a description for the use of amateurs; but our imagination can the powers of the universe to strife, and drags some soft, gentle, yielding nature down with him in his fall. Such has Goethe pictured him; but from the hands of Rembrandt he comes simply an old magician in his laboratory. We need hardly say that it is extremely doubtful if such a personage as Faustus ever existed. Some author has supposed that the legend had its origin in the invention of printing, the honour readily supply what it wants. At first sight, we can hardly imagine that this old man, with his dressing-gown and night-cap, is the famous Doctor Faustus, the bold pioneer of philosophy, the modern Prometheus, the rash and ambitious genius who roused the fire of Marlowe, whom Goethe has immortalised, and who filled Byron's sleep with dreams. We figure him to ourselves as young, proud, energetic, sombre, and secluded—with flashing fiery eyes, and with a defiant spirit, which dares of which belongs in part, as we all know, to John Fast, or Faust. It appears, nevertheless, more probable that the hero of all these tales was a student in the dogy, born at Weimar, or at Kundlig, in the fifteenth or the beginning of the sixteenth century. The first written work on the subject of which we have any knowledge, is the "History of Faust and of Christopher Wagner, his valet, by George Rodolph Widman: Frankfurt, 1587."

INTERIOR OF A COTTAGE, BY ADRIAN VAN OSTADE.

Our engraving is an excellent illustration of the best points and greatest beauties of Adrian Van Ostade's style as a delineator of the home-life of the Flemish peasantry. An old woman tending a nursling; two children, one of them drinking eagerly from a cup, whilst the other shares its breakfast with a dog; the cradle neglected in a corner; the pot overturned, and the whole household in disorder—this is the in the background, and the thousand streaks and sparkles on the linen, the basket, or basin. The painter of Lubeck found here a whole course of art. Attracted by the variety of lines and the melody of colour, if he found these he needed nothing else. His pencil reproduced what had charmed his eye, and not what had found favour with his thoughts. Hence the tendency amongst painters of the Dutch and Flemish schools whole scene, and simple as it is, few but Adrian Van Ostade could depict it so well, because he was the patient and simple painter of reality. One might ask, however, what could induce an artist to select a scene so vulgar, types which boasted no beauty, and accessories which have nothing to recommend them but their rudeness and rusticity? To this Van Ostade would reply by showing you the jet of light which plays across the figures, the harmonious shading which reigns to scenes of what we call "low life." They are the painters of material life, but hardly ever attain to the poetic sublimity of the Italians. Their inspiration is short-winged, and scrapes the ground. It is a domestic bird, with splendid plumage, but of vulgar appearance, which never goes far from the house; while Italian art is one of those stately but graceful swans which float calmly and majestically on limpid lakes, or soar through blackening clouds.

MICHAEL ANGELO BUONAROTTI.

VASARI tells us, with charming quaintness, that the Deity looking down upon the earth, and perceiving the fruitlessness of so many labours, the ardent studies pursued without any result, and the presumptuous self-sufficiency of men, which is further from truth than darkness is from light, resolved, by way of delivering us from such great errors, to send to the world a spirit endowed with universality of power in each art and in every profession.

He was born of a most noble and most ancient family, and at a most propitious moment, Mercury and Venus exhibiting a friendly aspect, and being in the second house of Jupiter. His father had a farm about three miles from Florence, which contained some valuable quarries, in which stonemasons and sculptors were constantly at work; and to the wife of one of the former the nursing of the future genius was confided. "Giorgio," said Michael Angelo to Vasari, in after life, when honours were thick upon him, "if I have anything good in me, it comes from my birth in the pure air of your country of Arezzo, and perhaps, also, from the fact that with the milk of my nurse I sucked in the chisels and hammers wherewith I make my figures." His other brothers were placed, as they grew up, with wool and silk-weavers, his father being of a commercial turn of mind; but Michael exhibited an unconquerable inclination for drawing, and he was set apart for an artist. So he was placed in the studio of Domenico Ghirlandajo, who did for him all that a good and kind master could do with a pupil who in a few months knew more than himself. Very soon after his entrance into Ghirlandajo's studio, he corrected some female figures drawn by his master, exhibiting the perfection of form, with a few strokes of his pen. Some sketches, also, which he made of scaffolding and the workmen engaged upon it in repairing a building, caused Domenico to exclaim, "This boy knows more than I do." He did many marvellous things of the same kind, till at last an accident brought him before the world with the happiest prospects. Lorenzo di Medici, the magnificent Lorenzo, the glory of Florence, the dux datus et propositus of Italian literature and art, chanced to be greatly desirous of forming a good school of painting and sculpture under the superintendance of the aged Bertoldo, the disciple of Donato. So he desired Domenico to send him any youths from amongst his pupils who evinced a marked taste for sculpture. Michael Angelo and Francesco Gronacci were the two selected, and on repairing to the Medici garden, on the piazza, in which Lorenzo had collected a great number of gems of ancient art, they found a youth of the Torrigiano family modelling in clay certain figures given him by Bertoldi. Michael immediately entered into competition with him, and with such success, that Lorenzo was convinced he was in truth a youth whom he was bound to assist and put forward in every way in his power. This favourable impression was increased by the sight of a marble copy from the antique of the head of a faun, made by Michael about the same time, with marvellous accuracy and ability, though he had never handled a chisel before.

A room in Lorenzo's own palace was accordingly set apart for him, and the great merchant prince signified to Ghirlandajo that it was his intention henceforth to provide for his maintenance and education.

Buonarotti was now sixteen years old, and he lived in Lorenzo's palace during the next four years, namely, till 1492, when death deprived him of his patron. During this period of his career he executed in marble "A Battle of Hercules with the Centaurs," which looked more like the work of a master than that of a youth in his teens. It is still preserved in the house of the Buonarotti family at Rome, and remains in possession of the artist's descendants. Lorenzo entrusted him with the keys of his famous garden, and gave him a general superintendance of it. These honours excited the jealousy of his fellow-pupil, Torrigiano, to such a pitch, that he began to jeer him one day, and struck him so violent a blow in the face that he broke his nose in such a manner that he bore the marks of the injury for life.

Michael Angelo returned to his father's house in great sorrow upon the death of Lorenzo. He had, in truth, good reason for his grief. We can fancy what delightful, happy hours he must have spent in that delicious abode, steadily pursuing the arts he loved, and surrounded by the finest productions of antiquity, and smiled upon by him whose smiles made happy the wisest, wittiest, and bravest men of the day. After this he wandered through various parts of Italy, visiting, amongst other places, Bologna and Venice, and leaving in each some of his masterpieces. His first visit to Rome was owing to a curious circumstance. He executed at Florence a sleeping Cupid, life size, which was pronounced by all who saw it a work of rare excellence, particularly by Baldassare del Milanese, who strongly advised him to bury it for a time and then send it to Rome, where he would then obtain a high price for it as an antique. It is said that Michael Angelo allowed him to do so for him, and he accordingly sold it to Cardinal San Giorgio for 200 crowns. The cardinal, however, soon heard that the statue had been at Florence, and was greatly enraged by the banter and ridicule he had to undergo in consequence of the deception. He sent it back to Milanese, who had sold it to him, and compelled him to return him the money. But the affair made such a noise that it raised Michael Angelo's credit greatly. He was consequently soon after invited by Cardinal San Giorgio himself to go to Rome and reside at his house; but the cardinal, knowing little of art, never set a proper value on him, and they soon parted. Jacopo Galli, a Roman gentleman, perceived his talent early, and commissioned him to make a Cupid the size of life, and with a Bacchus ten palms high. The union in outline and expression of masculine energy and passion with female softness and roundness of form, was so admirably rendered in this work, that it was now acknowledged upon all hands that Michael Angelo far surpassed all modern sculptors. Amongst his greatest achievements of this period was his "Dead Christ"—a work not for any one age or generation, but for all time. Every muscle, nerve, and vein is rendered with an accuracy which displays consummate knowledge of anatomy; an attainment the more wonderful from the fact, that at that time the structure of the human body was but very imperfectly understood. "There is," says Vasari, in his simple but expressive language, "a most exquisite expression in the countenance, and the limbs are affixed to the trunk in a manner that is truly perfect; the veins and pulses, moreover, are indicated with such exactitude, that one cannot but marvel how the hand of an artist should in such a short time have produced such a work, or how a stone, which just before was without form or shape, should all at once display such perfection as nature can but rarely produce in the flesh."

Michael Angelo appears to have placed a high value upon the work himself, as he engraved his name on the Virgin's girdle, a thing which he never did on any other occasion. It says little for the value of fame, however, that one day when he entered the place where it was erected, he found a large crowd admiring it, and on inquiry being made who had executed it, some one said, "Our Hunchback of Milan," without any one's offering to correct him or set him right.

There was a huge block of marble at Florence at this time, out of which a certain Simone de Fiesole had commenced to make a colossal figure, but had so botched it, that the authorities shut up the marble, and did not suffer him to proceed. Michael Angelo's friends now advised him to try and obtain it, and he succeeded in doing so. He measured the mass, with the view of accommodating his figure to the shape of it, and finally executed a young David holding a sling in his hand. It was erected in front of the Piazza del Signori, and was the admiration of everybody; but the Soderini, a municial officer of Florence, in all the flush of aldermanic dignity, must needs say something depreciatory, to show his judgment in matters of art. Michael Angelo perceived at once that he was standing in such a position that he could not see it properly, but, in order to satisfy him, slyly gathered up a little dust in his hand, and going up to the nose, tapped it with the chisel, but without taking any off, and at the same time let fall a little dust. "Look at it now," said he to the Soderini. "Ah!" replied the good man, "I like it better now." By all competent judges, however, the work was looked upon as almost faultless, and the Soderini paid him four hundred crowns for it. A bronze cast of it was made and sent to France.

His next great work was a design for the façade which he constructed for the Great Hall of Council, in competition with Leonardo da Vinci. It was entitled "The War of Pisa," and represented soldiers surprised.

His fame was now so great that he was invited to Rome by Pope Julius II., and charged with the construction of his sepulchral monument, upon which he intended to display extraordinary magnificence. Upon his arrival he went to the quarries of Carrara, and excavated a prodigious quantity of marble, and having collected it at Rome, sketched a design and began the works. The tomb was to stand within the church of St. Peter, which was to be rebuilt for that purpose. It was to stand apart, and around the whole was to run a range of niches, interchanged by terminal figures, clothed from the middle upwards, and bearing the first cornice on their heads, while to every one was bound a captive, in a strange and abased attitude, the feet of each resting on the projection of a scroll or basement. These captives symbolised the provinces, or part's impérial, which Pope Julius had subdued and brought within the jurisdiction of the mother church. Other statues there were also, representing the Arts and Sciences captive, and in mourning attitudes, emblematic at once of their subjection to Religion, and their sorrow at being deprived by death of their patron and promoter. Above the cornice appeared friezes in bronze, with figures of cherubim, and over all two figures—one, Heaven, carrying a bier upon her shoulder, and smiling with joy that so great and good a man was entering her portals; the other, Cybele, or Earth, bewailing her misfortune in losing him.

It is sad, after having called up before our minds the image of so noble a work, to learn that it was never completed. Many of the statues were executed, but as the building was not forthcoming, they were scattered far and wide. Two of those representing the captives were given to Roberto Strozzi, a gentleman at whose house the sculptor had lain during his illness, and by him they were presented to Francis I. of France. They remained for a while at St. Eeonen, but are now in the Louvre.

The works of the tomb were, however, still proceeding, when an unexpected and rather curious incident brought them to an abrupt termination. Some marble arrived one day from the quarries, and as the carriers had to be paid, Michael Angelo went to the Pope for the money. On his arrival at the palace, he found that he was engaged in transacting some very important business. He accordingly returned, and paid the men himself, believing he would be reimbursed next day. But on repairing to the Vatican for that purpose, the servants refused him admittance. He was astonished—declared there should be some mistake;—but not the orders regarding him were express and positive. He instantly left the city, and returned, post-haste, to Florence, where he formed the intention of going to Constantinople, and entering the service of the Sultan, who had invited him to his court for the purpose of constructing a bridge to connect the capital with Pera on the other side of the strait. The Pope in the meantime was writing furious letters to the Florentine authorities, demanding his return; but Michael Angelo, who resented affronts keenly, positively refused to do so. At last, so imperious did the language of the pontiff become, that he forced to return, even if he had felt desirous of doing so; and it was not till the Soderini offered to secure him against all harm by investing him with the sacred character of a Florentine ambassador, that he at last consented.

When he reached the Pope at Bologna, he found that the idea of completing the tomb was abandoned, and he received a commission for a statue in bronze of his Holiness. The clay model was completed before the pontiff left Bologna for Rome, and he came to see it. The right hand was elevated with an air of great dignity. The Pope, not knowing what was to be in the left, inquired whether he was supposed to be blessing the people or anathematising them. The sculptor replied that he was "admonishing the Bolognese to behave discreetly," and suggested that a book should be placed in the left hand. "Put a sword into it," said the visible head of the church; "of letters I know but little." This statue was placed over the gate of St. Petronio at Bologna, but was afterwards destroyed by the Bentivogli, and the bronze was sold to the Duke Alfonso of Ferrara, who made a piece of cannon of it which he called Julia. Of the fragments, the head only was preserved, which remained for some time in the duke's wardrobe; but what afterwards became of it is not known.

On Michael Angelo's return to Rome he was commissioned to paint the ceiling of the chapel in the Vatican, which Julius had constructed in memory of his uncle, Pope Sixtus, known as the Sistine Chapel. His disappointment at not having the execution of the tomb was amply compensated for by the triumph which he now achieved in this splendid work. It was completed in less than two years, and still continues to excite the astonishment and admiration of every spectator.

After the death of Julius, though his successor Leo X. was one of the greatest and most magnificent patrons of art the world has ever seen, Michael scarcely comes before us at all during his pontificate. He appears to have been mostly employed as an engineer, in which his talents were as great as in art, working quarries, making roads, bridges, aqueducts, &c. During the reign of Adrian VI., Leo's successor, he resumed the construction of the monument of Julius; but civil war and political troubles interrupted it, and drove him back to his native city, which his talents in engineering proved successful in defending against a large besieging force, so that it could not have been taken had not treachery rendered the great man's labours fruitless. When peace was restored, he returned to Rome, and employed himself for some time on the monument of Julius. His next, and in many respects his greatest, work was his painting of the "Last Judgment" in the Sistine Chapel. It was finished in 1541, and is perhaps the most sublime and even awful work which has ever issued from human hand. Thousands of persons came from all parts of Italy to see it. He afterwards painted the "Martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul;" but being old at the time, it cost him great effort and fatigue. Monuments of his genius as painter and sculptor there are, plenty and glorious; but perhaps none of them are so striking and famous as that which testifies to his architectural skill—the Church of St. Peter's at Rome. It was begun by Julius II., in 1506, and was by him committed to the hands of various architects, each of whom added on a different plan from his predecessor. In 1546 it came under Michael Angelo, and he speedily infused harmony and unity into those parts which had been already completed, and made designs for the remainder, which, though he did not live to witness the completion of the edifice, were admirably acted upon, and resulted in producing the noble structure ever devoted to Christian worship.

Michael Angelo died in 1564, and his funeral rites were celebrated with a splendour and solemnity worthy of his great life and great deeds. Sculptor, painter, architect, engineer, and poet; there was hardly anything he did not touch, and he touched nothing that did not bloom.

We have been enabled to discover whether Michael Angelo's drawing, "The Dream of Human Life," which we reproduce (p. 100), is still in existence; and it is impossible even to learn anything of its history. It has been preserved and handed down to us by successive engravers, with slight differences of one kind or another. One only of these versions, however, is recognised by Landon in his works of Michael Angelo.

ALBERT DURER.

ALBERT DURER was born at Nuremberg, on the 20th of May, in the year 1471. His father a native of Pannonia,* was

* "Albertum Durerum à Pannoniâ oriundum accepimus," says Camerarius, in the Preface to his translation of Albert Durer's Vol. I.

a celebrated goldsmith. In his youth he had studied in the Netherlands, under the famous masters of the school of Bruges, who had imparted to him their style, so full of delicacy and truth. But in the year 1455 he relinquished the fertile meadows of Flanders for the fresh valleys of Germany. At the age of twenty-eight he settled at Nuremberg, and there married a young girl, named Barbara Hellerin, who became the mother of the famous artist. It is probable that Albert Durer began to assist his father in his trade at a very early age, but he always manifested a preference for engraving. Some authors, among others Kaael van Mander, maintain that he received lessons from Martin Schongauer, a celebrated engraver, surnamed "Le beau Martin," and known by the name of Martin Schön. But this vague tradition is without foundation, and in the account which Albert Durer has himself written, and which Sandrat has preserved to us, there is nothing to lead us to suppose that his father had any intention of placing him under the tuition of Martin Schongauer, who resided at Colmar. Durer only says, "Having already acquired the art of working in gold, I felt a greater inclination to turn my attention to painting than to pursue the trade of a goldsmith. When I communicated my wishes to my father he was much displeas'd, for he regretted that I had wasted so much time in learning my trade. Nevertheless, he acceded to my desire, and on St. Andrew's Day, in the year 1486, plac'd me for a term of three years with Michael Wohlgemuth." Unaffected and pious, living without ostentation in the bosom of a quiet family, it was long before he became aware of the extent of his powers. The first plate executed by him bears the date of 1497; it represents four naked female figures, and far from having been copied, as is asserted by the historian Baldinucci,* from a copperplate of Israël van Meckenen, was an original work, which Israël van Meckenen copied. His first picture, a portrait of himself, was executed in the year 1498; it is now to be seen at Florence, in the gallery set apart for the reception of autograph portraits. The artist has drawn himself in half length, seated before a window, his hands resting on a maul-stick; he is dressed in festive attire, a white tunic striped with black, and a mantle thrown gracefully over one shoulder. His beautiful hair is arranged in long rich curls. Although the lines are very decided, and the drawing hard, there is a boldness in the execution, and a softness in the touch, which is not to be met with in his later efforts. The noble expression which the master has given to his countenance was no flattery, but with this air of dignity he has blended an ingenuous satisfaction with his personal appearance.

Albert Durer was not only handsome, he was also very proud of his beauty, as we learn from his letters to his intimate friend Willibald Pirckheimer. An innocent pride in the painter, which was only one form of his admiration for all the works of God. It seems, indeed, as if nature had been as bounteous with her outward gifts as she had been prodigal of her intellectual endowments. "She had given him," says Camerarius, "a commanding figure, and a body worthy of being the temple of so exquisite a mind."† His features were remarkably regular, his eye bright, his hair abundant and glossy, and his nose aquiline, while the slender elegance of his neck, his expansive chest, sinewy limbs, and hands of exquisite delicacy, completed his personal attractions.

Albert Durer was fifteen when he commenced studying under Michael Wohlgemuth, one of the old masters, who, full of modesty and honour, practised his art in an obscure studio, caring little for glory, diligently reading his Bible, studying nature, and labouring as if to fulfil a moral obligation.

Having completed the term of his apprenticeship, the young artist left Wohlgemuth, in order that he might see something of the world. He travelled through Germany, and also visited the Netherlands and Italy; but we glean little of this first tour, which, made at the early age of nineteen, must have had a decided influence on his character. "I set out," says Durer, "just after Easter, in the year 1490, and returned in 1494, after Whitsuntide, when Hans Frey negotiated with my father to give me his daughter in marriage, and with her a dowry of 200 flains. Our nuptials were celebrated on the Monday before St. Margaret's Day, 1494." If we are to judge by the portrait of Agnes, painted by her husband, she must have been possessed of extraordinary beauty; but with this beauty was mingled an expression of irritability, more especially when anything unusual happened to annoy her. Albert Durer, warned of this failing by the delicacy of his perception, could not help entertaining gloomy forebodings. He thought of the young girl promised him in marriage, as one of those sinister prophecies which the Pythoness of old was wont to clothe in brilliant language. But he submitted to what he considered his destiny.

The newly-married couple lived happily together for a short period. Soon, however, clouds began to gather. Durer, whose character was mild and gentle, had not the determination to commence a strife with the charming, though formidable, Agnes Frey. The disconsolate artist sought comfort and advice from a near friend, in whom he ever found a ready sympathiser in his sorrows. Being married himself, Willibald Pirckheimer was the better fitted to be his counsellor, though his domestic life formed a strange contrast to that of Albert Durer. His partner was a model of grace and gentleness; no discord had ever disturbed their harmony. But he was destined to have his share of the troubles of this world; his wife died, and her loss was a mutual grief to the two friends. The artist, deeply impressed with the memory of Crescentia, painted her stretched on her death-bed, holding in her failing hand a lighted taper and a crucifix, and receiving extreme unction from a priest seated at the bed-side, while a kneeling Augustine friar reads the prayers for the dying. This painting was executed with pious care. At the side of the weeping Willibald are seen the nuns of St. Clair, who are come to soothe the last hours of his wife. At the top of the canvas Durer wrote, in letters of gold, words dictated to him by his friend.

In the meantime Agnes Frey, tormented by avarice, restless, haughty, and violent, allowed no repose to the husband she had tamed, to the melancholy painter of "Melancholy." She urged him to work, even threatened him, and at last locked him in his studio. He wrote sorrowfully to his faithful friend, Willibald Pirckheimer: "I hear that you have taken to yourself a wife; take care that she prove not also a master." Once he managed to get beyond the reach of this Xanthippe, by making a second visit to the city of lagoons, the home of Italian art, beautiful Venice. He was induced to make this journey, by the pleasant reminiscences of his former sojourn there. This was in the year 1506. The wonderful engravings of Albert Durer were already beginning to astonish the lovers of the fine arts in Italy; his renown had crossed the Alps and reached the ears of Raffaele. These two great masters having discovered that their admiration was reciprocal, exchanged portraits, Durer sending with his some of his fine engravings. The famous engraver, Marc Antonio, of Bologna, was at that time in Venice. He observed in these engravings what was wanting in his own. He remarked the admirable guidance of the graver, the exactitude and delicacy of the figures, and the great precision with which the copper was cut. Admiring also the free and bold style of Durer's wood-engravings, he attempted to imitate it. By degrees he was led on by his success to counterfeit thirty-seven pieces of "The Passion," and to make them complete, placed upon them, instead of his own mark, the monogram of Albert Durer. Vasari relates, that Durer, warned of this fraud by the receipt of some of the proofs, hastened to Venice, brought an action against Marc Antonio, and obtained an order from the magistrates forbidding the Bolognese engraver to use, for the future, the cypher of Albert Durer. This anecdote has been contradicted, and has been pronounced by Bartsch to be one of those fictions so frequently met with in the books of art of the period. The reason he gives for his opinion is, that the pieces of "The Passion" are dated 1509 and 1512, and that, consequently, they could not have appeared for several years after Durer's visit to Venice in 1506. It would be necessary, he justly observes, to prove that Albert Durer made another journey to Venice; but of this we have no account. This argument is forcible, and, we may say, conclusive, when we remember the numerous inaccuracies of which Vasari has been found guilty. From the confidential letters which Albert Durer wrote to his friend Willibald Pirckheimer from Venice, we may gather, that the sojourn of the Nuremberg artist caused quite a sensation among the Walsche (it was thus that

* We read in Baldinucci (Vita di Alberto Durer): "Altro non si vede di quel tempo fatto da lui, che una stampa colla data del 1497, anno venzellesimo dell' eta sua, e quella anche aveva copiata da una simile intagliata da Israël de Menz. . . ." There is certainly a mistake here, arising from the fact of the engravings signed Israël van Meckenen having been attributed to Israël the elder instead of to his son, Israël the younger, who has been proved, both by the Abbé Zani and Adam Bartsch, to have been the real author. The learned iconograplist enumerates several other copies by Israël van Meckenen after Durer, which are very inferior to the originals. In the preface to the Latin translation of Albert Durer's German work, are to be found some most valuable details of the life, character, and habits, of this great artist.

Albert Durer named all those who were not Germans¹. His house was continually besieged by visitors. Nobles, musicians, and learned men sought him, and so disturbed his German tranquillity, that he was sometimes obliged to conceal himself, in order to gain a few hours' quiet. With the characteristic penetration of a German, Albert Durer made his observations on the good people by whom he was surrounded, among whom he detected many of those witty amiable loungers, of whom such numbers still exist in Italy: "One would take them," says he, "for the most charming men. They are well aware that one is not ignorant of their numerous follies, but they only laugh at it." With the solitary exception of Giovanni Bellini, with whom he formed a close friendship, and who overwhelmed him with praises, Durer had ever cause to complain of the painters. Thrice they had him dragged before the magistrate, to compel him to pay the dues of their companies.

"I have many friends among the Uccelle," he writes, "who have warned me neither to eat nor drink with their painters, among whom I have many enemies. They place copies of my works in the churches, and in every building where they can possibly have them; afterwards they speak disparagingly of them, say that they are not antique, and are worth nothing. But Giacomo Bellini praised me in the presence of many gentlemen. He himself paid me a visit for the purpose of asking me to paint him something; he promised to pay me well. Everybody tells me that he is a good and pious man, inasmuch that I have conceived a great affection for him. He is very old, but is yet the first painter. The thing which pleased me so much eleven years ago, does not please me at all now.* I only began to-day to sketch my picture, for I have had so great an irritation in my hands, that I have not been able to work, but it is now better. "ALBRECHT DURER."

The painting to which Albert Durer refers in this letter was executed by order of the German community established at Venice, under the name of "The Fondaco dei Tedeschi." The price agreed upon was eighty-five ducats. As soon as it was placed upon the altar of the church for which it was destined, the dog and the patriarch went to see it. Every one praised it, except such as were painters of only moderate fame; for the great artists, on the contrary, acknowledged the splendour of this foreign genius. Giovanni Bellini extolled him. Andrea Mantegna, a native of Mantua, wished to become acquainted with him, and Durer set out to visit him, but before arriving at Mantua he heard of the death of this painter.† Jacopo da Pontormo, having engaged to paint "The Passion of Jesus Christ," attempted, without disguise, to imitate the Gothic style of Durer, and Vasari himself admits, that the inventions and beautiful conceptions of the German painter were of great assistance to the Italian masters.‡ But this sway, exercised in the very heart of Italy, by a German—that is to say, a barbarian, could not fail to excite the jealousy of the Venetians. Perhaps there never lived a man more happily constituted, and gifted in a higher degree with qualities calculated to gain the affections and dissipate all ill-feeling. Durer was kind and generous to all, and always mild and gentle in his bearing. His conversation, which displayed at once his high appreciation of art, and his profound knowledge of the mathematical and positive sciences, particularly geometry and architecture, was so agreeable and interesting, that his hearers decided the moment when he should cease to speak. He was never at a loss for words, in which to express himself, and his manner was so noble and dignified, that the highest potentates, Ferdinand, King of Bohemia, and Maximilian, Emperor of Germany, took pleasure in conversing familiarly with him. The latter, having formed the highest opinion of his talents, retained him at his court, where he employed his graver and his brush alternately. It is related, that one day, when engaged in painting some large object, his ladder proving too short, Maximilian requested one of the nobles who surrounded him to hold the ladder, that the artist might mount with safety to the top. But the noble lord considered it beneath his dignity, and refused to obey. "You are noble by birth," exclaimed the irritated Emperor, "my painter is crowned by genius;" and to show how much easier it was to make a noble than a great painter, Maximilian forthwith commanded that a patent of nobility should be made out for Durer, giving him for armorial bearings—three shields on a field of azure, two on the chief, and one on the base. These arms became subsequently those of all the societies of painters.

At the age of forty-nine, Albert Durer again visited the Netherlands. Unfortunately, Agnès Frey, his terrible spouse, followed him there. Antwerp being at that time the most important town in the Low Countries, and the centre of commerce, was the first place they visited. The evening of their arrival, the agent of a rich banking-house—that of the Fuggers—gave them a splendid supper. The following days Durer was escorted through the city, and the painters invited him to a dinner which was given at their hall, of which the illustrious guest gives the following account:—"No expense was spared; the banquet was served on silver, and all the painters, with their wives, were present. When I entered with mine, they separated on either side, as if I had been one of the nobles of the land. There were present many persons of high station, who greeted me respectfully, manifesting every desire to be agreeable and obliging in all things. When we were seated, Master Rathporth offered me, in the name of the corporation, four measures of wine, in token of their good will and esteem. I thanked them, expressing my gratitude. . . . The entertainment was continued until a late hour of the night, when we were conducted home by torchlight, amid overwhelming protestations of friendship."

At Ghent and at Bruges Durer received a similar welcome. Proofs of esteem were lavished upon him, in the shape of invitations; delicacies abounded, the wine flowed plentifully, and every evening he was conducted to his abode by torchlight. Margaret of Austria, regent of the Netherlands for Charles V., hearing that Durer was at Brussels, despatched an officer of the court to assure him of the favour of herself and the emperor. In gratitude for this politeness, the Nuremberg engraver presented to Margaret some of his finest plates, "St. Jerome in the Room," engraved on copper with wonderful delicacy, a copy of "The Passion," and afterwards he gave her a pair of his entire collection of engravings, with the addition of two subjects drawn on parchment with great labour and care, which he valued at thirty florins. But he soon began to feel the effects of intrigue: the envious prepared snares for him so artfully, that after the favourable reception which Margaret had given him, her manner suddenly changed towards him. Durer showed her a portrait which he had painted of the Emperor Charles V., when she assumed so disdainful an air, that the artist was compelled to remove his canvas in silence. On another occasion, in order to ascertain whether this contempt were felt for his talents or his person, he begged for the little book of Master Jacob (Jacob Cornelisz), which was embellished with choice miniatures; but the lady replied sharply that it was promised to her painter, Bernard Van spicuously in his memorandum-book these vengeful words: "In all my transactions, whether in selling or in buying during my sojourn in the Netherlands, in all my intercourse with the high or low classes, I have been wronged, more particularly by the Lady Margaret (of Austria), who has given me nothing in return for all my presents and labours." Regarding the portrait of the Emperor Charles V., which the regent had appeared to despise, Albert Durer was obliged to part with it for a pocket-handkerchief of English manufacture. Happily a citizen of Antwerp, Alexander Imhoff, accommodated him with a loan of one hundred golden florins, for which he put his hand to a bill stamped with his seal, and Orley. Then and there ended their connexion, much to the gratification of the crafty and the envious. This celebrated engraver was not worse treated by the Austrian princess than by private individuals, for in Brussels he painted six portraits, for none of which the remuneration was forthcoming. His abode at Antwerp provoked the following remark:—"I have made here many drawings and portraits, the majority of which have brought me nothing." In consequence of this, although he worked hard and practised the strictest economy, he became involved in pecuniary difficulties. Hurt by the contrast which he remarked between his splendid reception and the strange proceedings which followed it, he wrote con-payable at Nuremberg. Just as he was meditating his departure, Christian II., king of Denmark, made his appearance in the city, and, hearing that Durer was still there, sent for him, loaded him with favours, and desired to have his portrait taken by so great an artist, for which he paid him liberally. Gratiated by the splendid engravings presented to him by Albert Durer, Christian invited him to a banquet, at which the Emperor, the Princess Margaret, and the Queen of Spain were present; but none of these august personages deigned to address a word to the noble and handsome guest, whose genius did honour to a royal entertainment. Soon after this, our artist left Belgium, carrying with him bitter reminiscences, which made his native Germany appear more charming than ever. There, at least, he had only to bear his customary grief, conjugal strife, a grief which was unvarying and inconsolable, and which was revived, from time to time, by the passions of Agnes.

The study of the Flemish paintings, and his own acute observation, had by degrees worked a considerable modification in Albert Durer's view with regard to the nature and aim of art. The correspondence of his friend Melancthon, as well as the later works of the painter, proves to us that, towards the close of his career, his mind underwent a vast change.

unable to support the double burden of labour and taxation, inasmuch as Agnes Frey became every day more peevish and ill-tempered. In the abode in which the unhappy couple passed their stormy existence, where should have reigned that peace and quiet so dear to artists, and the poetic and softening influences of memory, ill-humour, defiance, anger, all the irritated and irritating passions were let loose. Tortured by the foolish fear of poverty, the avaricious and beautiful Agnes harassed the patient engraver with her lamentations. She watched him with a commanding look, and held his genius captive to her sordid spirit, demanding what was to

SAMSON SLAYING THE LION.—AFTER ALBERT DURER.

Instead of the profusion of detail which characterised his more youthful productions, he now sought to throw into his pictures a simplicity and harmony of conception, which he found made a much nearer approach to nature, than the laborious variety which he crowded into his former pictures. He regretted that he had not discovered this earlier in life, for, at his age, it was difficult to alter his style of painting; but with these noble regrets was mingled the still more noble desire to improve the style and general character of his works. Such is the energy of the true artist! Then it was that he painted the sublime figures of the Apostles, which are to be seen at Munich.

A fatal hour was approaching for Albert Durer. He was become of her should she be left a widow.* Those friends who would have solaced and entertained him were driven away,

* Nemini mortem imputare queat, quam uxori ejus que cor ipsa usque adeo eroserit, tantoque cruciatus eundem afflixerit, . . . ut nullam a labore remissionem querere, vel societati quorundam interesse potuerit, ob continuas querelas, quibus ad laborandum noctu atque interdum rigore cum compulerit, ut pecuniam saltem quam moriens ipse relinqueret, lucraretur . . . etc.—“Letters of George Hartman,” a friend of Durer. Bayle, in his “Dictionary,” quotes a letter from Prince Anthony Ulrich, of Brunswick, which proves that Durer suffered all the misfortunes, with all the patience of Socrates. “Ipsum domi Xanthippen habuisse perniciam et divina sue mentis flagellatricem accerrimam.” and the poor old painter, tired of life, and worn out with struggling, lost his energy, and gave himself up to despair. An eyewitness relates, that his reason sometimes seemed to wander. Albert Durer died on the 6th of April, 1528.

At the cemetery of St. John, at Nuremberg, is shown the spot where this great master, after a life full of troubles and anxieties, found a haven of rest. "It is impossible to imagine a more gloomy place," says one of our contemporaries.* Not one of those country graveyards, so full of nature's poetry; no weeping willows drooping their melancholy branches; no dark towering cypress mounting towards the skies; no flowers, green turf, or garlands, pious offerings from the living to the memory of the dead. The tombs, ranged in long rows, like the beds of the patients in a hospital, are merely flat stones laid over the graves. No railing encloses them, no cross surmounts them; their burying-place might be compared to a camp-bed set up for a night. Meanwhile, the lichen spreads its dusky stains, and the mass of rank verdure announces that oblivion is already beginning to swallow up the memory of those beloved beings to whom the epitaph promises eternal tears.

On Albert Durer's tomb-stone is the following simple inscription:—

ME. AL. DU

QUIBQUID ALBERTI DURERI MORTALE TUIT

SUB HOC CONDITUR TUMULO

EMIGRAVIT VIII IDUS APRILIS MDXXVIII.

Willibald Pirckheimer, the faithful friend of the great painter, added, after this short epitaph, a brief catalogue of his virtues, and mentioned the universal grief which was felt for his loss. It well became him to engrave this last farewell on Albert Durer's tomb-stone, for he had strengthened and consoled him all his life. Even fate seemed to respect their old attachment, for they are laid side by side in the same graveyard.

So much for the man: let us now briefly examine the works by which he is known. Having already (ante p. 37), on presenting our readers with the beautiful allegorical design called "Melancholy," by Albert Durer, spoken at some length of the peculiarities of his style, it will be unnecessary to go over the ground again. On the contrary, we believe it will be more profitable if we consider with attention the subjects we are enabled to introduce into these pages as illustrations of the genius of the great German artist.

Albert Durer lived in troublous and stirring times—times favourable for the development of genius wherever it was possessed; for, while he sat in his study and imagined moralities and satires upon mankind, while he indulged in those fantastic dreams which he has revealed to us in so many shap's, while he travelled to Venice, to study the arts—and to escape the tongue of Agnes Frey,—Columbus, and Americus Vesputius, and Sebastian Cabot, were opening up fresh fields for the enterprise and commerce of mankind. While he was busy over those wonderful sketches of the great Passion of our Lord, Luther and Melancthon were fiercely battling with old Rome, and the dawn of the Reformation broke upon the world. While he was painting that grand picture of St. Mark and St. Paul and St. John and St. Peter, as a parting gift to the people of Nuremberg—that famous picture, removed a hundred years afterwards to a more princely resting-place, the Protestant inscriptions on which, written by his own hand, were rudely cut away, lest they should offend the courtly eyes of the elector of Bavaria—during that time, Laurentius in Haerlem, and William Caxton in Westminster, were perfecting that "divine art" which has done so much to advance the liberties and increase the comforts of mankind; the people of western Europe were just beginning to appreciate and understand the sciences which the Moors, now driven ignominiously out of Europe, were wont to cultivate in the fair city of Granada; Sir Thomas More was improving the literary taste, of which

* M. Alfred Michéls, author of "Études sur l'Allemagne," where it is to be found a summary of the history of German Painting.

Geoffrey Chaucer and old John Gower had laid the foundations in England a century before; the great Raffaele was adorning the Vatican with those beautiful frescoes, which have been the wonder and study of artists ever since; and men were just beginning to wake up out of their long sleep of apathy and ignorance, never, it is to be hoped, to doze again.

The art of engraving and etching upon copper had not long been invented when Albert Durer was born: before he was twenty, however, he had made such progress in its practice as to be looked upon as Michael Wohlgenuth's most promising pupil; and by the time he was twenty-three, he had established himself as a "painter, engraver, architect, and sculptor," in his native place, that

"Quaint old town of toil and traffic, Quaint old town of art and song."

Henceforth he was destined to be the principal painter and engraver of Germany, and to leave on the works of all future German artists the impress of his own peculiar treatment. He found in the works of his predecessors a dreamy, wild, fantastic energy; and he followed in their path with such success as, in his earlier works, to surpass anything that had gone before, in eccentric spirit and vague mysticism.

Of this peculiar manner, this singular treatment, this fantastic, thought-provoking style of drawing, which we have numerous examples in the works of Albert Durer. Thus, besides the allegory of "Melancholy," already given in these pages, we are enabled to present our readers with two other specimens of what may be called Albert Durer's first manner. In "The Lord and the Lady" (p. 173), we recognise one of those strange German moralities of which the painters of that day were so extremely fond. Here is an allegory of human life, not difficult to translate. The lord is whispering "soft nothings" in the lady's ear, while, in the shadow of the bare and leafless tree, the conqueror Death stands waiting by. Hour-glass in hand, he watches their every motion, as if, at no distant time, he meant to claim his own. Honour and wealth, and pride and station, possess no spells to charm the destroyer; youth and age, ruddy health and tottering disease, beauty and deformity, bravery and cowardice, strength and weakness, genius and stolid ignorance, all fall beneath his resistless dart—all succumb, as it were, to an irrevocable Nemesis from which there is no escaping.

Of a like character, both as respects the high degree of careful finish given to the work, and the mysterious darkness of the theme, is the "Death's Head Coat of Arms." Who can fail to read and understand the dread lesson it essays to teach? The most subtle and learned king-at-arms never emblazoned heraldic picture such as this. Here, upon honour's shield, is painted the escutcheon which every man must hang above his door at last—grim, grinning Death! Oh, the painter is a moralist indeed! A bare, eyeless skull, supported by civilisation and barbarism—the crowned lady and the naked savage—is the picture which our mortality holds up before the eyes of our pride. It is a lesson we may every one of us take to heart. And the crest to this dread coat of arms is an empty helmet, fantastically crowned with eagles' wings and leaves, emblematic of the emptiness of worldly honours and the worthlessness of pride! Well may the satyr leer into the lady's eyes; for the jewel-crowned head, no less than the beggar's, must come, one day, to be a thing like that depicted on the shield.

Albert Durer's mature manner shows itself in more plainly understood, but not less powerful, imaginings. In such designs as "The Passion of Christ," "The Apocalypse of St. John," "The Martyrdom of the Ten Thousand Saints," "The Knight, Death, and the Devil"—a sort of condensed expression of the spirit of the "Pilgrim's Progress," says Sir Edmund Head; in Madonnas and Apostles; in "The Triumphal Arch and Car of Maximilian;" in "The Life of the Virgin;" and lastly, in portraits of friends and homelike pictures, such as are used to hang over the fire-places in good citizens' houses.

The first-named work consists of two great series of woodcuts, afterwards rendered in more enduring copper. "The Great Passion" comprises representations of the main incidents in the eventful life of our Saviour—his birth in the manger, his dispute with the doctors, his way to Calvary with the cross upon his shoulders, the taking down of his body from the fatal tree, his burial and resurrection.

In all these subjects, says Kugler, the most perfect grouping is made consistent with the greatest simplicity of design; and however indifferently the engraver has executed his part, the very varied expression of the single figures, and the peculiar grace of the lines and movements, cannot be concealed. When we look at such fine works, we easily comprehend why the wily Italians valued Durer's compositions so highly, and how it was that a translation of them into Italian was so much desired.

"The Lesser Passion" consists, as the name implies, of a series of the more domestic incidents in the life of Christ—pictures in which the mysterious events related are all brought before the spectator, as in a moment of time, with truth, power, and the liveliest feeling of the beautiful. Of these, the most celebrated are—"Christ washing the Feet of his Disciples," in which a great number of figures are artistically grouped in a small space, which, nevertheless, is not crowded or confused, but leaves the principal group, in which the Saviour is of course the prominent figure, clear and distinct from all the rest; "Christ praying on the Mount of Olives," one of those simply beautiful compositions in which dignity and feeling are blended with the greatest tenderness and the most profound repose; "Christ taking leave of his Mother," previous to the accomplishment of his great mission (p. 161), another of those touching incidents which Durer, in his best period, knew so well how to depict; "Christ appearing, after his Resurrection, to Mary in the Garden, and to his Mother in the Chamber," both compositions of great beauty and simplicity of arrangement—of one of these, "Christ taking leave of his Mother," our readers will be able to form their own judgment. The noble tenderness of the son, the anguish of the mother, and the sympathy of the attendants, all evince the hand of a master in their development. In this series the utmost carefulness in the arrangement of his groups has been observed, and in the disposition of the drapery there is a nobleness and simplicity which displays the figures to the utmost advantage. It has been noticed, in Albert Durer's oil paintings, that the draperies are generally too much cut up into strange shapes, a plan by no means calculated to improve the forms of their wearers. But in all his ideal subjects, his fancy being allowed full play and his pencil being freed from the fashions of his own country, he has made the folds of his draperies fall in those large imposing masses, so much admired in the works of the great Italian master, Raffaele. A great anachronism, however, occurs in this series of pictures—namely, the frequent introduction of German styles of architecture and costume, and a consequent destruction of that unity of design so highly desirable in works of historical value. This kind of oversight is frequently observable in the productions of the German and Dutch schools of painting; and we need only refer, in illustration of our remarks, to "The Rape of the Sabinæ," in the National Gallery, in which Rubens dresses his Sabine women in garments of Venetian silk. The two works known as "The Greater and Lesser Passion," have been engraved twice on copper and once on wood.

From "The Life of the Virgin," a series of twenty woodcuts, we have selected the most important, viz., "The Marriage of Mary and Joseph" (p. 169). Instead of the severely classical style observed in "The Passion," we have in this series a representation of those tender relations of domestic life which Albert Durer knew so well how to depict. The series embraces the history, as far as it is described in the New Testament, of the mother of Jesus. The scenes most interesting, after that shown in our engraving, are "The Birth of the Virgin," which event Albert Durer, true to his national predilections and quite oblivious of facts, has made to take place in a German house in the midst of a numerous company of women and maidens; "The Flight into Egypt," a composition of a few figures simply disposed in a thickly growing wood; "The Repose in Egypt," in which the Virgin sits spinning beside the cradle of her little one, while Joseph is employed at a carpenter's bench, unseen by either father or mother, angels worship beside the lowly resting place of the child Jesus; and "The Death of the Virgin." This last subject has been frequently copied by the pupils of Albert Durer, and many pictures after it exist in the continental galleries, some of them even bearing the monogram of the original artist. It is stated by Dr Kugler to be "a perfect coup d'oeil, with a simple division of the principal groups; fine forms, and indications of the deepest feeling in the solemn exercise of holy rites."

The "Marriage of Mary and Joseph" is a work which may be advantageously studied. It is at once delicate and powerful in the manner of its treatment; and, considering the comparative infancy of the art at the period at which it was drawn, may be looked upon as a great triumph of skill. The arrangement of the lights and shadows in this picture was pronounced by a recent writer on art to be worthy the pencil of that great master of chiaroscuro, Rembrandt. St. Joseph is properly represented as much older than his bride, the expression of whose face is tender and submissive, though she is not beautiful. The female figure to the right of Mary is strangely attired in an enormous head-dress and loose gown; but the drapery on the other figures is gracefully and artistically disposed. The architectural arrangements of the building are extremely well managed, and in the bas-reliefs on the arch there is shown great fertility of invention and play of fancy. As a specimen of wood engraving, however, this is scarcely equal to the "Death's Head Coat of Arms," already noticed, or the "Melancholy."

The Dutch and German painters appear to have possessed but little idea of female beauty, or but small power of expressing it. But, in truth, their models were not chargeable with the sin of too much loveliness, a fact which may in part account for the extremely plain, not to say ugly, women whom Durer and his compeers have christened by the name of Mary. A modern writer says that the women of Germany do not belong to the tender sex, at least in appearance. Thus, can anything be more unlovely than the female figure with the child upon her lap, which is known by the name of "The Virgin with the Monkey?" (p. 172. What was the design of the painter in introducing so ugly an animal into his picture, it is impossible to guess; for there is nothing in tradition or history, that we are acquainted with, which would account for such an eccentric combination. The face of the monkey, indeed, is so prominently intruded as quite to call off the attention from the infant Jesus playing with the bird, which should, according to all precedent, be the leading object in the picture. But in the details and accessories this picture is really fine. To be sure, there is in the background a Nuremberg house and a German landscape, but then the lover of old Flemish and Italian pictures has long ago learnt to look indulgently on such little inconsistencies as these.

"The War Horse" (p. 176) belongs to altogether another class of subjects. It bears the date 1505, and the monogram of the painter. Like the rest of Durer's performances, it is characterised by extreme care and laborious finish. Indeed, when we come to examine this design, and mark the evidences of labour bestowed upon its execution—every line completed, every separate hair and muscle of the animal elaborated with the greatest nicety, every part of the design worked up with the extremest pains, every part of the copper-plate covered in with "cross-hatchings" and "dry point" work—we are inclined to ask ourselves, was all this patient labour expended for no other purpose than to show us an unwieldy-looking horse and its soldier-rider, standing quietly in the grass-grown court-yard of an old castle? There must, we think, have been some motive for all this real hard work which, at this distance of time, is hidden from us. Perhaps both horse and rider were portraits.

attributed to Albert Durer; but whether he really engraved them or not, it is pretty certain that the drawings on the wood

One other subject concludes our list of illustrations. "Samson Slaying the Lion" is one of the many wood engravings were from his hand. It is a masterly production, and shows, more than any other design we have introduced, how entirely he could overcome that vague mysticism and eccentricity so common to the school of which he was the head and founder. The amazing strength of the man, as, with his legs bestriding the infuriated animal, he is supposed to be tearing its jaws moment in a little minute criticism - we cannot but think that the hinder limbs of the latter appear too much at rest for the writhing pain exhibited in its head and fore claws. In this, as in other subjects, the background is Germany of the six-asunder, is seen in every muscle of his huge body. The perfect mastery he has obtained over the lion is shown in its crouching attitude and utter prostration. Both man and animal are exceedingly well drawn, though—to indulge for a teenth century—a rather strange country into which to introduce the enemy of the Philistines and an Arabian lion! A similar inconsistency is observable in Rubens' treatment of the same subject, which is engraved by the Fleming artist, Wyngaerde, who resided in Antwerp about the year 1640.

Enough has been said of the philosophy and tendency of Albert Durer's works; it will be our task now, therefore, to tell the reader where the originals of his most famous compositions are to be found. As we have already said, no specimens of Durer's oil paintings are to be seen in either the National Gallery, the Louvre, or the Belgian Museum; though the British Museum and the Louvre each of them possess impressions from his copper-plates and wood engravings. In the library of the Louvre are fifteen original drawings by Albert Durer, executed with a pen and shaded on white tinted paper, illustrative of the "Passion and Resurrection of Jesus Christ." In the National Library of Paris there are also five of our artist's beautifully-executed water-colour drawings; and in the Royal Library at Munich, there is preserved the celebrated missal of Maximilian I., during whose reign the Reformation, under Luther, first began. This missal is adorned with numerous arabesques by Albert Durer, drawn about the year 1515. The King of Bavaria also possesses eight drawings by this great master. In the collection of prints at Berlin, there are upwards of two hundred drawings by Durer; and the archduke Charles of Austria likewise possesses five specimens at his palace at Vienna. But the most complete and valuable collection of Durer's unpublished drawings is in the possession of the family of Joseph Heller, the artist, better known as the author of the "Life and Works of Albert Durer." This famous collection contains, besides various drawings, upwards of seventy portraits of persons with whom the painter was acquainted. Several of these drawings are rendered still more valuable by notes and descriptions from the hand of the artist.

Of the ENGRAVINGS ON WOOD attributed to Albert Durer, we have given several specimens. Many impressions exist in the British Museum, the Louvre at Paris, the Museum at Berlin, and elsewhere. Whether Durer actually engraved upon the wood, or contented himself with making the drawings merely, is a disputed question among artists and connoisseurs. Adam Bartsch, the celebrated German engraver, and keeper of the Imperial collection of Prints at Vienna from about 1790 to 1820, is of opinion that, from the multitudinous occupations of Albert Durer, he could not possibly have engraved the wood-cuts attributed to him; and he is further strengthened in this opinion by the inscriptions on the titles of the various productions in which those wood-cuts appeared. The German engravers, Hans Schauflein, Hans Burgmaier, Albert Altdorfer, and Lucas Cranach, most of whom were contemporaries of Durer, agree with Bartsch, who is still further confirmed in his conclusion by Charles Blanc, the editor of the "Histoire des Peintres," and George Stanley, the latest editor of Pilkington's "Dictionary of Painters." On the other hand, John Young, formerly keeper of the British Institution in Pall Mall, Joseph Heller, Rumohr, Otley, and Heinecke, affirm the probability of Durer's having both drawn and engraved the blocks. For ourselves, we offer no opinion on the subject; content with the knowledge, that if an artist-mind guides the pencil, no indifferent engraving can altogether mar the effect of the drawing; and that, on the other hand, if the original drawing be bad, no amount of mechanical skill in the use of the graver is sufficient to completely hide its artistic defects.

There are no fewer than a hundred and seventy known wood engravings after Albert Durer's drawings, besides some sixty or more attributed to him. These last, though extremely well executed, do not bear internal evidence of Durer's handiwork. Most of the wood engravings—such as the "Greater and Lesser Passion," the "Life of the Virgin," "Samson slaying the Lion," &c., are from Scripture history.

Of the ENGRAVINGS ON COPPER, STEEL, AND TIN, executed by Albert Durer, Bartsch enumerates no fewer than a hundred and eight, about one-fourth of which are devoted to sacred subjects. It would not be consistent with our space or design to give a list of these, but we may briefly indicate the most noticeable among them. The series of sixteen plates, called the "Passion of Christ," has been three times engraved, and the coppers bear various dates, from 1507 to 1512. "Adam and Eve," and the "Nativity," impressions of both of which, from plates, may be seen in the print room of the British Museum, bear the date of 1501. Two proofs of the first-named subject sold at Durand's sale for £60. Several "Holy Families," on copper, are much esteemed by collectors, especially that known as the "Virgin with the Monkey," and another known as the "Virgin with the Apple," which represents Mary seated on a stone, in a landscape with buildings, and the infant holding in his hand an apple—a mode of representation very common in Nuremberg, where there exist some dozens of sculptured Virgins, executed by unknown artists, of greater or less pretensions as works of art.

The fine allegorical subject, called "Melancholy," a copy of which was sold at the Debois' sale for £5; "Death's Horse," which at the same sale brought £10; a woman with wings standing on a globe, holding in her hand a cup, "improperly called," says Stanley, "Pandora's Box," but otherwise known as the "Great Fortune," a proof of which was sold for £15; a naked woman on a globe, holding a stick with a thistle at the end of it, which is known as the "Little Fortune," and a proof of which sold for £5; "St. Hubert kneeling before a Stag, with a Cross on its forehead," one of Durer's best works, proofs of which sold for £20 to £30, according to their merit; "Death's Horse," which fetched £10; "The War Horse," also engraved on wood; the "Lord and Lady;" the "Conversion of St. Eustace," a perfect work; "St. Jerome meditating on the Holy Scriptures," the "Twelve Apostles," the "Prodigal Son," "Death's Head Coat of Arms" (also on wood), the "Crucifixion," with the holy women and St. John at the foot of the cross, "Christ praying in the Garden," and the great "Ecce Homo," are all well-known subjects. Besides these, there are numerous engraved portraits, among which are—Albert Mayence, Frederick, Elector of Saxony, Willibald Pirckheimer, Philip Melancthon, the Reformer, Erasmus of Rotterdam, and Joachim Patenier, the landscape-painter of Leige and bosom-friend of Albert Durer.

Various scholars and followers of Durer's style have copied his engravings with more or less success. Among them may be mentioned Hans Wagner, Hans Schauflein, Bartholomew Beham, Albert Altdorfer, Jacques Binck, the first scholar of Albert Durer, Wenceslaus of Olmutz (1481), Wemig (1509), and Marc Antonio Ramondi (1787—1530). The last-mentioned artist has been pronounced one of the most extraordinary engravers of his time. The purity of his outlines, the beautiful character and expression of his heads, and the correct drawing of the extremities, establish his merit as a perfect master of design. But he was at the same time a great forger; for, according to Vasari, he saw at Venice the set of thirty-six wood-cuts by Durer representing the "Life and Passion of Jesus Christ," and was so much pleased with them, that he copied them with great precision on copper; and, having affixed Albert's cipher to them, the prints were taken to Italy and sold as originals. Durer at length, discovering the deception, complained to the senate of Nuremberg of the plagiarism, when the only redress that he obtained was, an order that for the future, when Antonio chose to copy Durer's, or any other painter's works, he should affix his own, and not the original artist's name to the plates!

Albert Durer, architect, sculptor, painter, engraver, geometer, and author, has left numerous evidences of his skill behind him. In SCULPTURE his most important work is an alto-relievo in stone, representing the "Preaching of St. John the Baptist," now in the royal cabinet in Brunswick. The "Adam and Eve," carved in wood, in the cabinet of Gotha; "Jesus Christ on the Cross," a carving on ivory, in the royal collection at Munich; the "Thirty Thousand Virgins," sculptured in agate upon an altar, in the royal collection at Vienna,—are all fine works, and display, more fully perhaps than any other of his performances, the peculiar tendency of the artist's mind. Durer's carvings on stone, wood, ivory, and agate, are preserved with jealous care in the palaces of the nobility of Germany, which fact will account for so few of them being known in the present day. He is also said to have engraved several subjects on gems for seals, &c.

As an author, Albert Durer's fame rests upon several books of a technical character, very little known or read now-a-days. Among these are: "Instructions for Measuring with the Rule and Compasses," published in 1525, and enriched with sixty-three copperplate engravings; "Instructions for Building Fortifications," with nineteen engravings, published in 1547, and translated from the German into Latin in 1531; "Four Books on the Proportions of the Human Body," with plates, published in 1528, and afterwards translated into Latin in 1592, and French in 1597; and, certainly the most amusing work for the general reader, a volume of his letters, political essays, and journals of travels, published in French by Campe, under the title of "Relics of Albert Durer." This last work will be found in the library of the British Museum.

His most celebrated literary production is the Treatise on the Proportions of the Human Body. It must be confessed, however, that his German character, with all its obscurity and want of method, is observable in this treatise, in which there is also a great deficiency of comprehensive ideas, no general principle, and no synthesis. The reader can see clearly enough that Albert Durer was a man of imagination, but not a philosopher, and that he was deficient in that clearness of deduction for which French writers are so remarkable. When we find such a master as Durer taking in hand so fine a subject as that masterpiece of creation, the human body; we naturally expect the writer will rise to some elevation of thought, and show some sympathy with the lofty considerations suggested by the contemplation of nature's noblest production. On the contrary, Durer gives utterance to none of those great ideas which might well have served as the foundation for his work; he lays down no general principle, but abruptly commences by entering upon the consideration of a human body, which is seven times the size of the head, remarking at the same time that this proportion belongs only to rustic figures. In the second chapter he discusses one that is eight times as large as the head, upon which he gives no express indication of his opinion, though from other parts of his work it would appear he considered this proportion preferable. He then proceeds to the figure of a man whose height is equal to nine heads. Here the author, foreseeing a large and higher head may be desired, proposes the geometrical mean. Next comes the proportion of ten times the head, which Albert Durer evidently regards as exceeding the true proportion of beauty; for he pronounces the figure to be slender. Hence he allows the reader to increase the size of the head, and make it nearly a ninth part of the body. From a comparison of these various proportions, and Albert Durer's remarks upon them, we gather that, according to his notions, the proportion of beauty lies between the height of eight, and that of nine heads, since this is neither rustic, like that of seven heads, nor slender, like that of ten. But this view is nowhere distinctly expressed. The author avoids declaring his opinion in plain terms, leaving the reader to form his own judgment. He even goes so far, in the third book of his treatise, when touching upon the variety of human figures, as to invent a sort of instrument for lengthening or shortening figures, making them larger above, or smaller below, thicker or thinner, by placing them upright or inclined in a triangle, in which they diminish as they approach the vertex or uppermost point, and increase as they recede from it. If, however, he carries this alteration of figures to excess—that is to say, if he shortens or lengthens the representation of it so as to make it unnaturally thick or thin—no doubt he does this in order to warn the student and preserve him from the faults to which he is liable, and to teach him elegance by showing him deformity. But where is Albert Durer's idea of beauty? Will it suffice for the student to avoid every species of deformity in order to succeed in attaining to beauty? Albert Durer does not tell us this. He hopes the skilful artist will discover the laws of proportion by studying a great multitude of men, no particular man being perfect. "The beauty," he says, "concealed in nature almost confuses one. We may meet with two handsome and well formed men, who nevertheless have nothing in common, and of whom it is impossible to say which is the handsomer. Such is the imperfection of our knowledge. Who, then, can say with confidence and precision what is true excellence of form?" And not only does he confess himself unable to determine what constitutes true beauty, but he does not think the artist can worthily express the little he knows of it. And he exclaims, "Art can hardly express the beauty of nature. I speak not of a perfect beauty, but of one known to us and yet surpassing the power of our understanding, and escaping the skilful touch of our hand."

The Italians have been less severe than we in their judgment of this treatise, and Jean Paul Lomazzo, among others, professes so great an esteem for the German writer and his work, that he considers the proportion which Durer gives of a body, viz. ten times the size of the head, to be beautiful; but at the same time admits that competent judges think such a figure too slender, yet says it will not do to deviate from the judgment of so great a man as Albert Durer. He is, however, quite mistaken in attributing to Durer a preference for this proportion. M. Paillot de Montabert thinks he has discovered a sort of treasure to use his own words in Durer's work, and imagines the author must have obtained access to some ancient manuscript which has escaped the destruction of barbarous times; but this learned connoisseur does not explain himself with regard to the treasures which he declares he has discovered, and it appears to us that in guarding against one prejudice he has fallen into another. If Durer had possessed the manuscript of a Polykletus, a Euphranor, or only some pupil of these great masters, we should have found clearer traces of it in his pages. We should have met with the immortal rudiments of that beauty, the rule of which had been discovered and the form imaged by the Greeks.

The constant occupation of our artist on the more repulsive employment of the graver, allowed him but few opportunities of exercising his talents as a painter. Consequently, not many pictures in oil are to be seen out of the galleries of the German sovereigns. The following are the principal works of this character of which the pedigree is perfectly known:

"The Martyrdom of the 10,000 Christians, who were put to a Cruel Death by the command of Sapor II., King of Persia." Albert Durer is represented in this picture with his friend, Willibald Pirckheimer. He is holding a stick with a paper attached to it, with the inscription, "Iste factus anno Domini, 1508, Albertus Durer ab manus," with his monogram. This picture was painted for Frederick, Duke of Saxony; it afterwards adorned the Rodolph Gallery at Prague. Karel Van Mander, in his "Book on the Painters," speaks very highly of it.

"The Trinity." God the Father, seated on a rainbow, is represented holding the dying Son on the cross; the Holy Ghost, in the shape of a dove, hovers above. It is surrounded by a glorious company of angels, saints, and patriarchs. Beneath is seen Albert Durer himself, holding a tablet with his monogram, and this inscription, "Albertus Durer heriens, factus anno Virginis partu, 1511."

"The Virgin and the Child," signed with his monogram, and dated 1512.

"Portrait of a Fair-haired Youth," dated 1517.

"Portrait of Johannes Kleberger, Merchant of Nuremberg," dated 1526.

"The Holy Virgin Smocking the Infant Jesus," painted in 1503.

In the Pinakothek of Munich, some of Albert Durer's finest paintings are to be seen. This valuable collection, partly formed from those of Dusseldorf, Mannheim, and Strasbourg, contains seventeen works of this great master, many of them portraits, among others that of Durer's father, with this inscription in German, "I painted this likeness of my father when he was sixty—Albert Durer, senior." Dated 1497.

"The Portrait of Michael Wohlgemuth," Albert Durer's master, dated 1506. Michael was then eighty-two years of age.

"The Portrait of Albert Durer," dressed in fur, his right

By the desire of Maximilian I. they were conveyed to Munich, and replaced by copies by Wisscher. These four figures, the size of life, painted in 1526, are known by the name of "The Four Temperaments." These two works are exquisite, and mark the highest degree of perfection to which their author has attained.

hand placed on his breast, with the inscription, "Albertus Durerus noricus ipsum me propriis sic cingebam coloribus ætatis XXVIII." Dated 1500.

"The Apostles St. Peter, St. John, St. Paul, and St. Mark." Durer presented these two pictures to the Council of Nuremberg, where they were preserved until the year 1627.

"Christ on the Cross," "The Descent from the Cross," "The Weeping Virgin," "St. Mary Dying," besides "Lucretia in the Act of Stabbing herself," and two small pictures representing "St. Joachim" and "St. Joseph," painted in 1523, upon a ground of gold, after the style of the school of the Lower Rhine.

The Public Collection at Nuremberg, established in the Mansion of the Brotherhood of Landaner, contains only three of Albert Durer's pictures, viz., "Hercules fighting with the Harpies," painted in water-colours in the year 1500, and two corresponding panels, the one representing Charlemagne, the other the Emperor Sigismund, both figures larger than life.

The Chapel of St. Maurice contains a painting of "The Dead Body of Christ supported by St. John, and wept over by the Virgin Mary."

Willibald Pirckheimer, the Emperor Maximilian I., and Blanche Marie, second wife of that monarch. This picture, dated 1506, was begun and finished, according to the inscription upon it, in five months, and is known by the name of "The Painting of the Crown of Roses."

In the Dresden Gallery there are two pictures by Albert Durer, one of "The Bearing of the Cross," in black and white, and a small portrait, dated 1521.

The Gallery of Cassel contains four portraits by this master.

There are several of his secondary productions in the Museums of Frankfort, of Cologne, of Carlsruhe, of Gotha, and of Darmstadt.

The northern capitals of Europe boast the possession of several paintings by Albert Durer. The catalogue of the Imperial Museum of St. Petersburg mentions five; that of the Stockholm Gallery, three; and that of Copenhagen, four; but there is great reason to doubt the truth of their pretensions.

There are enumerated in the official catalogue of the Museum at Madrid, eight productions of Albert Durer, but they are either of little importance or doubtful authenticity.

In the museum at Havre we lately saw a fine "Holy Family," attributed to Albert Durer. Its pedigree, however, was not authenticated.

In the Gallery at Florence may be seen, among other works of this master, "The Adoration of the Magi"—very remarkable; the busts of "The Apostles St. Philip and St. James," painted, in water-colours, in 1516; also the portrait of the artist's father, dated 1490, and that of Albert Durer himself, painted in 1498. These two portraits came from the gallery of Charles I., King of England, upon the dispersion of that monarch's effects by the parliament of the Commonwealth in 1659.

Albert Durer is always seen to disadvantage in the galleries of amateurs; for the compositions they contain are unimportant, and generally limited to portraits and studies of heads, the greater part in black and white.

It appears that very few of Albert Durer's works have found their way to public auction.

We have alluded above to the two portraits, now in the Florence Gallery, which formerly belonged to the collection of Charles I. They produced together only £100.

In later years (August, 1850), at the sale of the collection of William II., King of the Netherlands, we have seen that a picture by Albert Durer, representing "St. Hubert," realised, including the expense of the sale, about £350 sterling.

A few words will suffice, in this place, to mark the appreciation in which Albert Durer is held, both as a painter and an engraver. "If," says Vasari, "this diligent, industrious, and universal man had been a native of Tuscany, and if he could have studied, as we have done, in Rome, he would certainly have been the best painter in our country, as he was the most celebrated that Germany ever possessed." Hear, too, what Dr. Franz Kugler, one of the most accomplished art-critics of modern times, says of this German contemporary of Raffaele:—"In Durer the style of art existing in his day attained its most peculiar and its highest perfection. Rich and inexhaustible, he became the representative of German art at this period. He was gifted with a power of conception which traces nature through all her finest shades; and, above all, he had an earnest and truthful feeling for his art, united to a capacity for the severest study. His drawing is full of life and character, his colouring has a peculiar brilliancy and beauty; and if, in spite of the shortcomings inevitable to the state of education and public taste in his days, the greater number of his works make a deep impression on the mind and feelings of the spectators, it is a strong proof of the peculiar greatness of his abilities as an artist." Again, in reference to Durer's skill as an engraver—"If we do not discover," says Bryan, "in his works the boldness and freedom so desirable in historical designs, we find in them everything that can be wished for in subjects more minute and more finished. Born in the infancy of the art, he carried engraving to a perfection which, even in this day, is seldom surpassed."

Beneath is a specimen of the hand-writing of this celebrated artist, his signature and seal, together with several of the more common of the monograms which he affixed to his works.

ART IN GREECE.—THE CONVENTS OF MOUNT ATHOS.

MOUNT ATHOS lies to the south of Macedonia, between the gulfs of Contessa and Monte Santo, at the extremity of a peninsula connected with the continent by an isthmus about a mile and a half long. It is a round and almost conical mass, rising to a height of about three thousand feet above the level of the sea, and casting an immense shadow in the setting sun almost across the Archipelago. Little mention is made of it in the works of Grecian historians beyond the record of two facts—the one, that Xerxes caused a canal to be cut across the isthmus to give a passage to his fleet; and the other, that a Greek sculptor, Dinocrates, proposed to Alexander the Great to cut the mountain into the form of a statue with outstretched arm, and holding in its hand a town containing ten thousand inhabitants.

The hill is called at the present day by many of the Greeks Hagion Oros, or the Holy Mountain, and it is rendered remarkable by the fact, that its population now consists of about six thousand monks, forming a separate and almost independent community, and inhabiting several convents built along the slopes. These convents were the cradle of Byzantine art fourteen hundred years ago, and now, after a thousand storms of war, and change, and revolution have rolled over Greece, they form its last refuge.

Concerning the origin of this religious community, we have no certain information. In the persecutions with which the Christians were pursued in the first centuries of the Christian era, many faced martyrdom without hesitation, and even with joy; others, less confident in their own strength of nerve, sought security in desert fastnesses, and adopted the life of anchorites. It was thus that the seeds of Christianity were scattered over the solitudes of Nubia and Syria. Many more fled to Mount Athos, and took up their abode along its sides, hoping that the seclusion of the place, and the difficulty of access, would afford them safety, however precarious, from the rage of their enemies. When Constantine removed the seat of the empire to Constantinople, and avowed his adherence to the new faith, the population of Mount Athos rapidly increased, and convents were built, such, in all probability, as we now see them. It is right to mention, however, that this is mainly conjecture; history is entirely silent regarding this retired but interesting corner of the Byzantine empire. We have said that these convents are the last refuge of Greek art; we may add, that they contain some interesting relics of old Byzantine civilisation, and manners, and forms of faith, and are by no means an uninteresting subject of study for those who seek to lift up the pall which for four centuries has shrouded the remains of Greek greatness. They number in all twenty-three, lying around the mountain, none of them at any great distance from the sea. The most ancient to which our attention will principally be directed, are the Iohann Labra, or holy monastery, Vatopedi, Ivirón, and Xilandari. The first, which at present contains about four hundred monks, was founded by St. Athanasius about the beginning of the fourth century, and to this circumstance owes its pre-eminence over all the others. While they are simply dedicated to some saint, it is entitled the holy monastery par excellence. Vatopedi was the one to which John Contocuzine, whose romantic story has been so well told by Gibbon, retired to spend the remaining years of his life, when, disgusted with power, he abdicated the imperial throne.

On the highest point of the mountain rises the little Church of the Transfiguration, and scattered around are a town and some little villages; and in the centre of the peninsula lies the metropolis or metropolis of Mount Athos, Karies, all inhabited by a shifting population of monks, whose sole occupation is the importation of provisions and other necessaries from Salomon for their brethren in the convent. The monks are divided into two classes, brothers and fathers, or pyres, and are made up of an indiscriminate mixture of Slavacs, Greeks, Wallachians, and Armenians, all reduced to the same state of torpor, both physical and mental, under the rigidity of the monastic rule. The convent buildings present for the most part great uniformity of appearance, generally an irregular and confused mass, with no evidence of unity of design in the arrangement of the different parts. A single door, which is always fastened at twilight, gives entrance to a square court-yard, around which the cells of the inmates are ranged in one or more stories; additions being made, upon a plan apparently dictated solely by caprice, when any increase took place in their number. In the centre stands the church, surrounded by a crowd of small chapels, but all built of brick, and so imperfectly, that frequent repairs have effaced all traces of the primitive style. On all the walls appear stiff, sad-looking, and austere pictures, which form a singular contrast to the easy, indolent, and insouciant appearance of the monks.

Mount Athos was in the earlier days of Christianity the great seat of intellectual activity—the hot-bed of theological and metaphysical discussion; but the state of listless indolence in which its inhabitants are now plunged is a strange satire upon its former glory. All the convents contain libraries of greater or less extent, filled with manuscripts and rare and valuable relics of the literature of antiquity; but the monks, far from studying them, suffer them to be lost or injured through carelessness, in utter and complete ignorance of the treasures of which they are the guardians. They read nothing but their offices, write but rarely, and are for the most part plunged in complete ignorance, not only of everything that is passing in the outer world—but of the very rudiments of literature and science. There is hardly a doubt that a diligent search by competent persons would bring to light many valuable works of classical authors hitherto supposed to be lost, or known to the western world only in a mutilated state. Some of the monks who visit Salomon to transact business for the convents, take advantage of their stay, to pick up a smattering knowledge of medicine and the Turkish language, but this is the only effort towards self-improvement that is ever made. The rude drubs by which Byzantine art is now represented amongst them, furnish additional proof of their mental degradation, when we remember that, during the first two centuries after the establishment of the convents on Mount Athos, they were the chief seats of religious art in the world, and students resorted thither from all parts of Europe to receive instruction from the inmates.

In these times such names as those of St. Athanasius and Peter the Athosite figured in their annals, in no very striking contrast with many others of sense inferior zeal and learning. The church of Aghia Labra, founded by Athanasius in the early part of the fourth century, was endowed richly A.D. 965 by the emperor Nicephorus. The gates, which probably belong to that period, are composed of wrought copper, and display great beauty of execution. They remind one of those of the church of Ravello near Amalfi, as well as of many other religious monuments of Apulia. The portico is covered with Turkish ornaments. The general arrangement is that of the church of St. Mark at Venice. The altar is covered with a great deal of rich gilding, as also most parts of the ceiling, which is covered with carved and fretted work, and encaustic paintings in great abundance; and the body of the church contains desks, pulpits, and other articles of a similar nature of great richness. The monks have substituted these for the massive pulpits of the ancient Latin church. Nearly all are the gifts of the Russian government.

The Byzantine school, which was a school of transition from ancient art, that sought the beautiful merely for the form itself, to Christian art, which uses the form only to veil an idea, devoted itself from the very first to preparing for the transformation which inevitably followed the adoption of this new aim by the cultivators of art. In this point of view the Byzantine artists were successful in arriving at a unity such as has never been attained by those of the Renaissance, and from which they are still very far indeed. The Italian mosaics, executed by Italian artists, can alone give us a right idea of the laborious changes which Byzantine art underwent before it assumed its definitive form from the teachings of the great masters of the school. At a later period, to preserve the established forms from the influence of time or caprice or fashion, a monk named Denys collected the acknowledged and established principles of the school, and compiled them in a code. His manuscript was distributed through the various convents and carefully copied, and thenceforward became the text-book of the painters; and so powerful has been its influence, that it is impossible to fix the date of a Byzantine painting by its style. So closely have its rules been attended to, through a long lapse of time, so intimate, too, has been the connexion between Greek painting and the Greek worship, that the former has everywhere followed in the march of the priests, and we find it prevailing almost to the exclusion of every other in Russia, in Greece, in Asia Minor, and in the regions bordering on Mount Sinai, where Greek convents are numerous. The church, Aghia Labra, contains the best specimens of it extant. The cupola is entirely occupied by a colossal figure of Christ, with that air of purity and dignity which the painters of the Renaissance have adopted. The complexion is straw-coloured, as the monks there express; one hand is extended towards St. John, as if in the act of instructing, and the other is laid on his heart. The hair is fair, but the beard is black, as also the eyebrows, which give the half-closed eyes an air of mingled simplicity, sweetness, and firmness. The Byzantine artists indicated the importance of the personage they painted by the size of the figure. The saints in raiment height as they increase in holiness, while Christ is taller than them all by the head and shoulders.

At the base of the cupola stand a row of archangels in shining robes, holding rings of keys in their hands, surmounted by images of the Redeemer. The brilliant colours of their garments stand in dazzling contrast to the sombre black of the ground, and in their faces and attitudes there is an air of lofty, calm majesty. Over their heads an amiable but menacing old cherub flutters round Christ as a cherub, and as if typifying the spirits of the blest, they seem to grow more and more ethereal the nearer they approach him. There is nothing human in their figures except the head. The rest is consiposed of a great number of wings, pointing in every direction, and looking like stars in the deep blue firmament of the vault above; while on a golden ground, and on a grand scale, the image of Christ looks down from the midst of them all, so that in whatever part of the building the worshipper kneels, he seems to have his eye upon him.

The pendentives represent the four evangelists writing at the dictation of an apostle, and the walls of the rest of the church are covered with subjects drawn from the Old or New Testament. On the two arms of the cross we see the of the Latin chieftains of the Crusades, who fixed their abode in Greece on their return from the Holy Land. His head-dress is that of the Merovingian kings, and his robe, as well as his crown, is sprinkled with fleurs-de-lis, and in his hands he holds a model representation of the façade of a church, probably of one which owed its existence to his pious munificence; in front of him appears his son, wearing the same costume.

Under the external portico we find figures of the ancient asceti, or anchorites, in an attitude of prayer, who, in imitation saints of the church militant, who shook off the dust of the schools, and defended their faith on the fields of force, standing upright upon a black ground, in an attitude of vigilant repose. The churches of the other convents present precisely the same aspect, though on a more diminutive and less perfect scale, in accordance with the Medo-Persian laws of the Byzantine school, which treated all subjects in the same manner, with the same figures, in the same attitudes. Towards the end of the principal nave, to the left, appears a painting with an inscription, now illegible, evidently representing one of the fathers of the desert, lived in grottoes and caverns in the mountain side. They appear to have been reduced to the last extremity of hunger, and are clothed in a simple and primitive garment of leaves, while their beard descends almost to their knees. Beside them an inscription informs us, "Such was the life of these anchorites." These ascetics themselves travelled from convent to convent, painting those vivid representations of their own unhappy lives, and also sculptures, numerous little crucifixes in wood, many of which are still preserved.

ALBERT CUYP.

The painters of the school to which Albert Cuyp belongs were not always fully appreciated in their day. They were earnest and laborious men, with the true inspiration of genius, at a time when artistic talent was less rare than at the present hour. This prevented their being as highly regarded as they otherwise would have been, and it thence followed that many paintings which now are highly valued, and which fetch good prices, were during the lifetime of the artist almost unsaleable. It has been truly said, that no man is a prophet in his own country, and we have often found this perfectly true with regard to artists of the first eminence. Albert Cuyp, one of the best of the Flemish school, one of the most picturesque and effective who took up the example of Van der Velde, though son of a great artist, was not in any way as warmly considered as he should have been by his contemporaries. This may perhaps be more fully understood when we examine into his character and life.

Albert Cuyp was born in the year 1606, the same year that gave birth to the great Rembrandt. The first saw the light at Dordrecht, the second at Leyden. These two painters were men of different character and various style, though one would have expected that they would be necessarily strongly influenced in their genius and tone of mind by the times in which they lived. It was an era of stern warfare and desolation, of blood and rapine, and yet scarcely a trace of this fatal tendency of the hour is to be found in their productions. They were, as many students of art have been, always in a world apart, which separated them from many of the impulses of the age to which they belonged, and it is pleasing and refreshing to turn from the sanguinary drama of civil and religious wars to their admirable productions. It is the quiet contrast offered to the view of him who, escaping from the battle-field, wounded and almost dying, finds himself suddenly in some sequestered woody nook, where man and horse find welcome and cheering repose. Rembrandt sketches with his masterly pencil the varied phases of human life, and still avoids all that has reference to the party quarrels of the day. Cuyp stands before us quiet, calm, unobtrusive—a thoughtful, pleasing man, who appears to know nothing of the war which is raging around him—who is scarcely aware that Holland is ravaged by fire and sword, and who allows his every sense to be captivated by the gentler muse. Neither the noisy forum nor the sectarian struggle has any charm for him. He lives in a world of his own, and that world is nature in its most picturesque forms. He is varied in his loves. Now he admires the sea, now the land. The ordinary landscape and the perilous ocean have almost equal charms in his eyes; for his pencil sketches now a quiet pasture scene, with tame oxen and sheep, now a dashing marine piece, where some tall ship is bending 'neath the breeze; or launching away again, brings before us a picture in some native district, where the sun is warming an otherwise cheerless prospect, where shepherds wander with their flocks, where the huntsman rides merrily, where boatmen pull cherrily, or where fishermen pursue their peaceful calling with true Dutch phlegm.

This philosophic calm, experienced by certain artists during troublous times, has often been remarked upon. It has called forth many a recondite observation, and though a feeling not easy to be understood by the more active mover in stirring hours, is yet a circumstance to be much valued. And these were no common struggles. Holland was convulsed by the disputes of its religious sects, who soon turned from arguments to weapons—from theology to warfare. Much blood was shed, and all civilisation, art, science, seemed threatened with utter annihilation. City armed against city, and the inhabitants of the same town killed one another in the streets which gave both birth. It was in the days when Barnaveldt perished with his brother on the scaffold. Young Albert Cuyp was born during these tragical hours. But as he grew up, even more terrible disasters tormented his youth. The invasion of Holland by Louis XIV.—the terrible scenes amid which perished John and Cornelius de Witt, his countrymen, his fellow-townsmen—were events of his youthful hours. But so elastic were the spirits, so singular was the character of Albert, that no evils, however great, no trials, however painful, were able to influence his mind. He seemed incapable of feeling sadness. He could not join in the sanguinary struggles of his time, and appears, while others were slaying and being slain, to have spent his time in admiring nature, in sitting beneath the greenwood tree, listening to the murmur of water, or seeking to entice the cunning trout from his crystal retreat. No matter what opinion may be generally entertained as to this seeming insensibility on the part of the artist who could isolate his mind from civil brawls and bloody wars, we owe to this very peculiarity of character many admirable paintings, full of grandeur, many delicious, calm, warm and sunny masterpieces—scenes which everywhere reconcile us to the charms of existence, because they make us love and admire nature in her purest works; and yet, those who would ask everything of the same man, complain that he did not allow his soul to be fired by deeds of heroism and valour, his mind to be developed by dark passions, in which case he might have given us some of those sombre and living pictures of the hour, which have immortalised Ruysdael and the great Rembrandt.

We have said that Albert Cuyp was born in 1606. Some say in 1605; but this is of little consequence. His death, too, is involved in obscurity. But he was living in 1672, for we have his name in a list of burghers. His father, and his master in his noble art, was Jacob Gerritsoon Cuyp, a man much esteemed, and looked upon as the leader of the school in which his son so much excelled. Jacob Gerritsoon shared the fate of David Teniers. He was surpassed and eclipsed by his son. Many masters of first-rate ability have thus been concealed from posterity. David Teniers exists not for the general student of art, because of his great descendant. The same occurred to Paul Bril, the historical landscape painter—to Simon der Vlieger, cast into the shade by William Van der Velde—to Nicolas Moyart, surpassed by Berghem. Arnold Houbraken, in his important work on painting, quietly remarks, that Albert Cuyp painted better than his father. The fact is, that though remaining attached to a particular line of subjects, and these subjects in which he coped with Paul Potter, Wouwermans, Du Jardin, and Ruysdael, and so many other chosen spirits, he was always so distinct, so native in his genius, as to be ever distinguished from all his rivals. A Cuyp will rarely be mistaken by the most ordinary connoisseur for a Coxis, or a Van der Neer.

Nature was his field, the inexhaustible fount whence he drew the warm impulse which influenced and guided his genius—nature in its grandest, in its humblest phases. He never found anything too great, anything too small for his keen observation. He combined the varied characteristics of most of his contemporaries. He equals all of them, and is sometimes their superior. He revels in the human form, in animals, in still nature, landscapes, sea-views, interiors of churches, winter scenes, moonlights, kitchens, fish, cocks and hens, and all the appliances of humble agricultural existence. All these subjects, and many more, have been vivified by his fertile pencil. His great power consisted in his capability of producing the same thing a hundred times over without plagiarising himself. And yet he does not search for effect; he does not find the picturesque in strange contrasts and rough scenes, in the rags of the poor, in the tatters and hideous misery of the beggar, in the angular projections of starved cattle, in the manifestation of their bones in quaint style, nor even in rare, though real, effects of light and shadow at morning and eventide. Berghem, Tivoli, Weenix, and many others, had given to the picturesque a novel and ingenious touch of life, by seeking the irregular, the wild, the unexpected, in all things—a style which had necessarily many charms and many admirers. Lizards running over an old wall, with here a lichen and there an ivy-leaf; a rustic hut beside a time-honoured ruin, which gave the humble cot a dangerous shelter; some half-starved beast, a wounded horse, hopping lazily along with bandaged leg; a poor suffering ass, eating timidly by the wayside, were subjects freely chosen by Flemish painters, and subjects which they rendered with rare truthfulness and vigour. They possessed the power of making attractive, by means of their magic pencils, most repulsive subjects—even those subjects men most anxiously avoid in life—the sickly animal, the beggar in rags, the wild desert, or a road overgrown with thorns and briars. They created treasures out of rags. Albert Cuyp, on the other hand, drew his inspiration from a more elevated and elevating source, and, seeking his ideas of the picturesque in objects opposed to general theories, succeeded in a most marvellous way. We wish not to elevate Cuyp at the expense of any of the many singular geniuses of the hour; but no one can study the peculiar features of the painter of Dordrecht without being pleased. Abandoning the ready resource of rustic misery, the easy and catching attraction of rags and destitution, of wretched nooks and unknown and unexplored corners, he paints animals in full health, and the sun at noon-day.

A writer on the genius of this painter quotes complacently a certain William Gilpin, canon of Salisbury, who wrote a book on the picturesque and beautiful. He supports the view practically illustrated by Berghem, Du Jardin, Ostade, and others. "We admire in the horse," he exclaims, "considered as a reality, elegance of form, a fiery mien, lightness, and a soft skin; we admire this animal also in the same way in a painting: but as a picturesque subject, we prefer an old cart-horse, a cow, a goat, a donkey. The coarse appearance and rough skin are better adapted to demonstrate and elucidate the genius of the pencil. Richness of light depends much on contrasts." It was not in the study of Cuyp that William Gilpin sought his inspirations. His genius lies another way. He has much of the feeling of the rich and well-to-do farmer in him, for he loves well-fed cattle, clean and well-combed horses, and broad daylight casting its golden lustre over the plain. This is, in fine, his peculiarity, and the distinguishing mark which separates him from all his rivals, and from every member of his school. Gerard de Lairese put forth, a century later, ideas on landscape quite opposed to those of the worthy canon of Salisbury, and these ideas Cuyp was one of the first to forestall. He revels in the view of nature in her loftiest moods, and paints a meadow and a hill, a horse or boat, as Claude Lorraine did the ruins of Rome, the waterfalls of Tivoli, the Bay of Naples,—embellishing, as it were, the very nature he sought to render faithfully and truly.

The rich variety, and the fecundity of Cuyp lead us to compare him often to other masters whose style was similar. Like Wouwermans, he was fond of a halt of hunters, a quiet bit of woodland sport, but he treated the subject differently. His horses have a marked difference from any others, his nobles have a manner of their own. Few who have visited the Gallery of the Louvre, in Paris, have failed to note the two Cuyps known as "The Going out for a Ride" and "The Return," the former of which is engraved in the present number.

We have often gazed with pleasure, during our once daily walks in that magnificent gallery, at both. The "Going out" well exemplifies the genius of Cuyp. A richly-dressed lord, clothed in scarlet, has just vaulted on a mottled grey horse, while his squire in green tunic stoops to hold the stirrup. The leading group, lit up by a bright sun, is relieved against a house in deep shadow, whence are issuing the lord and one of his suite. To the right, the shadow of the edifice, falling on the earth, brings out in warm colours the brilliant light which fills the back of the picture; two shepherds and a flock of sheep are brought within the rays of the sun, and form a light demi-tint, a transition admirably contrived as a contrast both to the dark shadows of the foreground and the clearness of the distant background. It is an exquisite portraiture of a living breathing scene of life in its strongest sense, of the tranquillity and ease of the fortunate, of the heat and splendour of day.

The other, which forms with it a pair, represents three horsemen, among whom you recognise the lord by the magnificence of his costume, the beauty of his horse, and the haughty frankness of his mien. A hunter in livery holding two dogs in leash, presents a partridge to one of the squires, and this little event draws the attention of the three personages. On one side a tuft of trees, mingled with brushwood, brings forward the cavaliers; while on the other we behold a vast landscape inundated by light, where you see cattle, houses at the foot of a hill, and antique towers, doubtless the manor towards which the seigneur and his suite are wending their way. The mind is inspired with calm delight as it gazes on that luminous scene, and then comes to rest on the gallant mien of that gentleman in blue velvet garnished with gold, his hair floating on his shoulders, and his head covered by a kind of turban made of some white drapery. The play of chiaro-oscuro is here principally caused by the diversity of local colours. The marked tints of the two horses, one chestnut, the other black, are in contrast to the master's steed, whose white and spotted skin is so admirably rendered as to deceive the eye. The painter has rendered and constructed the habiliments of the cavaliers as ably as the tones of the horses' hair, opposing the dun velvet of the squires to the dazzling velvet of their noble master. These pictures should never be passed over on a visit to the Louvre.

We must not be led to believe that Albert Cuyp is a painter without faults. In some of his best pictures we shall find errors to note, bits heavily rendered. Some have criticised rather slightly two dogs in "The Going out." They are not faultless, but they are very little inferior to the rest of the picture. Many of the admirers of Cuyp carry their high sense of his genius so far as to ascribe his little errors of omission to accident, and some attribute even these two beautiful masterpieces to Jacques Gerard Cuyp, rather than own the slight faults of an artist of such power and skill as Albert. But whatever the energy of the execution and the excellence of his touch, often thick and irregular, sometimes sharp and firm—whatever the beauty of his colouring, warm, rich, and harmonious—he is perhaps more remarkable in the expression of sentiment than even in the execution of his works. The modes and fashions he pictures are stamped by his individuality, while strictly in accordance with historic truth; the ideas which he calls up wear the impress of his personal temperament. The same gallant cavaliers who appear in the hunting subjects of Wouvermans, elegant, rude, and proud, mounted on prancing steeds, ready at every moment to rear and leap, are viewed by Cuyp in quite a different light. They too bear the stamp of his peculiar characteristics. His models remind us of those opulent burghers of the seventeenth century who led the life of noble lords without their easy and lively manners, their haughty air, and what can only be explained as wide-awake character. The cavaliers of Wouvermans have a firm air, and one fancies one hears their coarse words; armed for love and war, they carry gorgeous plumes stuck in their broad-brimmed felt hats; they have golden spurs, loose boots, and pistols in their holsters. The heroes of grave and thoughtful Albert Cuyp are not so petulant; their physiognomy is calm and grave, their dress is rich, of dazzling stuff, but without coquetry; their horses are thorough-bred, solid, strong, docile, and ready for gallop or trot, but they know nothing of rearing and kicking—of taking a bit in their mouths—of starting off at a hand-gallop—and other tricks known to chivalric horses. Those who ride upon them are peaceful men—steady and solemn Protestants, who ride side by side, in solemn discourse on the affairs of the state. The father of a family, whom Terburg, Nelsehe, or Metzger would show us in the interior of their houses, gently laying down the law to a beloved child, being present at a daughter's music lesson, or presiding at a meal, we find Albert Cuyp delineating at the hour when he passes along on horseback, with his servants, followed by his dogs, and looking on his ride as a question of health, an amusement at a fixed hour. Albert Cuyp is truly the Flemish citizen painter—the fortunate and well-to-do citizen, he is remembered.

It is much to be regretted that the annalists and biographers of the seventeenth century have been so indifferent as not to transmit to posterity something of the life and habits of the great artists of Holland. There is no biography of Albert Cuyp. The life of an artist is always replete with matter worthy of remembrance. We need only refer to the sketches of those whose friends have recorded their sayings and doings. Was Cuyp brought up in luxury and ease, or was his youth passed in struggling, as so many others have done, against misery and care? Was he rich or poor? Did he ever take wife or have children? Who were his friends and protectors? We know not. To not one of these questions can we find an answer. And yet, were but a few of these details known, how much might we not draw thence to explain and understand his particular genius. His life must have been quiet, regular, happy, of that kind of happiness which gives a long series of years, and an indulgent and vigorous old age. We are, however, ignorant of the precise date of his death. It appears, however, according to Immerzeel of Amsterdam, that he was living in 1680, though the general inquiry of most writers has only carried the evidence up to 1672. We are able to asseverate from one of his pictures, where he paints a salmon fishery, a picture to be found in the Museum of the Hague, that he had for patron a farmer of the fishery of Dordrecht—a vague and dreamy kind of fact, which tells us nothing of either the protector or the protected. The general opinion of historians suggests, and general rumours appear here to be pretty correct, that the life of Albert Cuyp was calm, honest, laborious, and without passion. He must have found, at an early age, ample resources from his mere talent, and could have never known the bitter luxury of want. Of a calm temperament, of a gentle, quiet, and firm character, he doubtless lived in friendly intercourse with the best men of his time. It appears even that he was much connected with Maurice of Nassau, whom he often painted and copied in his hunting subjects, which would lead us to believe him a pure Calvinist. An elder of the reformed church, he no doubt practised with regularity, and without ostentation, his religious duties, as they were then understood. To judge him, in a word, from those histories of themselves which painters sometimes trace as clearly in their pictures as writers do in their books, Cuyp was a simple man, regular in his habits, and respected and loved by all who knew him. It has been truly said, that the tranquillity of his landscapes, plunged in indescribable ether, proves the serenity of his mind, and that the choice of his subjects demonstrates the simplicity of his tastes.

We are informed by Lebrun, that the English were the first who appreciated at their true value the pictures of Cuyp. We are told by Sir Edmund Head, that Cuyp's works were not valued highly until after his death. We are assured by another authority (Smith), that at the principal picture sales in Holland to the year 1750, there is no instance of any of Cuyp's works being sold for so much as 48 sterling (thirty florins). This statement is not corroborated by the Kunstler Lexicon of Naylor. According to Smith, a gradual advance in the value of Cuyp's pictures took place soon after the period just named, owing to the high reputation they had obtained among English and French dealers. In 1785, at the sale of the collection of M. Von der Linden von Shingelardt, Cuyp's pictures obtained prices, in some cases, commensurate with their merits, but which subsequently have been merited fourfold. In 1774, Walpole writes to Sir Horace Mann, and states, that at a sale of Sir George Colbrooke's pictures, one by Cuyp (a view of Nimeguen), which had cost its possessor only seventy guineas, was readily disposed of for £200. Lebrun says, "The French were a long time before they appreciated the works of Cuypp, and yet I have been present at sales in England when they have fetched three and four hundred louis. This great painter has treated every style with equal success, and has indeed been so perfect in all, that we know not which to select as his best. Portraits, animals, fruits—nothing was foreign to his genius. . . . The sun warms his productions."

One of these facetious French critics, who follows in the beaten track of prejudice, and who is possessed by a belief that the unfortunate people of these isles never see the sun, that we live in the midst of a fog, which everlastingly conceals from us the real character of that luminary—who believes, with most Frenchmen, that sales of wares in market-places are legal transfers in England, that we have no real green fields, and are, in fine, a nation of purblind shopkeepers, of course thoroughly comprehends our love of Cuypp, and why we should have been the first people to acknowledge his merits. Albert Cuypp did indeed introduce the sun and all its glowing images and radiance with singular power in his pictures. But many artists have done the same, and this by no means explains our him ensue from a kind of rabid fire-worship on the part of unfortunate islanders, who can never see the sun save in pictures.

The "View of the Maes" (p. 188) is the subject which excites the admiration of the English critic above alluded to. It is truly a lovely scene, happily arranged with a transparent background and a vast perspective. The trees which overhang the borders of the river are not gnarled and strange; on the contrary, they rise majestically and wave beneath the breeze as if saluting in chivalrous manner the river that bathes their stems. The sky is delicate, brilliant, warm; water refreshes the eye, and distant hills make up a pleasing and effective background. Cuypp has placed in this picture everything which we love to find in a landscape. There is a martial cavalier, a rustic and simple herdsman without coarseness, watching cows of dun and spotted colour, a superb bull, and some sheep; and then some splendid oaks of a grandeur suited to heroic landscapes, and a fine river where float a cloud of ducks, upon which a hunter is about to fire. The whole is coloured by a rich sun, calling him the Claude Lorraine of Holland. This name was given him in Boydell's Collection, and the writer of the sketch in that work rates him quite as high as Claude for his colouring—a merit the greater that the Dutch painter never left his native land, and could never, therefore, have seen any of the warm landscapes of the sunny south. But the admiration of English connoisseurs has not been excited in favour of Cuypp because he brings us in communication with the sun, which is to be gazed on here about as often as in most parts of France. What has taken the fancy of our fellow-countrymen has been his admirable representations of cattle, his water-pieces, and, above all, his study to paint well-fed animals, fat oxen, clean-limbed horses, and many other things which are in accordance with our tastes as a highly agricultural people. Such criticism as that we allude to is puerile; and there is no subject which should be more cosmopolitan, and less affected by national prejudice, than art-criticism. When the reasons for our admiration of Albert Cuypp are so obvious, it is childish to seek, for the sake of smartness, to make an appreciation of at an hour when the day is about to give way to night—a magnificent, imposing, and calm effect, full of rich poetry. There is a minute description by the English critic in Boydell, who has examined most carefully every tint, as if he hoped to leave such a description that by the aid of it and the engraving the painting might be recreated if lost. "The principal figure," he says, "is on horseback in a jacket of golden yellow, the sleeve of which is white; his cloak is of pale purple with a blue tinge; the man near him is dressed in black. When painting the human figure, Cuypp conceives very inelegant and short proportions. The one further off, and who carries a stick on his shoulder, is dressed in ruddy violet drapery. The reclining bull is black, and the cow behind is white. The other cows are variously marked with fawn and cream spots. Amid the distant group there is a woman wearing a sky-blue drapery, with white sleeves, and the boy is dressed in brown suit inclined to red. The hunter aiming at the ducks has a yellow doublet with red sleeves, which the neighbourhood of the trees tints with a green reflection."

When one has examined the oxen and cows of Potter, Berghem, Van der Velde, Kenel, Du Jardin, and the sheep of Van der Does, it is difficult to believe in any other mode of comprehending pasturage and cattle. We wonder almost how they can be delineated otherwise. And yet Albert Cuyp, who was the first master in this style, discovered a simple and new mode of viewing animal creation, a manner which is peculiar to no one else, Rembrandt excepted. Power, majesty, calm force, were characteristics discovered by Albert Cuyp in the brutes of the field, because he enveloped them with the mantle of his genius. He takes care always to present them in a way which shows off their best features, their most fully developed and rounded forms. There is something in his animals of the terrible genius which Poussin gives to his heroes. Their aspect is frowning and grand. The horses are lofty and proudly erect. Their thick and bushy tails sweep round their hind legs. They seem to be full of life, energy, and health.

As usual, the warm glow of sunshine adorns the landscape in a peculiar way.

It is somewhat singular that the French amateurs and connoisseurs, who profess to be very quick in finding out the merits of genius, should have remained so long blind to his talents, when men so very inferior to Albert Cuyp have acquired such rapid renown. The English nation showed better taste, and, indeed, it is our belief that nowhere has art ever been appreciated so highly as in this country. Our private galleries alone are miracles of richness and beauty. But in France sixty years ago Cuyp was unknown. His name is found in no catalogue. Those of the sales of Gersaint and Pierre Remy are silent with regard to his existence. The gallery of the Duke de Choiseul, and the cabinet Poullain possessed one or two of this master; but, despite the renown Cuyp had acquired on our side of the channel, they were unnoticed by amateurs. The nineteenth century came ere the painter of Dordrecht acquired due celebrity in France after his pictures had been turned about from one indifferent purchaser to another. We fully understand, however, why Cuyp came to be more readily appreciated by the Dutch and English, without accepting the salve which French art-critics find for themselves - our anxious desire to see the sea, even on canvas. His water-pieces, boats, rivers, canals, were more readily understood by naval nations than by a purely military nation, like the French. Both we and the Hollanders have always admired everything of mark connected with our favourite element. The same reason accounts for the popularity of Bachuysen and William Van der Velde.

THE CAMP. FROM A PAINTING BY ALBERT CUYP.

His herds and flocks are ever floating in a misty and warm light, which harmonises with the general details of the painting, and which conceals every angularity, leaving the eye only the power to examine the general outline. "His reclining bulls," says Thoré, "are magnificent brutes, with their marked spines, and their long noses, and their expansive nostrils."

His painting of "Cattle drinking at a River side" fully illustrates this. In this picture, of which the engraving is given (p. 189), the sturdy, fat, and large-sized cows, the picturesque shepherd, the quiet sage-looking dog, with the distant effect of a small vessel, of other cattle, a village spire, scattered houses, hills, and a rich, warm sky, make up in the painting one of Cuyp's most effective productions. The cows are admirably grouped. Every one is in the very position in which you would fancy it would stand. It is an interesting engraving, as fully exemplifying the style of Albert Cuyp.

A painter who could introduce so much air, light, and depth into his pictures, could not but excel in marine pieces. Those of Cuyp are like his landscapes - they are vivid, powerful, and true. They transport you bodily to the ports and seas of Holland, while the execution is majestic, positive, exact. One of his most justly celebrated works in this style, is that which represents the "Canal of Dort," full of vessels. They are arranged in line, their prows towards the centre of the picture. They have something of the aspect of a regiment in battle array. In fact, we notice a boat with three trumpeters, the Prince of Orange and his suite, who are about to pass the fleet in review. The effect is admirable. We look across them, one after another, until the last is lost in the mist which the sun has not as yet dissipated. It would be but repetition to speak of the fresh morning light falling on the scene, of the transparent air, of the extraordinary perspective. Gazing at the picture from a distance, we are struck by the effect produced by the shadows of the vessels in the limpid water. Looking nearer, we are still more surprised at the dashing and masterly style in which the whole is executed. The boldness and decision of his pencil strikes us here, as well as everywhere else. No painter, Van der Velde excepted, ever has been able to give an equally just and life-like representation of Dutch naval characteristics. Mr. Edward Solly refused £3,000 for this picture.

There is a good marine view in the Louvre by Cuyp. The pacific Dutchman has here departed from his usual calm character, and given us a tempest. The sky is overloaded with clouds; a thunder-bolt has just fallen; and across the whole canvas the lurid glare of the lightning is cast, while the dark form of a small boat stands out in strong relief struggling with the fury of the waves. Some critics have thought this production too poetical and too weak to be the work of Cuyp. It is, however, generally believed to be his; while, being a departure from his usual quiet illustrations of nature, it is certainly somewhat distinct in character.

Painters are like lovers: the lover always believes the beloved one beautiful. True painters see beauty in every phase of nature. Albert Cuyp found loveliness everywhere. Wandering on the banks of his favourite Maes, he found admirable landscapes where hundreds of others would have seen nothing worth painting. He has reproduced this subject under every variety of aspect. Fishermen's barks, ships of various size—some at anchor, some under sail—became, beneath the power of his pencil, delicious pictures. He adds but a ray of the sun, showing the fleet of boats, perhaps, in bold relief, playing amid the ropes, and pulleys, and masts, refracted from the deep waters of the river, giving marked outline to the faces of some of the crew, and shining on the oars of the boatmen and the pearly drops of water that fall therefrom. Such pictures started complete from his mind. We must not, however, forget the Steeple of Dort, of which the painter contrives to make a kind of pivot for all his little water-pieces. One of the best of these is in the possession of Mr. Holford, of London. Albert Cuyp is almost unique amongst the Flemish school in this style. His popular rival, Van Goyen, is too monotonous and superficial. It required the varied genius of Cuyp to produce such pictures, as he generally introduces a little of everything in which he excelled. Horses crossing a river in a ferry-boat; picturesque cottages surrounded by foliage, situated on the borders of a canal, and inhabited by Dutchmen with painted hats; figures of sailors descending the Maes; boatmen hauling along timber-rafts to Flossinguen; or a barge full of travellers, and drawn by a horse. This barge is what is called in Holland Trechtschuyt, a light boat with one mast, and in which travellers are conveyed for one halfpenny a mile. Those who love quiet can hire for a trifle, in addition, a little separate room, called the "Roof;" it is at the stern of the boat, and has two windows on each side. The hiring of this room affords a lively illustration of the extreme formality of Dutchmen even in their most trivial transactions. For the few halfpence that this luxury costs, the traveller has to give a printed receipt to an agent, whose duty it is to attend at the entrance of each town for the purpose of regulating the accounts of the Trechtschuyt.

This silent mode of travelling by water, which is the characteristic of these northern Venices, could not escape the keen eye of Albert Cuyp, who observed everything, and who loved Holland with all the enthusiastic love of a painter. The same man who so successfully treated midday scenes, when the sun shed its beams on fields and meadows, on water and on trees, was equally successful when he undertook to paint the interiors of churches in the style of Emanuel de Witte or of Nikkelen, or moonlight scenes in the style of Artus van der Neer. He was, indeed, their master, having indicated to them their peculiar styles. He was one of the first who succeeded in rendering on canvas that solemnity which we feel in the interior of a cathedral, when from some gloomy chapel we behold the light fall from the lofty windows of the nave, gilding the rich and elaborate carving, and playing fitfully upon the tessellated pavement. Even in historical subjects—such as the "Baptism of the Eunuch"—Albert Cuyp displayed equal ability. It is difficult, in fact, to mention any style in which he did not excel. Our readers are aware that many Flemish painters obtained celebrity by devoting their talents to illustrating the poultry-yard. Here, too, Albert Cuyp preceded Melchior Hondecooter, in depicting the heroic combats of the cockpit. In the collection of Dr. Leroy d'Etioilles, there is a cock-fight by Cuyp, which is admirably rendered. The action is animated and energetic. One of the combatants has thrown his adversary, his outspread wings supporting him; he digs his talons into the breast of the vanquished, and tears with his beak his bleeding crest. The defeated bird has thrown his wings back, and is thus trying to raise himself. His desperate struggles are expressed with painful truth. In the background, to the left, is a fowl looking on, half in terror, half in admiration, at the combat of which she has been the innocent cause. Many French critics have compared this picture to a fable of La Fontaine, and several modern French painters have imitated his style. This is perhaps the least meritorious of all Cuyp's pictures, and was produced probably at an early period of his career. He has left, however, many admirable paintings of the poultry-yard. A hen-house, which was sold amongst the other pictures of the gallery of Cardinal Fesch, is said to be worthy of his best days. M. George speaks of it as combining keen observation with the highest powers of genius. If Cuyp's works were placed in chronological order, we should find, we believe, that those great landscapes in which animals appear only as the accessories, belong to that period of his life when he had nothing to learn—when his genius had become fully developed. In those pictures which bear the stamp of early years, we find animals occupying a prominent position, and the details of scenery and human figures are subordinately treated. This will be found to be the case in that strange production somewhat resembling the "Paradise" of John Breughel, where we behold Orpheus seated under a tree, and taming the animal creation by the music of his violin. As Cuyp had to represent tigers, elephants, and leopards—creatures with which he was less acquainted than with domestic animals—the worthy Bavian has exhibited considerable ingenuity in getting over the difficulty. Near the divine musician is represented a cow, a horse, a dog, a cat, and some hares, and in the distant background are placed those ferocious beasts with whose forms he was less familiar. It has been remarked that Albert Cuyp rather destroys the effect of the marvellous music of Orpheus by this arrangement, there being no great merit in taming the tranquil animals which inhabit our stables and our farm-yards. It is difficult, however, even for genius to think of everything. This picture is in the possession of the Marquis of Bute. The "Pasturage on the Banks of the Maes," an engraving of which we present (p. 184), affords a remarkable contrast to this mythological creation. Here the genius of Cuyp had a congenial field in which to exercise its powers. He drew his inspiration from a home source. The principal group is composed of cattle—as in so many of his other works—some reclining lazily upon the ground, others clustering round a tree, as if for shelter from the sun. They are larger than Cuyp usually paints them, and are drawn with a care, a precision, and a power which is increased by the marvellous beauty of the tone. In the foreground are plants, grass, and shrubs, rendered with that fidelity to nature which is one of the principal characteristics of this artist. The grass is thick, silky, fresh and inviting—such a grass as that which poets have sang so much of. The whole scene is flooded with light. A saffron-coloured vapour tints, towards the horizon, the water, the trees, the plants, and the distant houses that cluster round the church. The clearness of the air surpasses belief. The background is filled up by an eminence, on which are shepherds and their flocks, while across the river are houses, windmills, and steeples. One of the most pleasing features of this picture is that which fills the right corner. A shepherd, his faithful dog by his side, is playing upon a pipe, and two children are listening to him with intense earnestness. The whole picture is redolent of the richly fertile land watered by the Maes—all is abundance, wealth, happiness. The sun is warm and bright; the well-fed cattle scarcely touch the rich pasture at their feet; the water is cool and pleasant to gaze on; while the shepherd—confident, happy, sure of to-morrow—amuses himself in a quiet and rustic way. One cannot but feel that the painter who conceived and executed this work of art must have been a happy man. The calm serenity of his mind is reflected everywhere. Cuyp would have been no hero for the "Memoirs of Extraordinary Painters." The quiet, calm, un-mysterious man who painted this picture could scarcely have experienced the fierce torments of Ruysdael—torments which speak in many of his paintings—nor the fantastic visions of Rembrandt, nor the wild eccentricities of Everdingen.

There are two other pictures, of which we give engravings, that are worthy of the genius of any master of the Flemish school. "The View of Dordrecht" (p. 180), contains some effects of light and shade truly remarkable. The boats at their moorings, the water, the quaint houses, and the old church, have about them that peculiar picturesqueness which belongs to Holland. The horse and horseman delineated in the scene called "The Camp" (p. 181), which is generally called "The Trooper," exhibits the genius of Cuyp in its best light. The horse is admirably rendered. It is a dapple-gray charger; his master, a citizen soldier, is just arranging the harness about his head, and adding a blue ribbon. The dress of the soldier—his bold manly bearing—the minutiae of the accoutrements—all are portrayed with the customary fidelity. The buff jerkin, cuirass, and large hat, are exceedingly characteristic, while the scene itself is rendered eminently picturesque by the introduction in the background of an eminence, at the foot of which are tents, and soldiers mounted and on foot. Cuyp's usual love of the animal creation is exhibited by the introduction, in a prominent position, of an excellently-painted dog. A horseman coming across the hill, is a picturesque accessory. This picture, which is 3 feet 10 by 1 foot 10½, is in the possession of Her Majesty.

"When Albert Cuyp died"—and the exact year of his death is not known—"there was found," says Arnold Houbraken, "not one model, not one painting of any master in his house." He never studied but from nature herself. It has been suggested that this arose from his disinclination to spend money in purchasing the masterpieces of others. Nothing can be more puerile than to attribute the voluntary ignorance of Cuyp to avarice. If he did not study the works of his predecessors or contemporaries, it was because he needed not to do so. Nature spoke to him in more eloquent language than anything he could find depicted upon canvas. The man of genius concentrates all his faculties on the one great object of his life. Everything that interferes with the accomplishment of his views must inevitably be cast aside. We often find that even those passions and eccentricities which would appear to militate most powerfully against success, which appear even calculated to degrade the artist, and to remove him from his high pedestal, frequently become the means which fatally impel him onwards. If Cuyp was possessed by the good old gentlemanly vice of avarice, and thus was led to be indifferent with regard to the productions of his rivals; if he thus escaped from the current infatuation relative to engravings of the old masters, we may predicate, that to this cause do we owe his originality. Happy Cuyp! guilty of this one weakness, it kept him from being a mere imitator; it compelled him to drink at the true source of inspiration; and it gave him that characteristic physiognomy which distinguishes him from all the Flemish school, which he surpasses both in simplicity and grandeur; while the ease, the boldness, and the finish of his execution, defies all imitation.

The lovely plains and hills of Italy, where the outline of all objects is cast in bold relief against a pure sky, bordered by a cloudless horizon, have inspired the genius of the Italian, French, and even English schools. The French have carried this to excess, and given us little else than historical landscape, the scene laid in Italy. French landscape painting, like French tragedy, is stilted and overdone. Painters, like the rhymers of modern French tragic drama, "arranged nature," to use one of their own phrases. They painted so as to elevate that which God had not made sufficiently divine for them. They turned hills into mountains, and mountains into hills; they altered trees, and gave them picturesqueness, and thrust in, on all occasions, Roman ruins and broken Greek columns. Poussin conquered the difficulties of this fictitious style; even when the scene was artificial, his genius mastered the incongruous elements he had to deal with. He struck his contemporaries dumb with astonishment; but his imitators and disciples—Guaspre, Francisque Millet, Leatelli, Orizonti, Van Huysum—could not succeed in disguising the defects of their style, as adorned by the genius of such a man as Poussin. In these imitators, the faults and errors outweighed whatever little talent they possessed. Their pictures, in as far as they were imitations of Poussin, are something like those stolid definitions of virtue which elevate man to something like the character of a demi-god. Their pictures are so replete with conventional majesty, and solid nobility of style, that we search in vain for nature and its pure and sweet emotions. This was not the case with old Albert Cuyp. He loved, it is true, tall trees rising majestically towards the sky, the rippling waves of rivers; but he was too much of a real student not to be aware that all this needed no imagining, also, that nature had no need of being corrected and improved in the closet. He knew that the difficulty was to come up to nature. All those beauties which certain painters aimed at inventing, he knew to exist already in creation, needing but eyes to see them, and a heart to feel them. He bore within himself the sentiment of grandeur, and everywhere he naturally invested what he saw with elevated ideality.

Albert had so strong a dislike to deep shadows, to cloudy skies, to the aspect of a country veiled by melancholy and gloom, that even when depicting his favourite winter scenes—rivers clothed in ice, effects of snow whitening the roof of huts, and hanging heavily on the boughs of the naked trees—he must chase away the fog, scatter the clouds, and show the cold but pleasing rays of a winter's sun upon the landscape. There is one beautiful piece of this kind engraved by Fittler, representing "Fishing beneath the Ice." This picture is in the possession of the Duke of Bedford, and cost originally 1,200 guineas.

It is a view on the river Maes during a severe frost. On the foreground and left are sixteen fishermen, the greater part of whom are busy with nets and long poles, fishing under the ice, while others are putting the fish into tubs. On the opposite side is a market woman seated in a sledge, drawn by two horses. Several persons skating and otherwise engaged, are distributed over the river. A tent and the tower of a church are seen in the distance, and a few leafless trees and a windmill give interest to the banks of the river. The consummate skill of the painter has given to this bold and dreary scene an aspect the most agreeable and inviting, by the cheering presence of the sun, whose warmth appears to soften the sharp fridity of the atmosphere, and to diffuse a sparkling brilliancy upon every present object, lighting up the whole scene to dazzling brightness. Groups of fishermen, whose countenances and gestures indicate health and vigour, add materially the magical effect, which is perfected to illusion by the delightful truth of the gradations and purity of colour. But Cuyp never tried to represent that heavy and gray sky which hangs upon the earth like the marble covering of a tomb. It is really remarkable to notice how this painter has succeeded in painting winters without coldness, and moon-lights without sadness.

There are to be found in old print-shops eight engravings by Albert Cuyp. It has been objected that as Adam Bartsch, Huber, and Rost, the catalogue of Brandes, that of Winkeler, with a bold and firm hand. A writer on the subject, who takes his facts from Smith's catalogue, says of his drawings:—

“They were generally executed with black chalk or India ink, without the charms of colouring, and not displaying accuracy or great talent. They are not held in high esteem, although but few of them are in existence. Some few etchings of Cuyp, evincing careful study of nature and bold-make no mention of any of them, while even the catalogue of the Rigal sale is equally silent, therefore they are not genuine. It is, however, sufficient to examine them to be assured whence they come. They have the marked character, the accent of his pictures, and it is impossible for one learned in the history of Flemish art to ascribe them to any one else. They are, as may naturally be expected, studies of oxen and cows, engraved ness of execution, are much valued. They, however, are exceedingly rare, a very few specimens only being known to exist in the galleries of amateurs.”

We have already spoken of the mixture of elevation and ingenuity which is the true characteristic of the genius of Cuyp. This is the first impression which strikes us when we examine his landscapes. But it is necessary to add, that no

Dutch landscape painter has carried further the knowledge of aerial perspective. No one has carried further the power of representing air, transparence, depth, and purity of atmospheric effect in his pictures. It seems strange; but it must have been that this Dutchman, born amid the fogs of his country—a country he never left—must have had in the depths of his tranquil mind something like an interior and serene

Italian palaces, we should do so forgetting that the two painters were born at far distant extremities of Europe. Claude passed his life at Rome or at Naples, Cuyyp seldom left the city of Dort, and never saw any sky save that of the Low Countries. We must not then expect him to paint the cerulean blue ether of Italian skies. His sun is more pale, of a clearer and softer hue, but the spectator feels around him a freshness which light, which made him see everything in creation through an impalpable and imponderable ether, which bathes his radiant pictures in lucidity. He has been called the Claude Lorraine of Holland, and this warm praise is only exaggerated in appearance. If one expected to find in Cuyyp the golden specks playing in the sunbeams, the orange tints of the skies of Lorraine, her green and silvery waves, and the warm vapoury clouds that play round the columns of the penetrates to the heart, calming and consoling the mind. The atmosphere of Claude is burning, it scorches the lungs; loaded with the perfumes of poetry, it draws the soul on to indolence and love; that of Cuyyp impels to freshness, excites a desire to travel, gives strength, and rouses activity and life. These two different masters, so different in character, are yet both true. The few degrees of latitude between their two lands made the difference of their genius. But we cannot but allow that the inspired painter Jorraïne had much more before him to rouse his pencil and brush, to create rich nature, than any northern painter could find, however much he might be a worshipper of light. Claude had but to wander on the shores of the Bay of Naples to find radiant and dazzling subjects every day. In Holland, on the contrary, the sky has splendid pictures for the eye only at rare intervals. Like Ormuz, the sun struggles during a great part of the year against darkness. And yet it is strange that we find in Cuyp none of those struggles between light and darkness, between day and night, which so moved the soul of Rembrandt. The artist and painter of the cold north always loved the light, the day, the sun. In fine, the great, the crying, the wonderful characteristic of Cuyp is, that in Holland, in the seventeenth century, that is to say, before the second invasion of a foreign style, he sought the picturesque elsewhere than in rude disorder, effect rather than in contrast, and found grandeur in simplicity, as he found happiness in a peaceful life.

The Bibliothèque Nationale, of France possesses several engravings all of cows.

In Smith's catalogue there are 335 pictures of Albert Cuyp mentioned; but some of them are the same, described, however, under different names.

The Museum of the Louvre contains six—a "Pasturage on the borders of a river" (p. 184), valued at £2,000. "The Return" and "The Departure for a Ride;" the pair are valued at the same sum. The Departure, of which we give the engraving (p. 185), is the best. The others are in the same style.

Vienna has one picture of "Five Cows," four of which are lying down.

At Munich there are two, one of "A Horseman," the other a "Cock and Hen on a dunghill."

At Dresden there is one, "A Woman spinning and a Man sleeping."

Amsterdam has two, "A mountainous Landscape," and "A fierce Charge of Cavalry."

At the Hague is a very clever "View of the Environs of Dordrecht."

The Hermitage of St. Petersburg contains several small specimens.

It is in England, however, that we find a great abundance of Cuyps, because here this great painter has always been appreciated and understood. The reader may therefore enjoy the pleasure and satisfaction of fully examining into the merits of this painter himself.

The National Gallery contains a picture which has been engraved by Bentley and by Goodall. It is a "Hilly Landscape," intersected by a winding river. On the right and front is a gentleman on a dappled-gray horse, represented with his back to the spectator; he appears to be in conversation with a woman who stands by his side, and at the same time is pointing with his whip towards three sportsmen, who are seen in the second distance watering their steeds at a river. Two cows lying down, a flock of sheep, and three dogs, are distributed over the foreground, which is diversified with docks and other wild plants. The aspect of a fine summer's morning is diffused throughout the scene. It originally belonged to Laurence Dundas. It then passed to Mr. Angerstein, and in 1824 was bought by Parliament for the National Gallery at a cost of 195 guineas.

Dulwich contains eighteen, and there are the pictures which are best known in this country. They are of a very varied character, though all rustic landscapes, interiors of houses, and water-pieces, enriched by barks and fishermen. Smith has given a lengthened catalogue of them, but one or two will suffice for those readers who are not disposed to examine for themselves. It is one part of the progressive education of this country that picture-galleries are now beginning to be fully appreciated by the millions; and it is the pleasant province of a work like that we are publishing, to assist the great mass of the community in forming correct ideas in relation to the great masters, who otherwise would be confounded. Everybody can admire a striking and effective picture, but it is only after some study that its beauties can be fully appreciated.

The first worthy of note is a landscape with a broad road on the right, and two lofty trees at its side, which stand near the middle of the picture. At the foot of these are seated two shepherds guarding a flock of thirteen sheep, which are browsing around them; further on the road is a woman in blue, wearing a straw hat, in conversation with a man who is mounted on a mule loaded with panniers. The left of the picture is adorned with shrubs and bushes, growing luxuriantly on the banks of a river. It originally cost 180 guineas.

We have then a landscape composed of a hilly foreground, and a canal flowing in the middle distance on which are vessels under sail. A group of eight cows occupies the front, the whole of which, except one, are lying down; they are guarded by a peasant in a red jacket with a knapsack at his back, who is leaning on a stick apparently in conversation with a woman seated, with a little girl standing by her. This is a pretty and pleasing production, quite à la Cuyp.

Another is still of his favourite land. It is a landscape representing a "View in Holland." In the foreground are two shepherds, one of whom stands with his back to the spectator, the other is lying down; at a little distance from them are a black and white cow standing, and a red one lying down, and under a lofty hill on the left, is seen a herd of cattle. This cost the nation 130 guineas. "A Woman keeping Cows" is a pleasing landscape of a mountainous country, with a river on the right, extending into the extreme distance. In a meadow, composing the left foreground, are seven cows, four sheep, a horse, and a woman with a stick in her hand. This picture was in the possession of Sir Francis Bourgeois, and cost £225. "A Gentleman on Horseback," which cost 950 guineas; now in the collection of Edmund Higginson, Esq., of Saltmarsh Castle, is a beautiful picture—the glowing warmth of a summer sun gilds the scene. "A Herd of Cows Reposing," is a picture such as none but a great artist could have painted. It cost £800, but it was lately in the possession of Baron Delessert, Paris.

"An ancient Castle with Towers, encompassed by a moat and surrounded by lofty hills." A man on a black horse, and a herdsman with five sheep, give interest to the foreground. This picture is a perfect gem. It is 1 foot by 1 foot 8 inches.

This painting was originally bought of an old-clothes man, at Hoorn, in Holland, for about fifteen pence. It passed through many hands, increasing in value whenever re-sold, and was at length brought to England by Mr. La Fontain, who sold it for three hundred and fifty guineas. It is a delightful composition, with charming effects introduced.

The Earl of Ashburnham has a "View of the Castle of Ne-miguen on the confluence of the Rhine," which cost eight hundred guineas—an admirable work, brilliant in tone and admirable in the execution.

The Marquis of Bute possesses a Landscape with a large river on the right, on the further side of which is a small town, and beyond it a lofty hill. The brilliant effect of the morning sun pervades this lovely scene. This beautiful picture merits the highest commendations for the various qualities which give interest and value to this work of Cuyp, which is valued at 1,800 guineas.

The late Sir Abraham Hume, Bart., possessed many which have passed into the gallery of Lord Alford.—"A View on the River Maes," with the town of Dort on the spectator's left, and numerous vessels lying in long perspective by the side of the quay. Among them may be chiefly noticed a large Dutch passage-boat filled with persons, alongside of which lies a small boat, having on board an officer in a scarlet dress seated, and another wearing a dark dress standing near him; a yacht and several other boats are distributed over the river. The effect of a fine summer's evening pervades the scene and gives to the rippling wave a thousand varied hues. A few light summer clouds float over the azure sky, and contribute greatly to the charm of this superb production.

Of the very few pictures which Cuyp painted of this size (it is 3 feet 10 inches by 5 feet 6½ inches) and subject, the one just described is perhaps the one most agreeable to the eye and feelings; as it possesses an agreeable warmth of tone, combined with the appearance of a genial atmosphere, free from that sultry and oppressive heat which sometimes predominates in his pictures; it is worth £2,000.

Another is a number of "Horsemen watering their Steeds in a river." It is impossible to commend too highly this beautiful work of art; the masterly execution displayed in every part, the science evinced in the arrangement of objects and forms, and the wonderful and lovely gradations of tints and atmospheric truth, justly entitle it to the first rank among his last productions. It is worth from £1,500 to £2,000, and is in the collection of J. Martin, Esq.

"The Thirsty Herd-man." A hilly country, beautifully diversified by clusters of trees and an extensive river, represented under the aspect of a brilliant sunset. An example of superlative excellence. It is in the possession of Mr. J. Norton, and cost 380 guineas.

In the collection of Mr. J. H. Hope, is a very beautiful "Cattle Piece."

In the private collection of the Queen, besides that already described, may be seen, a negro holding two horses, a cavalier conversing in the middle of a crowd, a group of three cows, with a shepherd and his wife.

Lord Varborough has a very effective "Winter Scene," a frozen river, which is not to be confounded with that in the possession of the Duke of Bedford.

The late Sir Robert Peel had three pictures of Cuyp, which we believe are still in the possession of his son; a "Group of Cows near a River," which was purchased at an expense of £400; "Cavaliers and Cattle," £200. The third is an "Old Castle surrounded by Towers," the deep shadows of which are reflected on the surrounding water. A horseman, a shepherd and some lambs fill the foreground. The light and shade of this picture is exquisite in finish.

The Bridgewater Gallery contains the remarkable "Naval Piece," described above.

Lord Lansdowne has two Cuyp's; one, a scene on the everlasting Maes, the other "A Woman Milking."

The Grosvenor Gallery has four—"A Landscape," "A Moonlight," "A Stream," and another "Landscape."

A well-known Parisian connoisseur possesses an important and superb picture by Cuyp. It is a large and splendid "View of Dordrecht" (p. 180), taken on the side of the jetty. The scene is animated by barks and vessels, of which some carry the Dutch flag. A bale of merchandise is being unloaded from a schooner into a boat, and addressed to A. Cuyp. A vast multitude of vessels are seen on the horizon; others enter the roads, and are firing the saluting cannon. On the first foreground to the left is a group of three barks, loaded with merchandise and men. On the side of the vessel towards us, we read, "A. Cuyp f. 1640." This was the epoch when the artist was in the full force of his genius. To the right is the town of Dort, with its crowded jetty. In the canal are two other boats, on board of one of which are two, and on board the other, four persons. There are fifty figures in this painting. It is one of his richest productions; every detail is rendered with the perfection of genius.

Baron James Rothschild possesses two very good Cuyp's. The subjects are, "A View on the Water" and "A Paysage on the Borders of the Maes." There is a town sleeping in a luminous fog, on a motionless canal, where a great trading-ship is at anchor. Here we see two elegant cavaliers, one of whom with a red cloak, mounted on a black horse; the other has dismounted to arrange the bridle of his white horse, seen en groupe. A shepherd, sitting on the ground, is speaking to them. To the right, in the foreground, are three cows and two figures. In the distance, in golden vapour, is a church with ruined towers.

At the sale of the Prince de Conti, in 1777, a group of seven persons, of whom six are gambling, was sold for £108s.; while another, "A View of the Maes," loaded with sailing vessels and sloops, fetched £80. "Two Cows," in the side of Randon de Boisset, in 1777, fetched £70. At the sale of the Duke de Praslin, in 1793, "A View of the Maes" fetched £94.

Towards the middle of the picture are six cows, while the right is occupied by a boat manned by two sailors. At the Robit side, 1801, was sold "A View of the Banks of the Maes." To the left is a rich hill-side with several cows; one stands up, and a woman is milking it. It sold for £100. Also another "View of the Maes by Moonlight," which fetched £112 16s. At the sale of Leyden, in 1804, there was sold a "View of Flossingen," which realised £100. At the Lebrun sale, in 1811, a beautiful "Interior of a Village" was sold for £104. It is a sweet and pretty scene. At the Laperrière sale, in 1823, "A Hunting Party" was sold for £916. It represents a young Prince of Orange, mounted on a brown horse of small stature, stopping to give orders to his hunters. He is accompanied by two squires, mounted on a black and a gray horse. Towards the second foreground is a hare, dogs, a piqueur on horseback, and a valet running on foot.

As we have before stated, the works of Albert Cuyp were not held in high estimation during the lifetime of the artist. It was the English who first showed a proper appreciation of their merit. After the sale of the Van Slingelandt collection, which took place in 1785, the prices of his pictures increased so much that imitators of his style speedily arose. The most noticeable of those imitators was Jacob Van Stry, born at Dort in 1756. Van Stry took Cuyp for his model, and ultimately acquired the art of copying and imitating him with wonderful success; so that many of his pictures, after being artfully disguised by dirt and varnish, were sold as original works of Albert Cuyp. But, in addition to this, he was frequently employed to introduce figures and cattle into the genuine pictures of that master, either for the purpose of improving their composition or to please the fancy of the purchaser. Notwithstanding the assiduity with which he studied the works of Cuyp, and the success which has attended many interested persons in imposing his productions on the inexperienced as genuine pictures by that master, he has in every instance fallen far short of those peculiar beauties which constitute the great charm of his teacher. In addition to a prevailing mannerism and hardness of outline which runs through all his pictures, there is an evident deficiency of that mingling of the warm and cool tints so essential in painting. There is, also, a want of truth in his gradations, and an absence of atmospheric effect. He died on the 4th of February, 1815, aged 58, at Dort. His pictures fetched from three hundred to six hundred florins, after his death.

Another imitator was Dionysius Van Dongen, born at Dort in 1748. His attempts at copying were so successful that he found a readier sale for them than for his own pictures. Cuyp, Paul Potter, and Wynants, were his principal models. False Cuyp's he excelled in. He died, in 1819, at Dort.

Another was Abraham Van Bossum. He was less servile in his imitation than the others. Some of his works are highly prized by the Dutch collectors. His style closely resembles Cuyp's. He flourished about the end of the seventeenth century, and was most successful in landscapes, cattle, views of towns, cottages, and poultry. His pictures have fetched very high prices.

The last imitator was one by name Bernard Van Kulaat, born at Dort in 1650; the date of his death is not known. His style does not much resemble Cuyp's; he, however, began as an imitator of that master, but ultimately abandoned his imitations for a style more easy and more native to him.

The numerous artists who endeavoured to build a reputation and a fortune on the mere imitation of Cuyp, is of itself evidence of that painter's genius. Mediocrity has no ready followers. Mediocrity is common enough. It is the privilege of genius to be pillaged. Poets, authors, artists, have all had their plagiarists; and there is scarcely a painter of any real value, of whom false copies may not be found in the market.

Severe and careful critics will not, however, be imposed upon, and the sham Cuyp's are now cast back to merited obscurity. There is some difference between copying a master as a study, and copying him to palm the imitations on the public. Careless and ignorant purchasers may not know the difference, and a false Cuypp may be as interesting and valuable to them as a real one. We know ourselves a man of rank and fortune who glories in a Greuze and a Watteau—both barefaced shams, sold to him by a speculative Jew dealer. As the worthy squire is happy in his ignorance, we have not sought to undeceive him.

A critic feels a natural tendency to elevate the subject he is treating. It is impossible to treat of such a painter as Albert Cuypp without rating him very high. One is roused to warm enthusiasm by the study of his pictures. But we think that we have not fallen into exaggeration as far as the great master we have been treating is concerned. It is to be regretted that we have not richer materials about him. We should have been glad to know what kind of a wife he chose unto himself, if he had stalwart sons and fair daughters. But he has no history save his works, which, though so little appreciated in his day, are now immortal. Proud, indeed, may the man be who owns a genuine Cuypp.

Flemish art holds a very high position in the history of the art of Europe. The men of the Netherlands, who revived painting, did so in a most attractive form. They did not seek the beauty of the ideal, of the very highest order of art, but their characteristic was breadth, freedom, and originality. They combined with this great attention to individual objects. They painted the life they knew: its different phases, its petty and larger peculiarities; the daily existence of the town and village; nature in her works; in-door and domestic. Consequently there was a particular delicacy of touch about them. They do not hold the first place in art, but they tend very much towards it.

Historical painting was a very large department of the Flemish school. It had two branches: one influenced by the catholic clergy in Brabant, the other guided by protestant Holland, and very different in character and attributes. The founder of the Brabant school was Peter Paul Rubens—a painter who had little influence on Cuypp. Cuypp, in the little he did study, studied the Dutch school. But as we have said before, it was by throwing off the trammels of all schools that our artist of Dart became truly great.

PIETRO DE CORTONA.

SOME two centuries ago, in the sunny land of Italy, beneath the warm sky of Tuscany, there was a little shepherd-boy, of twelve years old, feeding his flock by the wayside. He was a simple herdsman; and there he sat on the warm bank, beneath the shade of a tree, thinking, when suddenly he started up, cast down his crook, and walked away towards Florence. What he did this for, and under what impulse he acted, it is difficult to imagine. But to Florence he did go.

Now in Florence there dwelt another boy, of not more than eight years old, nearly as poor as himself, who had left his native village of Cortona to become turnspit in the kitchen of Cardinal Sachetti.

Now Pietro did not come to Florence to enter upon the lucrative duties of the scullion of a prince. He was fired by a noble ardour. In Florence there was a school of painting, and Pietro had determined to become a painter. How, it was difficult to imagine; but he determined to try.

And Pietro stopped before the palace of Cardinal Sachetti, and waited patiently until monsignori had dined, to get an opportunity of speaking to his comrade and friend Tommaso. He waited a long time, but at last Tommaso appeared.

"How do you do, Tommaso?" said Pietro, looking at the well-fed young official with great respect.

"How do you do, Pietro? And what have you come to Florence for?" said the scullion.

"I have come to learn painting," said Pietro of Cortona, quietly.

"Nonsense, you had better learn cooking," replied Tommaso. "It's a good trade; one never can die of hunger in that profession."

"You eat, then, as much as you like here."

"I should think so. I could give myself an indigestion every day if I liked."

"Well," said Pietro merrily, "we can come to an understanding. You have too much, and I have not enough. I'll bring you my appetite, and you'll give me your kitchen."

"Done—settled," said Tommaso.

"Then let us begin from this very moment," cried Pietro, heartily, "for as I have not dined, I feel anxious to begin our partnership at once."

Tommaso took Pietro up secretly to a garret where he himself slept, offered him half of his bed, and told him to wait, for he would soon come up with some leavings from his lordship's table.

"Very good," said Pietro; "but don't be long. My long walk has given me an appetite."

Tommaso soon returned, and the two sat down to supper. It was a gay repast indeed. Tommaso was full of spirits, and laughed heartily at the voracious appetite of Pietro.

whole house with his architect, and visited rooms he had never entered before. The garret of the scullion did not escape the joint investigation of his highness and the artist. Pietro was out; but his numerous sketches on the walls and on paper testified to the patience and talent of the child who dwelt in that garret. The cardinal and the architect were struck by the merit of these works.

"Who lives in this room?" said the prelate.

"Tommaso, a scullion, my lord," replied one of the servants who stood behind.

The cardinal sent for the boy, in order to pay him some highly-merited compliments upon his great ability, and to confer with him as to his future prospects. When, however, poor Tommaso learned that his highness had entered the garret, and had seen what he called the daubs of his friend Pietro, he gave himself up for lost.

"You are no longer to remain among my scullions," said the cardinal, who little thought the boy had a lodger.

CATTLE DRI KING. FROM A PAINTING BY ALBERT CUYT.

Pietro had not the means of buying paper and pencil, and Tommaso had as yet no wages. But the walls of the garret were white, and Tommaso brought up some charcoal, with which Pietro began boldly to make sketches. In this way time passed, until Tommaso by chance received a small coin. Great joy in the garret. The young artist procured paper and pencils. He now went out at daybreak, and entering the churches, studied the pictures, the monuments, and wandering about to the out-skirts, studied nature again in those fields which had fired his infant genius, and which by some strange and irresistible impulse had driven him to the study of painting.

By degrees the first crude sketches in charcoal on the walls disappeared, and Pietro of Cortona covered the narrow cell with more perfect pictures. The garret of the young scullion became a little temple of art and friendship.

But even the best kept mysteries are one day explained. Cardinal Sachetti determined one year to have his palace undergo thorough repair. For this purpose he went over the Tommaso, deceived as to the true meaning of the cardinal's words, thought merely that he was driven from his kitchen, and was without a home. The poor scullion saw ruin for himself, and exile and starvation for his friend. He accordingly, while weeping bitterly, threw himself at his master's feet.

"Oh!" cried he, "do not send me away. What will become of Pietro?"

The cardinal, considerably puzzled, asked for an explanation of these words; and after some little hesitation, he learned that Tommaso had for two years kept in his garret, in secret, a young shepherd-boy.

"When he comes home this evening," said the cardinal, "bring him to me."

And the cardinal dismissed the scullion, after telling him to keep his place, laughing heartily all the while at his mistake.

In the evening the artist did not come back. Two days passed, then eight, and even a fortnight elapsed before anything was again heard of Pietro de Cortona.

At length the cardinal, a great patron of the arts, began to be exceedingly anxious relative to the lad. He caused inquiries to be made, and found that the monks of an isolated convent had sheltered the young artist of fourteen, who had humbly asked permission of them to copy a picture by Raphael which was in the chapel of the cloister. He had been freely allowed to carry out his wish. He was then brought back to the cardinal, who received him with kindness, and placed him at school with one of the best painters of Rome.

Fifty years later, there were two old men who lived like brethren in one of the most beautiful villas of Florence. People said of the one, "He is one of the greatest painters of the day," and of the other, "He is a model of friendship." It was Pietro de Cortona and his friend, the scullion—the one a great painter, the other a rich and honoured citizen.

THE UNKNOWN MASTERPIECE.

THERE is a tradition current in Spain, which is not one of the least singular of the tales which float about in connexion with painters. One day Rubens was in the neighbourhood of Madrid, and went into a convent of very severe rules, and remarked, not without some surprise, in an humble and poor choir of the monastery, a picture of the most sublime and admirable talent. This picture represented the death of a monk. Rubens summoned his scholars, showed them the picture, and asked their opinion. All replied, that it was of exceeding genius.

"Who can be the author of this work?" asked Vandyk, the cherished pupil of Rubens.

"There is a name at the bottom of the picture, but it has been carefully rubbed out," replied Van Thulden.

Rubens begged the favour of an interview with the prior, and asked of the old monk the name of the artist, whose production he admired so much.

"The painter is no longer of this world," replied the abbot.

"Dead!" cried Rubens, "dead! And no one knows his name, no one ever hinted to me, no one told me, of his name, which should be immortal,—a name before which my own would have faded. And yet, my father," said the artist with a flush of pride, "I am Paul Rubens."

At the sound of this name, the pale face of the prior was animated by singular warmth. His eyes flashed and he looked at Rubens with a strange and wild look—a faint glimmer of pride flashed across his face—but it lasted only a moment. The monk then looked down, crossed his arms, which for a moment he had raised to the heavens in an instant of enthusiasm.

"The artist is not of this world," he repeated.

"His name, my father—his name, that I may let the whole world know it, that I may render unto him the glory which is due unto him."

The monk shook in every limb; a cold sweat burst out upon his body and tinged his wan cheeks; his lips were compressed convulsively, like priests ready to reveal a mystery of which you know the secret.

"His name, his name," cried Rubens.

The monk shook his head.

"Listen to me, my brother; you have not understood my meaning. I said to you that the artist was not of this world—I did not say he was dead."

"You say he lives," cried the artists in chorus. "Give forth his name."

"He has renounced the world—he is in a cloister, he is a monk."

"A monk, my father, a monk? Oh, tell me in what convent. He must come out of it. When God stamps a man with the seal of genius, this man should not be buried in obscurity. God gives such a man a sublime mission, and he must accomplish his destiny. Tell me in what cloister he is concealed, and I will tear him from it, telling him of the glory that awaits him. If he refuses, I will have him commanded by the Pope to return to the world and resume his brushes. The Pope loves me, my father, and the Pope will hearken to my words."

"I will give up neither his name nor the cloister which has opened its shelter to him," replied the monk in a firm tone.

"The Pope will command you," said Rubens, exasperated.

"Listen to me," replied the monk, "listen to me, in the name of God. Do you think that this man, before leaving the world, before renouncing fortune and glory, did not first struggle firmly against such a resolution? Think you, brother, that he must not have felt bitter deceptions, bitter sorrow, before he became convinced that all was deception and vanity? Let him then die in peace in that shelter he has found against the world and its sorrow. Your efforts, moreover, will be in vain he will triumphantly reject your advances," he added, making the sign of the cross, "for God will continue to be his friend, God, who in his mercy has deigned to appear to him, and will not drive him from his presence."

"But, father, he renounces immortality."

"Immortality is nothing in presence of eternity."

And the monk refused to carry on the conversation.

Rubens went away with his pupils, silent and sad, and returned to Madrid.

The prior went back to his cell, and kneeling down on the straw mat which served him as a bed, prayed fervently to God.

Then he collected together his pencils, his colours, and his easel, which were scattered about his cell, and cast them through the window into the river which flowed beneath. He gazed then a little while sadly at these objects as they floated away.

When they had entirely disappeared, he kneeled down again, and prayed with excessive fervour.

The author of the masterpiece was never known.

GERARD DOUW.

GERARD DOUW, the most feeling and expressive of Dutch genre painters, Durer excepted, was born at Leyden on the 7th of April, 1613. His father, Janszoon Douw, was a glazier. Gerard, however, showed no inclination to follow that trade, but early manifested a taste for the fine arts. The father did not oppose his son's inclinations, but, on the contrary, did all in his power to encourage and strengthen them. When a mere child, Gerard Douw was placed with Bartholomew Dolendo, an engraver, with whom he remained for some few months, acquiring considerable skill in the art. He was then placed with Peter Rouwhorn, painter on glass, with whom he remained about two years more. At the expiration of that period, such was the progress the young artist had made, that his master had little else to teach him, and accordingly, at fifteen years of age, Gerard Douw became the pupil of the celebrated Rembrandt. After three years of unremitting study under that master, Douw felt that he might release himself from the trammels of an instructor, and dispense with all lessons, except those taught by nature herself. Accordingly, he left the studio of Rembrandt, and prepared to take his own independent position in the world of art.

Portrait painting was the first style which engaged his attention; but of this he soon tired. He found that it exacted too much of his versatile powers. Not only did it necessitate the trouble of taking accurate likenesses, but also of painting good pictures. He required more time, too, to perfect his works than many people who wished to engage his talents were disposed to give. Their patience was fairly exhausted before he had completed more than a mere sketch of their features. Such was the elaborate patience which he bestowed upon the effort to render every detail of his picture in the most perfect manner, that Descamps assures us, on one occasion, when Douw was engaged in painting the portrait of a lady, he spent five days upon the hand. Another authority says, that to a broomstick, in one of his pictures, he devoted three, some say five, days of incessant application. It is not surprising, therefore, that he should have abandoned a department of his art which demanded such a vast outlay of time, and which, moreover, did not allow his imagination sufficient scope to develop itself. He obeyed the instincts of his genius, therefore, in surrendering himself to the spirit of his fancy, whether that led him amid the beauties of nature, or among the homely scenes of domestic life. Whatever picture he undertook received the utmost attention, even in its minutest particulars, at his hands. The care he bestowed merely upon his colours almost exceeds belief. He always ground them himself. He kept them shut up in air-tight boxes, and closed every aperture of the room in which they were placed, so that the apartment itself was almost air-tight; he also entered the room on tip-toe, with the scrupulous caution with which a sick chamber is visited; sat himself down softly, to prevent his clothes from sweeping against the floor or the furniture, and thus causing dust to arise in the room. He also kept his brushes, palettes, and pencils, in positions where they were secure from atmospheric variation and influence. This care was not bestowed in vain. His colouring presents a richness and purity which has rarely been equalled, and probably never surpassed. The neglect of these minutiae affects much the slow progress of modern art. When studying the style of Rembrandt, he appears to have viewed the works of that master through a convex lens; for when Rembrandt's pictures are seen through that medium, they bear a marked resemblance to those of Douw.

Gerard Douw had a most intimate knowledge of the mechanical details of his art; an artistic capacity to group those details in a spirit of harmony; and unflagging manual and mental industry. His industry was indeed marvellous. He would bestow hours in studying new effects, in viewing the contrasts and combinations of light and shade, and in perfecting the most trivial accessories of his subject. He cared not how he laboured or how protracted his labour was, so that he was enabled to attain to that degree of excellence to which he felt his genius was capable of leading him. He was guided, as is every truly great mind, solely by the light of his own opinions. If he pleased himself, he had achieved the highest possible amount of success. He was his own critic; all other critics might be listened to, but it was himself alone who was to be obeyed. It was no easy task he set himself, but it was one that at any expenditure of time and patience he determined to execute. How he succeeded is well known. Other painters may have been as painstaking, but in no works of art are the evidences of industry more unobtrusively apparent than in the works of Gerard Douw.

An eminent critic thus sums up the character of Douw: "Formed in the school of Rembrandt, Douw appears to have received from him a thorough knowledge of light and shade and the power of treating it, so as to produce complete harmony; but he abandoned the fantastic tendency and the striking effects of his master, and formed for himself a peculiar style. Gerard Douw delights most in subjects within the narrow circle of kindly family feeling; we meet with no action, as in Terburg, in which an interest is excited by the traces of some passion hidden beneath the surface, but merely the affectionate relations of simple domestic life, and the peaceful intercourse of a quiet home. The execution, as is necessary in such subjects, is extremely neat and highly finished, without degenerating into pettiness or constraint; the various accessories are handled with the same care as the figures, for they perform a necessary part in domestic life; and the daily intercourse with them seems, as it were, to lend them an independent existence and a peculiar interest. The arrangement is, therefore, such, that these accessories not only combine agreeably with the whole, but in general occupy a considerable portion of the picture. We often look through a window, on the sill of which lie all kinds of household utensils, into the busy scene within. Frequently the comfort of domestic privacy is made more striking by the twilight of evening or by candlelight; for in the treatment also of the effects of light of this kind Gerard Douw has shown himself a great master. Although the life of the lower classes, such as housemaids and retailers of articles in daily use, frequently forms the subject of his pictures, yet they are painted without any leaning to the burlesque and vulgar feeling of such masters as Brauwer; indeed, whenever Gerard Douw approaches to coarseness of this kind, we can observe that it is done with design and with an effort. On the contrary, neither the drawing-room of the great, nor subjects supplied by poetry, are suited to his natural taste; and though he has frequently tried them, the result is not happy."

Gerard Douw lived in honour and prosperity, and died at the age of sixty-one, in the year 1674. He had several imitators, the most successful of whom was Francis Miéris, born 1635, died 1681. His imitations frequently deceived experienced judges. Peter Van Slingelands was another imitator of Douw, and many of his pictures bear a marked resemblance to those of that master, and are frequently sold as such. But there is a certain weakness and irresolution in Van Slingelands' pictures, which the practised eye is enabled to detect at once. John Van Staveran was another imitator and pupil of Douw. His subjects were, however, limited, and his style far from effective. The principal works of Gerard Douw are "La Femme Hydropique," in the Louvre; "A Schoolroom, by Candlelight," in the Musée at Amsterdam, and valued at £1,600; the "Interior of a Room, with groined ceiling and arched windows," in a private collection in Paris, and valued at 1,200 guineas; "A Grocer's Shop," in the possession of the Queen, and valued at 1,200 guineas; "The Poulterer's Shop," worth 1,270 guineas, formerly in the possession of Sir Robert Peel; "La Marchande Epicière du Village," in the Louvre, value £2,200; "A Schoolroom by Candlelight," now in the Musée at Amsterdam; "The Interior of a Dentist's Shop." Many valuable portraits of himself, in various collections. "La Lecture de la Sainte Bible," in the Louvre, valued at £1,000; "A Hermit at his Devotions," in the possession of Lord Ashburton, and valued at £1,500; "The Water Doctor," now in the palace of the Hermitage, St. Petersburg; "The Surprise," in the Gallery at Dresden, and valued at 500 guineas, &c. &c. Some of his pictures, of great value, were sold to the Empress of Russia, and were lost at sea in 1771. Of the pictures to which we have alluded, we select a few for description.

The first is "La Femme Hydropique." The picture represents the interior of a large and lofty room, with an arched window on the right, and a circular one above it; in the opposite side of the apartment is suspended a rich piece of tapestry, which is drawn up, and forms a pleasing object, both from the tasteful cast of the folds, and the angle which it makes in the picture. The composition exhibits a group of four figures, disposed near the window. The centre one is a lady of middle age, evidently suffering under a severe malady; her affliction is affectionately deplored by her daughter, a beautiful girl, who is kneeling by the side of her parent, holding one of her hands. A doctor, in a purple silk robe, and a scarf round his waist, stands on the left of the lady, attentively examining the symptoms of the disease; while a female attendant, who is behind her chair, is offering her some refreshment in a spoon. The elegance of the dresses, and the taste displayed in the furniture, denote the rank and opulence of the family. This surprising production is no less excellent for its finish in all the details than for the strong natural expression of each figure: the patient resignation of the lady, the filial affection of the daughter, the anxious attention of the nurse, and the ominous gesture of the doctor, are portrayed with a refinement of feeling that would do honour to the best Italian masters. This picture is in the Louvre, and is valued at £1,800. It is his masterpiece. It was given by the Elector Palatine to Prince Eugene, and, after his death, remained in the gallery at Turin, until the French carried it off and placed it in the Louvre. They gave 100,000 francs instead of restoring it.

The next is "The Interior of a Dentist's Shop," of which we present an engraving. An old man is being submitted to the operations of the dentist. At the back, an old woman, resting upon a basket, is waiting to see the tooth extracted. On the window-sill in front are a shell, a bottle, a basin, and a pot of flowers. A skull on a shelf at the back of the room, several medicine jars, and a stuffed lizard suspended from the

and the general air of life and reality which invests it, speaking in no small voice of the genius of the creator.

In the collection at Hampton Court there is a small Gerard Dowd of "An Old Woman asleep with a Book on her knees." The Dulwich Gallery also contains two small pictures, and in the gallery of the late Sir Robert Peel was a picture which formerly belonged to Mr. Beckford, and was sold at the Fentroof gave completeness to the scene. The scrutinising look of the operator contrasts well with the resigned appearance of the patient; and the steady reflective gaze of the old woman is shown to great advantage in the light of the window. This picture, one of several illustrations of dentistry, a subject Dowd often treated, is remarkable for the richness of the colouring, the truthfulness of detail, the admirable grouping, hill Abbey sale for 1,270 guineas. It represents "A Hare bargained for between an old woman and young girl."

In the Berlin Museum there is a picture representing "A Store-room with vast quantities of Provisions." The cook has just opened the door and has a candle in her hand. She steps lightly to avoid disturbing a mouse about to enter a trap. The light on her face produces a pleasing effect.

JOHN VAN HUYSUM.

THERE is an essential difference between the genius of a Huysum and that of a Cuyp or a Douw; the latter reach to the verge of the very highest branch of art, but our present artist is of another school, though sufficiently great in his way. Some have instituted a comparison between Baptiste, Huot, and Huysum. But these two artists are separated by the wide difference that exists between the French and the Flemish schools. It is from the similitude and yet the contrast between them that we can appreciate the distinction between the two schools, and can seize and judge of the difference between the style in which they have severally treated flowers. The French school is generally considered to regard nature as something purely secondary, much inferior to man, and bowing wholly subservient to his greatness. For a long time that school used landscape but as the framework of an historic scene, or as a garden, where wandered poets, and heroes, and philosophers. They rarely took for subjects the lovely creations of the earth. Flowers, above all, were disregarded by them. Even those who did make them their special study and their choice workmanship, used them only as light decorations fit to adorn the panels of the palace and boudoir of the lady of fashion. The artists of the French school used flowers simply to show off their delicacy of touch, their richness of colouring, and the keenness of their eye. The painters of the Flemish and Dutch schools always placed nature in the first rank both in their admiration and in their pictures. As long as they confined themselves to natural sources, to inspiration, arising from their own characters and climate, everything was a subject for a masterpiece. They were quite satisfied when they could paint the banks of a river, when they could make a picturesque scene out of an old moss-grown wall, or render the grace and elegance of a flower, its peculiar and gentle charms, its every tint, characteristic, and hue. The same country which produced so many amateurs of flowers, so many enthusiastic worshippers of the tulip, gave to the world also the best artists in this peculiar line. The son of Gaul devoted a leisure hour to a bouquet, to show his power of rendering contrasts, and to bring together all the bright colours which are found in this sun-born department of creation. The Dutchman seeks to rouse sympathy and admiration in the heart of the amateur of gardens, to awaken in his soul the emotions naturally suggested and kindled in the mind of one who loves flowers, who knows their history, their family, their varieties, and their perfume. He seeks to make the rose of an hour live a hundred years. Huet paints a bunch of flowers merely for effect and contrast. John Van Huysum painted flowers from love, and under the influence of a kind of inspiration.

The place where he was born was peculiarly the locality where flowers were always highly appreciated. No other nation at that time could enter into the floricultural enthusiasm of the Dutchmen. Huysum was born at Amsterdam, in 1682. He was the pupil and the eldest son of Justus Van Huysum, a flower-painter, who had transformed his house into a kind of manufactory of everything which could contribute to the decoration of apartments and gardens. At the head of this peculiar establishment Justus Van Huysum placed his son John, while all his other sons, whom he had also initiated into the mysteries of the art of painting, worked under him. The coarse work of this trade soon disgusted John, who felt within himself higher and nobler aspirations towards true art. He accordingly entered deeply into the study of Abraham Mignon, an able painter, of Verelst, and David de Heem, who was a kind of master in this school. His flowers and fruit were executed with the utmost neatness and finish, while his colours were brilliant, and harmonised in the purest manner. From the study of these masters, John Van Huysum turned to the ever-open page of nature, where, despite the clear and transparent light shed on all creation's works, so few learn to read. This imitation of their line of conduct was most fortunate for our artist, as it enabled him to see all that was good in his predecessors, who were considered inimitable, and to correct, by reference to reality, any errors into which they fell. He found errors in their copies of nature, slight and trifling faults, indeed, but such as he endeavoured to avoid. It was, then, by active and industrious search after the real and the beautiful, that the genius of Huysum was cultivated to the highest pitch. Beginning only with flowers, he saw open before him a whole world—fresh, new, delightful. He investigated every branch of his subject; he visited every corner of his new domains. Birds, butterflies, wasps, bees, all came in for their share. He made them all, as it were, the satellites of floricultural creation. At an early period, he studied diligently to imitate the marble slabs which were to support his baskets of flowers, the pots which were to contain his bouquets, the bas-reliefs which were to adorn his vases, and all the delicate minutie of ornaments for handles, etc. He armed himself from head to foot to conquer the domain of roses. He was a regular Don Quixote of horticulture.

This taste for flowers seems to have been innate. Even when an infant, it was remarked that his eye was constantly attracted by the bright colours of nature's most beautiful and most short-lived children; and, during his boyhood, his great delight was the cultivation of a little plot of garden-ground, where he would pass hours sitting upon a bench, watching, in spring and summer time, the result of his labours and his care. This taste of his was so well known that his father's friends never thought of giving him any other presents than a packet of seeds or a bunch of roots, and it was the general opinion that he would ultimately become a great botanist—perhaps a great physician. Those who thought so, however, did not know that the young Van Huysum cared little to study the secret processes of nature, and was captivated only by the graceful forms, the exquisite colours, and the beautiful grouping of his flowers. Vanderkamp relates, in his collection of anecdotes of the notabilities of Amsterdam, that when our painter was a mere youth, a curious adventure happened to him from this excessive fondness for the floral productions of nature. He was one day wandering in the neighbourhood of the city, when he came to a garden separated from the road by one of those neat hedges which form the admiration of all travellers in Holland. According to his usual custom, he looked over to see if there was anything in his way worth admiring, and having discovered that all the flowers in the beds were already well known to him, was about to go away, when his eye was attracted by a magnificent tulip that stood in a pot upon one of the lower balconies of the house. Its size, its form, its lustre, at once threw him into ecstasies of delight, and he would have given anything to have been allowed to approach it, to hang over it, to contemplate it from various points of view.

Timidity, natural to his age, prevented him, however, from entering the garden and asking permission to gratify his desire; and so, after having lingered near the hedge for more than an hour, he tore himself away with a sigh and returned homewards.

But the tulip still occupied his thoughts. He neither supped nor slept that night, and next morning early went forth and returned to the garden, in hopes of again seeing his beautiful flower. The windows of the house, however, were still closed, and the tulip had not yet been put out into the air. Van Huysum was patient. He walked up and down meditating, until at length he saw a young girl come out with the tulip pot in her hand and place it carefully where it could catch the first rays of the sun. Anybody else would have observed that the young girl was beautiful exceedingly; but the young painter only looked upon her as a thing that carried a flower, or rather he did not look upon her at all, but gazed with his great eyes at the real object of his admiration.

It happened that Agatha Kostar—such was the young girl's name—was betrothed to the son of one of the richest burgo-masters of Amsterdam, who came out that morning on a visit to his intended father-in-law, partly to discuss the preliminaries of his marriage, and partly to settle the price of two hundred and fifty hogsheads of suzar, which Van Kostar had for sale. As he walked deliberately by, examining as he went the nice little garden and the neat house which were to form part of Agatha's dowry, he could not help being struck at seeing rather a wild-looking youth staring like a tiger over the hedge full upon the balcony; while his betrothed still stood, after having set down the flower, admiring it, and now and then brushing off a few grains of dust that had fallen upon its petals.

Dutchmen are slow in most things. The son of the burgo-master took this fact into his mind, without making any comment, and walked into the house. But when he came to the window, and perceived that Agatha still lingered there, under the raking fire of as eager a pair of eyes as he had ever seen, he could not help feeling a small, a very small pang of jealousy; and touching the young lady on the shoulder, said to her,

"Who is that young man?"

The young girl looked very innocently first at him, and then at the stranger, and replied:

"I had not seen him; he is some beggar probably. I will send him out something."

"Some broken victuals," economically observed the burgo-master's son, in whom the feeling of jealousy began slowly to die away.

Next morning, however, again perceiving Van Huysum at his post, he took note of his costume, and convinced himself that he was no beggar. Now, as he perfectly well knew that a plate of broken victuals had been sent out, and did not know that Van Huysum had gone away in the meantime, all this business appeared very strange to him, and he determined, as he stepped slowly towards the house, to come to an explanation.

He found Van Kostar sitting enjoying his pipe at one of the back windows, in a state of contemplative beatitude, with a large ledger open before him; for the good old gentleman had long been confined to his house by obesity and the gout, and was compelled to transact all his business there.

"Good morning, my son," said he, stretching out his fat hand. The young man took it, gave it a solemn shake, sat down, and came at once to the point.

"I am not satisfied with Agatha," said he. Then, leaving this observation to sink into the old gentleman's mind, he took up a pipe, filled it, and began to smoke in a very jealous and melancholy way.

Van Kostar looked at him, and took more time in trying to get at the meaning of his phrase than he did generally in deciding on the merits of a commercial operation. At length he said what he might have said before, "I don't understand what you say."

The burgomaster's son then stated that he had seen a young man making love to Agatha over the hedge, which, for a Dutchman, was rather a stretch of imagination. Van Kostar opened his eyes, laid down his pipe, and struck a blow with his fat hand upon the table.

"Son-in-law," said he, "what you say is not true. I know Agatha, and shall call her at once to have an explanation."

Now it happened that Agatha, as even the discreetest young ladies will sometimes do, had been listening at the door, and heard the charge which had been made against her. Instead of coming in at once, and exculpating herself, she instantly ran back to the balcony, moved by a natural female curiosity to have a look at this young stranger, of whom she had hitherto taken no notice.

Van Huysum was still there, and was employed in trying to sketch on a piece of card the object of his fond admiration. "It is true," thought Agatha, blushing, "and he is writing a letter to me. Upon my faith, he is a very handsome young man; and Gerard never looked at me in that way."

Whilst she was indulging in this dangerous speculation, Gerard, the burgomaster's son, made his appearance, and conveyed to her her father's message, that he desired to see her, but without alluding to the suspicions which he had himself entertained.

On seeing his kind grave face, Agatha repeated a little of having allowed her thoughts to wander, but still could not help carrying on the mortification a little further. She was quite convinced that Gerard was right, so far as Van Huysum was concerned, and equally convinced of her own innocence.

There is nothing that makes women so revengeful as being wrongfully suspected; and Agatha is therefore deserving of credit that she did not determine to flirt with the stranger as soon as she found out who he was. "I am afraid," she said, "that I know what my father wants."

Gerard started, for as yet there had been no fact to confirm or justify his uneasiness. He looked sorrowfully at the young girl, and taking her hand, led her to the chamber where her father was waiting rather impatiently for her presence. The old man exclaimed at once, "Well, daughter, has Gerard told you what is the matter?"

"No, father," she replied; "but I think he is jealous."

"That's it," exclaimed the old man, laughing; "but you must tell him at once that he is mistaken, and that the young fellow with the eyes thinks no more of you than he does of my tulips."

"I am not quite sure of that, father," replied Agatha.

Van Kostar gave a long whistle, and then meditated for a few moments. At length he said, "Would it not be well, Gerard, instead of talking to this foolish girl, to learn who this stranger may be? Go out, like a man, and tell him to come in. I have always found, that to be straightforward is the best way to do business."

Gerard immediately walked out and went to Van Huysum, who had just finished his sketch, and said to him, "Young man, will you come with me? I know not who you are, but I am afraid that you are nearer to obtaining what you desire than I am."

"Thank heaven!" exclaimed Van Huysum with the accent of a passionate lover.

Gerard felt his heart sink within him, and said, "Have you loved long?"

"Three days," exclaimed Van Huysum.

"And I have loved her for three years," said Gerard, with a sigh.

"Three years!" cried the young painter. "Has that flower been in bloom so long?"

Gerard thought to himself, this is the fine talk with which these young popinjays win the hearts of maidens. If she be inclined to him after having only seen his head over a hedge, what will it be when he makes fine speeches to her? Then he said aloud, "She is eighteen years old."

"Eighteen years!" again exclaimed Van Huysum, in a dreamily poetical manner. And so he followed his rival into the house, and was soon in presence of the old man and his daughter.

Gerard by this time had made up his mind that the young stranger loved Agatha, and that Agatha loved the young stranger; and being both a prudent and a good man, said to his intended father-in-law, "It is useless to struggle against fate. I know that they are destined for one another; and if this young man makes his demand, and it be accepted, I shall withdraw my claims, and the relations of our houses shall not be disturbed."

Agatha looked rather surprised at being so easily abandoned, and having compared the appearance of Van Huysum with that of Gerard, saw that, after all, the latter was much the most eligible individual. Besides, she had not really thought of breaking off a good match in this romantic way, and now exclaimed, "I suppose my consent will be asked?"

Van Huysum approached her, and taking her hand said, "I beseech you not to disappoint me."

By this time Van Kostar had a little recovered from the surprise which their strange doings had excited, and roared out:—"Is everybody mad? What is the meaning of all this nonsense? Do you think I will give Agatha to the first stranger that is picked up by the way-side?"

Van Huysum thought that the tulip had received a name. And looking very respectfully at the irate old gentleman, said, "If you will not part with Agatha herself, as you have been so kind as to call me in, will you give me one of her bulbs?"

At this extraordinary speech it seemed evident that the young painter was insane, and Gerard began to think whether it would be most proper to knock him down or coax him away. Our painter, however, not understanding the odd looks that were cast at him, went in to say: "I saw your tulip the day before yesterday, and so admired its perfection, that I wished to possess a similar one, or at any rate to be allowed to make a sketch of it. I have tried to do so over the hedge, but am afraid that I have not succeeded." He then drew forth his card, and exhibited his performance. Agatha bit her lips, for she began to feel rather ridiculous; but her father and her lover laughed heartily, and the former exclaimed, "Young man, you may have my tulip, pot and all, and if you will paint it for me, I will buy the picture, and make a present of it to my daughter at the christening of her first child."

Agatha, says the worthy Vanderkampe, who seems to have hung over this story with tenderness, ran away blushing, and Van Huysum afterwards found in Van Kostar one of his most liberal patrons.

The Dutch are very extreme in their love of collections. They describe this peculiar taste by the word âep-lu-bbery, which may be translated, curiosity-love. Some collect shells, some indulge in the luxury of medals; and in many a grocer's and cheese-monger's house will you find a library of strange and rare books of Fliziv; and primitive editions; or you will find the same man making unheard-of sacrifices for antique Chinese and Japanese ware. But the greatest instance of the âep-lu-bbery known, is this devotion of the Dutch to the art of flower-painting. They worship this branch of art; it is a subject of adoration. It will then be readily understood to what a degree John Van Huysum received encouragement, when we mention that he succeeded in eclipsing Abraham Mignon. In the same picture he flattered both their love for painting and for flowers. It may, however, be remarked, that one of the first persons, after Van Kostar, to purchase his works and to cry up his talents was the envoy of France, the Count of Morville, who ordered four pictures, two for the Duke of Orleans, and two for himself.

The generous protection of this friend soon made Van Huysum fashionable. It drew attention to him, particularly from foreigners of rank and wealth; and from that moment, we are informed by Deschamps, his pictures fetched as much as 1,200 Dutch florins (about £120). His reputation having spread far and near, several German princes and all the sovereigns in Europe were eager to possess flowers from the hand of bouquets of Van Huysum, and informs us that the brother of the painter, James Van Huysum, "lived with Lord Orford, and painted most of the pictures in the attic story."

Though fashion does sometimes decide the temporary fate of an artist, yet when that reputation continues to hold its own, it can scarcely be deceptive. The unanimous suffrages of artistic Europe were never yet given to mediocrity. At all events, they were not in the case of John Van Huysum. He really did reach, in flower-painting, almost to perfection, and we may almost say of him what d'Argenville says of Baptiste, "his flowers only want perfume to make them real."

The arrangement, the drawing, the perspective, the chiaroscuro, the touch, were all studied by Van Huysum with ardour. He seemed to catch by intuition at the varied a painter, whose workshop was the gardens of the richest floriculturists of Amsterdam and Haarlem; the King of Poland, the King of Prussia, the Elector of Saxony, the Prince of Hesse, ordered pictures of him, for which they paid him very large sums; and one, who, to use a French hyperbolic phrase, "was almost a sovereign," Sir Robert Walpole, obtained from him four pictures to adorn his mansion at Houghton hall, in Norfolk. Huysum from that hour was a favourite in England. His charming productions were appreciated at once, at a time when it was fashionable to follow the example of a noble lord, and when the good opinion of such a man as Walpole did more for an artist than even his genius. The pictures purchased by Sir Robert Walpole, says Horace Walpole, in the account he gives of his father's pictures in 1752, were most highly finished. In this work, he only mentions two elements of his glory. He may have been less skilful, he may have been less of a painter than Huet in the more artistic co-ordination of a bouquet. The French academician looked principally to the effect of the whole, and regarding flowers only as ornaments, made all the little sacrifices necessary to give relief, unity, and animation to his picture. Van Huysum often mars by certain little details the general whole. To render it more light, he cuts his picture up by small, fine, and capricious branches. The elegant lightness of all this ravishes the heart of the botanist, who recognises and names with joy the myosotis, the fuselia, and the blue campanula; but these delicate accessories sometimes injure the frankness of the general effect. There was a want of completeness which drew down the blame of other artists, and laid him open to criticism; men, who see in a sprig of lily of the valley nothing but a bunch of little bright points, and for whom an anemony is rather a tone than a flower, objected to the artistic carefulness of some of his productions.

Without falling into the insipidity which is the necessary result of an attempt to attain visible symmetry, the painter must give to his basket of flowers an order which, however, he must take care to hide. The young girl who has returned from the garden with her great straw hat full of flowers, has made haste to immerse their stalks into a vessel full of water other hand, be symmetrically divided and present to the eye a too methodical arrangement. A tuft of anemones may counter-balance a hyacinth; the rose of Provins may be the companion of a double full-grown poppy; because the brilliancy of a tone increases the size of a flower, and exalts its importance; a daisy is larger in appearance than a violet of the same size. These ideas are suggested by the painting we have engraved (p. 200); for it is Van Huysum who speaks, and we are only translating, in an imperfect manner, what the admirable picture and with her simple hand, without thought and without design, she has given to her bouquet a charming aspect, an inexpressible and unexpected beauty. So must the artist do. What an ingenuous child, in whom grace is natural, discovers by instinct, the painter must attain by a sonic combination. In what that combination consists, it were difficult to say. We may affirm, nevertheless, that the corresponding parts must be unequal, and that if the bouquet does not look well when leaning entirely to one side of the vase, it must not, on the elegantly touches. It is the master himself who tells us to what degree perspective and design are necessary to the flower-painter, and that there is nothing so difficult to draw, for example, as a leaf fore-shortened, or a flower with the petals curled inwards. It is he who shows us what art, what care, is necessary for setting these pretty models, so that, whether seen in full or in profile, bending forwards or backwards, they may always preserve the character and the form which we know to be peculiar to them. Inartistically represented, a round flower may appear square or triangular; and seen from a particular point of view, a chesnut-flower, which takes a pyramidal form in nature, may seem to be round.

One of the ablest writers upon painting, Sir Joshua Reynolds, has said, speaking of Rubens, that his paintings were nosegays of colours. This phrase darts like a ray of light through this difficult subject of flower-painting. It is evident that nature supplies those who follow this art with the proper tone of every one of the elements—we were going to say, of the personages—of their picture. The painter, therefore, has only to compose his chiara-oscuro, with the local colours, and without having to invent the harmony of his work, he finds it ready made. As Philip Wouvermans makes use of the variegated coats of his horses—the bay, the chesnut, the dappled gray, the black, and the white—to develop the gamut of his chiara-oscuro, so Van Huysum, taking his flowers, in one sense, as so many tones and demi-tones already formed on the palette of nature, has only to dispose them to produce the nosegay of which Reynolds speaks; and may thus, by softening away towards his background, by means of flowers in demitint and of deep coloured models, like the iris, the bluebell, and the pansy (grouping his light flowers towards the centre), discover, we will not say only optical perspective, but even a poetical aspect, from the fidelity of the imitation.

“The artist who wishes to attain a certain amount of talent in this department of art,” says Millin, “should pass the greater part of his life in studying his models. He ought to possess a garden in which to cultivate them himself, in order that he may be able to procure the most beautiful of each season of the year, to make a choice of them, and to have nature under his eyes as he works. To be successful in painting flowers, certain natural dispositions are necessary, which every artist does not possess. There are, indeed, certain moral qualities, which seem to favour the artist in this department who has possessed them. To the exact coup d’œil which makes them correct draughtsmen and good colourists—to the indefatigable patience in matters of detail—to the cleanliness of handiwork which leads to perfection—these artists commonly unite a gentleness of character, a serenity of soul, and an evenness of temper, which tend to make them at all times equally correct, equally pure in colour, equally certain and like in their ‘handling.’”

Who would not believe that this portrait of the flower-painter is precisely that of Van Huysum? Who would suppose that the author of these sweet masterpieces—the assiduous companion of hyacinths, of tulips, and of roses—had lived an agitated and sombre life? It is, nevertheless, true, that in the midst of his triumphs Van Huysum suffered the pangs of jealousy. He had married a woman who, according to some biographers, was neither young, nor pretty, nor desirable; but it happened one day that the raileries of one of those men who feel a stupid pleasure in disturbing the happiness of others introduced grief into his soul. From time to time indeed his mind wandered. Once, in a moment of irritation, he insulted the master of the house in which he lived, and was turned into the streets. To these excesses succeeded a long fit of melancholy. As an increase of misfortune, the son of this suspected wife fell into evil ways, so that Van Huysum, seeing him to be incorrigible, was obliged to ship him off to India. It happened, however, as a rare exception, that his painting was by no means influenced by these miseries of his domestic life. His temper was sad and sombre. His paintings were always smiling and transparent. When he was at work no one was admitted into his studio, not even his brothers; as if he had desired, says his biographer, Deschamps, following Van Gool, to hide from all his method of prifying his colours, and making use of them. But, perhaps, we should believe that solitude was necessary to his disturbed spirit,—that Van Huysum, to paint his flowers, required tranquillity and silence, as Gerard Douw to paint his quiet interiors, did his readings of the Bible. His exquisite finish supposes, in fact, an attention which nothing had disturbed, an enthusiasm which no external accident had cooled. We must, therefore, attribute to something else besides vulgar quackery, or the littleness of egotism, the habit which the painter had of hiding himself from everybody when he was in presence of his flowers.

Vanderkamp, in the collection above quoted, has preserved some particulars of the domestic life of Van Huysum, which are worth recording. He differs, however, from other writers in stating that, although Catherine, the painter’s wife, was ten years older than himself when he married her, he was led to the match rather by affection than by interest. He became acquainted with her one morning at the market, when he was purchasing some rare and curious flower-roots, while she had come out to get provisions for her father’s family, which was by no means well off. He liked her appearance so much that he broke off a bargain, which he had nearly concluded, to follow her home. They talked together, and he almost immediately expressed a wish to marry her. She told him that she was free, but that for the present neither her father nor her mother could do without her assistance. “The matter may be arranged, however,” said Van Huysum, who calculated very sagaciously that a housewife would be rather a decrease than an increase to the expense of his establishment.

“Catherine,” says Vanderkamp, who was a contemporary and had, probably, often seen the lady herself, “though not remarkably beautiful, was an agreeable-looking, neat-handed person, and it was easy to understand the affection which a quiet man like Van Huysum experienced for her.”

They were married in due time, and during the early part of their union lived happily together. Catherine seems really to have been a virtuous person, though somewhat light-minded, and given to other society than that of her family. Having been somewhat neglected in her youth, she listened with pleasure to the compliments paid her by the fine people who came to look at her husband’s pictures, and as he often left her for days and even weeks, to shut himself up in his room, or wander through the country to study the beauties of nature, her ardent affection for him somewhat diminished. The very fact that many young men paid court to her proves that the common opinion of her want of fascinating qualities is erroneous. Among her admirers was a Frenchman of the name of Gervais, who used to express his passion by sending every day a large bouquet of flowers.

Catherine perfectly understood what was meant by this attention, and yet rewarded the sender by nothing more than a few gracious smiles, when he paraded up and down in the street before the house, smiling with that self-satisfied air which is peculiar to French roués. She was so far, indeed, from understanding the danger of what was going on, that instead of throwing away the flowers, she made a practice of giving them to her husband, saying, or leaving him to understand, that they were sent to him by his friends.

Generally speaking, he observed, simply, that the arrangement of the flowers was too formal. At other times he pulled the bouquet to pieces, and tried, by casting it loose into a vase, to give it a natural arrangement. This went on for some time, and at length M. Gervais, finding that his presents were always received, began to think himself entitled to an interview. He accordingly wrote to the painter’s wife and told her to meet him by the canal about sunset. To his first letter Catherine paid no attention; but as she had contracted habits of illiness, and often sat for many hours musing on the pleasures which the wives of less intellectual persons than her husband could freely indulge in, ill-luck would have it that the idea came to her, that if M. Gervais wrote again she ought to comply with his invitation, in order to tell him how very improper it was for him to pursue her in this way, and that she was determined to remain faithful to her excellent husband. The second letter came, of course full of protestations and entreaties; and Catherine, whose prudence seems to have been quite asleep, took the opportunity, whilst her husband was still shut up in his studio, to dress herself out in her best, in order to go and reprove the enterprising Monsieur Gervais.

he might probably have succeeded in leading her astray; but the boldness of his manners frightened her at the outset, and she understood of what an unpardonable imprudence she had been guilty. Gervais ever proposed that she should run away with him, but instead of that she ran away from him, and returning to her house shed bitter tears of repentance. Her husband, seeing her in this melancholy mood, sought to comfort her, and asked the reason of her grief; but she would not explain further than to say that she was a very bad woman, undeserving of his love. He laughed at this, and thought she had probably upset one of the valuable pots of varnish which had recently been sent to him as a present from Paris, and like a prudent man thought it best to say no more of the matter. His gentleness only made his wife more sorrowful, and indeed there was reason for her sorrow, though she did not know it, for from that time forth unhappiness and discord were introduced into the house.

Monsieur Gervais, furious at having been made a fool of, as he thought, determined to revenge himself, and meditated for some time how to carry his project into effect. He began by writing a third letter to poor Catherine, expressing his sorrow for his previous conduct, calling himself all the villains in the world, and begging her to grant him that forgiveness without which he said his life would be miserable. The good woman was delighted on receiving this communication, and consented easily to a request which it contained—that Gervais should be allowed to continue his presents of flowers as if nothing had happened. Every morning, accordingly, a magnificent bouquet was brought to the door, and Van Huysum used to say, smiling, "I see that our friends, whom I had thought had forgotten us, begin to remember us again." Whereupon Catherine, in her innocent joy, would take the flowers and place them in various lights, that he might admire them. Some time afterwards, Gervais met Van Huysum out in the fields, and coming to him said, in a very mysterious manner, "I hope you are happy."

"I hope so, too," replied Van Huysum, smiling, and stooping down to gather a remarkably fine blue-bell that grew at his feet. The French Iago laughed in a curious way, until he succeeded in attracting the painter's attention.

"What do you mean?" said the latter, rising up and looking inquisitively at him.

"I mean," replied Gervais, "that if that be the case, all the foolish stories that the people tell about your wife Catherine must be mere malicious inventions."

"And what do people say about my wife Catherine?" cried Van Huysum, beginning now to feel uneasy, and remembering the unexplained tears of his wife some short time before.

"Nothing particular," said Gervais.

"Nothing! People don't allude to 'nothing' in that extraordinary tone," exclaimed the painter.

"Why," said Gervais, "if I thought that the reports abroad were true, I would not repeat them to you; but as they are evidently mere calumnies, you ought to know them. They say that your wife is in correspondence with one of the Spaniards recently arrived in the suite of the Duke of Alva; and the most amusing part of the matter is, that he pretends to be a Frenchman, and has even assumed my name. I know that every morning he sends a nosegay of flowers to your house; but perhaps this may be by your permission; although some add that letters are concealed among the flowers."

On hearing these words, Van Huysum turned very pale, for he remembered that he had never thought of asking who it was that sent the presents of flowers, which he had received as intended for himself. He broke away from Gervais, and hastening home, shut himself up in his studio, and began to paint that celebrated picture of the deadly nightshade, which is the only one remaining of his that possesses a sombre character. We say remaining, because it was last heard of in the Louvre gallery in 1815, when it was claimed as stolen property by one of the petty princes of Germany. It is not mentioned, however, in any of the catalogues we have seen, and may have been destroyed, or, which is more probable, forms the ornament of some private cabinet. This, at least, is the account which is current in Paris. Probably M. Jeanron, the late able director of the Louvre gallery, and one of the most learned men in the history of painting in the present age, might be able to furnish some further particulars. He has paid great attention to the annals of Dutch painting; and no man would be more capable, if he felt disposed, of giving us an account of all that vast number of little-known painters who illustrated the period in which Van Huysum lived.

To return, however, to Vanderkamp's narrative of the domestic tribulations of our flower-painter. On the morning that succeeded his interview with Gervais, he watched carefully the arrival of the accustomed nosegay, and instead of allowing his wife to take it in her hands, seized it himself, and hurriedly saying that it contained a flower which he wished to copy, ran to his studio, and shutting himself in, tore it to pieces. Sure enough, there was a small piece of folded paper concealed amongst the stalks, containing these words, "Thank you, dearest, thank you; you shall hear again to-morrow."

This missive, signed "G.," naturally confirmed the dreadful suspicion which had agitated Van Huysum's mind. Instead, however, of going to his wife, and asking for an explanation, the unfortunate man determined to indulge his grief in silence; to create no scandal, and simply to watch the proceedings of Catherine with greater care.

This incident was the beginning of a long series of domestic unhappiness. Van Huysum was not able sometimes to restrain himself from making bitter allusions to Catherine's misconduct, and she, feeling that his accusations were in the main unjust, and forgetting what cause she had given to his upbraidings by a moment of imprudence, often answered with asperity, and terrible quarrels were the result. Van Huysum, by degrees, seemed to lose all self-guidance, except when his art was concerned. Among other things, he imagined that the son who bore his name, was not really his, and the rough treatment which this suspicion naturally caused may have partly contributed to drive the youth into bad company. At any rate, the whole town began soon to talk of his excesses, and it became necessary, in fact, to send him away. Gerard, the husband of Agatha, of whom we have already spoken, put him under the care of the supercargo of one of his ships. He went to India, as above stated, and seems, as he grew older, to have seen the error of his ways. At any rate, we find him about fifteen years afterwards established as a merchant at Batavia, where the name is still preserved in that of the firm of Dewink, Van Huysum, and Co. We do not know whether Van Huysum ever came to a proper explanation with his wife. The story of his quarrel with the master of the house in which he lived, according to Vanderkamp, was connected with a much more unfounded fit of jealousy than that suggested by the malice of Gervais. It appears that the landlord used sometimes to remonstrate with the painter on the violence of his language and conduct, and to praise the general good behaviour, and the decent demeanour of Catherine, who, at that time, might almost be called an elderly woman. Van Huysum imagined that there must be some improper reason for this interference, and once forgot himself so far as to strike the landlord in answer to some more than usually vehement remonstrance. This led to a terrible quarrel, at the end of which Van Huysum was driven from the house. It would seem, however, that he was not ultimately compelled to change his abode. Probably an explanation ensued; and there seems some slight reason to believe that in this explanation Catherine's conduct was in some measure cleared up, for the painter still continued to live with her, which it is not likely he would have done, if she had been anything more than the innocent cause of the sufferings he temporarily underwent.

However, his melancholy mood of mind still clung to him, and in the advanced years of his life he became more and more fond of retirement, more and more exclusively attached to his beloved flowers. Even when not occupied in painting them, he would sit for hours contemplating their beauties, and communing with them as if they were beings endowed with life. In the mad fits which occasionally came upon him, he would talk to his tulips and his anemones as if he believed that they were capable of understanding him and appreciating his feelings. Some pretended that this strange behaviour been a simple-minded man, rendered unhappy both by temperament and circumstances.

It has been asserted that Van Huysum was accessible to

was affected merely in order to attract attention; but Vanderkamp, who knew him at this period of life, denies that affectation was any part of his character, and represents him to have envy, a much more cruel and less easily avowed sentiment than jealousy; for envy is but a variety of hate, while jealousy is another form of love. The only pupil who was ever brought up by Van Huysum—we speak on the authority of Van Gool—was a lady of the name of Havermann, who almost rivalled her master. The Dutch historian informs received. He adds, that Van Huysum rejoiced at a circumstance that deprived him of a dangerous competitor. We may, however, very readily be led to infer, to the honour of us, that the young lady, dishonoured in the eyes of the world by impropriety of conduct, fled from her country and sought refuge in Paris, where she and her works were equally well our artist, that Van Gool speaks here only from supposition, when we find him in error as to the career of Mademoiselle Havermann. He informs us, that on her arrival in France

she was received by the Academy of Painting, which is not correct. It is scarcely likely that Van Gool should be more correct on one point than another. However this may be, Van Huysum allowed no trace of this bitterness of character to appear in his pictures. It may have been that he allowed something to peep out, but he expressed it symbolically and mysteriously in a language understood only by himself. He may have allowed the complaints of his wounded spirit to find vent sometimes in the bitter perfume of some wild flower, which he mingles with his garden favourites. Antiquity had set an example of these delicate allusions, and the celebrated flower-girl of Athens gave a meaning, and that a clear one, to every garland she wore. But whether Van Huysum sought or not to emulate Glycera must for ever remain a mystery. All we know is, that he threw his whole soul into his works.

We regret that Vanderkamp, usually so copious in his details, has not given us some distinct account of Van Huysum's female pupil. He does not mention the name of Mdlle. Havermann at all, but alludes, with considerable vagueness, to reports of some symptoms of envy exhibited by his favourite artist. He declares them to have been totally unfounded, and a little afterwards tells the story of a Miss Petermann for whom Van Huysum appears to have entertained a great affection. If, indeed, we did not know his character too well, we should imagine that he sought a refuge from the unhappiness produced by his jealousy in the society of this young lady, who was an artist like himself, though not his pupil.

Her favourite subjects, indeed, were the bright-coloured birds brought home by the Indian traders; but as she introduced frequently a few flowers as accessories, it is probable that her friend gave her some advice as to their composition and colouring. From the similarity of the names we should be disposed to think that the whole story of the envy of Van Huysum for Mdlle. Havermann was an invention of his enemies. Miss Petermann, according to Vanderkamp, some years after her intimacy with our painter had diminished, married without the consent of her parents, and left the country in order to avoid their displeasure. She settled in Paris and was no more heard of.

Haarlem was, in the seventeenth century, the city of flowers par excellence. It boasted of some of the finest gardens in the world. George Foster, one of the comrades of Captain Cook, thus speaks of the famous flower-garden of Haarlem:—"I can no longer deny that the winds scatter perfumes from Araby the Blest to the very ocean; for through the balmy atmosphere we could distinguish the balsamic odour of the hyacinth and other flowers." We all know the fabulous prices paid by certain Dutch amateurs for flowers, and particularly for certain varieties of the tulip. At the time when Van Huysum lived, certain squares of tulips were priced at six and eight hundred pounds. A passionate admirer of this plant, one day, in default of money, gave cattle and goods to the value of 2,500 florins (about £250). The proud owners of these rarities were the men who delighted to open to Van Huysum their marvellous conservatories, their incomparable gardens. Woerhelm is quoted as owing a portion of his great celebrity as a gardener to his extreme hospitality, and the friendship which existed between him and the painter. Our artist, then, had only to select the most lovely amid all that was lovely; and every one will at once appreciate the immense advantage he enjoyed in having before his eyes on all occasions the most perfect and choice examples.

By dint of constant contemplation, Van Huysum appears to have discovered in flowers every aspect of insect life; but as he has taken care to make details always subordinate to the triumph of his bouquet, it is only by careful examination that we discover those little insects which surround the rose with a shining, singing, buzzing escort. The queen of flowers, however, is not the only one that rejoices in a court; the narcissus, the forget-me-not, the honeysuckle, receive within their calix the honey-bee; the Spanish jacinth has its parasites, and the more insignificant bell-flower has its winged ants and other satellites. The insects of our friend Van Huysum are almost as numerous as the flies which visit the strawberry-bed of Bernadin de St. Pierre. "They were," says the latter, "distinguished one from the other by their colour, their shape, and their movements. There were some of golden, some of silver, some of bronze tint, some were spotted, some streaked, some blue, some green, some dark, some clear. Some had heads round like a turban, others long like the point of a nail; to some they looked like a point of black velvet, others they dazzled, as if they had been rubies." Such is this little world, and Van Huysum has given it life with as delicate a pencil as the pen of the poet. But he is not satisfied to raise a fly with its gauze wings on the clear ground of an apricot or other fruit; he further observes and studies, to enrich his work, the snail which crawls under the leaf of a raspberry-bush, the butterfly which flies around his vase, and the bright beetles, with their gold and copper hues. If we examine these beautiful bouquets, engraved by Eardom in mezzotint, we see admirably represented an insect which crawls timidly on a gooseberry branch, which serves as a junction between two peaches, like a bridge between two mountains upon a precipice. We often see the bullfinch making its nest at the feet of the bouquets of Van Huysum, and beside his little gray-spotted eggs are to be seen numerous rose-buds. Birds and flowers are about to burst forth together. Even to the very dew-drop is the painter accurate and admirable. He paints this little accessory with life in all its fresh transparency, and there stand trembling on a bunch of grapes, fresh, cool, and humid, in the pictures of Van Huysum, those liquid pearls which live but a fitful hour.

This may be a proper place to say a few words of mezzotint, alluded to above. Some writers have indicated, as the inventor of mezzotint engraving, the Prince Palatine Robert Rupert of Bavaria, nephew of Charles I. Others say that this prince was let into the secret by Louis de Siegen, an officer in the service of Hesse-Cassel, whose first work, published in 1643, was a bust of the Landgravine Amelia Elizabeth. The prince communicated the secret of De Siegen to Walleran Vaillant, a Flemish painter, and it was divulged by the indiscretion of some workmen. We shall return to this point.

It is generally known in what mezzotint differs from line engraving and aquatint. Instead of the engraver in aquatint and line using his point to form the dashes and the shades upon a polished plate which represents the lights, the engraver in mezzotint uses a particular instrument to produce the lights upon a granulated plate which represents the shadow. In other words, he spreads black on a white surface; the other distributes white on a black surface. The graining of the plate on which the engraver operates in mezzotint is obtained by means of a tool called a cradle. This tool, of a circular form, is armed with little, all-but-imperceptible teeth; it is moved over the surface of the plate in every way, so that the copper is covered with little, asperities, which form the grains of which we speak. If the copper-plate thus prepared is placed in the press, there results a proof of a velvety black and of a perfectly even tint. This uniform black, obtained by a merely mechanical process, is the basis of the artist's work. After having traced his drawing, the engraver makes his lights and half-lights, wearing away the grain more or less with the scraper. These lights, the half-tints and the black furnished by the upper grain, compose the effect of chiaro-oscuro, which is necessary to produce the desired effect. The labour of the engraver in mezzotint consists not exactly in engraving the copper, but in destroying artistically what the workman has engraved with the cradle.

Mezzotint is more fit than any other style to represent phantoms, enchantments, artificial lights, like that of a lamp, a torch, fire—in a word, all kinds of night effects. Laresse also declares that this process is the best by which to render the effect of plants, fruits, flowers, vases of gold, silver, and crystal, armour, etc. But this is somewhat of an erroneous opinion, and is surprising in one who was himself so able in mezzotint. Fruits, flowers, precious vases, and armour—all objects distinguished by the rich variety of their substances, and which present such divers aspects—are much better expressed in line engraving than in mezzotint. This is so true, that classical science has found a thousand ingenious ways of cutting copper to characterise each of those objects, and to have them recognised at the first glance—metallic and reflective bodies, as well as the satin surface of a flower, or its thorny stalk; the skin of an apricot, as well as the rough coat of a melon, or the tough skin of a pomegranate. While the one can easily represent the soft petals of the tulip, or the ruddy peach, mezzotint has not a grain to render all the other varied tints with energy and native softness.

The fact is, mezzotint, with its deep shades, its union of masses, and its bold demi-tints, suits fantastic subjects, subjects of sombre poetry, so familiar to the genius of Rembrandt; it is suited to moonlights by the melancholy Elzheimer, or night-scenes as understood by Schalhalm and Gerard Douw. Certainly, if this style of engraving does not imitate solid bodies effectually, and render the apparent character of their substances, it is admirably adapted to the representation of rich hangings, of satins and velvets, and even of flesh; for the mezzotint engraver has not to fear that shiny effect which often renders the naked form unnatural in other engravings. In the reproduction of colours, this process easily gives almost inexpressible demi-tints, which made the Italians call the style mezzo-tinto, a name we have adopted instead of the maniere miroir of the French. But still it must be confessed, that if mezzotint colours a scene more broadly and more naturally, it is not so easy to render in it the finer elements of the art. It offers less scope to the genius and power of the artist.

Another defect of this style is, that it does not last, that the plate soon wears out when in the press. William Gilpin says himself that you cannot obtain more than one hundred good proofs in mezzotint, the rubbing of the hand, and the press, having soon worn out work that has scarcely penetrated beyond the surface of the copper. "Nevertheless," says this writer, "if you constantly repair the plate, it may give four or five hundred proofs of a very tolerable character. The best impressions are not always the first; these are too black and too crude; the good ones begin from the fortieth to the sixtieth."

By a singular contradiction in the usual order of things, it happens that mezzotint produced its best results in the early days of the discovery, so that the first engraver in mezzotint was the ablest and the most justly celebrated. On this point many writers have disagreed with the canon of Salisbury, who asserts that this art has gone on progressing with the age, and who says that the masters of the eighteenth century are very far superior to the contemporaries of Prince Rupert. Even the very existence of pictures executed by Rupert is denied by Gilpin, who says distinctly, "As for the works of Prince Rupert, I know those that are positively proved to be by him; and those which are given out as his are executed in a hard, black, coarse, disagreeable style, which the masters who succeeded him imitated." This is an error to be regretted in a man of such eminence as Gilpin. A very eminent and graceful critic says, "In the first place, it is certain that the prince did engrave; and what more convincing proof can I give of this fact, than that his arms are attached, by way of signature, to the works he has executed, especially to that admirable picture of the Executioner who holds up the head of St. John, an engraving after Rebeira." These arms are found on the plate when it has been reduced, and nothing but the bust of the executioner remains. To such a decisive proof need we add the testimony of Bason?

But without entering into a long analytical inquiry into the questions raised by Gilpin, we can by no means agree that the engravings are executed in the harsh, black, and disagreeable style which is ascribed to them by Gilpin. On the contrary, the full length piece representing the "Executioner" appears to us to be a masterpiece in mezzotint; especially, if we examine it in fine proofs, such as are sometimes found in England, generally very superior to those found in the National Library of Paris, in the valuable and inexhaustible print department. In fact, it is from this very production that we can judge what the full force of mezzotint is, when in the hand of a master who knows how to remove its crudity, and to correct its natural difficulties by the boldness of his lights and shades, the suddenness of his transitions, and the proper use of his scraper. Thus treated, the engraving in mezzotint is a true picture, because to the tranquillity produced by broad and well-defined shadows it unites free and lively touches, masculine relief, and dashing touches which belong only to painters. These admirable attempts are difficult to reach in ordinary engraving, because the hand only touches the black, and is compelled to be chary of lights, instead of applying them with resolution and vigour, as you can in mezzotint, by energetic strokes and the careful use of the scraper. In other words, in ordinary engraving the whites are negative, and all the energy is in the shadows. In mezzotint, energy can as well be found in the touch of the deeper scratched lights as in the shadows, where softness is increased by aquatint.

"The character of Prince Rupert," says a somewhat partial historian, "is pictured fully in this fine engraving of the 'Executioner holding the head of St. John,' as boldly dashed off, as proud as the picture of the Espagnolet." In the midst of a refined court, as Horace Walpole says, Rupert looked like a rude artisan; but let us rather copy the portrait traced by the Tory Hamilton, and which Walpole himself cannot help quoting. "He was brave and valiant to a fault. His mind was subject to certain errors he would have been sorry to correct. His mind had been fertilised by experiments in mathematics, and by some study in chemistry. He was polite to excess when it was not required, while he was proud and even insolent when he should have been civil. He was tall and had a truculent look. His face was dry and hard when even he tried to soften its expression; when he was ill-humoured he looked like a demon."

Such was the man who rested from the fatigues of Naseby and Marston Moor, and from acts more than questionable; who fled from the fatigue of courts by giving himself up to an art of which he only knew the rudiments, and yet which he carried to perfection. If he really was the inventor of the mezzotint, as Horace Walpole affirms, it is curious to know how, according to this author, Rupert was brought to this discovery.

"Let us take the prince in his workshop," says Walpole, "covered with dirt, ill combed, and perhaps with a dirty shirt. On the day of which I speak, he certainly was not shaved and powdered to pay his court to Miss Hughes; for I speak of the time when he was living in retirement at Brussels, after his uncle's final catastrophe. Going out that day early in the morning, he remarked a sentry, who, at a certain distance from his post, was doing something to his gun.

"What are you doing?" said the prince.

"The soldier replied, that the dew which had fallen during the night had rusted his gun, and that he was scraping and cleaning it.

"The prince approached, and, examining it nearer, thought he saw something like a figure on the barrel, with innumerable little holes close to each other, like a damask work in silver or gold, and of which the soldier had engraven a part. Every one knows what an ordinary officer would have done in a similar case. If he had been a simple sprig of fashion, he would have scolded the young fellow and given him a shilling; but the 'genius fertile in experience,' drew from this simple accident the idea of mezzotint. From what he had seen, the prince concluded that the means were to be found of covering a plate of copper with a grain composed of fine asperities which would give, on being printed, a black proof; and that on scratching different parts, more or less, demi-tints and lights would be produced. He communicated this idea immediately to the painter Walleran Vaillant, and they set to work together. After numerous experiments, they invented a steel roller with teeth like a rasp, which produced a grain on the copper, that is to say, the black background they were in search of; and on this background, scratched or rubbed at will, they easily found every gradation of light."

Such is Walpole's version. According to this it appears that Rupert invented mezzotint at the time he was living in retirement at Brussels: that is to say, after the death of Charles I., and consequently after the year 1649. But we have seen before, that already an officer in the service of Hesse-Cassel had published a mezzotint representing the portrait of the Landgravine Amelia Elizabeth, which picture bears the date of 1643. It is impossible, then, to admit that Rupert was the inventor of a process which a Bavarian officer found before him, unless we suppose, which is unlikely, that the prince knew nothing of the discovery of Louis of Siegen.

In France, mezzotint has never been a favourite style, either with painters or with the public. In England, however, it has been very popular, and many could be named who have given lustre and vogue to the style.

Van Huysum painted many flowers in water-colours, and they are his best, and those which at the present day fetch the largest sums, not only because of their rarity,

FLOWERS AND FRUIT, FROM A PAINTING BY VAN HUYSUM

Horace Walpole, who in this instance simply put in order the manuscript of Virtue, assures us that he had the story from Killigrew, who had it from the painter Evelyn. It is, however, well known that other writers have attributed the discovery to Sir Christopher Wren, who communicated it to Prince Rupert. However this may be, this style of engraving has many advantages. Independently of the poetry which it lends to many subjects, mezzotint offers a more expeditious method, and on this point the painter Gerard de Laïresse tells us that he prepared in an hour, while walking in his garden, but also because they so admirably represent the freshness and beauty of nature. As to his paintings in oil, they have all the qualities of a solid water-colour, and the faults of a painting on porcelain, fine and tempered, but slightly defective. They seem as if they were painted with water-colours on panels prepared with glue, and finished up in oil. The colours, still brilliant and unchangeable, show the extreme care he took to purify and to select them.

The landscapes of Van Huysum are highly esteemed by the Dutch, and they have been known to pay as dear for them as even for his flowers. And yet these landscapes, to speak frankly, are but copies of Guaspere, imitations of Glauber, reminiscences of Poussin and Claude. Van Huysum lived at a time when the Dutch school was reverting to the foreign style. The naïve lovers of nature, the Karel, the Van der Velde, the Paul Potters, even Ruysdael—those great painters to whom the sight of a shady hut, the humblest rill, and a few houses, sufficed to inspire a masterpiece—gave way to landscape-painters influenced by historical pre-occupations. The great Gerard de Lairesse, a learned master, "too literary to be a painter of the first order," had introduced into the

had to be rendered, produced, in these instances, insipid and cold pictures, which, despite all his talent, had neither the picturesque style of Berghem, nor the sylvan charm of Ruysdael, nor the grandeur of Guaspere and Gonsels. The only reason why the Dutch are so proud of a landscape of Van Huysum is, that their very rarity makes them precious and rarity is often more coveted than genius.

We must then, after all, come back to the bouquets of Van Huysum; and it really should suffice for an artist to be the greatest of flower-painters in his school, as great, indeed, as any. Even in fruits we must not wholly absolve him from simple pasturages of Holland the nymphs and demigods of Poussin. Ancient dryads came to visit the groves where before had only wandered the buxom and short-petticoated farmers' wives of Berghem. But this bastard classicity could never inspire the same enthusiasm, and win the same success, as the productions which emanated from the simple impressions of the masters. The natural consequence of his composing his landscapes merely from the study of old engravings (and he certainly knew nothing of the countries he attempted to paint) became evident. Van Huysum, who was so admirable, so warm, so exquisite, when a leaf or a flower having been unsuccessful. Some of them resemble wax, and assume the polish of ivory. We must confess, in fact, that in this department of his art, Van Huysum is below David de Heem. His peaches are too firm, his pines have "not a thirsty look," and his grapes are wanting in maturity, in golden hue, and in sunny warmth. He succeeds better in bunches of red currants, and the inside of pomegranates, divided by membranous skins into little red lodges full of pips; sparkling rubies, which rejoice the sight, and seem as it were to slake the thirst.

Whether his subject was fruits or flowers, and he was very fond of mixing them up), Van Huysum liked to paint his pictures on light grounds; and these are the favourites with amateurs. "There is no colour," says Lairese, "which does not look well upon white, though really the most sombre then look best." By keeping his background slightly gray, Van Huysum could easily display clear flowers there with vigorous tone; and he had, moreover, this advantage, that this neutral ground, being less luminous, gave a reflection to the dark models which were projected upon it.

Van Huysum had three brothers, who were distinguished in painting: Justus, who died at twenty-two, and who painted large and small battle-pieces with astonishing facility, and without models, with great genius and taste. Jacob, who died in London, used to copy the works of his brother so as to deceive even a practised eye. He also designed pictures himself, after nature, which are much esteemed. The third, named John, lived still in 1773, in the year that Deschamps published the fourth volume of the "Lives of Painters." Van Huysum died on the 8th of February, 1749, leaving three children; and though he received, during his lifetime, considerable sums of money for his pictures, he died poor.

"The high price of Van Huysum's pictures," says a French critic, "is accounted for in several ways. In the first place, their finish is exquisite, and it is a circumstance worth remarking, that amateurs pay according to the labour which a picture seems to have cost; then to their beauty, for it is certain that, in the special instance of flowers, Van Huysum never had a rival; in fine, to their rarity, for in all Europe we can scarcely find a hundred pictures altogether." The painter himself sold them at a high rate, and his principal purchasers, therefore, were such men as the Count de Merville, the Duke of Orleans, the Elector of Saxony, the Prince of Hesse Cassel, the King of Poland, the King of Prussia, the Elector Palatine, and the Stadtholder.

The Museum of the Louvre possesses some of the finest of Van Huysums known to the world. They consist of landscapes, flowers, fruits, &c.; some rated as high as £480. Smith says:—"He attained to as high a degree of perfection in painting fruit and flowers as is likely that science will attain. His best works defy imitation; but there are skilful copies in existence, which closely resemble his works. His imitators were his brother Jacob Van Huysum, who devoted his time to study and copying his brother's pictures, in which he became very skilful. He died in London, 1746. He lived for some time with Lord Orford, and painted a number of pictures for him. Another was Herman Van der Myn, born at Amsterdam, 1684. He studied under Ernest Steven, and being attracted by the beauty of Van Huysum, began to copy him, succeeded well, and none have arrived at considerable eminence in this branch of art, but became anxious to distinguish himself in others—painted distance and portrait subjects; but was not prudent, and died in London, in poverty, 1741."

John Van Os, father and son, studied Van Huysum; the younger produced some brilliant pictures; two of them are in the Royal Museum at the Hague. His other imitators were Wybrand Hendricks, Herman Van Brussel, and John Linthorst.

The Marquis of Westminster has a fine picture, worth £260. It is a rich assemblage of fruit, consisting of purple and white grapes, a cut melon, peaches, plums, apricots, an open pomegranate, a bunch of filberts, a cracked walnut, currants, and raspberries, some of which are disposed in a basket, and the whole skilfully grouped on a marble table, mingled with a few flowers, consisting of the cock's-comb, the hollyhock, and the convolvulus. This picture gives evidence of a master hand in every detail; the effect of the whole is most exquisite.

In the Amsterdam Museum is a picture representing an elegant group of flowers, composed of roses, hyacinths, auriculas, anemones, disposed in a vase adorned with boys playing with a goat, placed on a marble slab, on which are a bird's nest with four eggs, and a peony, some blue-bells, and a rose. Dated 1726, painted on a light ground.

There is another representing a fine collection of fruit, consisting of grapes, peaches, plums, apples, &c., and a vine branch and a sprig with raspberries on it, interspersed with a few flowers and insects.

In the Louvre is a very fine work—"A quantity of Fruit," piled indiscriminately on a marble table, consisting of grapes, peaches, and plums, amongst which are mingled an African marigold, hyacinths, and a cock's-comb. A basket of apricots is also on the table. It is on a light ground.

Another represents "A quantity of fine Fruit," consisting of melons, peaches, grapes, and plums, interspersed with flowers—white poppies, cock's-combs, and convolvuluses, grouped on a marble slab. In the background is a terra-cotta vase, adorned with Cupids.

In the Royal Gallery of Dresden is "A group of Flowers," consisting of red and white roses, irises, tulips, &c., tastefully arranged in a vase, standing on a marble slab, on which lies a chaffinch's nest with three eggs.

In the Royal Hermitage of St. Petersburg is the representation of "A beautiful Vase, embossed with Cupids," standing on a marble table, containing a rich assemblage of flowers, consisting of white, red, and yellow roses, auriculas, anemones, poppies, African marigolds, &c., upon the table. At the foot of the vase are a chaffinch's nest containing four eggs, a sprig of nasturtiums, and a full-blown rose. The background represents a park scene. Signed and dated 1722.

The companion to this is "A choice selection of Fruit," disposed in the most skilful manner on a marble table, amongst which may be enumerated clusters of grapes of different kinds, peaches, pomegranates, apricots, and plums; with these are tastefully mingled the white poppy, the scarlet lychnis, and the marigold. A bunch of red currants, a cracked walnut, and another in its shell, lie on the front of the table; and at the extremity of the group stands a handsome vase, adorned with nymphs, in which are a hollyhock, a rose, and other flowers.

"LA RENAISSANCE" (REVIVAL OF ART).

"LA RENAISSANCE" is a term which is now exclusively applied to the revival of art, the return to Greek and Roman ideas of beauty as displayed in the ancient statues, and the general diffusion of better taste in matters of art, which took place in the fifteenth century. It was in Italy, that mother and nurse of modern art, that this movement took its rise. It must not, however, be supposed that there were no painters there during the dark ages; not only history, but pictures still extant, testify to the contrary; but they were hardly worthy of the name of artists. None of them were scholars, and they followed their calling rather as a trade than as a profession. Their art was a sort of stupid mechanism stupidly followed, in which nature was not even imitated, but distorted. This state of things continued till the middle of the thirteenth century; and the first symptoms of a change appeared in the marked improvement of sculpture amongst the Tuscans. Byzantine rules had hitherto completely enchained the Italian artists, but they now turned from the works of the modern Greeks to those of their ancestors. There was in Italy a very good collection of ancient statuary, but it was not until now that they began to be studied. Niccola Pisano took the lead in this great work, and in various works, particularly bas-reliefs on the outsides of vessels and ornaments, showed the Italian artist how much still remained to be achieved. His associate, Andrea Pisano, was the founder of that great school which produced Oragna, Donatello, and the celebrated Ghiberti, the maker of the Florentine gates, which Michael Angelo pronounced worthy of forming the entrance to Paradise. The improvement of sculpture was followed by that in mosaic, the school of which has existed in Rome so early as the eleventh and twelfth centuries; but for want of specimens for study, painting long remained in a more incomplete state than either of the foregoing branches of art. The revival in painting is due to Florence, and the genius which presided over it was Cimabue. He appears to have learnt the art from some Greeks who had been invited to Florence, and painted in the chapel S. Maria Novella. The essential and fundamental principle of the Greek art, however, was a fixed and unalterable adherence to established rules, so that, every artist copying his master, no change, and consequently no improvement, could ever be effected. Cimabue, however, like most other Italian artists, got the better of his Greek education, threw off the yoke, and went straight to nature for instruction. "But his talent," says Lanzi, "did not consist in the graceful. His Madonnas have no beauty; his angels in the same piece have all the same form. Wild as the age in which he lived, he succeeded admirably in heads full of character, especially in those of old men, impressing an indescribable degree of bold sublimity, which the moderns have not been able greatly to surpass. Vast and inventive in conception, he executed large compositions, and expressed them in grand proportions."

Giotto made another step in advance, by giving greater chasteness to symmetry, more pleasing effect to design, and greater softness to colouring. The meagre hands, the sharp-pointed feet, and staring eyes of the Greek style all disappeared under him. This gradual transition was due wholly to the study of the antique. It was to this that many of the greatest geniuses of Italy owed their development. In 1349 we find the Florentine painters, who had now become a numerous body, forming themselves into a fraternity, which they styled the Society of St. Luke. Many similar ones were formed in other parts of Italy, particularly at Venice and Bologna. These associations, however, did not include painters alone, but were open to all who worked at the various trades requiring most skill and dexterity. Painting was not yet looked upon in the light of a liberal profession, but still the esprit de corps was growing up amongst those who practised it. Giotto's discovery of oil-painting, towards the middle of the fifteenth century, was the crowning step in advance. The rest was left to genius; and how nobly genius did its part, it is not necessary here to relate. The beginning of the sixteenth century was styled the Golden Age of Art, though much remained to be achieved.

It was not, however, until the appearance of Leonardo da Vinci and Michael Angelo that the Renaissance made its way beyond the Alps, and spread its blessings over France and the north of Europe generally. These great men belonged to what is called the Florentine school—a school which, though wanting in power of relief in drapery, in beauty, in grouping, as well as in many other points, yet always excelled in design. Da Vinci and Michael Angelo were its two great masters, and when they appeared they inaugurated a new era by pointing out the immutable characteristics and established laws of nature, thence deducing rules which their successors have since followed with great effect both at home and abroad. The history of the former of "these grand old masters" is a series of triumphs of the highest order, in which art seemed almost to have attained to perfection. We all remember the pleasing story which illustrates so strikingly the splendour of the ideal to which he strove to attain, and the indomitable patience with which he laboured in pursuit of the great object of his ambition. He laboured for four years at a portrait of a Florentine lady named Mona Lisa, but was never able to complete it to his own satisfaction, and at last relinquished the attempt in despair. Francis I. of France saw at Milan one of the finest of his works, "The Last Supper," and endeavoured in vain to saw it from the wall. Failing in this, he invited the artist, now in his sixty-third year, to accompany him to Paris. Da Vinci complied, and although he no longer continued to follow his calling, his presence in the French capital gave an impulse to French art, to which it is indebted for all its subsequent successes.

It is owing to this circumstance that a French artist, M. Landelle, in a painting, representing the Renaissance under a symbolical form, which he has this year exhibited at the Louvre, and an engraving of which we here supply, places him in so prominent a position amongst the authors and promoters of the Renaissance. This picture, which is to form part of the new decorations of the Louvre, contains several exaggerations and peculiarities of a former age. The artist has introduced into it all the characteristics of the sculpture, as well as of many of the paintings of the sixteenth century; the slender eyebrows, removed far from the pupils; the high forehead, the elegant, but almost disdainful features, all remind us of the proud beauties of the French court at that period. The length of the arms, legs, and fingers, and various other details, belong to a type well known to those who are familiar with the different schools and different epochs in the history of French and Italian art. These proportions, no doubt, give a certain air of nobility to the figure, but many of the artists of the Renaissance have exaggerated them, and M. Landelle has intentionally copied this exaggeration, in order to indicate the taste of the period, and give an appearance of chronological accuracy to his work. If we suppose the woman in this painting to stand up, it will be found that the different parts of her body are not in the proportion laid down by rule; for instance, her length will be greater than ten heads. But we must not characterise this as a fault, because it is in reality an historical trait. It was thus the artists of the time drew their women, as may be seen by an examination of any of their works in the palace at Fontainebleau. The huge mass of drapery is another characteristic also, which shows that the artist has been careful to avoid all appearance of anachronism, and the figure generally is distinguished by the dignity of the attitude, the elegance of the features, and the fineness of the outline.

At her feet are two little cherubs; one, resting on a medalion of Francis I., the great patron of the arts in France, raises his head, and contemplates the Renaissance apparently with unmixed satisfaction. This is the genius of the approaching good time, full of faith and hope, and gladly hailing the transformation then taking place in the arts. The child's head displays great feeling and power of thought and observation. Infantine simplicity and artlessness together with the intellect and forethought of a more advanced age breathe from every feature. The other cherub reclines in a sorrowing attitude, and with a very sad expression of countenance, against a beautiful enamelled vase. Though the character is not here so well marked as in the other figure, it is not difficult to perceive that this symbolises middle-age art,—Christian inspiration mourning over the triumph of pagan art and Graeco-Roman traditions.

There is one man in England, however, whose dicta in matters of art are yearly acquiring additional force and authority, because he supports them by eloquence of passing brilliancy, by all the weight of personal conviction of no ordinary depth and fervour, and by a passionate devotion to the subject on which he writes—we need hardly say we mean Mr. Ruskin—who looks upon the Renaissance as an unmitigated calamity. Short as is the space in which we are compelled to notice the subject, in connexion with a work of art which has attracted considerable attention in the French capital, it would be unpardonable to pass from it without alluding to the views propounded regarding it by one whose study of it has been so profound. In his recently published work, "The Stones of Venice," treating of the various kinds of architecture which adorn the "City of the Sea," he bestows almost unmixed praise upon those of the two first periods, the Byzantine and the Gothic, and almost unmixed censure upon that of the latest—or, in other words, upon the architecture of the Renaissance; and to it, also, he assigns all the unsightliness and deformity which meet our view in modern houses and public edifices. He draws glowing pictures of the contrast between the rich quaint picturesqueness of the streets in Nuremberg and other old mediæval towns of the Continent, and the bald flimsiness of our present streets and squares. The fact is by everybody admitted, though there is a wide difference of opinion as to the cause; but on this we cannot dwell. As to the difference in the spirit which animated morality, began to lose sight of Christ, and fix their thoughts more on themselves, and consequently to analyse instead of believing. It is a return to that early subservience of art to simple and undivided faith and undoubting hope—to make it a veritable form of worship, and not merely a source of amuseearly Christian art, and that of the Renaissance, his statements, though not so lengthy, are certainly clearer; and according to him, the Renaissance owed its origin to the revived study of the ancient classics, of the works of the heathen philosophers. The Christians, by imbibing pagan ment for dilettanti and connoisseurs—that Mr. Ruskin professes to aim at. Judging from the wide difference in the morale of France and England, we suspect his views will make little way in the former country. The spirit of pure devotion is not there racy of the soil.

ADRIAN VAN OSTADE.

PAINTING is a sort of freemasonry, which has its mysteries and its gradations. Certain men of the world, from the mere influence of their love of art, have acquired a vague and rudimentary notion of it; have learnt a few proper names, and some historical facts, without connexion and without continuation. They know just enough of it to make many throw a great light upon the æsthetic or historical parts which they have preferred to explore: this is the second degree of initiation. Some, finally, have resolved to unite the pleasure of the love of painting with the pleasure of making it a study. They have dug deeply into the matter. By dint of seeing and comparing, by dint of sagacity, attention, and love, they have found the cause of their emotions; and in ascertaining this by an analytic process, they have discovered the great principles which compose all the poetry of the art: these are of the highest grade. These alone can appreciate Adrian Van Ostade, one of the most profound masters, the most learned and the most original who has existed since Rembrandt.

Adrian Van Ostade belongs to that generation of painters who, in the seventeenth century, left Germany, their country, in order to settle in the Low Countries. Holland, peopled with amateurs, and filled with picture-galleries, was at this epoch a sort of Italy of the north, which attracted by turns Adrian and Isaae Ostade, Backhuysen, Lingelback, Gaspar Netscher, all originally from Germany. Adrian was born at Lubeck,* in 1610. We are ignorant of his family; and mistakes; but they are already in the first stage, for it is no small thing to speak of art, even with some blundering. Others have multiplied and generalised their knowledge; they have attempted to form arbitrary inductions; they have created for themselves a mode of seeing founded upon first impressions; they have taken their temperament for a judge. These rank among amateurs: their province is to

* Born at Lubeck, Adrian Van Ostade would be classed, legally and geographically speaking, among the painters of the German school, as well as the other artists whose names we have cited. It is well here, for the pretensions of some writers, such as Huber and Brulliot, that their nationality renders them little suspected. Deschamps eludes the question by comprising, without saying a word on the subject, Adrian Van Ostade in the generic title of his work—"The Lives of the Flemish, German, and Dutch Painters." Dargenville himself is not undecided; he classes the two Ostades with Albert Durer, and Holbein among the German painters; as he also ranks Petilot, the famous miniature-painter on enamel, well known by his portraits of the women of the court of Louis XIV., among the Swiss artists. Bartsch, on the contrary, preserving a prudent silence upon the question, as became a wise German, describes the works of Ostade in his first volume of the Pinco graveur, consecrated to the Dutch school. Amateurs have scarcely anything is known of this skilful master, as of so many others. Who, then, was occupied at this time in collecting the materials for a history of painting? Strange, truly, that an art so charming has not found among so many admirers one serious, interesting historian, worthy of some attention. The life of Adrian Van Ostade only commences for us at the moment when we meet him at Haarlem, in the studio of François Hals, called Franck Hals. This was a bold, vigorous painter, of free manner, and strong colouring. He represented the Flemish traditions; he even went beyond them, to such an extreme, that Vandyck advised more wisdom and moderation. Adrian, on the contrary, was by his nature, and in spite of his origin, a true Hollander. He was so as much in his exterior physiognomy as in his genius. His grave appearance, the benevolence and simplicity of his countenance, declared the purity of his soul and the regularity of his life; the precise arrangement of his pictures, and the precious finish of their execution, speak of the conscience of the artist, his scrupulous care, his patience.

But why attempt a portrait of Van Ostade, after that which he has so marvellously painted of himself in the celebrated picture which is in the Louvre, where he is represented with his numerous children? The genius of Holland is wholly here, —family feeling, tranquillity of mind, interior life, rigid, and simple. And here the method of the painter exactly corresponds to the thought of the picture. Ostade, his wife, and eight children, are here disposed in a large space softly lighted, the furniture of which consists solely of an avenue of columns; the tone of the walls is of a fine gray, mingling a little with the green, which serves as a basis to the harmony of the picture. Upon this agreeable tint stand out the white necks and black vestments of all the members of the family. The girls and the boys, the youngest about eight years of age, have the flat features, the rounded nose, the projecting chin, and the sharp eye. They resemble their parents, as becomes well-born children, and are equally remarkable for the uniformity of their ugliness and of their costume. All the heads are uncovered, with the exception of that of Van Ostade, the father, who wears his hat as the king of this race, upon whom he looks with paternal regard. The house is neat and simple, nothing is seen upon the waxed inlaid floor but two or three flowers, fallen perhaps from the bouquet which the children have come to offer to their father; for by the expressions of the faces, the Sunday dresses and correct deportment, it may be imagined that it is, a fête day with the family, a domestic and friendly fête. The drawing is sober, the light softened. There is no coquetry in the choice of the tones; scarcely is the monotony of the black drapery interrupted here and there by tobacco-coloured petticoats, or by trowsers of a hazel tone; the contrast of the black and white at first appears abrupt, but it is conceived on a scale so skilfully tempered, that it enlivens the picture without being glaring, and arrests the attention without offending the eye. It is a charming composition, which breathes tranquil emotion, the peaceful felicity of a united family, from the father who holds in his hand that of his wife, to the youngest child, who offers cherries to its little sister!

As soon as the very name of Van Ostade is mentioned, it brings some masterpiece to memory. Before he had arrived at this degree of perfection, the young Adrian had long worked with his master Hals. Wise and industrious, he was not seduced, as many others have been, by the love of travel. Italy, whose name alone then excited the artists of all nations, as formerly the name of Jerusalem had fascinated whole nations, Italy had seen only Rembrandt. In the studio of Franck Hals, Ostade formed a friendship with Brauwer, who was also called Adrian, and who had already, without being aware of it, sufficient talent to be made by his master the gut short all these uncertainties, and, without regard to questions which concern the art less than the custom-house, they have declared the two Ostades, Backhuysen, Lingelbach, Gaspard Netscher, and some others, to be Dutch in style and talent; and in the fulness of their assumed authority have classed these eminent artists among the painters of that school.

Franck Hals was avaricious, and his wife so well seconded his views, that the unhappy Brauwer, who was retained in prison, worked on his master's account, painted charming pictures, and received scarcely sufficient food. Ostade, who witnessed this shameful treatment, showed Brauwer that he was sufficiently skilful as a painter, and advised him to take flight. Brauwer followed this advice and fled—by the door of celebrity. Leaving, in his turn, the studio of Hals, Adrian Van Ostade devoted some time to discover his own style. First he attempted to imitate Rembrandt, to whom François Hals occasionally bore some resemblance,* but in the triviality of this great master—we speak of Rembrandt—there was a sublimity, an incomparable poetry, far beyond the humble genius of Van Ostade. He then turned to Teniers, whose nature and talents he better comprehended, and who, besides, although of the same age as Ostade, had preceded him in painting village scenery. Brauwer, who had become a master, found his old comrade in the midst of these perplexities; and quickly proved to him that Rembrandt was imitable, and that, after all, the name of Ostade was worth as much as Teniers'. The friend of Brauwer then resolutely took his own stand, although he still retained something of his first tendencies. In abandoning Teniers and Rembrandt he preserved the impression he had received from the genius of the two masters, and became what Adrian Van Ostade is to us, a familiar Rembrandt and a serious Teniers.

The large and fine city of Haarlem, which holds the second place among the cities of Holland, offered to Van Ostade all that could please his taste for comfort, regularity, and employment. At some distance he could find in the large villages of Hemstedt, Sparenwou, or Tetrode, studies of the rustic manners of which he so often reproduced the picture. The beer of Haarlem was in great repute throughout all Friesland and the country of Drente; the drinkers and the smokers, the other models so familiar to the pencil of Ostade, would not, therefore, be wanting. Besides, he had early married a daughter of the great marine painter Van Goyen, and we have already seen that his family increased rapidly enough to oblige him to lead a laborious and sedentary life. Ostade was one of those philosophers who care to hold but little place in the world, and to change it rarely. Nothing less than the rumour of neighbouring wars could have decided our peaceful artist to leave his residence and his habits, and return to Lubeck, his native city. "He passed through Amsterdam," says the historian Houbraken, "intending to go to Lubeck; but an amateur named Constantine Sennepart induced him, by his fair words, to remain with him. He pointed out to him the advantages of residing in so considerable a city, where his works were esteemed, and where he would find numerous purchasers who could afford to pay him well. It was about the year 1662 that he arrived at Amsterdam. He commenced a great number of designs, which were purchased by M. Jonas Witzer, with some by Battern, for 1,300 florins.†

At the period when Van Ostade settled in Amsterdam, this rich and fine city was filled with amateurs, and the most celebrated painters flourished there. There was not a class of Dutch society, not a variety of the Batavian race, not a single condition, which had not in Amsterdam its chosen painter. Lingelbach there displayed his lively fairs, his hunting-pieces in the style of Wouvermans, and his charming sea-ports. The citizens went to Gerard Douw for small and delicately finished portraits, and to Abraham Van Tenpel for those noble full-length portraits worthy of Vandyck, brilliant with flesh colouring and satin. Gabriel Metz represented the wealthy interiors of Holland, ladies at the toilet or the harpsichord, young gallants writing love-letters or practising the graces in the drawing-room, or, better still, pretty waiting-maids pouring water for their mistresses from a silver ewer. Adrian Brauwer was the painter of alehouse brawls, of libertines, of gamblers, and of drunkards. Paul Potter was privileged to wander with his shepherds and their flocks. Finally, the old Rembrandt, in the depths of his mysterious studio, reigned over the crowd of amateurs, impressing his genius upon them, and exciting their admiration. In the midst of all these great artists, Adrian Van Ostade came to seek his place, and found it. He did in protestant Holland what Teniers had done in catholic Flanders. And, without carrying this idea too far, it appears certain that the diversity of the two nations, so apparent to him who had come from Antwerp to Amsterdam, is very evident in the difference between the two masters. It is only necessary to have seen the Low Countries, to be struck with the sudden change as we pass from Belgium to Holland. The farmer of the neighbourhood of Mechlin does not in the least resemble the Dutch peasant. The fair of Flanders is full of joy and clatter; the rural fêtes, in the neighbouring countries of Haarlem and Amsterdam, are less noisy and more dignified. There the rustic smokes and laughs, gets drunk and sings, and gives expression to his joy in vulgar sallies; here he remains serious, meditative, at least in appearance, and even taciturn; he drinks conscientiously and in silence. But who knows what he absorbs, what liquor he swallows? In this respect Van Ostade, in painting reality, expresses the grotesque ideal of Rabelais, and the debouches of his fancy. In the inn, as well as in the interior of their cottages, the peasants of Ostade display the pleasures of drinking in frightful proportions. Men and women hold enormous fantastic glasses; the servants ascending and descending the cellar stairs can hardly supply these imitators of Gargantua. "A butler should have a hundred hands, as Briareus had," said the curate of Mendon, "for this incessant pouring." And truly we see it on looking at these red faces, these eager eyes, these enormous mouths, which, finding the glasses too small, though broad and deep as wells, seize the pot itself, and drain it to the bottom. A century before, Rabelais, in his artistically coloured style, had painted the models of Van Ostade—those drinkers with diapered nose spangled with purple blotches, enamelled, embroidered with gules, "of which race few loved ptisan,"* but all were lovers of strong September." Ah! these lovers of "strong September," Van Ostade has made portraits of them, and so true to life, that his compositions would well adorn a Dutch edition of Rabelais, in that part of the book where Gargantua feasts brother Jean des Entommeures, and cries, "How good is God, who has given us this good wine!"

† Arnold Houbraken, La Vie des Peintres des Pays-Bas. Die Grootte Schouburgh der nederlandsche kunstschilders en schilderssinnen, Amsterdam, 1718. The invasion of Holland by Louis XIV. having taken place in 1672, it is possible there may be a mistake in the figures 1662, given by Houbraken, and repeated by Deschamps. In this case, it would have been the rumour of the invasion which decided Van Ostade to return to Lubeck.

It is not known whether Van Ostade took lessons of Rembrandt; but it is certain that he yielded to the influence of this great master, and that he adopted his chiaro-oscuro, especially when he painted interiors. With Rembrandt, light has a dramatic effect, his shadows are imposing and awful, as if inhabited by phantoms. If he throws a fantastic ray in the obscure abode of a recluse, it speaks to our imagination, and we perceive unknown poetry hidden in this mysterious marriage of the day and the night. The simple Ostade did not rise to the conception of these poems of light; but he borrowed of Rembrandt his gradually receding lights, those marvellous gradations which give transparency to shadow, interesting the eye and even delighting the thought. This single ray of light introduced into the cottages of the poor, through the lozenge casement, frequently falls only upon subjects and objects most strikingly trivial. The heroic gleam of Rembrandt falls with Van Ostade only upon prose, misery, and ugliness;

it, nevertheless, adds a serious interest to the humble personages whom he represents. Observe "The Rustic Household" † (p. 216). While the children are playing with the house dog, their little sister, holding by the knee of her mother, stretches her hands towards a toy which she wishes to have. The father and elder son look with delight upon this simple action: this is all the plot of "The Rustic Household." But even this simplicity is charming. We would not wish to leave this cottage without going over its numerous details, without counting the utensils scattered about in the most picturesque disorder. We look with interest upon the wicker cradle from which the child has just been taken; the half-cleared table with the old-fashioned pitcher chequered with blue stripes; here the grandmother's wheel, there, in the embrasure of the window, the cage with canaries; against the wall some glasses and plates stand upon a wretched plank in form of a dresser; higher up, hanging from the beams of the ruined ceiling, the basket full of straw in which the fowls are carried to market; here and there some clothes drying upon the line or upon the wooden balustrade which leads to the loft; not forgetting the barrel of beer which completes the provisions of the family, nor the engraving fixed upon the wall, showing that the idea of art is not absent even from this miserable cottage. Well, it is the chiaro-oscuro especially, which gives to this humble scene its principal value. The light enters freely through the large casement, but it is soft, warm, and caressing; it leaves a great part of the picture in the repose of shadow, and falls only on the principal objects. From the window to the cradle the ray meets all the figures, including the dog, who is also of the family; each of them stands out with vigour and clearness. Then follow the details of the furniture, which the light distinguishes according to their degree of importance in the mind of the painter; that is, as they may serve for effect by throwing back the light, or contribute to the general harmony of colour, by the happy distribution of their tone.

In contemplating these interiors, where we breathe domestic peace and simple happiness, we may judge of the character of Van Ostade and his private life. He has painted himself here, rather than in smoky alehouses, where neither his tastes nor his genius could penetrate. The history of art offers more than one example of the contradiction between the style and tastes of a painter. We have seen that Teniers lived as a gentleman in the castle of Trois-tours, and had nothing in common with the habits and feelings of the subjects of his pictures. Adrian Van Ostade was neither a drunkard nor a gambler. While his friend Brauwer, living in the midst of his vulgar models, spoke their language, drank their wine, and shared their drunkenness, Van Ostade himself preserved the dignity and gravity of his manners. If he occasionally painted the same subjects as Brauwer, it was doubtless to satisfy the demand of purchasers, or from caprice and as an exception. We easily recognise, on looking closely at the picture painted by Ostade, called "Pleasure interrupted," (which was engraved in the last century by F. David, and the print dedicated to Voltaire!) that the angry players in vain draw their knife and frown their passion; we feel that the peaceful talent of Van Ostade, has not sufficient violence of gesture or ferocious expression in the drunken figures, and that he must leave to Brauwer the representation of these brutal struggles, where the drinkers slay each other amid the cries of the servant, and mingle their blood with their wine.

A simple and profound observer, a perfect painter, an harmonious colourist in the originality of his tints, Adrian Van Ostade was never more admirable than in his rural pictures. There he combines his charms and places them in a true light. Under the arbour of hops, before the village inn behold the strolling singer, who scrapes upon his shrill violin a gay strain from his collection. To cover his lank and withered body he has borrowed the tinsel of a comedy lord; a cock's feather in his nether button-hole waves in the wind. Near him a little boy, seen from behind, standing as proudly as a primo uomo upon the boards of a great theatre, seems to accompany him upon an instrument, though we cannot see it. The countenance of the singer—sharp, mocking, merry, and almost impudent—leaves no doubt as to the nature of the words which he utters: he carries to the village the ways of the town; he has just uttered a vulgar jest, and lends to the picture, playing with a dog. Within stands the hostess, grave and modest; her serious countenance forbids a laugh, and behind her two men are listening, partly concealed in the half-tint—one would smile, but disdainfully; the other, without standing on ceremony, enjoys it heartily and freely, and freely yields himself to a half-stupid admiration.

Is not this truly a little scene of rustic comedy, of comedy of manners, full of free gaiety? Has not the most learned analysis of human sentiments dictated the details of a composition where unity of effect rules variety of expression?

originality of his features the mimicry of his profession. The varied expression of the personages is rendered with rare truth and skill. First, there is the jolly fellow in a fit of laughter sliding from the stone bench on which he sits. Two children are seated by his side; one appears scarcely to comprehend what he sees, while the other, about the age of the boy who accompanies the singer, with open eyes profoundly admires the precocious talents of the young artist. Further off a little girl holds by the hand a young frightened infant, while the last of the family sits on the ground in front of the

And what idea may we not form of this masterpiece, if we remember what the pencil of the colourist has added to charm the eye by the harmony of his tints and the disposition of the light! "The place of the scene," says a clever critic, "is shaded by a tree, and by the bushy stalks of the hops climbing over the poles. The light introduced through the branches strikes vividly upon the wall in the centre of the picture, and spreads over it in delightful gradation. The general tone is clear; the transparent foliage throws upon all the objects a greenish reflection which mingles softly with the strong colours. This greenish tint, which was familiar to Van Ostade, has become here, as in many of his works, a great beauty, on account of the foliage over which it is spread, and the strong light which animates the picture. The wall, the door, and the ground, offer a true colour, lively tones, fine half-tints, and careful details. We see here the perfection of art, so far as this kind of painting is concerned.*

pressed by exterior objects, should be able to draw upon copper the passing scenes which strike them. For example, a ray of sun-light, passing between two clouds, falls by chance upon the hump-backed violin player, who stops at the door of the inn; or upon a baker who cries his hot bread; or rather upon a group of grotesque beggars in great hats—here is a picture complete, but without the delay of painting, the artist vividly traces his impressions upon the varnish, he takes notes with his graver as the poet takes his with the pencil, and it afterwards happens, that this rapid sketch interests us so much the more, inasmuch as he has here expressed

How many things could we not add here respecting the effect of the picture, the idea, the original order of the design,—in a word, the sentiment of the whole. What proves that transparency of colouring, is not with Van Ostade the only merit of his works, and that this time the colourist is, so to speak, above the market, is the inestimable value of the prints engraved from his pictures, especially those which he etched himself, and in which, notwithstanding, we find his peculiar defects—careless handling, and occasionally a feeble design. Like almost all Dutch painters, Ostade was an engraver. It is necessary that artists, who are easily im-with more freedom and vigour the impression received. The etching of Van Ostade is distinguished by great sobriety of workmanship. The white of the paper here performs an important part. Not a line is without purpose, not a hatching which is not there to give expression to the features, to arrange a fold of the drapery, or to indicate a movement. The parts of light and shade are neatly cut, and when the half-tints are multiplied it is entirely exceptional. The print called "A Painter in his Studio" is an example of this. For the rest, Van Ostade is, in his own style, what Berghem is in his: he understands picturesque forms best, he gives character to the slightest details; in truth, he lends unknown grace to the falling boards of a damp, green, rotten pent-house. An old roof where grass is growing, an ancient casement window, the remains of an old basket, and even the lizard on the wall—all with Ostade are invested with charms, attract notice, and, as amateurs say, are full of rayoit.

Adam Bartsch reckons fifty etchings of Adrian Van Ostade, not including a doubtful piece.* If we now reckon the precious, highly-finished pictures which we see from his hand in the galleries of Europe—so many interiors, alchouses, fêtes under the vine arbour, as well as the portraits by this master, for he executed some superior ones—we shall see that the life of Ostade was that of an artist of great industry and extent. It is even curious to notice the kind of moral seclusion in which nearly all the great painters of Holland lived. It is said that they carried with them a sort of atmosphere, impervious to rumours and events from without. In their pictures we seek in vain for any trace of the great facts of contemporaneous history. The youth of Rembrandt and that of Van Ostade was spent in the midst of the disasters of the Thirty Years' War; and the former remained all his life wrapped up in an exalted dignity, most foreign to the outer world; from the depths of his cavern where he painted his philosophers in meditation, he heard not Count Mansfeld's cavalry passing. The other, more troubled by the war since he fled from it, did not once regard the soldiers who defiled under his windows, did not go out of his rustic inns, or his silent smoking-houses.

cleaning the house; and as it is supposed that the servant is occupied all day in this work, and that she has not time to prepare the evening meal, they are content with hot bread and butter, which is quickly prepared; therefore, at a certain hour, the bakers of each quarter announce by a trumpet that their batch is ready for distribution, and each then hastens to make provision."—"Catalogue raisonné des différents effets curieux et rares contenus dans le cabinet de feu M. de la Roque, par E. F. Gersaint. Paris, 1745."

* The catalogue of Rigal (pp. 277, 278), speaks also of two other prints attributed to Ostade, one of which is marked with the letters "A. O. S." The safest course is to refer it to Bartsch. The work of Adrian Van Ostade is usually accompanied by a portrait of the painter, engraved by J. Golt, after Coneville Dusart, and a copper plate, upon which is engraved this title—l'Œuvre complett van den ceemaards schilder Adrian Van Ostade, alles door hemzelf gelyventent en gest.† the complete works of Adrian Van Ostade, the celebrated painter, designed and engraved by himself. This work thus complete, in proofs, from worn-out plates, would scarcely be worth £6; but a work composed of first proofs, which they call proofs de remteques, would not be worth less than £600 or £800.

a board serves for a table, two men are playing at cards. One of them, a bad player no doubt, and, alas! always having the contrary chance, is out of humour, and throws the cards upon the ground. The other rises indignantly, and with his hand resting upon the edge of the board, leans towards his companion, and sharply reproaches him for his bad faith. Evidently a violent quarrel is about to follow this contest, as yet peaceful. Every one around the players is watching their quarrel. A woman, whose glass and pot of beer stood upon the board, hastily removes the precious objects; a smoker has taken his pipe from his mouth, and looks gravely upon the scene; the violin player, whose bow mechanically continues the air already commenced, is looking at nothing but the two actors of the drama which is preparing. A critic is astonished that this work should be known by the name that we have quoted. Everything in the scene seems to breathe a peace which would not be troubled by the trifling altercation which has taken place between the two players. No doubt there is profound peace under this fine green foliage, the violin of the fiddler rejoices the ears of the tranquil drinkers and the ecstatic smokers. Nevertheless, in a corner of this picture, a man is standing with flashing eye, clenched fingers, and hat over his eyes. In rising, he has violently thrown down the bunch on which he was sitting. The struggle has not yet commenced, but it is inevitable. And it is precisely in having chosen this moment when peace still continues, that Van Ostade has shown himself the ingenious and profound observer. In a French tavern the bottles would have flown about without any explanation. But the Dutch painter has been able to represent a man highly irritated surrounded by people who are interested in his emotion, and whose physiognomy, notwithstanding, is placid, because this slowness to throw off his habitual calm is natural to the Hollander. There is a very considerable interval between the moment when he is moved and that in which he allows it to appear. Sober in movements as in words, he speaks fewer words, and makes fewer gestures in the course of a whole year than a Parisian in one day. We may mention, while on this subject, that in Haarlem, just by the city of Van Ostade, two masons were one day seen pulling a rope in order to raise a large stone. Presently the two men, exhausted by the enormous weight, found they had not sufficient strength to raise the stone to the required height. The stone remaining suspended a few feet from the ground, the two masons turned towards the passers-by, showing them by a look that they needed assistance. Immediately two or three men advanced from among the people without speaking, assisted the masons, who spoke not a word to them, and then withdrew, still preserving the silence. As the task was long, several persons succeeded them, still without a single word having been exchanged, and without a single gesture having been made, beyond the movements by the manœuvre.

At all times amateurs have recognised in the works of Adrian Van Ostade two perfectly distinct styles:‡ one which is a little that of François Hals, that is, a bold, free, and decided manner; the other soft and fine, resembling a painting on enamel, not, however, what is depreciatingly called the porcelain style. There is in the Louvre a celebrated specimen of this—the picture of "The Schoolmaster." Although fineness of execution in small works is a law in painting, and there is a law as imperative requiring bold execution in large works, it cannot be denied that Van Ostade here deviated in practice from what his master had taught him, and he himself practised with such success on other occasions. We need only notice as examples the portraits of small dimensions, which, without speaking of the character and expression of the heads, are marvels of touch. The pencil is there managed with circumspect and abundant freedom, the folds of the skin are sharply defined without roughness, the details are marked without any reserve, and in a head where nothing is wanting the whole dominates, nevertheless, to that degree that this head may serve as a lesson to a painter who executes large portraits. It is not, then, easy to conceive why Van Ostade has occasionally thrown himself into the manner of which we speak, and why he should even go so far as to polish his painting with processes of his own invention, as is thought by M. Paillot de Montabert: *—"I suspect that Van Ostade, who represented 'The Fish-market' which is seen in the Museum of Paris, and in which we perceive upon the tables various kinds of fish, arranged in order one above the other; I suspect, I say, that he obtained this transparency from colours ground with oil alone, and laid on with particular art, an art which consisted not only in the touch, but in a certain polish which resembles the effect that block marble receives from the burnisher, which renders it brilliant and as clear of tarnish as it was at first. The custom of rubbing a painting to polish it has been noticed by several Flemish writers."

However that may be, the touch of Van Ostade, whether deeply marked or softened, firm or smooth, was always obedient to the will of the painter when he wished to display one of the most precious qualities of his art—expression. How many times, in going over the gallery of the Louvre, have we not been arrested and powerfully retained by the little picture of Adrian's which represents a Dutch merchant reading a letter. The man seems so attentive that in turn he compels our attention. But what is contained in this letter which he holds in his hands, and devours with his eyes? What, in our simple imaginings, have we not read there? No doubt, he is the rich owner of a privy-plot, who has received news from a distant country. The letter which interests him so deeply relates the unforeseen adventures which have happened to his ship, perhaps inauspicious, but the immovable Dutchman reads this serious correspondence with apparent calmness. Sensibility in this Batavian is latent, it has not wrinkled his forehead, marked his cheeks, nor weakened his eyes; the expression of it leaves him not less tranquil and vigorous. Also, in spite of the vulgarity of the features, the countenance of this model interests us: it is elevated by the manly lines which the pencil has so vividly marked, it is ennobled by the philosophic character which distinguishes it, and, in a word, by the presence of thought. In this the master is seen.

Adrian Van Ostade died at Amsterdam in 1685, at the age of seventy-five years. He had his brother Isaac for a pupil, one of the most astonishing landscape painters that ever existed. If so many writers have declared him very inferior to his master, it is, because they have found it more convenient to copy the four lines devoted by Deschamps to Isaac Ostade, than to go to see his landscapes, full of golden mist and rustic poetry. Corneille Dusart, Corneille Beza, and David Ryckart, the younger, were also the pupils or the imitators of Adrian. Like him, their subjects were the conversations of the peasantry, the interior of their houses, their simple pleasures, their artless emotions, their quarrels. Some have often been pleased to compare Ostade with Teniers, and we acknowledge the justice of the parallel which has been drawn by the good Deschamps, to whom we must now and then render justice—a parallel which has been developed, continued, and completed with skill by Emeric David. Teniers, say they, grouped his figures better, and knew better than Ostade how to dispose his plans. In fact, the latter sometimes played the point of light so high that the apartments appeared odd, and would have been ridiculous if he had not known how to fill up the vacancy by details which interrupted the large spaces. The colouring of Teniers is clear, bright, silvery, and altogether very varied; that of Ostade, with the same transparency, is vigorous, warm, and often florid.† The one has a light, vivid, and spirited touch; the other is sustained, flowing, and soft. The one manages the light, in order to soften it, bringing it across the thick bushes, or allows it to glide into the cottage of the poor only through the climbing plants with which the window is shaded; he charms us, in fact, by mysterious and striking effects. The other, on the contrary, places his figures in open air, and without expressive shadow, without betraying his learned combinations, he gives to his picture the tone, the interest of life. In imitating nature Teniers represents her amiable, smiling, and especially admirable for her variety. If he paints a rustic fête, we recognise in the games of the peasants, in their joy, in their anger, in their quarrels, the diversity of their characters. Each state, each age, has its manners. By the side of a stupid drunkard are shown persons who adorn the fête by the dignity of their attitude and their bearing. Van Ostade, contracting the circle of his models, chooses only the figure and the actions of the peasantry of Holland from the most ignoble and the most grotesque that nature and manners offer. "A satirical author," said M. Emeric David, "Ostade makes his personages ugly, in order to render them more pleasing and more ridiculous." The latter sentiment appears wanting in justice. It is for the jester Teniers to ridicule his world. No, the kindly Ostade should not be transformed into a satirical author. The painter of dull cottages and of peaceful smoking-houses, has not made his peasants, his poor and his silent smokers, ugly in order to please; he has not mocked his models, he has copied them seriously; and under the rag, which cover them, in the profound misery into which they are plunged, he has many times made us feel the presence of the soul. Teniers has sought the comic, Ostade has perhaps found it, but without knowing it. He placed himself at his window framed with honeysuckle, and saw human comedy pass by. If you desire to hear drinking songs and indulge in a roar of vulgar laughter, enter, without ceremony, the alehouse of Teniers; but if you prefer to mingle with the poor villagers, and in smoking round the hearth forget, as they do, the labours, the hardships of life, go see that little picture by Adrian, which represents the entrance to the village inn. Upon the wall hangs a bill where the painter has written these words:—"House to be sold: apply to Van Ostade."

The work of Adrian Van Ostade holds an important place in the portfolios of amateurs. It is composed of fifty prints. The best, according to Bartsch, are "The Hurdy Gurdy Player," "The Family," "The Barn," "The Father of the Family," and "The Quack," all very superior to No. 16, which has for its title "The Doll demanded."

The art of well detaching the figures is particularly seen in "The Quack," "The Dance at the Inn" (p. 221), and "The Luncheon," "The School" and "The Singer" may be noticed as the least successful engravings of the master.

The pictures of Adrian Van Ostade are rarely to be met with among amateurs. They are nearly all in museums or in very rich private galleries.

The Louvre reckons no less than seven of the finest. "The Schoolmaster," "The Family of the Painter," and "The Fish Market," are true masterpieces.

In the Museum of Munich are five pictures by Ostade. "A Still Life, with vases, fruit, fish, and a dead cock." "A Dutch Inn," where peasants are fighting, and their wives, modern Sabines, come to separate them. The three others represent drinkers and young villagers; charming compositions of feeling and method.

In the Dresden Museum are five pictures by Ostade, besides two copies of this master. It is not uncommon to meet acknowledged copies of the great masters in the museums of the North. Is it not the finest homage that can be rendered to the talent of these painters when we cannot procure the originals?

The Musée Royal of Berlin only possesses a single Ostade: it represents an old woman under a vine arbour, believed to be the mother of Ostade.

The Hermitage at St. Petersburg contains no less than twenty works of Ostade, among which a series of "The Five Senses," and some charming interior scenes.

The heirs of Sir Robert Peel possess, in their collection in London, "An Alchemist," by Adrian Van Ostade. The execution of this picture is of rare perfection, and Waagen

We now turn to a list of prices of the pictures of Ostade, furnished by the public sales.

In 1714, at the sale of Lorange, "The Backgammon Players" was sold for £17. At that of M. de la Roque, in 1745, two little pictures representing half-length figures, one "A Sailor," the other, "A Peasant," were valued at £1 the two; another, representing "A Baker, who trumpets hot Bread," at £5.

At the sale of M. de Julienne in 1767, there were offered five pictures by Ostade; the first, painted in 1661, represented "The interior of a Chamber," in which, near the fire, are a woman and child, and four men, each holding a pipe, the fourth, sitting in the chimney corner, holds a pipe and a pot; to the right, near the easement, are a woman and two men standing. This picture, painted upon copper, was sold for £300. The second, dated 1662, represents the famous "School-master," which is in the Louvre; it sold for £260. The third, representing "The Players at Ninepins," by the side of a violin player, fetched £109. The fourth represents "A Man, a Woman, and two Children," one sitting in a chair, while the mother is feeding it; dated 1667, price £10. The fifth is "A Lower Room, lighted by a large casement," in which there are five figures, price £103.

At the sale of the Duke de Choiseul, in 1772, several pictures of Ostade:—"The Game of Shuttle-board," which we have reproduced (p. 220), sold for £186. "The interior of a house of Peasants" (the great smoking house, engraved by Wisscher), four principal figures, one with his back to the fire, fetched £356. "An Interior;" upon the table, which is covered with a cloth, are plates, bread, and glasses, near it a man and a woman, further off two children under a window, a third sitting in a chair, in the foreground a large spindle; price £120.

At the sale of the Prince of Conti, in 1777, an "Interior of a Peasant's house," dated 1668; the same, which at the sale of the Duke de Choiseul, sold for £356, now only realised £283.

In 1812, at the sale of the cabinet Clos, was put up, "An Interior of a Farm;" twenty figures, men, women, and children; advance to the sounds of a bagpipe; a child sitting upon a bench. This picture sold for £242. It came from the cabinet Servad of Amsterdam, where it was sold in 1778 for 2,430 florins, or about £243.

In 1825, at the first sale of the Prince Galitzin, was sold for £520 a picture by Ostade, representing "An Interior of a Smoking-house."

At the sale of the Chevalier Erard, in 1832, was sold "The Dutch Smoking-room" (p. 217); a woman and four men by the side of a violin-player, accompanying a woman who is singing, other persons talking or smoking; price, £100. "The Adoration of the Shepherds," which Ostade is said to have painted on the birth of one of his children, produced £170.

At the sale of the Duke de Berry, in 1837, was offered "The Village Dance," No. 10 of the catalogue. This very capital picture, dated 1660, has been engraved by Woollett; it was valued at £880. In 1768 it made part of the collection of Gaignat; in 1777 that of Randon de Boisset; in 1801 that of Tolosan.

At the sale of Paul Perrier, 1843, "The Fish-market" was valued at £110; "The Empiric" at £240.

LONDON has splendid galleries and magnificent pictures. The National Gallery and Marlborough-house contain priceless gems. Then in the halls of our nobles the works of the immortals are to be seen. Also, for those who have time, there are Hampton-court Palace and Dulwich with their treasures, rich and rare. You need not travel to Venice, Vienna or Rome. There is much amongst us for the stay-at-home traveller to see and admire.

Edinburgh has, also, a collection of pictures, but little known, but which will well repay a visit to that beautiful and romantic city. Though of recent growth, it promises to do credit to the country, and to supply that deficiency in the study of art in Scotland which has hitherto been almost neglected. This fine collection, to which we beg to call the reader's attention, consists of that class of the genuine works of the great masters which are more especially of an instructive character to artists, rather than such as are usually selected with a view to the adornment of a gallery as a public spectacle. The directors wisely seek pictures which may be relied upon as safe models—upon which the student may advantageously form his taste and correct his practice. Although these may prove less attractive to the cursory observer, or be less calculated to dazzle by the brilliancy of subject and effect, the advantages of such a course of instruction are too obvious to require much detail in this place, as its tendency is to exalt and purify public taste, to moderate the extravagancies of the untutored aspirants in arts, to check the dangerous precipitancy with which they are too apt to overstep the slow and certain measures by which alone excellence in art is to be obtained, and to assist the artist in subduing the delusive estimate of his own powers which he is so ready—especially if he be very inexperienced—to form; for it is true, as has been well remarked, that "those accustomed to teach in the academies of painting, have generally found that the slow and laborious student was more likely to rise to eminence, than those who pressed forward in the confidence of genius." After everything is acquired that experience can teach, an ample field will yet remain for the exercise of genius and invention. The scope is boundless. But the basis of painting ought to be laid in study, in an intimate knowledge of the works of the best masters, in acute observations of nature, and unwearied combat with the difficulties of execution. These are the substantial promoters of the art, and in so far as associations or private patronage can supply facilities of employment, and objects of emulation and study, they have done their part.

The Royal Institution, in which the Edinburgh collection is placed, stands in Princess-street, not far from the finest of Scotch monuments, that erected to the memory of Sir Walter Scott. The original collection, acquired at considerable expense by the directors of the Royal Institution from various private collections in Italy, has, from time to time, been enriched by additional pictures, the gift of persons friendly to the advance of art in Scotland. There are also added some pictures of modern artists, acquired by or presented to the institution; but the most important addition is that of the valuable collection of paintings, marbles, and bronzes, the property of the late Sir James Erskine, Bart., of Torrie, which, by an arrangement recently entered into by the Board of Trustees and the trustees nominated by the late Sir James Erskine, are not deposited in the galleries of the institution. On his death, Sir James Erskine, of Torrie, bequeathed to his brother, Sir John Drummond Erskine, his whole property under burden inter alia, "That at his death he make over to the College of Edinburgh, to be entailed upon it, all my pictures, bronzes, and marbles, in the House of Torrie, for the purpose of raising a foundation for a gallery for the encouragement of the fine arts. And for the better security of this, I nominate and appoint my next heir of entail and the succeeding heirs of entail to the estate of Torrie, chancellor of the college—the sheriff of the county, and the provost of Edinburgh, to be trustees." Sir James died in 1825, and his brother died in 1836, when the trustees removed the collection to the College of Edinburgh, and by special agreement in 1845, between them and the Board of Trustees for arts and manufactures in Scotland, the entire collection, the pictures of which are in the finest preservation, and have been collected with much judgment as choice specimens of the works of the different masters, especially in the Flemish and Dutch schools, were placed under the charge of that Board in the Royal Institution. The institution, comprising the two collections, is open gratuitously to the public, two days each week—three days being set apart for the accommodation of students of art, who are supplied with tickets on applying at the office. On entering, the first picture that attracts the eye is "The Lomenilli Family," one of the most distinguished in the Republic of Genoa. It is on canvas nine feet square. This is, perhaps, the finest specimen of Vandyck's pencil now in Great Britain. It is in good preservation, and abounding in all the peculiar excellencies of that great master; in the rich and mellow tone of colouring, the delicacy of touch, and above all, in the power he possessed of displaying character in his portraits. The principal figure is probably the most successful example Vandyck ever produced of masculine beauty, and noble and unaffected bearing in attitude and expression. Another picture of Vandyck's, is the "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," which has always been esteemed one of the best historical works from that master. The attendants, five in number, are binding the martyr to a tree; two are Roman soldiers on horseback. The landscape and background are in beautiful harmony. It is the sketch for the finished picture now at Munich, which Sir Joshua Reynolds saw at Dusseldorf. He says, "He never afterwards had so brilliant a manner of colouring, it kills everything near it." Behind it are figures on horseback, touched with great skill. This is Vandyck's first manner when he imitated Rubens and Titian, which supposes the sun in the room. In his pictures afterwards, he represented the effect of common daylight. Both were equally true to nature, but his first manner carries a superiority with it and seizes our attention; whilst the pictures, painted in the latter manner, run a risk of being overlooked. A picture of Titian's, on a panel, called "A Landscape," is a fine specimen of that great master. It is one of four panels painted by Titian, to ornament the bed of his patron, the Emperor Charles V., representing morning, midday, evening, and night. Jerome Buonaparte, when the bed came into his possession, removed the panels and had them framed as pictures. After his departure from Spain, the bed and the four pictures were restored to their original owner, the Duke of Vivaldi Pasqua, from whom the one in the collection was purchased. A "Madonna, Infant, and St. John," is one of the finest specimens of the master which has been exhibited in this country. The "Summer," "Autumn," "Winter," of Tintoretto are bold but somewhat extravagant sketches. There are two very fine specimens of Barbieri; one representing the repentance of St. Peter, and the other the Madonna, Infant, and St. John. One of Huysman's pictures, entitled, "Landscape with Cattle and Figures," fully bears out the criticism common on Huysman—that his pictures generally have a striking effect of light on the foreground. In the same collection there is a woodland scene, in the fresh, juicy manner of Robbenia, with a river-bank in the foreground, on which appear some small figures. Another Robbenia is a woody landscape, has the remarkable light pencilling of the foliage for which that artist was celebrated. A picture of a young lady, richly attired, presenting flowers to the Infant Saviour seated on the knees of the Virgin, is attributed to Titian, on account of the splendour of the colouring and the exquisite truth and transparency of the flesh in shadow. At any rate, it is of the time of Titian, and belongs to his school. There is one Cuypp, which appears to be an early picture. The scene is a sunset, in a Dutch landscape. In the middle is a river with several groups of nude figures; some are about to plunge in—others are already immersed. They are principally in shadow, with strong gleams of light on their shoulders, producing a peculiar yet harmonious effect that tones well with the view of a distant town, and the softened tints of a serene evening sky. There is one fine picture by Jacob Ruysdael: it is apparently a Flemish view, with a river in front, a richly wooded and broken bank in the middle distance, and the lofty towers of a church more remote. On the left is a group of gnarled oaks, for delineating which Ruysdael was so famous. The figures are painted by P. Wouvermans. It is an harmonious and forcible picture. There are two pictures by Francis Snyders; the one called "A Wolf Hunt," is a very large forcible picture, in which the fierce rage of the wolf, surprised in feasting on a slaughtered deer, is energetically displayed in seizing one dog by the buttock, while his own fore paw becomes the prey of another courageous hound; the other, "A Boar Hunt," in spite of some spirit in the dogs, is a very inferior picture. There is a beautiful Italian landscape by Richard Wilson, affording an exquisite specimen of the skill of the English Claude in aerial perspective and clear sunny effect. The scene is on the borders of a small lake, on which rises a steep bank covered with wood, and crowned by a village. A "Salvator Rosa" will also please his admirers. The scene is the shore of a wild lake on which appear several armed banditti. A rocky boundary on the further side occupies the middle distance on the right, and declines so as to give a distant view towards the left hand. There are a few straggling trees, but the whole composition is grand, solemn, and forcible, with the utmost clearness of aerial tints. There are several pictures by Dutch and Flemish masters for those who admire that homely and faithful style of art for which those painters are so famed. A picture of Poussin is one of the gems of the place. It is a "Land Storm," with beautifully designed figures in the foreground and middle distance. The conception is poetical, full of vigour and genius. The branches of the trees, the drapery of the figures, and the action of their muscles, proclaim the violence of the tempest, before which man and cattle are succumbing. A dark lurid tone presides over the scene in unison with the scorching heaven and the allied lightning that strikes on the castellated cliffs in the distance. One of Guido's pictures also adorns the place. It is an "Ecce Homo," or a Christ crowned with thorns—one of that artist's favourite subjects. The mild resignation of the picture triumphs over mortal agony. The colouring is of that lucid softness that gives a charm to the principal works of this master. One other picture also we must allude to—one of Backhuysen's. It is the "Return of small Craft into Harbour during a brisk Gale." Figures on the jetty are observing the entrance of a vessel. The water is broken with his usual skill, and tones well with the lowering sky. But, after all, the pictures we like best in the collection, are some of the moderns. We believe as much in the present as the past. Old art, like old wine, is not necessarily good. There are exceptions, occasionally, in favour of what is new; and Edinburgh can boast of some of the exceptions. Among them are some of Etty's pictures. If we go into our own Vernon Gallery, we almost forget that Etty painted anything but genre pictures. We forget that he started an historical painter—a calling he forsook when the British public fell in love with his women—nude, large-eyed, and black-haired. But of his historical power Edinburgh has some splendid specimens, superior to the "Joan of Arc," another of his pictures in the historical style, exhibited in the Dublin Exhibition. There are five of his pictures in Edinburgh. We give them in the order of their merits. The first is "Conibert—Woman interceding for the Vanquished," then "Benaiah slaying the two lion-like men of Nob," and a series of three pictures representing the story of Judith and Holofernes—the last especially is a gorgeous and striking picture. Judith, and Holofernes, and the maid are very fine. In one picture we have the maid listening at the entrance to the tent, while Judith within is doing the bloody deed; then we have in another the terrified appearance of the maid as Judith issues from the tent with the head of Holofernes in her hands. Etty in this series of paintings has succeeded in telling the entire story with wonderful accuracy, and fidelity, and power. It will be long before we gaze upon three such magnificent pictures again. Turning away from their terror and splendour, there are two pictures of a different description which you will do well to look at before you leave the rooms. The one is a delicious picture of Paton's, "The Reconciliation of Oberon and Titania." Mr. Phelps may tell us we cannot put the creatures of fairy mythology upon the up with life and beauty was soon seized by a stronger. Another fine modern picture, also, is "Christ teaching Humility," by Robert Scott Lander. This, with Paton's picture, was purchased by the Society of Arts in Scotland, and was presented by them to the collection. This society was the first of the Art Unions established in Scotland, and has an income, we believe, of about £4,000 a-year.

One advantage you will have in the Edinburgh gallery is, that you will have plenty of time and room for the study of the pictures. You will not be jostled or inconvenienced by your company. A thing that will strike you with amazement is, that in the modern Athens—the home of all that is elegant and refined—you should be requested not to spit. It is strange that in such a place such a notice is necessary. We mention the fact with profound respect. It is said the arts refine the manners; let us hope such will be their effect in stage—our machinery and art are too gross and sensual for that, is at once apparent, whenever managers try to act the "Midsummer-Night's Dream;" but it is different with the plastic arts. What the one cannot, the other can. You can paint them, and Mr. Paton has done so in one of the most delicate and delicious pictures we have ever seen. Every inch of it is alive with fairies—dancing under mushrooms—drinking from acorn cups—sleeping in flowers. Fairies with light-blue eyes and ruby lips gleam on you from every corner. The canvas is crowded with incidents. It is a picture you might gaze on for hours. The other picture to which we refer, is a noble fragment of the genius of Scotland's great painter, Sir David Wilkie, being an unfinished picture of "John Knox administering the Sacrament at Calder House." It is an outline, nothing more. The hand that was to have filled it

Edinburgh, and that in a few years the obnoxious notice may be taken down.

Spend then a happy hour in the Edinburgh gallery. If you be no artist, your contact with art will lure you out of yourself into a nobler and larger sphere—and if you be an artist, your soul will burn purer, and your aim will be higher than before. In the words of Barry Cornwall:—

"There is Raffaele still before thee, Titian, Michael, Rembrandt all,
Now for a vigorous effort; trust thy sinews and thou shalt not fall.
In thy land is Hogarth's glory; side by side with Reynolds' fame, Much to spur thee, naught to daunt thee; DARE, and thou shalt do the same."

CHARLES FREDERICK LESSING.

CHARLES FREDERICK LESSING, no less distinguished as a landscape than an historical painter, the grand-nephew of the celebrated Theophilus Ephraim Lessing, is, like that illustrious poet, one of the most gifted men of his age. He was born on the 15th of February, 1808, at Wurtemberg, in Silesia. From his early youth he displayed a much stronger propensity towards the study of nature than the learning of the schools. Nevertheless, his father placed him at the Berlin academy when he was hardly fourteen years old. His intercourse with young painters, and a journey to Rugen, during which he had an opportunity of seeing the ocean and vast rocks, awakened in his mind an irresistible impulse towards painting; but his father strongly opposed every entreaty for permission to indulge this propensity, and would not yield to the urgent remonstrances of young Lessing's patrons, who discerned his Schadow to copy some land-scapes by Reinhard. The copies were so excellent, that the professor at first took them for the originals—so fresh and lively did they appear—and he was quite indignant because he thought Lessing had attempted to impose upon him. But when he had ascertained the true state of the case, and perceived the great merit of the young artist, he took him at once into his studio, and acted as mediator between the father and son. Schadow, who possessed the rare talent of quickly and accurately discerning ability in others, as well as penetrating with keen critical insight into their peculiarities, deserves honour for having advanced Lessing to his high position and contributed to his versatility of talent. For scarcely had Lessing acquired a certain skill in the drawing of figures, when a vast number of compositions proceeded from his creative imagination; but Schadow succeeded, by strong representations, in convincing him that in this path he would accomplish nothing really solid remarkable talent. After a long conflict between his filial duty and his inclination, he abandoned the instruction of the academy without his father's knowledge, and declared with firmness that he had already become a painter, and would not be kept back by anybody from following the calling to which he felt he was destined by nature. He now applied himself to his art with the utmost diligence, and his progress completely amazed his instructors, Professors Kollman and Dahling. His first pictures, "A Church-yard with Tombstones," and "A Church in Ruins," painted in 1825 and 1826, immediately excited general attention. But though even his father now became convinced of his superior talent, and a complete reconciliation between the two took place, an earnest, melancholy tone lingered in his mind after this period, and is still often perceptible in his works.

In the year, 1826, Lessing was ordered by Professor and worthy of fame. Lessing now closely applied himself to his "Silbercross," his first great work in the Wagner collection at Berlin. When the hall at Bonn and the Court of justice at Coblenz were adorned with frescoes, Count Stieglitz had scenes from the life of the emperor Barbarossa painted for his saloon, and Schadow instructed Lessing to prepare a cartoon for a panel. This last was "The Battle of Lonium," the grandest and most vivid of all these productions. At this time, the poems of Uhland were the principal study of the Düsseldorf artists, and they suggested to Lessing two of his finest works—"The Castle on the Sea-coast, by Moonlight," and "The Royal Pair in Sorrow." German art had never before displayed so grand and profound an earnestness, or produced an oil-painting so finished in every part. At the exhibition in 1830, it was without rival; everything else appeared to a disadvantage by its side. This invaluable gem of art is no longer in Germany, but at Petersburg. A very successful lithograph from it, by Jentzen, was spoilt; but there is still an excellent copper engraving by the master-hand of Lüderitz.

About the year 1829, the well-known poet Von Uechtritz began to exert an influence over Lessing. When Professor Schadow, in 1830, went to Italy, with other artists, he entrusted Lessing with most of his duties, and from this time his works exercised a most decided sway over the tone and character of landscape painting. In the year 1830 also, his "Leonora" was completed. The two following years successively witnessed the commencement of his "Hussites Preaching," and his "Council at Costnitz." The former of these pictures, which was completed in 1836, and is in the possession of the King of Prussia, has met with the greatest success in most of the principal towns of Germany, as well as in Paris, and it procured for the painter the cross of the Legion of Honour from the King of the French. By this work he gave that protestant direction to art, which is still his great characteristic. The same tendency is prominent in his "Ezzelin," where the wounded man spurns the consolation of the monks, and refuses to allow the representatives of the court of Rome to interfere with his communion with God. It is well known that Schadow, on observing this strong protestant tone, found great fault with the design, and did his utmost to dissuade Lessing from completing the picture. But art, and Lessing's inward impulse, triumphed; and the noble chef-d'œuvre, which was painted in 1841 and 1842, is now the principal attraction in the gallery at Frankfurt. No previous or subsequent painting attracts such universal attention, and justly excites such warm admiration. The number of Lessing's noble productions is too great to admit of a detailed description within our limits. Those we have mentioned are among the chief.

Lessing's figure and appearance are of a grand and noble character, his features are distinctly marked, and their expression is full of meaning and interest. With art he also successfully cultivates hunting sports. His usual dress is a green over-coat and a green cap, which give him the appearance of a forester. He is a most affectionate and attentive husband and father. It is rather difficult to get acquainted with him, but he is a faithful and constant friend to those with whom he is on intimate terms. The slightest deviation from truth gives him great pain. He is a noble, genuine German in the fullest sense of the term, and demands fidelity and truth in life as well as in art. Every year he goes on a journey for improvement in his profession—that he may constantly repair to nature as the source of his inspiration. In the pursuit of his studies he is unwearied and discriminating. He does not consider study from nature really useful unless the student copies striking objects with the utmost fidelity and fulness of detail that art and skill will allow. He willingly communicates the benefit of his advice and assistance to all young artists. To many he answers the purpose of an ideal model, and Düsseldorf owes much to him both in his personal and artistic character.

Germany is with good reason proud of the grand creations of this genial and real German artist; for every new historical work is a fresh triumph of art. He has studied the development of the reformed religion from his youth up with great interest, has grasped the subject with considerable power of mind, pursued it with a deep sensibility to its stirring incidents, and drawn from it the materials for some of his finest efforts. The composition of his "Hussites Preaching," and his "Luther Burning the Papal Bull," displays a strength of belief and a peculiarly religious tone, which prove him to be not merely an artist, but a man of deep religious convictions—a Christian hero of the grand order. Each of his superior works has for its groundwork, not only a great historical event, but a profound idea, which serves as a central point for the whole. His "Hussites Preaching" admirably depicts the tendency of the time in question. His Huss, who appears before the pile on which he is about to be burnt, who is condemned to the flames as a heretic, and whose ashes are to be scattered to the four winds, that no trace of him may remain—this Huss, Lessing has pictured kneeling before the pile, and by the warmth and earnestness of his devotion irresistibly compelling even his enemies to pray with him.

Similarly Luther stands forth, in his large painting, as a mighty hero, with his head raised to heaven, attracting towards himself the animated gaze of the bystanders, and looking just as we may easily imagine he did look when he uttered those well-known words at the Diet of Worms—"Here I take my stand, I cannot alter, God help me, Amen!" Close behind Luther appears the church in all its glory, for Luther struggled not against the church, but against what he considered the corruptions of the church. No artist has ever yet succeeded in portraying the impetuous reformer with so much power. All the interest is concentrated upon that part of the picture where his figure appears; and the mind of the spectator is absorbed in the contemplation of the impressive scene before him, and the mighty results which have flowed, and may yet be expected to flow, from this significant event. On the right of the picture are youthful students engaged in stirring the fire; on the left Melancthon, Duke George, Carlstadt, and other eminent Protestants. In the first sketch, which Lessing made in 1818, Luther stood as in the finished picture; but in the group on the left were several distinguished nobles in military attire, and on the right students and people.

In the large Indian ink cartoon-drawing, which was executed in January, 1852, Luther has his head turned towards the fire, preparing to throw the bull into the flames. While the attitude is admirably appropriate to Luther's fiery temperament and impetuous mode of action; the expression of the face indicates a firm, warm confidence in God, and a lofty animation of soul. On the right of Luther stands a young, richly dressed student; on the left, in the foreground, we see Duke George, wearing an expression of evident dissatisfaction with the proceeding. The figures are about two-thirds the size of life. The picture has, it is true, neither academic style, nor regular arrangement according to artificial rules, but is so pure, so smooth, so true to life without any exaggeration, that not only is the beholder struck with the truthfulness and living force of each figure, but the whole composition exhibits a perfect harmony and unity which cannot be too much admired.

Even before the completion of this great work of art, London, New-York, Brussels, and Rotterdam were competitors for it. It is now the property of Herr Notteboom, of Rotterdam, and will form one of the chief attractions in the exhibition of German (particularly Düsseldorf) paintings, which is about to take place in London, next July. The Germans, not unnaturally, feel great regret at the loss of a painting which excited so animated a competition all over the world, so to speak, even before it was finished. All that they have left is the cartoon drawing of the sketch, which belongs to Dr. Lucanus, of Halberstadt, and is open to the public. The right of engraving it has been conferred by Lessing upon Jansen, of Düsseldorf, the copper-plate engraver, who has already acquired great fame by his engraving of "the Rescue from Shipwreck," by Jordan, and who expects to complete his task within two years.

C. A. FRAIKIN, THE BELGIAN SCULPTOR.

AMONG the sculptors of the present time who are flourishing in the full vigour of their artistic power, Fraikin deserves to be mentioned with honour as a genuine artist of the highest order. He belongs to that class of men who are worthy to attract the attention not only of their own countrymen but of all who take an interest in art and artists.

C. A. Fraikin was born at Herentals in the year 1818. His father was a public notary in that town. Even as a boy he gave evidence of a strong and even irresistible inclination towards art. Drawing was his fondest, his constant delight. His father was too wise a man to offer any opposition to this evident indication of natural genius. Hardly had his son received an elementary school education, when he was sent to Brussels, at the age of thirteen, to pursue the course of study in that academy with a view to perfect himself as an artist. The young aspirant fondly hoped he had now attained the object of his desire; but his dreams of artistic greatness were destined to be soon disturbed. Only a month after the commencement of his career at Brussels, he was called to fulfil the melancholy duty of accompanying the remains of his honoured father to the grave. With him all Fraikin's plans were buried, for his practical guardians would hear nothing of his talent, his irresistible propensity, his brilliant expectations of artistic celebrity, and the bitterness of his disappointment if he were prevented from continuing his course. The lad was peremptorily ordered to decide upon a calling which would ensure him worldly prosperity and a respectable position in society.

Fraikin was obliged to abandon his pursuit of art and prepare for the study of medicine. Such was the fixed resolve of his guardians, and he could not but comply. The time for preparation passed by, but with his Virgil, his Homer, and historical compendiums, pencils and chalk were frequently in his hand. So also during his professional studies at the university, which extended over four years, he was busily engaged in increasing his artistic skill. The hours which could be withdrawn from the study of Esculapius were devoted to art. In these stolen moments he completed a vast number of drawings from copper-plate engravings, and drew portraits of all his fellow-students with whom he was on friendly terms. At length the young disciple of Esculapius had completed his curriculum; he passed his final examination with success; and went and settled down in a small town near Brussels to obtain his livelihood as a medical practitioner. As may be easily imagined, he had many leisure hours, all which, according to his custom and inclination, he sedulously devoted to art. He drew various heads and figures in chalk; but of models in clay the young doctor had as yet no idea. At length it came into his head to make a full-size bust of himself. He procured some plaster of Paris, moulded a block, and set to work to cut the bust out of the plaster of Paris, for as yet he was completely ignorant of the ordinary procedure of sculptors. In spite, however, of all difficulties, the perseverance of the young artist brought the work to a state of completeness. The bust was finished, and, what was more, bore a strong resemblance to him.

Fraikin not unnaturally looked upon this as a great triumph. He sent the bust to his brother, who was residing in Brussels. His brother lost no time in showing the work to some of his acquaintance. All were more than surprised; they were at a loss to conceive how such a bust could have been made by a young man who had never handled the sculptor's modelling tools, nor made sculpture his special study. They supposed that it would require at least five years to complete such a bust as the young medical practitioner had cut out of plaster of Paris, with no other instruments than his scalpel, knife, and file. Scarcely had Fraikin been made acquainted with the unexpected success of his first attempt at sculpture, and the warm encomiums that were lavished upon it, when he resolved to abandon the medical profession, and devote himself entirely to art, which he felt deeply convinced was the calling for which he was by nature intended. He bade farewell to medicine, and at once repaired to Brussels, where he commenced a regular course of study under a sculptor. In three months he had learnt the art of modelling, was entrusted with important works, and attended constantly at the Brussels academy. He rapidly passed through, or for the most part leaped over, all the different classes, and after five months' most diligent application, obtained the first prize in composition and modelling from nature.

This took place in the year 1812. The young artist immediately went to work, and modelled "Venus and the Doves." The charming statue attracted great attention, and made so favourable an impression, that he forthwith resolved to go and take up his residence at Brussels. By his earliest considerable productions, which were finished one after the other in rapid succession, he soon acquired a European celebrity. His reputation was at once established: for all recognised in his works a highly gifted artist, who was in the fullest possession of the antique gracefulness of line and form. His fine talent met with support and encouragement, while he was plentifully supplied with commissions to execute, some of them of considerable importance, both from the government and the town of Brussels; for which latter he, with others, ornamented the noble portal of the town hall with eleven statues of great artistic merit.

In a contest of plastic art appointed by the Belgian government, Fraikin came off victorious over many very able competitors, by his well-known and greatly-admired sculpture of "Love," which he worked in marble for the public museum by order of government. This work, in delicacy of outline and gracefulness of posture, is one of the most beautiful that have been produced in any country during the last ten years.

The artist was now able to gratify a wish he had long cherished of visiting Italy. In the year 1816 he repaired thither, and remained there a year, studying and labouring with the greatest perseverance and assiduity. He returned home enriched with new views of art, having a better knowledge of his capabilities, and more skilful, if possible, in the practical part of his art. Scarcely had he arrived, when he was elected a member of the Royal Academy of Sciences and the Fine Arts. Similar expressions of admiration for his rare talents and his exquisitely graceful productions were lavished upon him from all sides. In the year 1818 he completed his celebrated "Psyche," as a companion to his "Love," and was made a knight of the Order of Leopold.

His talent met with equally deserved recognition in foreign countries. The petty envy of rivals may have been excited by his appointment to prepare a statue for the Ostend civic authorities in memory of the Queen of Belgium, shortly after her lamented decease. But the result has proved the wisdom of those who selected him for that purpose. With cheerful courage and a genuine artistic inspiration, Fraikin set to work, and what he has achieved affords striking proof that he perfectly understood the task he had undertaken, and knew how to give perfect development to the beautiful conceptions which he had formed in his mind. The artist had the high satisfaction of learning that the committee appointed to examine his work pronounced it completely successful. Indeed, how could it be otherwise? It strikes every beholder at once as the production of an artist animated by a spirit of genuine devotion, and impressed with a deep sense of the dignity and importance of his art.

The queen, whose figure is an admirable portrait, strongly resembling the original, is on the eve of dissolution, and, in anticipation of future glory, is rising from her couch to grasp with her right hand the heavenly crown which an angel is bringing her from on high, with the golden palm of victory in the left hand, and overshadowing her with his outspread wings. The earthly crown has fallen off the queen's brow, who is striving with her right hand after the crown of immortality, which the heavenly messenger has brought. Her left hand, sinking down by her side, throws back the royal mantle which partly covers the couch and out of it fall flowers and fruits, emblems of the deeds of her beneficent gentleness and philanthropy.

At the feet of the queen sits an earnest female figure, the hands folded in an attitude of devotion, looking up at the dying queen with an expression of intense grief. It is an allegorical representation of the city of Ostend, which is seated on the stern of an ancient vessel bearing the arms of the city. The head of the figure is adorned with a species of helmet in the shape of the national cap of the Ostend women, and surrounded with reeds. The mantle, which falls in richest folds, half covers the breastplate.

The whole group breathes an artistic harmony of the loftiest character. It bespeaks the simplest, and yet the noblest majesty; the several figures are particularly successful in elegance of outline, natural ease of attitude, and the subordination of the purely sensual, without, however, at all trenching upon the beauty of the sculpture.

The head of the queen is no less remarkable for its wonderful fidelity than its beauty as a work of art; the posture is most pleasing and life-like; the attitude of the arms is at once pleasing and true to nature; and the whole drapery light and graceful. A mild and tender expression clothes the brow of the angel; the figure of whom is no less elegant in form out all its parts, finely conceived and skilfully executed down to the minutest details. The almost masculine earnestness in the head of the female figure which represents Ostend, forms a most striking and effective contrast to the other figures, and gives wonderful life to the whole group. SIR PETER PAUL RUBENS.

THE number, the magnificence, and the vigour of the works of Peter Paul Rubens, tell us more of his life than any biographies ever can; yet, to write a complete history of that happy and brilliant life, which was one continual flow of prosperity, that never saw its course once troubled by the calamities of the civil war which desolated the great painter's country, it will be necessary to speak of the enlightened scholar, the skilful diplomatist, and the accomplished man of the world, as well as of the consummate artist.

Generally speaking, the life of a painter furnishes but very few materials for the pen of the biographer, and the anecdotes of the foibles and eccentricities that may be gleaned from inquiring into the domestic habits of most artists, are often too unimportant to interest the reader. It is, however, quite different with Rubens, whose life abounded in prominent events, and who, at one time, was seen exercising his art as a painter, and at another engaged in the cabinet, or on some important diplomatic mission; now admired and praised for the excellent productions of his pencil, and now honoured and dignified by sovereigns and potentates for his conduct as a statesman.

According to one account, Rubens was a native of Antwerp, but others say that he was born at Cologne. At the latter place, the traveller's attention is drawn to two German inscriptions on stone tablets, inserted in the front wall of a plain-looking house in the Sternengasse. The first of these inscriptions says that Peter Paul Rubens was born in this house; and the second, that Marie de Medicis, Queen of France, came to end her days there, in the very chamber which had witnessed the painter's birth.* Mockery of human greatness! The widow of Henri IV.; the daughter and

* It was M. Wallraff who had these two inscriptions put up in 1822. In the first are the words, "Our Peter Paul Rubens, the Apelles of Germany, etc.," which aroused the national jealousy of Belgium to the highest point.—(See for this an article on these inscriptions in the Ghent "Messager des Sciences et des Arts;" bks 9 and 10 of the old series, 1823).

mother of a king; the woman whom the painter delighted to represent, surrounded by the emblems of imperishable greatness, was destined to fall, one day, from the height of her grandeur and to die in exile, the sorrow attendant on which was still more embittered by poverty. At present, the house in the Sternens Gasse shelters the family and the bales of a merchant; and vulgar reality now sits behind a counter, in the place of the poetry of recollection.

The birth-place of Rubens long gave rise to much animated controversy. In order to prove that he was born at Antwerp, great stress has been laid on a passage in the life of Philip Rubens, brother to the painter, and celebrated as a learned antiquarian. We read in this biography, written by Jean Brandt, that the town-council of Antwerp sent to Rome for Philip Rubens, in order to confer on him the post of secretary; but that this office could only be filled by a person enjoying the freedom of the city, which was granted to natives of Brabant alone. It was, however, urged that an exception might be made in favour of so learned a man as Philip Rubens, though he was not born at Antwerp, which was the birth-place of all his brothers, of his sisters, of his father and mother, and ancestors; ubi fratres (and consequently Peter Paul Rubens) *sorores, uterque parens, aliique retrò majores hunc aerem primum hausere.

"There has been much discussion," says M. Emile Gachet, of the Royal Commission of History of Belgium, "about the mutual claims of Antwerp and Cologne, with respect to their being the birth-place of Rubens. It has been urged in favour of Antwerp, that if the church registers contain no record of his baptism, it is owing to the religious troubles in the midst of which he was born. It has also been asserted, that the most convincing proof that Antwerp was the birth-place of Rubens is, that, otherwise, he would not have been able to enjoy the freedom of that city, nor to belong, in consequence, to the corporation of painters. All these reasons yield, in our eyes, to the following facts: in the first place, the absence of any record on the church registers of Antwerp and of Cologne is explained, not only by the troubles which agitated the country, but also by the religion to which John Rubens, the father of the painter, belonged, and for which he expatriated himself.

"Secondly, with respect to the freedom of the city,—which we consider the more specious argument,—it must certainly be allowed that it would be possible to find exceptions to the general rule, and that Rubens, on his return from Italy, merited more than any one else to have this rule infringed in his favour; and those who have read attentively the registers of the corporation of St. Luke, are well aware of this fact. Again, and this seems to decide the question, since it is true that John Rubens quitted Antwerp in 1568, and settled at Cologne, where he had, in 1574, a son named Philip, who was the elder brother of the painter (for this is an incontestable fact, which Jean Brandt has himself stated, in his biography of Philip Rubens, written and published in 1615), who will believe that Maria Pypelinex returned to Antwerp in 1577, for the express purpose of giving birth to Peter Paul Rubens, when it is stated that she only returned to that city, after the death of her husband, John Rubens, in 1587, and after it was restored to tranquillity? In a word, what plain-dealing man will not be satisfied with the contemporary testimony of Rubens' nephew himself, the author of the biography of the great artist, attributed for so long a time to Gevartius, but proved at last, by the Baron de Reiffenberg, to have been written by Philip Rubens?

"Peter Paul Rubens wrote as follows to George Geldorp, the painter, who had been commissioned to ask him for an altar-piece for St. Peter's church at Cologne:—"If I were to choose a subject to my taste, relating to St. Peter, I should take his crucifixion with his head downwards. It seems to me that I could accomplish something extraordinary out of this. But I will leave the choice of a subject to him who defrays the expenses, and defer it to the time when we know what is to be the size of the picture. I have a great predilection for the city of Cologne, where I was brought up till the age of ten; and, for many years past, I have often felt a wish to see it again." This letter," adds M. Emile Gachet, "clearly proves that Rubens did not present the picture of St. Peter to the church of Cologne, out of consideration for his having been baptised there, as has been pretended; but it is also far from furnishing arguments to those who maintain that Rubens was not born at Cologne, and however the expressions used by the painter may be turned and twisted about, it is impossible to translate, Ick aldaer ben opgevoedt tot het thienste jaer myns levens, otherwise than by I was brought up at Cologne till the age of ten. If this way of speaking does not imply that Rubens was born at Cologne, it, at least, renders his birth there very probable. Yet these are, at most, but puerile discussions.†

In order to discover, in the life of the man, the secret of the works of the painter, the numerous critics and biographers of Rubens are divided in their opinion respecting his origin. Some say that he was a descendant of a noble family of Styria; that Bartholomew Rubens, his grandfather, accompanied Charles V. to the diet of Worms, and made a conspicuous figure among the first gentlemen of the emperor's court at Brussels. The sumptuous style which the painter has thrown into his works is, according to them, a sign of his noble origin, which, too, is further indicated by his constant presence at the different courts of Europe.

In speaking of Bartholomew Rubens, Smith says, in his "Catalogue Raisonné," that he "joined the suite of the Emperor Charles V., upon the occasion of his splendid coronation at Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1520; at the conclusion of which ceremony he accompanied the emperor to the diet at Worms, and subsequently took up his residence at Brussels." The court of Charles was then the most magnificent and brilliant in Europe; and the young Bartholomew, having the advantage of a good education, and possessing all the fashionable accomplishments of the time, attracted the admiration of such a court. He found no difficulty in forming an advantageous union with a lady of noble family, named Barbara Arens, surnamed Spirinck. The commerce and opulence of the city of Antwerp, at that period, brought together a confluence of merchants from all countries, consequently such gaiety and amusements as were well calculated to excite a disposition in the young couple to remove to that city: to this they were further induced, by its being the residence of some of their relatives. Of this union, in the month of March, 1530, was born John Rubens, the father of the artist. Gifted with a ready disposition to study, his acquirements in the knowledge of the sciences and polite literature were extensive; at the age of twenty-four, he went to Italy, where, during a residence of six years, he perfected himself in the several universities for the profession of a civilian, and took the degree of doctor of civil and canon law at Rome. Soon after his return to his native city, he married a lady of distinguished family, named Maria Pypelinex, daughter of Henry Pypelinex and Clara Tolon, and established himself at Antwerp, in the profession of the law. His erudition and prudence shortly acquired him distinction, and, in May, 1562, he was elected a councillor of the senate. About this period, the Low Countries were agitated by the Iconoclasts, whose zeal for the destruction of images was attended by persecution, pillage, and every description of disorder, creating dissension and misery among all classes. These disasters continuing for some time, induced John Rubens to quit the official situation which he had held six years, and to remove with his family to Cologne, preferring peace and tranquillity to the prospect of wealth.

Other writers assert that Rubens belonged to that semi-commercial, semi-plebeian race, which was characterised by its intelligence and its sensuality, its fondness for work, eagerness in the pursuit of gain, and greediness of honours, but whose fertile and vivacious genius was always void of elegance, or of anything approaching the ideal. It was owing to this, say the latter writers, that the activity of Rubens procured him such great riches, and enabled him to use such speed in the execution of his paintings, of which the number is so prodigious, and the dimensions so vast, that, if they were all joined together, they would suffice to decorate, so to say, the largest street of any large city. This, too, was the reason why Rubens was so fond of such red, fleshy forms, and such herculean muscles; why he evinced an exaggerated love for action, that smothered the thought of the artist beneath the weight of the matter; and produced saints with the forms of athletes, and women and virgins with the lusty, rubicund beauty of those viragoes of the people who fatten on the vapours of blood inhaled in the shambles.

But of noble or mean birth,* the origin of the painter will not suffice to explain his works. Genius may, doubtless, yield sometimes to the influence which surrounds it; but it is always strong enough to resist everything puerile.

The artist has, properly speaking, neither country nor family, when his works make the round of the world; for his soul is everywhere in each of his pictures. There exists a more influential power, which must have ruled the painter as it rules the world, and that is the organisation and temperament which are peculiar to every one.

There are two principles which are at constant warfare in man: his mind and his body. The strongest part of us subjugates the other, exaggerates its victory, and proclaims it in our works. Every religion has experienced that antagonism which Horace called the double man. Among the Pagans, matter predominated; and they consequently deified their physical enjoyments, Bacchus being identified with wine, and Venus with love. The Christians, on the contrary, by making the flesh subservient to the mind, showed their desire to glorify all austere virtues and to substitute elevated thoughts, free from matter, for the brutish personifications of Paganism. Thought had superseded animalism, and art was rising to moral grandeur. But every power tends to run into excess; and, in this case, nature, outraged by the too violent reaction of Christianity, was soon compelled to uphold the rights of the flesh. This struggle is still going on; and this is the cause of our difficulties with respect to art, of which the real solution is some day to be made apparent by the reconciliation of all the faculties of man.

It is a pretty general custom to divide the talents of mankind into intelligence and temperament, into men of thought and men of action. This is true with respect to painters. We must, therefore, examine their peculiar organisation and character, in order to discover the secret of their works, which, properly speaking, are nothing but true mirrors.

Rubens is Pagan by nature, temperament, and action.

The Flemish school of painting had preserved an original grandeur through the whole of the fifteenth century. Charmed

* Michel, De Piles, Van Grimberghe, and a crowd of other biographers, assert that Rubens was of noble origin. Deschamps, Felibien, Dargenville, Houbraken, etc. say nothing of his ancestors. The Baron de Reiffenberg read to the Academy of Brussels, in 1833, a genealogical memoir, of which the following is the title: "Généalogie de la Famille de Rubens, tirée des Manuscrits et des Ouvrages imprimés de Rutkens Van der Leene, Le Roy, Foppens, de Vesiano, Hellin, etc."

It is there said that Bartholomew Rubens, of noble birth, a native of Styria, and who had settled in the Low Countries before the year 1528, married Barbara Arens, surnamed Spirinck, a native of Antwerp, by whom he had a son, named John Rubens, on the 18th of March, 1530. John married Maria Pypelinckx. Their seventh child was Peter Paul Rubens, etc.—"Nouveaux Mémoires de l'Académie de Bruxelles, vol. iii."

M. Gachard expresses himself as follows, in his pamphlet entitled, "Particularités et Documents inédits sur Rubens, Bruxelles, 1842:" "As Rubens was not noble, he could not be made Chamberlain, and as for the dignity of Councillor of State, it was reserved for the most eminent nobles of the country, such as the Prince of Orange, the Duke d'Arschot, the Count de Solre, etc." M. Gachard is right. We shall see, in the course of this biography, with what insolence the noble Duke d'Arshot treated the plebeian Rubens.

with simple doctrines and the beauties of Gothic art, it buried itself in contemplation at the bottom of cathedrals, full of intoxicating visions and mysterious terror. Painters having discovered, through their faith, the secrets of Christian art—the enemy of worldliness—had in consequence evinced great dislike for profane subjects. Their pious images, with their chastely arranged drapery, presented a double character of stiffness and maestri, which faithfully expressed the Christian religion, composed of severity and tenderness. The thin and transparent bodies of the apostles, the saints, the virgins, and the martyrs, seemed to be made of spiritual essence, while their soul shone like a sun in their features, surrounded by glories. But the troubles of the sixteenth century came to arouse art out of its mystic dreams; and the Flemish painters soon became realists and travellers. If a fervent master of the Flemish school had formerly undertaken a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, its disciples henceforth preferred wandering through Italy, and plundering, like a swarm of bees, in every school. Abandoning themselves entirely to the inclination of their individual tastes, they imitated in turn Leonardo da Vinci, Titian, and Veronese. In his enthusiasm for Michael Angelo, Francis Floris exaggerated his forms, and, so to say, erected in painting the colossal figures which the great sculptor had carved in stone. Martin de Vos applied himself to the reproduction of the colouring of the Venetians, and Otto Venius strove to imitate the magic lights and ineffable softness of Correggio.

Such was the situation of Flemish painting at the time when Rubens appeared in the history of art.

In 1566, John Rubens, who was a councillor of the senate, lived peaceably at Antwerp with his wife, Maria Pypelinckx, whom he had married on his return from a long stay in Italy. At that time, Philip II., king of Spain, was opposing, in the Low Countries, with the most barbarous oppression, the advances made by freedom of opinion, which the Belgian nobility, who were secretly leagued with the nobility of France, Germany, and Holland, defended against the Holy Inquisition. A murderous revolution was fermenting in the very heart of Flanders; the reformers, watched, followed from city to city, and tracked through the country and even into the very retreats afforded them by the woods, rose up in exasperated bands; fanatical orators excited their minds, and the orgies of revolt replied to the excesses of oppression. Reduced to exercise their condemned religion in the open air, in ravines and secluded places, the proscribed reformers gave vent to their feelings in the bosom of nature, that filled their wounded hearts with its wild inspirations. Their fury reached its highest pitch at the sight of the magnificent cathedrals where their implacable persecutors exercised a religion, the opulence of which formed so strong a contrast with their own misery. City artizans, mariners, and peasants, armed with scythes, hatchets and muskets, overran western Flanders, and carried devastation into the churches and convents; the altars of the churches were destroyed, the statues mutilated, the pictures carried about at the end of pitch-forks, and the books burnt by order of preachers standing in the pulpits with a torch in their hands. St. Omer, Ypres, the Abbey of Wemelghem, Menin, Commines, Warwick, and Lille, saw the work of destruction pass by like a torrent of lava, which, increasing as it went along, arrived at last at Antwerp. The feast of the Assumption was being celebrated in the midst of an immense assemblage of people, when the cathedral was suddenly invaded, the statue of the Virgin dragged, with a cord round its neck, about the building, and then decapitated, while a beautifully sculptured Christ was broken into a thousand pieces. The ground was watered, and shoes were clamed with the wine and oil intended for religious purposes, and the sepulchres were broken open, so that the bones they contained might be scattered abroad, to the exclamation of Long live the Queen! which was the rallying cry of the infuriated crowd. The fine organ fell to pieces with a sigh; the large tapers of the cathedral lighted up the scene with their mystic flames; the tocsin sounded; Antwerp trembled in the dark, and the sun rose on the ruins of seventy altars. Four days had sufficed for the spoliation of four hundred churches in Brabant and Flanders alone.

On hearing of these events, Philip the Second's rage was ungovernable; he sent into the revolted provinces the Duke of Alba, a man of the most implacable character, who carried extermination with him. At this juncture, the Belgian nobles, rising resolutely in arms, placed themselves at the head of the civil war; blood flowed in torrents in the public places and

On this occasion, the Prince de Chimay wrote to him as follows:—†

but also to enrich the churches, the museums, and the galleries of all Europe, from Rome to Paris, from London to St. Petersburg, and from Madrid to Vienna.

Peter Paul Rubens commenced his studies at the college of the Jesuits at Cologne, with the same facility with which he years, his widowed mother returned to her native city, where she displayed the greatest skill in the recovery of a part of her husband's property, which had been seized and confiscated, at one time by the royalists, and at another time by the Iconoclasts, under the pretence that his emigration, without a regular permission, was sufficient to implicate him in the conspiracies which then prevailed. It was, doubtless, from his mother that Rubens inherited that order, sagacity, and vigilance over his own interest, which, though they were the cause of his being so often accused of avarice and duplicity, made him so useful, in a political capacity, to the princes of the time, and above all to himself. On his approaching his sixteenth year, "he had made such progress in Latin, and other useful languages," says Smith, "that he was considered qualified to commence the study of the law, for which profession he was intended. At this period, an opportunity occurred of introducing him to the noble family of the Countess de Lalain, in quality of page, where he would have the advantage of observing the manners of polished society, and of obtaining that patronage which would tend to promote his future interests. His good sense and docility rendered a conformity to the rules of the establishment an easy task, and his quick apprehension enabled him to familiarise himself readily with the ceremonious style of the lofty Spanish nobility who figured at that period. This situation, however, was not to his taste; his predominant inclination for drawing, which had hitherto been indulged in only as an amusement, began to develop itself more decidedly; he became disgusted with the servility of his situation, and resolved to quit it, and pursue the study of the arts and polite literature. This resolution he took an early opportunity of communicating to his indulgent mother, who expressed unwillingness that he should follow a profession which she considered unworthy of his birth, observing that he was yet too young to choose for himself, and that his superior education entitled him to higher distinction than the pursuit of painting could procure. Notwithstanding this admonition, his natural attachment to the art, accompanied by a spirit of independence, induced him to reiterate his solicitations to his mother, to open to her his thoughts and anxious wishes, and, in conclusion, emphatically to declare that the situation of a page accorded so little with his tastes and feelings, that, however it might lead to honours and distinction, the summit of his ambition was to be a great painter, and in the pursuit of this object he would enjoy a life of liberty dearer to his heart than all the charms which his present situation might promise.

"This declaration made a suitable impression upon his parent, who was well acquainted with the predilection of her son for the fine arts; and it was agreed, after consulting the rest of the family, that he should be permitted to pursue the bent of his inclination. Having decided upon this, their next object was to find a suitable instructor for him, when a painter (whose only recommendation probably was an acquaintance with the family) of the name of Tobias Verhaert was accepted; but the penetrating scholar soon discovered his master's deficiencies, and quitted him to enter the school of Adam Van Noort,* a painter of history, celebrated at Antwerp as a colourist.*

Van Noort was naturally of a rough temper, which alienated him from the love of his disciples and friends; Rubens studied under him for four years,† but being at last unable to bear his brutality any longer, he left this surly master to enter the school of Otto Venius, painter to the Archduke Albert, governor of the Netherlands, and to his consort Isabella. Otto Venius had received a learned education, which had been improved and rendered still more brilliant by his constantly residing at the different courts of Europe. Too crude to be a man of originality and inspiration, Otto Venius was but a feeble imitator of Correggio, and it may be safely asserted that Rubens learnt hardly anything from him, with the exception of polished manners, an excessive love for letters, and a false taste for allegory. Rubens had been working for nearly four years under his second master,‡ when, feeling a desire to commence more extensive and bolder studies, he resolved to set out for Italy. He was also urged to this step by Otto Venius himself, who had long since inflamed the young student's mind with a desire to visit that classic land, by his glowing descriptions of the glories of the great Italian masters. The value and importance of the contemplated journey were therefore duly laid before the young artist's mother, and her permission eagerly solicited, which, after some deliberation, was granted. On this, Otto Venius presented his pupil to the Archduke Albert and the Infanta Isabella, who were so delighted with the elegant manners of the young painter, that they gave him letters of recommendation to several sovereigns. But, according to Bellori, Rubens possessed qualities which would have found him protectors wherever he went. "He was," says this writer, "tall, well made, of a fine florid complexion and a strong constitution; both mild and proud too, noble in his manners and distinguished in his dress; and he generally wore a gold chain round his neck, &c."§

Rubens quitted Antwerp for Italy on the 9th of May, in the year 1660, taking the road to Italy through France. "It would not be difficult," says Smith, "to imagine what was the subject of the thoughts of the young traveller during his long journey from Antwerp to Italy; they were doubtless fixed on the bright prospect before him; he was hastening to that classic country whose riches in art all concurred in praising, and which his imagination dwelt upon with delight. Plans were laid and resolutions formed for the regulation of his future conduct; these all related to his beloved art,—the idol of his constant adoration."

On arriving in Italy, it was Venice, which artists, poets, and travellers had, in their enthusiasm, pronounced to be the finest of all the cities of that country, that first attracted his ardent curiosity. While he was there studying the master colourists, a gentleman of the court of the Duke of Mantua, and who resided in the same hotel as the painter, expressed a wish to see him at work in his studio. The sight of a few half-finished pictures, and the conversation of the artist, quite fascinated the gentleman in question, who, on his return to Mantua a few days after, spoke of the talent and character of Rubens to the duke in such high terms, that the latter determined to send for him and to engage him in his service. Rubens therefore quitted Venice for Mantua, where the duke possessed a gallery full of the works of Giulio Romano. According to some biographers, and especially M. Van Hasselt, author of a conscientiously-written life of Rubens, but replete with national enthusiasm, the Flemish painter applied himself to imitating whatever fire the pictures of the duke contained, that is to say, those parts of them which spoke to his own feelings.

But where is there any fire to be seen in the works of Giulio Romano, and does this quality, which Rubens is generally admitted to possess, exist even in him? What connexion, too, is there between imitation and fire? The exclusive privilege of inspired natures, fire suffices itself for the creation of the originality and glory of the greatest masters. Tintoretto, Rembrandt, and the modern Delacroix, are men of fire. In the intoxication of thought, the storm of the passions, the tumultuous ardour of everything that breathes, and the mysterious violence of all inorganic natures, fire torments alike man, animals, and the elements. It pours itself out of our hearts in love, hatred, and grief; starts from the bowels of the earth through the crater of the volcano, rushes along with the torrent, and traverses the heavens on the wings of the tempest. It was fire which made the hair of the sibyls stand up with holy horror, and which has, in all times, given audacity to the warrior, inspiration to the poet, exaltation to the believer, and heroism to the martyr. Giulio Romano never knew what fire was. With all his imagination, he never succeeded in freeing himself from the influence of Raffaele, his master, whose tranquil genius sought after the idealism of order and the harmony of lines. Of a calculating character in everything, cold in his disposition, and deprived, by his active life, of the benefits of retirement and contemplation—the source of all exalted thoughts,—Rubens possessed no more fire than Giulio Romano did. Excessive love for mythology and paintings of unlimited dimensions, admiration for Michael Angelo, and above all, that false grandeur which characterises the works of all the masters belonging to the epochs of decay in the arts, form the only analogy that it is possible to find existing between Rubens and Giulio Romano. The former is more life-like than the latter. His village fêtes, his hunts, a few scripture subjects, and his "Battle of the Amazons," possess, if not real fire, at least a material freedom and a boldness of execution which approach it. The first three pictures of Rubens were placed in the church of Mantua, and three others, "Christ crowned with Thorns," "The Crucifixion," and "St. Helena discovering the real Cross," were painted at the request of the Archduke Albert, governor of the Netherlands, to ornament the church of Santa Croce di Gerusalemme, at Rome; the prince having borne the title of cardinal of that church, previously to his marriage with the Infanta of Spain. Following the generally forced conceptions of Tintoretto, Rubens has placed no nails in the feet of the Saviour; but has sacrificed Christian tradition to the wish of showing the convulsions of physical death as energetically as possible.*

While Rubens remained at Mantua, the duke's treatment of him was most flattering. From his first interview with that prince, the painter had produced on the former's mind a very favourable impression, which was afterwards augmented by the learning displayed by Rubens in conversation. Endowed with great quickness of apprehension, having an extensive knowledge of foreign languages, and possessing a handsome person and elegant manners, he quite gained the esteem of the duke, who often honoured him with his visits. On one occasion, as he was engaged in painting a picture of the history of "Turnus and Æneas," and, in order to warm his imagination, repeating with energy the lines of Virgil, commencing—the duke suddenly entered the room, and exclaimed: "Bravo! Rubens, the subject is excellent."

Some time after, he was employed by the duke on a secret mission to the Court of Spain, and set out under the pretext of offering a splendid carriage and seven superb horses to the king, Philip III., and some rich presents to the Duke of Lerma, his prime minister.†

Rubens' reception at the court of Madrid was highly flattering. The king entered freely into conversation with him on the subject of his mission, questioned him on the motive of his journey to Italy, and took a survey of the state of affairs in the Netherlands; and Rubens spoke so eloquently on each subject, that his Majesty, in his letters to the Duke of Mantua, expressed his satisfaction of the envoy in the highest terms.

During his stay at Madrid, the king sat to him for his portrait, and so did several of the nobility. When he took leave of his Majesty, the latter gave him assurances of his high satisfaction, and sent him some costly presents by the Duke of Lerma.

The ability Rubens had displayed in conducting the secret mission entrusted to his care, had prepared him an honourable reception from the duke, on his return to Mantua. But, however flattering the honours heaped upon him might be, they did not detach him from the principal object of his journey to Italy; and having now passed more than three years at Mantua, he felt desirous of visiting the other cities of that country, and particularly Rome. During his stay in the last named city, he painted several pictures for the Pope, the Cardinals Chigi, Rospigliosi, Colonna, the Princess of Scalabrino, and the fathers of the oratory. The influence produced on him by the grand style of Michael Angelo was so immense, that he never after succeeded in freeing himself from it. From Rome he went to Florence, where his appearance was hailed with delight by many celebrated persons; he also received a hearty welcome from the Grand Duke of Tuscany, who honoured him with a long audience, and finished by asking him for his own portrait, to be placed in the public picture gallery of the city, as it was customary to have the portrait of every distinguished painter, executed by his own hand, hung in that gallery. During his residence in this city, he painted several excellent pictures for the grand duke, and was also much employed by a great many of the nobility. The magnificent Florentine gallery of paintings and antique statues excited in him the most enthusiastic admiration, and frequently engaged his pencil; but although his subsequent productions possess but very few of the beauties of the antique, his notions of form having been vitiated by early impressions, "yet there is," says Smith, "occasionally in his works sufficient to prove that he was not insensible to the grace and majesty of the Greek sculptures." The same success which had hitherto waited on him everywhere else attended him here; and, on his departure from Bologna, the grand duke expressed his satisfaction to him in the highest terms, and presented him, among other valuable things, with his own portrait suspended to a gold chain.

Rubens did not stay long at Bologna, for the correct outline and the solemn composition of the Carracci had nothing in common with his genius, which had a horror of simplicity.

He now returned again to Rome, in order to fulfil some previous engagements, and terminate some unfinished paintings. The Florentine school of painting seems to have been greatly admired there, either for its colouring or its novelty. By order of Pope Paul V., Rubens now executed a painting for the oratory of the church of Monte Cavallo, representing "The Virgin and St. Anne adoring the infant Saviour." He also painted several pictures for the palaces of many cardinals and noblemen.

Being desirous of visiting Milan, he left Rome for that city in the beginning of 1607, where he executed many magnificent paintings. He copied the picture of "The Last Supper," by Leonardo da Vinci, and painted for the Ambrosian library a picture of "The Virgin and the Infant Jesus," which his friend, Velvet Breughel, encircled with a garland of flowers. He then hastened to Genoa, the opulence and activity of which reminded him of Antwerp, and urged him onward in his pursuit of gain. His reputation had preceded his arrival; senators, nobles, and merchants, all invited him to splendid banquets, and contended with one another for the possession of his pictures and portraits, for which they offered enormous sums. The artist painted the churches and palaces of Genoa, which were afterwards engraved and published at Antwerp, under the title of "Palazzi antichi e moderni di Genova raccolti e disegnati da Pietro Paulo Rubens." He also painted, for the Jesuits' church, two large pictures representing "The Circumcision," and "St. Ignatius holding the diseased."

The immense number of portraits and historical pieces which he painted in this city, caused him to make a longer stay there than he had made in any other place, with the exception of Mantua. But while thus engaged, the melancholy intelligence arrived that his mother was dangerously ill. He immediately set off for Antwerp; but arrived too late ever to see her again. A tomb in the church in which she was buried records that she died on the 14th of November, 1608, at the age of seventy.

Rubens had passed eight years in Italy, under the constant protection of the Duke of Mantua, in roaming from city to city to visit every school, and to inspect every chef-d'œuvre. Endowed with great activity, a capacious memory, and with such power of assimilation as was unknown perhaps before his time—an Italian in Italy, and a Spaniard in Spain—his flexinever possible for him to prevent himself from feeling the greatest aversion for those whose temperament was opposed to his own. After the death of his mother, Rubens, in order to give free vent to his grief, withdrew for four months into the Abby of St. Michael, where she had been interred. He was then seized with profound melancholy, was harassed by a conbility of character never changed his Flemish nature, nor diminished in the least his native originality. Though he has often employed the greatest skill to give the appearance of creative genius to recollection and imitations, though he has sucked, so to say, the marrow of the greatest masters, while still remaining himself, it must also be owned that it was tinual yearning to see Italy again, and was preparing to return there, when the Archduke Albert—who was desirous of keeping near him the painter, and above all the diplomatist at a time when Spain was in so difficult a position with respect to Holland—attached him to his service by a good pension, or a sol'd chanc, according to the expression of Philip

Rubens, his nephew and biographer,* In order to escape the bustling gaiety of the court of Brussels, Rubens reserved himself the right to reside in general at Antwerp, where he promised to keep himself in readiness to answer the first summons of his prince, and as the truce of 1609, signed at Antwerp and the Hague, gave him hope that his country, so long disturbed by war, was at last about to enjoy a few years of tranquillity, he married the daughter of a rich senator of pensive, seems to have painted his sublime ideas and hallucinations from the bottom of a prison: his general lights, rendered so brilliant by his ambient shades, seem to be the road taken by the apparitions which visited him, and the trace left by the soarings of his soul; while those unexpected lights which he has introduced into his pictures are the flashes of his impassioned genius that was as concentrated as the focus of the lens of Archimedes.

Though admirable in execution, and prodigious in colour, the "Descent from the Cross," by Rubens, has, however, nothing Christian about it. Look at that drooping head, those flabby, ponderous limbs, that representation of real death, and you will immediately say, that it is not Christ sleeping the sleep of three days, but a Hercules whose eyes are closed by death for ever. Dissolution has already begun there: the corpse is about to be changed into the elements whence it sprang, and dust to be returned to dust; from pagan death there is no resurrection, and nothing beyond the tomb. Then, again, look at that lusty matron, clothed like those mourners whom the ancients hired to weep at their funerals, and intended for the Virgin, whose faith and resignation ought to stifle all her sobs. How much better did Lesueur comprehend the poetry of Christianity! In the same subject, he is as superior to Rubens for suavity of feeling as he is inferior to him for boldness, brilliancy, and vigour. The force of Lesueur's production is doubtless weakened by the way in which the personages are dispersed; but then how expressive is each head! There, faith has overcome grief, as Christ will triumph over death. Do you not already see too, in Lesueur's painting, the soul of the Saviour shining, like the flame of a sacred lamp, through his transparent body? The head, slightly inclined, appears as if it were asleep only. But it must be owned that Lesueur would have never dared to place the colour of Christ's flesh by the side of a shroud of such dazzling whiteness as that of Rubens, who made it his delight to overcome all difficulties. Titian himself would not have attempted it, without having first flattened the white with one of those golden tints which he seemed to borrow from the rays of the setting sun.

But what do all these mystic dreams matter to Rubens? Is he not the painter of life, of vigorous life, the poet of hearty health, that has never faded from the fever of thought? Do you think that he admired the old Flemish masters with their emaciated saints? Strong and robust figures, boatmen, blacksmiths, and Flemish peasants will now ever live on his canvas as the representatives of apostles, saints, martyrs, or executioners. Jupiter, Hercules, Antinous, and Mercury there lend their features, in turn, to the God of Christians; while the Loves and the Angels, represented by chubby, round-headed Belgians, are scarcely able to find support upon their wings.

It could not, however, be expected that the fame acquired by Rubens would fail of exciting the envy and even the injustice of his contemporaries. His mode of living at Antwerp was the beau-ideal of an artist's existence. His house possessed such a collection of works of art, of pictures, statues, busts, vases, and other objects of curiosity and elegance, as gave it the appearance of a princely museum. His establishment also comprehended a collection of wild beasts, which he kept as living models for those hunting pieces, and other representations of savage animals which have never been surpassed. Owing no doubt, in a great measure, to the splendour with which he was surrounded, Rubens found himself all at once assailed by those who were most indebted to him for assistance. It was insinuated with the most audacious effrontery that he owed the best part of his reputation, in the great variety of works for which he was celebrated, to the talents of his pupils, Synders and Wildens, whom he occasionally employed in forwarding the animals and landscapes in some of his pictures. Cornelius Schut, who was in want of employment, accused him of want of invention; Abraham Jansens had the hardihood to defy him at a trial of strength; and even Theodore Rombouts ventured to vilify his works. Rubens replied to their accusations in a manner worthy of a great artist. He relieved the necessities of Schut, by providing him employment; to the challenge of Jansens, he good-humouredly said, "that his pictures had long since passed the ordeal of the connoisseurs of Italy and Spain, and that Jansens was at liberty to expose his in the same way, when and wherever he pleased;" and he replied to the sarcasms of Rombouts by exhibiting his famous "Descent from the Cross." And the more effectually to establish his claim to the title of universal painter, he finished with his own hands some of his most admirable landscapes, his lion-hunts, and other miscellaneous subjects, and thus covered his calumniators with shame and confusion.

Rubens' mode of working now was to make small sketches, slightly but distinctly; these were delivered to his pupils, who executed pictures from them on a larger scale, which they carried forward almost to the last stage, when Rubens took them up himself. He himself never painted without having read to him some passages of history or of poetry, and this constant accumulation of knowledge had enriched his mind with inexhaustible resources.

For the success of the various negotiations entrusted to him by the Archduke and the Infanta Isabella, Rubens was often beholden to his pencil, and his frequent presence at the different courts increased the brilliancy of his style, which was naturally sumptuous. It was near 1619. The truce of twelve years, signed between Spain and Holland, had almost expired. Drained of its resources, Belgium longed for peace. The national party alone was aroused to activity by the voice of Barneveldt, who soon died upon the scaffold with a stoicism worthy of the times of antiquity. The field was now left open to the intrigues of the Prince of Orange; devoured by ambition, Maurice harboured the project of secretly allying himself with Spain, and the Archduke Albert lent a complaisant ear to his insinuations. But, seduced by the illusion of an alliance with England, Philip III. would listen to no one but the Count of Gondomar, his ambassador at London. The latter gave him to understand that the Prince of Wales, afterwards Charles I., was determined on making a descent into Holland in favour of Spain, and on demanding the hand of the Infanta in marriage; while, on his side, Louis XIII., in order to counterbalance the influence of England united to that of the French Protestants, proposed to the King of Spain an offensive alliance against Holland, that focus of heresy. During Philip III.'s hesitations, the Archduke Albert redoubled his efforts in order to affect a pacification between the two countries. A lady of the name of Tserclaes, of noble birth, a firm Catholic, and already advanced in age,* served as an intermediary between him and the Prince of Orange, who had now only to be satisfied respecting the price of his defection, when the King of Spain was overtaken by death. Peace was so imperiously necessary to the belligerent parties, that hostilities were not begun immediately on the expiration of the truce; the negotiations were continued, and Rubens and the lady named Tserclaes were the principal agents employed to carry them on. The former had the hope of surrounding Isabella with a national party free from Spanish influence, and capable of restoring riches and repose to di-consolate Belgium. These were the motives which actuated Rubens in imposing silence on all his other feelings of patriotism; in him, the artist outweighed the citizen. The complications of the thirty years' war, and the elevation of Richelieu to power, had increased the difficulties attending the negotiations. The Sieur de Baugy, a Frenchman, residing at Brussels, denounced the influence exercised by the painter on the mind of Isabella as dangerous, and attributed all his political manœuvres to his love of money. The Sieur d'Espesses, another of Richelieu's emissaries, and who resided at the Hague, declared him to be a plotter of intrigues, and asserted that the lady named Tserclaes was his tool.

All these circumstances did not prevent Rubens from still devoting a great deal of time to painting; but it would nevertheless be a mystery how he managed to execute so many works, if we were not acquainted with his mode of life. He used to rise at four in the morning, attend mass, and then enter his studio. As he greatly dreaded the influence exercised by good living on the imagination, he was always very frugal in his diet. In the evening, when it was fine, he generally rode round the ramparts of Antwerp, on one of those spirited Andalusian horses which, with their gracefully-formed necks and tails touching the ground, served him as models. He seldom paid visits to any one, but always gave a hearty welcome to those who came to his own house. The supper-hour was usually enlivened by the presence of his friends, chiefly of men learned in letters or eminent as painters; among the former were Gaspard Gevartius and Nicholas Roekox. He also kept up an extensive correspondence with the artists and learned men of every country; in Italy, with Jerome Oleander and Duquesnoy, the sculptor; and in France, with Dupuy and De Thou, the former of whom is so celebrated

What a love for a learned fossil! Peirese was desirous of going to Flanders to visit Rubens, but above all to see Chrysippus.

"I cannot," continued he, "be sufficiently grateful for his politeness, nor speak highly enough of his great virtue and eminent qualities, both with respect to his profound erudition and surprising knowledge, and to his dexterity and skill in affairs of the world; neither can I sufficiently praise the excellence of his touch, and the great charm of his conversation, which afforded me such pleasure as I had not experienced for some time past."

It was through Peirese that Rubens obtained a privilege for the sale of his engravings in France, but which afterwards gave rise to a law-suit, in which he was accused of draining the kingdom, by means of his plates, of enormous sums of money. Rubens and Peirese mutually informed each other of political in literature, and the latter so well known by his tragical end; but his principal correspondent was Peirese, the illustrious antiquary of Provence, whom Balzac styled, in his valuable letters, a piece of the wreck of antiquity, a relic of the golden age. "I have seen with the greatest pleasure," wrote the candid Peirese to the mayor of Antwerp, "the inventory of the cabinet of M. Rubens, to whom I beg you to present my most humble thanks for all the polite offers he has deigned to make me. I will do my utmost to be of use to him in whatever he employs me, being unable sufficiently to admire the richness of his figures. I should like to make a journey into your country, to obtain a sight of them, and, above all, of the fine heads of Cicero, Seneca, and Chrysippus, of which I should probably steal a little sketch, if he allowed me." *

news, of the progress made in literature, the arts and sciences, and were continually sending one another publications written in every language of Europe. At one time, Rubens was delighted by receiving from his friend inscriptions and impressions taken from antique stones and cameos, in diva vulva com ale di papilion, † and at another time, it was Rubens who sent to Provence the mechanism of perpetual motion, discovered by one of his friends, and which filled him with enthusiasm. Then he afterwards launched into dissertations on his theory of the human figure, on chemical operations, hermaphrodites, the marriage of the sun with the moon, and the harmony of worlds. Aspirations of intelligence towards the regions of the absolute, whither all human notions, similar to the rays of the sun, converge towards eternal truth! But Rubens soon again became a positive being and a man of the world. According to his "Theory of the Human Figure," which is a miscellaneous collection of personal reminiscences and opinions that Rubens wrote on the margin of his sketch-books, man made in the image of God is the prototype of beauty in this world; the beauty of woman is of a second order only, a derivative from the beauty of man, though it surpasses the latter in elegance and grace. From the time of his first fall, man is there said to have remained in a continual state of gradual degeneracy, and to have henceforth borrowed from animals their features and instincts. This is one of the numerous contradictions of Rubens, who will shortly tell us, first of all, that the type of man is absolute, and independent of his nature; and then he will go on to say that he is composed of all the elements of the universe. He ascribes the formation of the human figure to the three geometrical principles of the cube, the sphere, and the pyramid. The sphere presides over are prominent, the thighs thick, and they decrease in the form of a pyramid down to the foot, the heel of which is well developed. The muscles are tumular in shape.

The third type is distinguished by a more spare habit of body, by the largeness of the bones, the length of the head, the development of the arms, the thighs, and the legs, by the flatness of the stomach, the firmness of the flesh, and the prominence of the tendons, which resemble cords, and raise the skin that covers them. The gladiator aiming a blow at his adversary, while guarding himself from the one with which he is threatened, is an example of this type.

A fourth model of physical vigour only exists, according to Rubens, in the imagination of artists: this is Christ—the Christ to whom the painter lends, in the course of his works, the thunder-bolts of Jupiter to chastise the world with!

the formation of the head, the cube over that of the trunk, and it is according to the principles of the pyramid that the limbs of men gradually taper in bulk towards their extremities. From the cube proceed strong and robust bodies, heroes, and athletes. The ancients recognised three types of force.

The first type is represented by the Farnese Hercules, to which the sculptor has given the most characteristic features of the lion, the bull, and the horse; for the hair of Hercules bears a perfect resemblance to the mane of the lion and the horse, his forehead takes after that of the bull and the lion, while the nape of his neck, with the part where it joins the shoulders, is as fleshy and muscular as the neck of the bull.

The second type, which is superior in elegance to the first, has more elevation in the breast, more firmness in the muscles of the stomach, wider shoulders, and longer arms. The hips

From the sphere are derived the round forms of woman: the elevation of the back, the shoulders, the breast, the stomach, and all her outlines. In imitation of the statues of antiquity, it is here said that beauty ought to be neither thin nor stout. Firm flesh, both white and of a pale red, a mixture of roses and lilies, of milk and blood—a graceful face; a white, slender neck, as flexible as the swan's; wide shoulders; a round arm; a soft, long hand and fingers; a smooth, full and somewhat prominent bosom, with firm breasts, slightly separated; the lower part of the back strong, and thin at the waist, with the bust nearly triangular; the stomach firm; the upper part of the back flat, but bending in towards the middle; depressed shoulders; strong thighs; a round knee; a stout leg, tapering gracefully down to the foot, which must be small and high in the instep—such ought, in the eyes of Rubens, to be the beauty of woman. And yet he has too often given her masculine forms, and has ever chosen his virgins among those rubicund, large-limbed beauties that are employed to represent Liberty and Republics. To be convinced of this, you have only to look at the picture representing "The Entombment," where you will see that the Magdalene is a strapping wench from a Flemish tavern. Her hair, which grows low down her enormous neck, touches the ground, after falling over her eyes which are streaming with tears. She is kneeling down, and holds in her hands the nails used for the crucifixion, while Mary, with her mouth wide open, is bellowing out her maternal grief.

This Latin manuscript was copied by Mr. Maurice Johnson, of Spalding in Lincolnshire, and presented by him to the society of Antiquaries. It is said that the original is at Paris, but we have neither been able to find this nor another work, entitled "De Coloribus," and attributed to Rubens. Towards the end of 1772, Jombert, a bookseller at Paris, bought at the Huquier sale, a collection of copper-plates engraved after the drawings of Rubens, and a collection of Latin annotations which had already been translated into French, but very badly. Jombert had them translated again; but he carried his ignorance so far as to suppress, under the pretext of their being dreams, two chapters by Rubens, one of which treated of the cabala and chemistry, and the other of the primitive formation of man, first created an hermaphrodite, and then divided into two sexes, as is seen in the "Drama of Human Life," by Giorgione, in the marriage of the moon with the sun. But Cardan, Albert Durer, Paolo Lomazzo, Vincent Scamozzi, and many others, had already formed theories of the same kind.

"Those large harmonious proportions which Lomazzo discovers in the human body by the numbers and tones of music," says Hilaire Pader, his translator, "testify to the perfect symmetry of our little world: this is why man is called the most perfect work of nature, the image of his Creator, the king of animals, who contains within himself the four elements; so that music not only finds in him the division of its tones, and geometry its points, lines, and figures; but astrology finds its stars there, philosophy its matter and its form, and chemistry the difference between its vessels and its furnaces; and do not be astonished that I have introduced chemistry, for if your nature is not chemical, you will never make a good painter.

"Ships, barks, galleys, and the like, are drawn from the human body, like Noah's ark. Those who measured our little world divided the body into six feet, the foot into six degrees, and the degree into five minutes, which made the number of sixty degrees, or of three hundred minutes, which they compared to as many geometrical cubits, by which Noah's ark was also described by Moses; for, as the human body is three hundred minutes long, filty wide, and thirty high, the ark was three hundred cubits long, fifty wide, and forty high."* This book, a mere extract from the large manuscript in which Rubens must have placed a particular article of his will, and which we sought for in vain, is almost entirely void of sense and logic.

Another book of studies has been engraved in twenty sheets by P. Pontius; and a third one, wrongly attributed to Vandeyck, who only furnished two heads for it, by the Comte de Caylus.†

In the "Flight into Egypt" (p. 210), the Virgin, who is enveloped in a hood, is of such gigantic proportions, that she resembles those stone statues which have mural crowns upon their heads to represent cities. But then it is certainly the duty of the Virgin to protect the Infant Jesus and St. Joseph against any accidents which might happen to them on the way. The Holy Family is walking in the moonlight, which might even be taken for day, in consequence of the strong light thrown into this picture by its bold and brilliant colouring.

Marie de Médicis, having been at last reconciled to her son at Angouleme, and having returned to Paris, in 1620, was desirous of enriching her palace of the Luxembourg with the works of a great painter; and sent for Rubens, on the recommendation of the Baron de Vieq, then ambassador from the Archduke Albert and the Infanta Isabella to the court of France.

Rubens lost no time in presenting himself at the house of the baron, by whom he was introduced to the queen, who honoured him with an order for twenty-one pictures, illustrative of the most important events of her life.

He immediately acquainted himself with the history of Marie de Médicis, arranged all the principal events in due order, made spirited sketches of each subject (which are now in the Munich Gallery), and gave them to his pupils to work from, under his continual superintendance. Instead of a real history, however, the painter composed a sort of allegorical poem, each picture of which forms a canto. The whole is a fantastic and turbulent production, in which divinities, with the elements and abstract ideas, are embodied in diverse personages, placed on earth, in the bosom of the ocean, in Olympus and Christian heaven, in the regions of mythology, and the history of France. The predominant passion of the epoch was a passion for allegory. We have already seen that Rubens had imbibed a taste for it from his master, Otto Venius, who wrote on this subject a book illustrated with figures, but which, if we are to believe Reynolds, is, at most, fitted to amuse children. Rubens was prodigal of emblems, and peopled the earth, heaven, and the sea with personages who are astonished at thus seeing themselves assembled. Some are entirely naked, and make a parade of their vigorous frames, which appear animated with real blood, while others, enveloped in flowing drapery, presume on their splendour to take the most haughty airs. Satin, velvet, gold, and precious stones abound beneath the light which they reflect, or of which they drink the rays. But who could, from the first glance, distinguish, without a guide-book, the sense of these allegories, which are ingenious and gross in turn?

The woman playing the violoncello is harmony tuning all the faculties of the princess. The three Fates, those cruel sisters, but who are here represented by three smiling females, are spinning golden days for the child beloved by the gods: Mercury is descending with Eloquence from the heavens; and the fountain of Castalia is pouring forth the poetry of its waters.

Look, too, at Jupiter and Juno, seated on the clouds. They are talking of the marriage of the Florentine princess with Henri. Gentle conspiracy! Love has presented the prince with the portrait of Marie de Médicis; Ilymen is praising her beauty to him, and France her virtues, while two Cupids are taking away his helmet and his shield, as if to banish, for a moment, all thoughts of war and valour from his heart, now possessed with love.

Here, the bishop of Marseilles comes beneath his canopy to meet the queen. Dressed in a blue tunic, studded with golden lilies, France receives her sovereign on a bridge of boats. In order to protect the yacht which has brought her, Neptune, followed by his marine family, has accompanied it to Marseilles—three syrens, lovely females, with fishes' tails, are sporting lasciviously in the sea, which dashes its foam against their muscular bodies; the lusty Tritons are sounding their shells, and Fame is shooting through the fiery sky of Provence, in order to spread abroad the news of the queen's safe arrival.

There, is the city of Lyons, which, personified by a female seated on a car drawn by two lions, bestrode by two Cupids, is coming to meet the king and queen, who are seated, under the forms of Jupiter and Juno, in Olympus: the king is sitting on the back of an eagle, and the queen is in a car with two peacocks, the emblems of haughty power. The tails of the birds are more dazzling than the rainbow.

Further on, Mercury, the god of eloquence and theft—an ingenious thought of antiquity, and still so applicable to the present times—appears, unblushingly, in a perfect state of nudity, and in the company of Cardinal de la Rochefoucauld, before Marie de Mélicis, to offer her an olive-branch, as a sign of reconciliation with her son, Louis XIII.

The picture representing "The Departure of Henri IV. for the War in Germany," is less loaded with useless ornaments. The portraits contained in it are admirable. Rubens was fond of surrounding his portraits, though perhaps not so much as Vandyck, with black drapery which brings out the features in such prominent relief, and shows the brilliancy of fresh flesh-colours to such advantage. Here, the queen is attired in a violet-coloured dress, which produces a charming effect, full of originality.

In order to astonish the spectator, Rubens seems to have exhausted all the resources of his theatrical style in the execution of the Luxembourg gallery. These paintings, which are now in the Louvre, are all prodigies, with respect to the boldness of their style, and the brilliancy of their colouring. In producing them, art gave birth to a fairy-piece and revelled in a debauch at the same time. They were worked in tapestry, a few years ago, at the Gobelins. Rubens is, above all, an illustrious decorator.

Towards the end of the month of May, 1625, the painter came to Paris, in order to finish there the two last pictures of the gallery; and the queen, who was fond of his society, had a seat reserved for her in his studio. Having one day been introduced by M. Bauru, in compliance with the wishes of the queen, into a drawing-room full of the ladies of the court, Rubens said to the former:—

"Madame la Duchesse de Guéménéé shines above all by her charming loveliness and elegance."

"She is, indeed," replied M. de Bauru, "a woman of remarkable beauty, a wonder of the world."

"Is there among my ladies," asked the queen, "some time after, of the artist, "any one superior in beauty to the women you have admired in your travels?"

"If I were Paris," answered Rubens, "I should give the golden apple to the Duchesse de Guéménéé."

"You are an excellent judge," remarked her majesty.*

It was during his residence at Paris that Rubens first met the Duke of Buckingham, the favourite of Charles I., so celebrated for the audacity of his gallantry towards queens, his political follies, and his magnificent extravagance. This acquaintance soon grew into the most intimate familiarity; and when Rubens was afterwards visited at Antwerp by the English minister, the painter consented to part with the collection which formed the glory of his cabinet, for 100,000 Brabantian florins, according to Michel, for 100,000 Dutch florins, according to Houbraken, and for £10,000 sterling, according to Walpole. Rubens reserved to himself the right, however, of taking casts of the antiques. Among other articles delivered to Michel le Blond for the Duke, were a hundred pictures, nineteen of which were by Titian, twenty-one by Bassan, thirteen by P. Veronese, eight by Palma, seventeen by Tintoretto, three by Leonardo da Vinci, three by Raffaele, and thirteen by Rubens.† Houbraken and Sandrart think the price given for the collection very exorbitant; and the former, therefore, assures us that Rubens "knew how to procure money in every way;" and the other, "that he had the reputation of not being very generous, and that he was accused by many of keeping very tight hold of his crown-pieces." Without carrying avarice to the extent that Rembrandt did—because he was, above all, desirous of appearing well-bred in the eyes of the world, and full of that vanity inherent in the merchants of Belgium and Holland, in whom the love of the arts originated, perhaps, in ostentation and the wish to display their opulence—Rubens was troubled all his life with a thirst for gold. He had scarcely terminated the pictures for the Luxembourg, when he began to complain bitterly to his friend Peirese of not being paid: Io mi stuffo di questa corte.‡ Then, as he seems to have been compromised by his opinions in the esteem of Richelieu, and to have lost, in consequence, a splendid order, he never leaves off praising the generosity of the Duke of Buckingham, and ironically compares to it the paltry gratitude of sovereigns. An alchemist, who was in search of the philosopher's stone, having offered to divide the fruit of his operations with Rubens, if he would advance the funds necessary to prepare the furnaces, the painter replied: "You have come too late; for I have already found the philosopher's stone on my pallet. And these," added he, pointing to his pencils, "have long since obtained the magic power of turning all they touch into gold." His mercantile activity did not allow him time for thinking, but made him work, as it were, by the yard and day, like a common house-decorator, and caused his inexhaustible pencils to throw their flowing colours over his canvas, like streams in a plain.

Following the example of Raffaele, Rubens surrounded himself with a crowd of young painters, most of whom afterwards became, in their turn, great masters: Vandyck, Jordaens, Gaspar de Crayer, Van Egmont, Diepenbeck, Cornelius Schut, Erasmus Quellinus, Mompert, Wildens, Lucas van Uden, and Francis Sneyders, formed a constellation that gravitated round his genius. While some worked at his historical pieces and tableaux de genre, others were occupied on landscapes and animals. Faithful to the processes employed by the master, the pencil of the pupil has sometimes deceived the most practised eye.

The immense pictures sketched by Rubens at Paris for the gallery of the Luxembourg, and painted in his studio at Antwerp, in two years, according to Michel,§ were first of all executed, collectively, by his pupils, and then finished off by the bold and brilliant touches of the master.

In order to extend his fame by means of engravings, he guided the burin of Bolswert, Paul Dupont, and Lucas Vosterman, his most faithful interpreters; and he himself executed some etchings full of character. He was so much the fashion, that recourse was often had to his fine touch for the titles of books, vignettes, tail-pieces, and figures in missals. At the market held on Friday at Antwerp, says Campo Weyermann, a considerable trade was carried on, though for the most part fraudulent, in various kinds of works, which greedy dealers sent to every country under the name of Rubens.

In the course of the month of July, 1626, he had the misfortune to lose his wife, Isabella Brandt, who left him two sons, Albert and Nicholas. She was buried by the side of his mother in the abbey church of St. Michael, the altar of which Rubens decorated with a painting which had been executed for the church of Sante Croce in Rome, but which, when terminated, was too large for the place it was originally intended for. His grief at his severe domestic affliction was very great, and he says to his friend Valavès: "Yes, I have lost an excellent partner; one might—what do I say!—one ought to cherish her memory from principle, for she had none of the faults of her sex, etc." But Houbraken maliciously observes, that she had, on the contrary, one very serious fault—that of loving her husband and his pupil, Vandyck, at the same time. The painter, it is said, afterwards revenged himself on Isabella for her infidelity, in some of his pictures, and particularly in the one representing the "Last Judgment," in which a devil is seen holding her in his claws and dragging her into the flames.

Holland had, however, resumed hostilities. The war of Germany afforded her unheard-of assistance. Richelieu did all he could to isolate Spain, while Philip IV. never ceased attempting to effect an alliance with England. Entrusted with the negotiations for this purpose, Rubens saw perfectly well that Spain absolutely required an auxiliary force in order to protect her against the audacious and persevering genius of Richelieu. This was his reason for undertaking a journey to the frontiers of Holland, in order to come to an understanding with Sir B. Gerbier, the English resident at the Hague. This journey had all the appearance of an artistic tour.

"After the death of his wife," says Sandrart, "Rubens wished to dispel his grief by travelling. He set out, in consequence, for Holland, with the intention of seeing the artists of that country. He visited Honthorst—of whom he bought

I could enter into long details about this journey, and the agreeable conversation of Rubens: let it suffice for me to say, that if he excelled in his art, he also possessed every kind of merit; and he was, in consequence, universally respected.

The correspondence of Rubens and the Duke of Buckingham was occasionally of a political nature, and was regularly communicated to the King of Spain. A secret disposition existed in both countries to terminate all differences, and it was therefore arranged, by the advice of the Marquis Spinola, prime minister to the Archduchess Isabella, that Rubens should go to Madrid, to lay before the king all matters relative to his correspondence with the Duke of Buckingham, and to receive instructions for a proposed mission to the court of England.

Philip IV. sent for Rubens in consequence, and the ambassador set out in the month of August, 1628. In his letters dated at this epoch, Rubens speaks of the immorality of the court, the insolence of the nobility, and the decay of Spanish monarchy. Among the number of his works which he left in Spain are, "The Rape of the Sabines," "The Reconciliation of the Romans with the Sabines," "The Triumph of the Church" (this subject had been already painted by Titian, for Philip II., whose sombre melancholy was sometimes to see him work; that he has already painted the portraits of all the members of the royal family, and that, too, with the greatest ease in the world, in their presence."

"I beg of you," he also writes to one of his friends, the mayor of Antwerp, "to take my little Albert, that alter ego, not into your office, but into your museum. I love the child, and it is to you, the pontiff of the muses, that I commend him, so that, together with my father-in-law and my brother Brandt, you may take care of him, either during my lifetime or after my death."

John, Duke of Braganza, afterwards King of Portugal, having sent Rubens an invitation to come and see him, the painter paid him a visit at his hunting-seat at Villaviriosa. Several Spanish and Flemish gentlemen accompanied the artist. But the prince, on being informed of the approaching arrival of so many visitors, sent a horseman forward to tell Rubens that his highness could not receive him, as important business had called him suddenly to Lisbon. At the same time, Rubens was begged to accept the sum of fifty pistoles.

enlivened by the painter's smiling images), "Venus and Adonis," "Diana and Actæon," and "The Rape of Europa," which are copies by Rubens after Titian, and are, according to Raffaele Mengs, works full of judgment and finesse. The originals were intended for Charles I., when Prince of Wales; but he never possessed them, since, instead of marrying the Infanta, as Spain had once hoped he would, he became the husband of Henrietta of France. At the request of the Duke of Olivarez, Rubens decorated the chapel of the convent of Carmelite nuns, painted "The Martyrdom of St. Andrew," five portraits of Philip IV. and Elizabeth of Bourbon, with those of the Duke of Olivarez himself, and the grandees of the court. In a letter, dated from Madrid,* the painter apologizes to his friend Peirese "for not having been to see him in Provence before going to Spain, tells him that he has just commenced the portrait of the king on horseback, at which his majesty is so remarkably pleased, that he comes every day

Smiling at the avarice of the monarch, Rubens expressed his regret at the sudden departure of his noble amphitryon, but refused the fifty pistoles, adding that he had taken care to bring a thousand with him, to defray the expenses of his visit. Being overtaken by night, Rubens and his companions were obliged to seek for hospitality in a convent. The next day, as the painter was looking round the church during mass, he was struck by the sight of a picture which seemed to him to have been executed by his own hand. He remained lost in conjectures as to what school the mysterious chef-d'œuvre could belong, and to what hand it owed its origin. Several monks, on being interrogated one after the other, seemed, by their systematic silence, to take a secret pleasure in the impatience of the stranger, who stood with his eyes riveted on the silent canvas. At last, after repeated entreaties, the prior said: "We cannot acquaint you with the name of him who executed this picture." "I beg of you," answered the artist, "to tell me; it is Rubens, the painter, who entreats you."

At this celebrated name, the monk turned pale, and added:

* Lettre à Peirese.

"He who painted this picture is dead to the world: he is a monk."

"A monk!" exclaimed Rubens; "light under a bushel!" and he added: "Father, tell me his name, with that of the convent in which he is. He must leave; for heaven has endowed him with genius to make it blaze like a torch in the eyes of men."

Vanquished by the struggle within him, the monk, faithful to Christian humility, staggered and fell down in a swoon on the pavement of the chapel; and, a short time after, he had ceased to breathe.

Rubens left Spain with the title of Secretary to the Privy Council,—a post which afterwards descended to his son Albert,† and fresh instructions respecting the projected alliance with England. Philip IV. had, however, only been able to give Rubens titles and orders. Money was so scarce at the court of Madrid, that in order to pay the artist for the pictures he had executed, the king was obliged to give him a draft on the Infanta, or rather on "those good Belgian provinces which enjoyed the well-known reputation of never allowing the bills of their sovereigns to be dishonoured."‡

Rubens arrived in Paris on the 21st of May, and, a few days after, reached Brussels, whence he immediately set out for London. But his friend and protector, the Duke of Buckingham, had been assassinated by Felton. Charles I., however, took a liking to the painter; and it was eventually arranged between the monarch and Rubens that England and Spain should mutually send each other a plenipotentiary, while waiting till peace was officially concluded; and while the Chancellor, Lord Francis Cottington, arrived at Madrid, Don Carlos Colonna arrived in London.

"My Lord Carlisle hath twice in one week most magnificently lauded the Spanish ambassador, and Mons. Rubens also, the agent who prepared the way for his coming."§ As soon as he had accomplished his mission, the artist went back to Antwerp, and only returned to London to be present at the signing of the treaty, in the month of December, 1633. In order to give the painter a public mark of his esteem, Charles knighted him, and made him a present of a magnificent sword and a diamond collar.

The presence of Rubens at the court of Charles I. gave a notable impulse to the taste for the fine arts in England. It was then that those private collections, which are at present so famous, commenced. Under the reign of Charles I., the price of pictures and other objects of art was trebled in Europe. It was by the advice of Rubens that the King of England purchased the fine cartoons which were being sold in Holland, and the collection of the Duke of Mantua, which did not cost less than twenty thousand pounds. The pictures of the ceiling of the Banqueting House at Whitehall are characterised by that false allegorical taste with which the artist has already been reproached. In "The Apotheosis of James I." the Virtues are represented by members of Parliament, and Prudence, under the form of Apollo, holds in her hand a horn of plenty. Rubens received three thousand pounds for his paintings at Whitehall, and they were repaired in 1780 by Cipriani.||

One of the most eminent personages of England, on seeing Rubens at his easel one day, said:

"The ambassador of His Catholic Majesty, I see, amuses himself by painting sometimes."

"I amuse myself by playing the ambassador sometimes," replied Rubens, in order to raise the dignity of art above diplomatic pride.

Fresh fermentations existed in the heart of the Walloon provinces; the cause of Holland carried the Flemish provinces with it; Richelieu, triumphant, boldly plotted intrigues, and showered his gold plentifully about. Furnished with a passport from the Prince of Orange, Rubens set out to again negotiate with Holland, in the name of Spain, when the deputies from the States protested against the extraordinary power vested in the artist. The Duke d'Arsehot hastened to overtake him, and insisted on his giving up his diplomatic papers. On this occasion, Rubens acted with such humility and weakness as to render his conduct quite unworthy of a man, and especially of a man of genius; this did not, however, prevent the Duke d'Arsehot from sending him a letter full of aristocratic arrogance, but entirely void of dignity. "I might well have omitted," wrote the duke, "doing you the honour to reply to you, for having so far forgotten your duty as not to come to me in person, instead of playing the confidant by writing me this letter, which is proper between equals, since I was at the tavern from eleven o'clock till half-past twelve, and returned there in the evening at half-past five, and since you have had leisure enough to speak to me; all that I have to say to you is, that I shall be very glad for you to learn how henceforth people of your sort ought to write to those of mine, etc."*

Isabella was weak enough to recall her ambassador, who, retiring from public life, again found in the arts those joys which politics had for a moment deprived him of. The death of the Infanta, at last, released him for ever from the enervating atmosphere of the court; and on the 6th of December, 1630, he married, at Antwerp, Helena Forment, a beautiful young girl of sixteen, who, by giving him five children, crowned his old age, that poetic ruin, with fruit and flowers. But, according to Campo Weyermann, Rubens soon discovered "that the court, a beautiful young wife, and that ugly visitor, the gout, are three blessings which an old man could well dispense with."

After the dreadful battle of Nordlingen, the Cardinal-Infant Ferdinand, brother to Philip IV., came to take possession of the government of the Netherlands. The city of Antwerp received him, with great pomp, within its walls, in the month of May, 1635. Rubens, who directed the pageant, himself made the slightly-coloured sketches which ornamented the eleven triumphal arches through which the prince passed.

"Your glory and fame, sir," said Rubens, in a letter to his countryman, the sculptor Duquesnoy, who had just finished the statue of St. Peter's at Rome, "reflect on our entire nation. If my age, and that dreadful gout which is consuming me, did not detain me here, I would set out directly to go and admire with my own eyes things so worthy of praise. But since I cannot be allowed this pleasure, I at least hope to have that of soon seeing you among us here again, and I do not doubt but that our cherished country will some day be proud of the works with which you have enriched it. Heaven grant that this may happen before death, which will shortly close my eyes for ever, deprives me of the inexpressible joy of contemplating the wonders executed by that skilful hand, which I now kiss from the very bottom of my heart."† This letter had scarcely reached its destination, when Rubens succumbed to an attack of gout, on the 30th of May, 1640, aged sixty-two years, eleven months.

* "J'eusse bien peu obmettre de vous faire l'honneur de vous répondre pour avoir si notablement manqué à votre devoir de venir me trouver en personne sans faire le confidant à m'escire ce billet qui est bon pour personnes égales, puisque j'ay esté depuis onze heures jusqu'à douze heures et demie à la taverne, et y suis retourné le soir à cinq heures et demie, et vous avez eu assez de loisir pour me parler. . . . Tout ce que je puis vous dire, c'est que je seray bien ayse que vous appreniez dorénavant comme doivent escire à des gens de ma sorte ceux de la vostre, etc."

The magistrates, the clergy, the nobles, the citizens, and the people of Antwerp, all followed the coffin containing the remains of the painter to the collegiate church of St. James, where it was placed in the vault belonging to the Foiment family. Three days after, a funeral service was celebrated in honour of the deceased, with such pomp as would flatter the pride of kings, and which reminded those present of the style of the artist's paintings.

His cabinet was found filled with things of considerable value, consisting of jewels, objects of art, and curiosities of every description; it also contained six gold chains, and several rings, with which he had been presented by various sovereigns, and his diamond hat-loop, which he received from Charles I., and which was worth 10,000 crowns. Ivory sculptures, rock crystals, antique and modern medals, agates, onyxes, cornelian stones, and more than two hundred and thirty pictures, of which the hand of Rubens himself had executed ninety-three, while the others were the productions of Italian, Flemish, and Dutch painters, were assembled in the artist's brilliant cabinet, and were afterwards sold for more than forty thousand pounds.*

Rubens had reigned triumphant in all the branches of his art—in historical and allegorical pieces, in tableaux de genre, in landscapes, in portraits, in animals, in fruit and flowers. Resembling that horn of plenty which the painter seems to have taken such pleasure in introducing everywhere in his works as an emblem of his own genius, his fecundity was inexhaustible.

Like most master colourists, he made the sketches with the brush; and this was the cause of the negligence and looseness with which he is reproached in his outline. More brilliant with respect to light and freshness than the Venetians—those much admired masters—he was below them in harmony, mind, elegance, and majesty. Formed out of the extremes of two delicate and two glaring colours, his colouring, badly blended, is sometimes crude, and, like baskets of flowers, his paintings give you the headache at last. It is in his grounds that Rubens has made the nearest approach to harmony; and he seems to have formed them by uniting all the colours of his pallet.

Though his portraits possess more relief and life than those of Titian or Vandyck, they have neither the calm grandeur of the former's, nor all the delicacy of the latter's; but the one called the "Chapeau de Paille," with which he would never part, is a perfect wonder.

In his landscapes he sometimes vies with nature in the transparency and the floating vapours of the air. This is generally observable in views taken near his lovely château at Steen, between Malines and Vilvorde, and animated by dramatic incidents, sun-beams, storms, or rainbows.

Less learned in antiquity than Poussin, who, by his nature, belonged more to antique times than to his own age, and who preferred statues to his best friends, Rubens only excels in the coarser types of mythology, such as fawns, satyrs, and followers of Silenus.

Silenus is stupefied by drink and his triumph. Full of wine to the throat, his way is impeded by heavy festoons. Where will that suspended foot stumble? Will Silenus burst when he falls? Ah! save that pitcher which Bacchus has filled! Calm yourself; the vigilant god will guide his old friend with an invisible hand, and, if he were to fall by accident, fear nothing, for wine, like the oil used by the athletes of antiquity, renders the limbs pliant.

Rubens liked none but the larger animals—the horse, the bull, the tiger, and the lion—in order to have the pleasure of playing with the study of their powerful muscles.

Physical life overflows in the works of Rubens, and undulates like the air of the sky or the waves of the sea; and yet the soul of those who contemplate his paintings is seized at last with a sort of weariness. The painter was accustomed to represent all ages and all conditions at the same time; and it is always the same types that meet our gaze. "Rubens had the fault of being rather too Flemish," says M. de Reiffenberg.

By his display of materiality, his profusion of pageantry, his glare of colours, but, above all, the absence of thought, Rubens is apt to fatigue the mind; but he has given soft rolls of beautifully fresh-coloured flesh to burning and lascivious natures, that exhaust themselves without loving or being loved, for the women of Rubens have no soul. Among all his cold and heartless beauties, those theatrical Syrens who are at the same time the intoxication and the punishment of the sensual man, is there even one whose features are sufficiently sublime to remind you of those heroines who save nations, of those worthy mothers who give their country men of thought and martyrs, or of those angelic creatures who, in their gentleness and power, lean in turn over the cradle of the infant, the bed of the old man, and the pallet of the poor, and whose hearts and goodness are blessed by all?

Of all ancient or modern painters mentioned in history, Peter Paul Rubens is the most fertile. The etchings executed by his own hand are, "St. Francis receiving the Stigmata;" "Mary Magdalene Penitent;" "A Woman holding a lighted candle, with a Boy lighting another by it;" Paul Dupont or Vorsterman has lent his graver to finish this etching, which is now very rare; and "The Portrait of an Old Man," with a beard and a furred cap.

Rubens has likewise left an innumerable quantity of cartoons, and of finished and unfinished drawings, with a really fabulous number of paintings.

Fifty engravers have been employed in reproducing his works. Among the most celebrated of these artists are Lucas Vorsterman, C. Galle, Bolswert, Suyderhoff, C. Vischer, Pene, Hollar, L. Van Uden, and J. Meysens.

The Bibliothèque Nationale, at Paris, possesses, in the Cabinet des Estampes, five folio volumes, containing a part of the engraved works of Rubens.

M. Van Hasselt, in the catalogue he drew up in 1840, after Smith's "Catalogue Raisonné," and which is placed at the end of his "Histoire de la Vie et des Ouvrages de Rubens," attributes 1,461 compositions to him.

All the public galleries of Europe, all the large cabinets of private persons, and half the churches of Belgium, contain paintings by this celebrated artist.

The Louvre possesses forty-three, of which twenty are composed of large allegorical subjects forming the Médiéis gallery, and which formerly ornamented the palace of the Luxembourg. The following are the subjects of them:—

"The Destiny of Marie de Médiéis;" "Her Birth;" "Her Education;" "Henri IV. receiving the Portrait of Marie de Médiéis;" "His Marriage with her;" "The Debarkation of Marie de Médiéis at Marseilles;" "The Marriage of Henri IV. celebrated at Lyons;" "The Birth of Louis XIII.;" "Henri IV. confiding the Government to the Queen;" "The Coronation of Marie de Médiéis;" "The Apotheosis of Henri IV.;" "The Government of the Queen;" "The Journey of Marie de Médiéis to the Port of Cádiz;" "The Exchange of the Princesses;" "The Happiness of the Regency;" "The Majority of Louis XIII.;" "The Flight of the Queen to the Château de Blois;" "Her Reconciliation with her Son;" "Peace concluded;" "The Interview of Marie de Médiéis with her Son;" and "The Triumph of Truth."

These twenty-three paintings, with the portraits of Francis, Duke of Tuscany, Jeanne d'Autriche, and Marie de Médiéis, the latter of whom is represented in the character of Bellona, were valued together, under the Restoration, at £140,000.

In the same gallery with these paintings is the fine portrait of Richardot, President of the Council of the Netherlands, long attributed to Vandyck, valued, under the Empire, at £1,080, and under the Restoration at £1,600; with the portrait of Baron de Vieq, which, as it was historically valuable to France, was purchased for the Louvre, at the King of Holland's sale, for 7,025 francs, about 4600. It has been already seen that it was the Baron de Vicq who procured Rubens the order for the Médicis gallery. The same gallery, moreover, contains "Lot and his Daughters," a little painting, in which freshness is allied to grace, and which was valued at £1,600 under the Empire, and at £2,140 under the Restoration; "The Triumph of Religion," a work which, remarkable for grandeur of composition, was intended, it is said, to be reproduced in tapestry, and which was valued at £1,600 under the Empire, and at £3,200 under the Restoration; "Tomyris, Queen of the Scythians," one of the best works of Rubens, and valued by the connoisseurs of the Empire at £2,880, and by those of the Restoration at £3,200; "The Village Fête," a work full of vigour, boldness, and tumult, valued at £3,200 by the Empire, and at £4,000 by the Restoration; and the transparent landscape of "The Rainbow," valued under the Empire at £1,100, and at £1,600 under the Restoration.

The Musée de Grenoble possesses one; namely, "St. Gregory, the Pope," surrounded by male and female saints.

The Musée de Lyon contains two, the first of which represents "St. Francis, St. Dominic, and several other saints, protecting the world from the wrath of Jesus Christ;" the other is "The Adoration of the Magi."

The Musée de Nantes contains an allegory, representing "Civil War and Fanaticism" (much esteemed); "The Head of Hercules," on wood, and highly coloured; "A Portrait of Isabella Brandt," the artist's first wife; different "Studies of Figures," painted on wood; "The Holy Family with Angels," a small easel-piece; and "The Flight into Egypt," another little piece, signed with the initials P. P. R. The landscape of this has been executed by another hand.

In the Musée Bibliothèque du Havre there are three paintings by Rubens, the first of which represents "Autumn,

The Musée de Marseille possesses "The Prince of Orange and his Family," "A Boar Hunt," "The Adoration of the Shepherds," "The Flagellation," and "The Resurrection."

The Musée de Toulouse possesses "Christ between the Two Thieves." This is a large picture, and one of the finest of Rubens, by its boldness and vigour.

The Musée de Bordeaux contains three; viz., "The Martyrdom of St. George," "Bacchus and Ariadne," and "Christ on the Cross."

In the Musée de Montpellier are, "Christ on the Cross," a "Landscape," containing ruins of antique buildings, nymphs, shepherds, and cattle; "A Scene from a Religious War," and a portrait of Francis Franck, a painter at Antwerp.

The Musée de Caen contains two; namely, "Melchizedek supplying Abraham with Bread and Wine," a large, well-arranged composition; and "A Portrait of James I."

The Musée de Lille possesses "The Descent from the Cross," "Mary Magdalene dying," "St. Francis receiving the Infant Jesus from the hand of the Virgin," "St. Francis," and "St. Bonaventure."

In the Musée de Valenciennes there are "Christ dead on the Cross," "The Annunciation," "St. Stephen, the Deacon, preaching the Doctrines of Christ in the Sanhedrim," "The Lapidation of St. Stephen," and "St. Stephen at the Tomb."

"The Annunciation," says the author of the guide-book to the Musée de Valenciennes, "is noted for a very remarkable peculiarity: this picture contains the portraits of the third

However, Mr. George, of Paris, possesses one, which represents "The Baptism of Christ by St. John," and which vies, in point of execution, with the finest of Rubens's productions.

We will now extend our researches to the museums of other countries, beginning with

Madrid, the Royal Museum of which city contains, among other remarkable pictures by Rubens, "The Adoration of the Kings," the portrait of Rubens himself being in the group on the right; "Mercury and Argus," "The Judgment of Paris," "The Three Graces," "Diana and Calisto," "Apollo and Midas," "Atalanta Vanquished," "The Rape of Proserpine," "Orpheus and Eurydice," "Moses and the Serpents," "The Milky Way," "Saturn devouring one of his Children" (these two pictures are of a frightfully dramatic effect), "Medea," "Andromeda tied to a Rock," "Andromeda delivered by Perseus" (the face of Andromeda is, for grace and freshness, one of the finest compositions of Rubens); "Philip II. crowned by Victory," an allegory, after an old portrait; "Nymphs surprised by Satyrs," a bacchanalian piece, full of movement; "The Garden of Love," a landscape with gallants and their ladies, remarkable for its delicacy of execution; four little allegorical sketches—"A Village Fête," "The Holy Family,"

Charles Ferdinand, Infant of Spain, before Nordlingen," with allegorical figures; "The Four Quarters of the Globe," an allegory; "The Portrait of the Painter," at the age of sixty, with a large turn-up hat and a black mantle, signed P. These works

RUBENS'S COAT OF ARMS.

"Christ crowned with Thorns" (a magnificent work), and "The Virgin surrounded by a group of fifteen Saints in adoration."

The Academy of Madrid possesses a painting representing "Hercules and Omphale," in which Hercules is running in a grotesque manner in the midst of the women. The composition of this picture is ridiculous, but the colouring magnificent.

The Vienna Gallery contains twenty-three paintings by Rubens, namely, "St. Ignatius curing the Possessed;" "The Assumption of the Virgin," surrounded by angels; below, near the tomb, are seven apostles, three men and four women; "St. Francis Xavier in India," a composition of forty-five colossal figures (the size of these altar-pieces is immense); "St. Jerome," in the habit of a cardinal, a bust painted on wood; "St. Pepin, Duke of Brabant," with his daughter, St. Begue, clothed in the habit of the Beguine nuns, whose order she founded, painted on wood; "A Bust of an Old Man with a long Beard," clothed in purple, painted on wood, and signed P. P. R., the face being seen in a profile view; "Atalanta and Meleager attacking the Calydonian Boar;" "St. Ambrose refusing the Emperor Theodosius admission into the Church of Milan," an altar-piece, with eleven large figures;

The Alliance of Ferdinand III., King of Hungary, with

The Royal Pinacothek at Munich possesses ninety-five paintings by Rubens; they are hung on red cloth, in the chamber called the Chamber of Rubens, and in the adjoining cabinet, both which rooms are richly decorated. Of these pictures the following are among the most remarkable: "The Fall of the Damned;" "The Reconciliation of the Romans with the Sabines;" "The Adoration of the Shepherds;" "The Last Judgment;" "St. Michael driving down the Rebel Angels;" "The Battle of the Amazons;" "The Lion Hunt;" "The Boar Hunt" (the animals are attributed to Smeyders); and "The Overthrow of Sennacherib;" with several magnificent portraits of sovereigns, and several portraits of the wives and children of Rubens.

The Dresden Gallery contains thirty-three paintings by Rubens, two of which, however, are not genuine.* Among the others are, "The Two Sons of the Artist;" "Silenus holding a goblet, which is being filled by a Priestess of Bacchus;" "St. Jerome and his Lion;" "A Young Lady dressed in black, and veiled;" "Bathsheba at the Fountain;"

* "The Adoration of the Magi," and "Jesus walking on the Sea."

"A Young Lady with a bare head, and holding roses in her hand;" "Hercules overcome by Wine, supported by a Satyr and Bacchanalian Nymphs;" "A Lion Hunt;" "A Boar Hunt;" "The Last Judgment;" "Neptune calming the Tempest;" "A Portrait of Helena Forman;" "The Garden of Love;" and "A Tigress suckling her Cubs."

In the Museum at Amsterdam there is a picture representing "Filial Roman Piety," with a sketch of "Christ bearing his Cross to Calvary."

The Museum of the Hague contains, "Venus and Adonis," in a landscape; with the portraits of Isabella Brandt, Helena Forman, and the confessor of Rubens.

The Brussels Gallery possesses, "Christ threatening to destroy the World;" "The Martyrdom of St. Lievin;" "The Coronation of the Virgin;" "Christ bearing his Cross to Calvary;" "The Entombment;" "The Adoration of the Magi;" "The Assumption of the Virgin;" a half-length portrait of the Archduke Albert; and a half-length portrait of the Infanta Isabella.

The Museum at Antwerp possesses, "Christ pierced with a lance upon the Cross;" "The Adoration of the Magi;" "St. Theresa interceding for the Souls in Purgatory;" "The Communion of St. Francis of Assisi;" and five sketches made by Rubens for the triumphal arches erected by the city of Antwerp when Ferdinand of Austria visited it in 1635. This museum also possesses the square chair, bound with leather and ornamented with large round brass-headed nails, that was used by Peter Paul Rubens at the sittings of the corporation of St. Luke, during the year of his deanship, in 1633.

The Cathedral of Antwerp possesses the celebrated "Descent from the Cross," of which we have given an engraving; "The Elevation of the Cross," painted for the church of St. Walburge; "The Assumption of the Virgin," placed on the high altar of the cathedral, and containing more than thirty figures; "St. John;" "St. Catherine;" and "The Resurrection;" the last picture is inferior to the preceding ones.

The Church of St. Paul, also called the Church of the Dominicans, possesses a fine painting by Rubens, representing the "Flagellation of our Lord."

The Church of St. James, at Antwerp, contains the tomb of Rubens, sketched by himself; a "Holy Family," containing all the portraits of the artist's family, a magnificent picture; "The Education of the Virgin" (on the door to the right is the "Portrait of Nicholas Roekox;" "The Virgin with a Bird;" "Christ on the Cross;" "The Trinity;" and "The Descent from the Cross," which is a small copy of the large picture of the cathedral at Antwerp, to which we have alluded above.

In Russia, Rubens is nobly represented, the Imperial Gallery of the Hermitage having two of its chambers entirely filled with the great artist's works. There are, above all, eleven very fine paintings in this gallery; namely, the "Portraits of a distinguished Dutchman and his Wife;" "The Virgin and Child;" "Mary Magdalene at the feet of the Saviour;" "Silenus and the Satyrs;" "The Saints adoring Jesus;" "Roman Charity;" "Bacchus;" "The River Tigris;" "Perseus and Andromeda;" "The Death of Adonis;" "The Visitation;" "The Descent from the Cross;" and some landscapes.

Both the public and the private galleries of England are very rich in the works of Rubens.

The National Gallery possesses "Peace and War," a splendid picture, which was presented by the late Marquis of Stafford to the above gallery; "St. Bayon distributing Alms," a fine large sketch; "The Rape of the Sabines;" "The Brazen Serpent;" "The Holy Family," a mediocre work; "A Landscape," sunset; "A fine Landscape of Brabant," formerly in the Balbi Palace at Genoa; "The Apotheosis of James I;" and "The Judgment of Paris."

Windsor Castle contains, in the Rubens room, a portrait of Rubens himself, which formerly belonged to the collection of Charles I., but which is inferior to the portrait painted for the Florentine Gallery; the "Portrait of Isabella Brandt," richly attired, sold to George IV., in 1820, for 800 guineas; "The Infant Ferdinand of Spain, and the Archduke Ferdinand of Austria," on horseback (a scene from the battle of Nordlingen); "St. Martin dividing his cloak with a poor Man;" "A Portrait of Sir Balthazar Gerbier," attributed by some to Van Dyck; "The Portrait of a middle-aged man;" "Mary Magdalene anointing the feet of our Saviour;" "The Holy Family;" "Winter;" "A Landscape, Sunrise, Going to Market;" the "Portrait of John Madderus," Bishop of Antwerp; "Philip II. of Spain on horseback;" and the "Archduke Albert on horseback."

In the Dulwich Gallery there are, a small sketch representing "Four Saints;" "Samson and Delilah;" "St. Barbara;" "A Group of Nymphs;" "Shepherds and Shepherdesses;" "Venus and Cupid;" "A Sketch;" "Woman in Blue Drapery;" "A Landscape;" "A Study;" "The Three Graces" (en grisaille); and "Mars, Venus, and Cupid."

Hampton Court contains, "A Small Landscape;" and "Diana and two of her Nymphs reposing after the Chase."

Rubens is also well represented in the private galleries in England. In the Collection of Mr. Wilkins there is the "Prodigal Son."

Sir Robert Peel's Collection possesses the celebrated portrait of the young girl, called "The Chapeau de Paille," which is a chef-d'œuvre of colouring and chiaroscuro, and is painted, as the Italians say, en amour. It is said that, during his life, Rubens would never part with this picture, which, after the death of his widow, passed into the possession of the Lunden's family, who gave 60,000 Dutch florins for it, and after being successively re-sold for 35,970 Dutch florins, and then for 21,000 Prussian crowns, was purchased by Sir Robert Peel for 3,500 guineas.* There is also "The Triumph of Silenus" in this collection.

In the Collection of Sir Abraham Hume there is, among other pointings by Rubens, "The Flight into Egypt by Night."

The Marlborough Collection possesses, "A Bacchanalian Procession," very like the one in the Munich Gallery, generally attributed to Rubens, but which we believe to be by Van Dyck; "The Rape of Proserpine," a fine work; "The Flight of Lot and his Family from Sodom;" "The Return from Egypt;" "Roman Charity;" "A Portrait of Paracelsus;" "Andromeda chained to a Rock;" "Portraits of the Family of Rubens;" "Portraits of Rubens and his second Wife, Helena Forman, leading a little child in a garden," a fine work; "The Virgin and the Infant Saviour on a Throne," the sketch for a large painting executed by Rubens soon after his return from Italy; "Venus and Adonis," a good painting executed in the middle part of the artist's life; "A Portrait of Catherine de Médeis;" a full-length "Portrait of Helena Forman;" "A Portrait of the Virgin in a scarlet dress;" "The Virgin," seen in a front view; "The Holy Family;" "Three Females gathering Fruit;" "Lot and his Daughters;" "The Adoration of the Magi;" "Meleager and Atalanta;" and "A Portrait of Rubens" with a hat on.

Lord Ashburton's Collection contains, "A Wolf Hunt," a celebrated picture; "The Rape of the Sabines;" and "The Reconciliation of the Romans with the Sabines," the first thought for the great pictures in the Escurial.

The Grosvenor Gallery contains, "The Israelites gathering the Manna;" "The Fathers of the Church;" "The Four Evangelists;" "Abraham and Melchisedeck," a large composition of nineteen pictures (these four paintings were executed by Rubens, when he was in Spain, in 1629, for the convent of the Carmelites at Locches, where they remained till 1808; they were sold by the French to M. de Bourke, then Danish minister at the court of Madrid, and were purchased from him by the Marquis of Westminster, in 1818, for 410,000); "The Wise Men's Offering," a weak composition of thirteen figures, which, it is said, Rubens executed in eight days, for the Convent of the White Sisters, at the Louvain; "Ixion embracing a Cloud;" "The Painter Pausias and Glyceria," these two heads pass for being those of the painter and his wife; "Sarah dismissing Hagar," an excellent picture; "A Landscape," a very jewel; and "The Conversion of St. Paul."

In the Collection of Mr. T. Hope there are, "The Shipwreck of Æneas," an excellent work; and "The Death of Adonis."

In the Collection of the Earl of Radnor are, "A Desert Landscape," in the environs of the Escurial; and "Venus and her Nymphs," the sketch for the large painting which was formerly in the Orleans Gallery.

The Earl of Pembroke's Collection contains, "The Infant Jesus," "St. John," and "A Young Girl and Angels."

In the Earl of Warwick's Collection are, "A Portrait of the Earl of Arundel;" and "Ignatius Loyola," in a red habit embroidered with gold, formerly in the Jesuits' church at Antwerp.

The Earl of Carlisle's Collection contains, "The Daughter of Herod receiving the Head of John the Baptist," an energetic composition; and "A Bust of Thomas Howard, Earl of Arundel." This portrait, which is one of the finest Rubens ever executed, has been engraved by Houbraken.

In the Collection of Earl Spencer is a sketch for tapestry representing "David and the Elders of Israel sacrificing to Jehovah."

In the Duke of Bedford's Collection is a "Dead Abel," a very fine painting for flesh-colouring and chiaroscuro.

A LANDSCAPE BY RUYSDAEL.

In Mr. Methuen's Collection are, "The Portrait of a Man with a white tucker," attributed to Rubens, but more probably the work of Mirevelt; "A Wolf Hunt," a small but good copy of the picture in the possession of Lord Ashburton; and "David and Abigail," an excellent production.

The Collection of Mr. J. P. Miles at Leigh Court contains, "The Woman taken in Adultery," sold at Antwerp for 2,000 guineas; "The Virgin with the Infant Jesus upon her knee;" and "The Conversion of St. Paul," a superb work, which was formerly the property of the Montesquieu family, of whom it was purchased by Monsieur Delahante, sent to England, and sold to Mr. Hart Davies for 1,000 guineas, and was again sold in 1810 for 2,550 guineas.

In Mr. Coke's Collection there is "The Return from Egypt."

At the Marquis of Bute's are "A Child" (thought to be one of the sons of Rubens) seated in the midst of grapes and fruit, on the dresser of a larder, with his nurse standing near him (the accessories are attributed to Sneyders); and one of the eleven sketches made for the triumphal arches erected at Antwerp in 1635.

Rubens left but a very small number of easel-pieces. They are seldom met with in private collections, and more seldom still at public sales.

At the Chevalier de la Roque's sale, in 1745, a sketch by Rubens, representing "St. George overthrowing the Devil," was sold for sixty-one francs, one sou.

At the Duke de Tallard's sale, in 1751, a "St. Cecilia" was knocked down for £802; "The Adoration of the Kings" went for £300; and "A Landscape," containing figures and animals, fetched £396 1s.

the "Shepherds" was sold for £100, and the "Portrait of one of the Wives of Rubens" for £720.

At M. Robit's sale, in 1801, "A Holy Family" fetched £180; and "The Resurrection," £336 16s.

A ROADSIDE INN.—FROM A PAINTING BY ISAAC VAN OSTADE.

At M. de Julienne's sale, in 1767, "A Roman Clarity" fetched £209; and at the sale of the pictures of M. de la Lave de Jully, in 1779, the "Portrait of one of the Wives of Rubens" was sold for £800.

At the Randon de Boisset sale, in 1777, "The Adoration of the "Shepherds" was sold for £510, and the "Portrait of one of the Wives of Rubens" for £720.

At the Lerouge sale, in 1808, "A Holy Family" was sold for £180. And at the sale of the pictures of Cardinal Fesch, at Rome, in 1815, "The Adoration of the Shepherds" was knocked down for £510.

At the sale of M. Clos, in 1812, "The Portrait of the Duke of Buckingham" fetched £360.

At M. Laperrière's sale, in 1823, "A Holy Family, St. Elizabeth and St. John," fetched £2,560.

At the Bonnemaison sale, in 1827, "The Triumph of Silenus" fetched £820.

At the Heris sale, at Brussels, in 1841, "The Tribute Money" was sold for £1,400.

Rubens has left so great a number of mixed crayon, India ink, red lead, and other drawings, that it is impossible for us to enumerate them here. Let it suffice for us to say, that they are found in the public galleries of every nation, as well as in the greater part of private cabinets.

The Louvre possesses twenty-four drawings by Rubens, but one of these does not appear to be genuine; the subjects they represent are:—"The Last Supper;" "The Baptism of Jesus," done in black and white crayon; "The Adoration of the Magi," done in three crayons, afterwards washed and finished off with water-colours; "The Same," done in three crayons, and washed; "The Holy Family in Egypt," done in black crayon, relieved with white; "The Elevation of the Cross," done in water-colours and crayon; "A Dead Christ," a superb drawing in three crayons, finished off with wash, and partly coloured; "The Descent from the Cross," in three crayons, and finished off with wash; "St. Francis receiving the Stigmata," done in black crayon, washed, and relieved with white; "St. Stephen," an oil camaiçu; "The Archduke Albert on Horseback," done with a pen, and washed; "A Lion Hunt," done in black crayon, washed, and relieved with white; "A Landscape," a study in black and white crayon, and pastel, &c.

Forty-five drawings by Rubens were sold at the sale of the cabinet of William II., King of Holland. Among the most remarkable were, the "Portrait of the Artist's first Wife," very beautifully executed, and which was sold for £26 5s.; "The Portrait of a Man of Distinction," sold for £25 9s.; "A Young Girl crouching down," a study for "The Garden of Love," sold for £17 16s.; "A Cavalier," from the same picture, sold for £16 19s.; another study from the same picture sold for £10 3s.; "Christ on the Cross," an academical figure of great worth, sold for £13 18s.; "Prometheus," sold for £13 2s. 6d.; "A Lady of Distinction," a very fine sketch, sold for £28; and "The Interior of a Cow-house," sold for £8 10s.

The fac-simile of his writing appended is the fragment of a letter in Italian, of which the Bibliothèque Nationale possesses the original.

We have also added the monograms which the painter placed, though rarely, at the bottom of his paintings or drawings.

JACOB RUYSDAEL.

Jacob Ruysdael was the son of a cabinet-maker, and was esteemed in his youth for the excellency of his disposition and the suavity of his manners. He has been called the painter of Melancholy, and over his life and works there is a certain indescribable sadness, a love, a sentiment, which affects the spectator without an obvious cause; something that rekindles faded impressions, that brings back the imaginations of youth he cannot tell why he does not understand it; but it is true, nevertheless. Poetry and music excite the same feelings certain prospects, landscapes viewed under peculiar effects—exercise the same influence—a species of morbid sensibility.

Ruysdael was a man of deep melancholy. He received a liberal education, and was designed for the medical profession; but he laid aside the scalpel and assumed the pencil; he had conversed with nature, had drawn inspiration from her deep silence, and longed to pour forth the inspiration that was in him. If he had spoken in words, he must have written philosophical tragedies; if he had spoken in the harmonious strains of music, he would have made the heartstrings vibrate to his solemn dirge and mournful songs; as he spoke on canvas, the idiom of the world—he let his sighs have vent and his melancholy utterance in leafless trees and gloomy clouds, and mysterious groupings of old trees and dark woody avenues, that began like the chancel of an old cathedral, and dwindled away into a slender sheep tract—in misty horizons, and in coming night. He was always introducing water; but whether that water was tossed and tumbled as a cataract, or whether it flowed smoothly, without a murmur or a ripple, it was sure to be sorrowful; there was a shadow over everything, a gloom upon all—the painter brooded over his sorrow, and seemed to have his dwelling among the tombs.

Of his life little is known. He devoted himself entirely to art. He resolved to lead a life of celibacy, and never to quit his aged father. He wrote his own mental history in his pictures, and it was all gloom and sadness. Here a tree isolated from its fellows, dark and sombre—scathed and naked—its immovable shadow darkening the still water of the lake. Here, a still, dark piece of water, the broad leaves of the lotus on its surface, yellow flowers flourishing in refreshing coolness, a background of gigantic forest trees. Something always dark and shadowy. Kugler says that Ruysdael is the master whose pictures form the proper type and centre of the whole pastoral school of landscape. In his works, as in those of the great painter of ideal landscape, Claude Lorraine, natural objects are treated in a manner which appears to manifest the influence of a higher spirit; but the means adopted by these two artists were very different. Ruysdael did not need to decorate the ordinary forms of nature, or dress her up in a holiday garb, in order to bring her nearer to something that was divine. Each single object, however homely and familiar, provided it had not been cramped and regulated by the hand of man—the green meadows, the silent sweep of the clouds, the murmuring trees or brooks—all breathe the pure and lofty feeling of that higher spirit. His paintings are, in fact, a renewal of that old worship of the spirit nature, which the Roman historian has ascribed to the ancient Germans. Yet there is in his pictures much that relates to the busy toil of man; but such features, in general, stand in feeble opposition to the overwhelming mass of natural objects, and the traces of human works often appear as mere ruins which have long yielded to the powerful operation of the elements.

ISAAC VAN OSTADE.

THE history of Dutch painting presents us with a group of artists who devoted their energies to subjects taken from humble life, who found their models in the roadside inn, and exercised their genius in the reproduction of village fêtes and cottage homes, and the haunts and habits of the peasantry. Among this group David Teniers stands the highest; sometimes, indeed, he exaggerates and borders on caricature, but at the same time exhibits great power of humour and bold and effective design. He excels not in the higher branches of his art, but is truly great when he pictures the clowns of the Low Country, whiling away their time with dice, beer, and tobacco, smoking short pipes with an air of inconceivable comfort, and listening with amazing relish to a man playing on the violin. Brauwer was also justly celebrated in the same department of art. He painted all manner of scenes from tavern life—drinking, dancing, quarrelling, smoking, fighting, playing at cards, or settling with mine host. When he exaggerates he seems to do it without effort, and the most mirth-provoking pictures of his pencil—the solemn gravity of the beer-lighting his pipe, the vain attempt of the peasant to hide his uneasiness while under the hands of the village barber—are perfectly natural and true. The jovial tavern-keeper, Jan Steen, is noted for the same cheerful view of common life; he gives us the same jolly boors, regaling at the same sort of beer-houses, finishes with the same detail, copying with the closest attention brass pans, and earthenware, and well-thumbed cards and drinking-cups, uniting with his artistic skill all the elements of genuine comedy. And among these faithful delineations of rustic scenery and peasant life, the two Ostades are deservedly recognised. Adrian, the eldest and the most celebrated; and Isaac, sometimes called the king of light and shadow.

To the career of this latter painter we have before referred—how he was born at Lubeck; was sent when very young into the Low Countries; received instruction from his brother Adrian; travelled to the banks of the Zuider Zee, and settled at Amsterdam, “where he attained,” says one of his biographers, “the summit of art.”

The engraving which we now present is from one of the well-known paintings of this master, and represents a “Road-side Inn.”

A country cart has stopped before a village hostel, and without alighting, the driver is refreshing himself with a comfortable draught, the hostess having brought him forth a pitcher of the strongest brewed; three or four neighbours are lounging round the cart, an old man sits on the top of a tub with a dog half asleep at his feet, while the fowls from the poultry-yard are picking up blades of scattered corn. The scene is very simple perhaps vulgar; yet the eye rests upon it with pleasure. The painting is a Flemish picture more than two hundred years old, but its charm has not departed—its beauty and freshness still remain. Why? Because the picture is true; it awakens happy thoughts of bygone scenes, calls up old memories deep and tender, and we regard that episode in village life, that simple group, that rustic quietness, with pleasure, because we have somewhere looked upon what might have been the original of the picture. The grateful shadow of those tall trees, the picturesque beauty of the roadside inn, its swinging sign, its thatched roof, the creeping plant that climbs upon it, the company of villagers, the still water, the reeds that grow up long and dank upon its margin, the trees far away, over which the village spire is peeping, and the lowing kine driven forth to pasturage, unitedly combine to make the picture interesting to us all. It is not simply what it represents, but the pleasing sensations which it awakens within us. There is poetry in the whole design, poetry that belongs to all time, that does not represent a particular period or a particular place—not a burgomaster of the sixteenth century, or a street in Amsterdam—but that reproduces nature; and nature never grows old.

One might draw a nice distinction between the two words—truth and reality. They are not to be accepted as synonymous. Modern painters have sometimes confounded them, and the result has been a school of Reality, the disciples of which have copied nature, line by line, and have failed to be true after all. They have represented things as they are; have not brought either judgment or taste to bear upon their study, but have been content to reproduce nature under aspects the most common and inartistic. They have toyed over trifles, have been diligent students of minutiae, have forgotten the beauty of the garden in the animalcules on one of the leaves, have overlooked the majesty of a river in the close imitation of the prism-coloured dew-drop, and in many instances have sacrificed all the true essentials of art to an unnecessary exactness in these minor points. This may be real, but it is not what may be emphatically called true.

Truth in art enters into the grandeur of the whole design, and into the poetry of nature. It looks for effect and not for detail; it admits choice and preference, and allows the judgment to be exercised in the selection and the taste in arranging a truthful picture. The artist is not content to represent every object as it presents itself to him on the first glance; he regards them in the most favourable light, uses discretion in the grouping of his figures, and at his pleasure introduces this tree and omits that. He claims the privilege of the poet, and artificial in the means which he employs, is true in the result which he effects.

This is not a subtle disputation about words,—it is a description of two systems; one produced Titian and Raphael, and the other the lowest painters of the Flemish school. The students of the "Realistic" school paint as though nature was always beautiful alike, as if the mission of the artist and that of the photographic camera were the same in their end and purpose, and that a picture was to be produced by an exact transcript of nature without choice and almost entirely by hazard. But the true mission of art is higher and better and nobler than this. Art supposes that its devotee should possess something more than an ability to execute—that he should have tact to seize only on those subjects most worthy of study, that he should accept or reject at his will, and that he should reproduce upon his canvas those images only which merited to be transmitted to posterity.

PETER SUBLEYRAS.

PETER SUBLEYRAS.

THERE are few details known with respect to the life of Peter Subleyras, but these few may be interesting to our readers. He was born in the year 1699, at Usez, in Languedoc. His reputation, which was formerly extensive, is not well supported by the works he has left behind him; for though it must be admitted his paintings display some eminent qualities—freedom of drawing, a striking and harmonious composition, and a delicate execution which always prefers subdued tones to strong contrasts—we seek in vain for indications of what may be termed style, in the highest sense of the term; that is to say, the combination of feeling and taste. Having acquired the first rudiments of design from his father, Matthew Subleyras, an artist unknown to fame, he became a pupil of Anthony Rivalz, of Toulouse, a master more remarkable for elegance than force, at the age of fifteen, and continued to be his pupil even after having lived long in Rome, and after professing the most enthusiastic admiration for the great works of Michael Angelo, Raffaele, and Julius Romain. Such is the effect of private instruction upon painters; they rarely get completely free from it, and many are to be met with who yield to it even while they condemn it.

In the year 1724, P. Subleyras proceeded to Paris for the purpose of attending at the Academy. He went with all the confidence of a young man of five-and-twenty, and of a Gascon, to compete for all the prizes against a host of rivals. Such was his assurance of success, and his elation at the bright prospect before him, that he was continually inviting artists into his studio to show them designs for paintings, and rough sketches of gigantic compositions. As yet he was free from doubt of every kind; but there is reason to believe that his confidence was more than once rebuked by disappointment, and that the young aspirant at first met with no very favourable reception among the Parisian artists and amateurs who were formed upon the school of Poussin. His manner was not liked; yet in 1726 he gained the first prize for painting. The picture to which this high honour was awarded is now in the Louvre. It represents the Brazen Serpent, and is deficient in warmth and life, though dramatic, and painted with considerable talent. One consequence of its success was the artist's removal to Rome, with a pension from the king, to complete his studies. He was so delighted with the mode of life in that great metropolis of art, with the many beautiful buildings, and other objects which adorned it, and with the society of artists, that he determined to make it his home for the rest of his life. Assiduous in the cultivation of his art, and aspiring in his aims, he managed to acquire great renown a member, like himself, of the Academy of the Arcadians. His marriage was pretty closely followed by his death, which took place at Rome, on the 28th of May, 1749. He died in great poverty, and almost want, leaving four children still very young. As he left few pupils behind him, no effort has been made to prepare his biography. There are, however, some interesting particulars about him in a correspondence where we should hardly expect to find anything of the sort. M.

even in that select circle, and was employed to paint for the Basilica of St. Peter an altar-piece representing St. Basil performing mass in the presence of the Emperor Valens, an engraving of which was executed by Domenico Cunego. He also painted other historical pictures for churches, not merely in Rome, but other parts of Italy. Portrait-painting, too, occupied a large portion of his time and attention.

During his residence at Rome, he married Maria Felicia Tibaldi, in 1745, a woman of great talent and distinction, and de Sironcourt, a chef de bureau of the French government, after a long residence in the Roman states, wrote from Cairo on the 10th of August, 1748, to M. de Rouillé, a member of the government, in the following terms:—

“It remains for me to speak to you of a friend of mine—a friend to whom I am warmly attached—I mean M. Subleyras, a French painter, long settled in Rome, who, I fear, will also die there, to the disgrace of France. I have known and loved him for fifteen years. In the first place, he is the n. s.

honourable man in the world. As for talent, he has, I believe, as much as can well fall to the lot of man. In point of taste, he is a prodigy; and if you wish (as doubtless you will) to go through a course of painting and the fine arts, you could not choose a better guide. What you study with his assistance will be rendered a hundred times more instructive than it would otherwise be. Never has any one arrived at so profound an insight into art in all its branches and all its accessories. He has brought to painting that philosophical spirit which appreciates everything, and places everything in its true position. He paints with the taste of Poussin for thinkers and people of refinement. He speaks to the heart as well as the intellect. But his works are nothing to himself. His views on painting, and all the arts connected with it, are far superior to his pictures. His means are limited, and beneath his aspirations. He has the misfortune to be married, and to have a large family and poor health."

There are some points in this extract that are scarcely correct. Subleyras can hardly be compared, at least as a painter, with Poussin and the thinkers. Nor does it appear probable that Subleyras was at all unhappy in his marriage. With the exception of such statements as these, there are in M. de Sironcourt's letter details worthy to be repeated.

The principal works of Subleyras, besides those already mentioned, are "Christ sitting at meat with Simon the Pharisee;" "St. Camille in an ecstasy of devotion;" "The Burial of Jesus;" and "The Marriage of St. Catharine Ricci." Two of his paintings and three sketches are in the Louvre gallery; two pictures by his hand are in the Brera at Milan; and one, representing "Simon Magus," adorns the walls of Alton Tower, the seat of the Earl of Shrewsbury. There are a few spirited etchings of his, some from his own designs, as, for instance, "The Brazen Serpent;" "The Martyrdom of St. Peter;" and "Mary Magdalene washing the feet of Christ." In a lighter style he painted and engraved with much elegance four subjects from La Fontaine. Among his portraits may be mentioned those of "Benedict XIV.;" "Cardinal Valenti;" the "Viceroy of Sicily;" and "Peter Lulas," a sculptor of Toulouse. It must be admitted that, after making all deductions, P. Subleyras is fairly entitled to an honourable position among the French painters of the eighteenth century. In concluding this brief account of him and his works, we are bound to commend him as an engraver whose etchings have the elegance and sometimes even the vigour of Salvator Rosa.

PICTURES IN THE LOUVRE.

No artist or connoisseur should omit seeing the pictures in the Louvre—the most exquisite and complete collection of ancient and modern art ever brought together. How the collection has been made, and by what means the splendid altar-pieces, and other historical chefs-d'œuvre, of the great masters, have found their way from the cathedrals of Spain and the palaces of Italy, to the halls of one of the most ancient castles in France, the admiring visitor will scarcely pause to inquire, as he passes, catalogue in hand, through various salons, and gazes, in mute wonder, on the famous Murillos, Vandycks, Raffaelles, Titians, Claudes, Rubens, Cuyps, Teniers, &c., with which these walls are decorated. Nor will it be necessary, in this place, to say more than that the principal pictures, illustrative of the various schools of classic art, were obtained for the Louvre by Napoleon, and that Louis Philippe, the greatest art-patron of modern times, spared no trouble or expense in adding to the collection such works as were necessary to its completion in a chronological point of view.

Thus there are now in the Louvre upwards of fourteen hundred pictures illustrative of the four great schools or styles of art—the Italian; the Dutch, with the Flemish, and German; the Spanish; and the French. Of this number, four hundred and eighty belong to the Italian, five hundred and forty to the Dutch and German, and three hundred and eighty to the French school. Besides these there are eight modern copies of ancient pictures, and a very large collection of the works of recent French painters. The illustrations of the Spanish school consist of sixteen pictures by Francisco Collantes, L. de Morales, Ribiera, Velasquez, and Murillo.

The pictures of the old masters are nearly all contained in two large apartments, called the Salon Carré and the Long Gallery; those of the modern artists are distributed in the various saloons and galleries devoted to the exhibition of Egyptian and Roman antiquities, Nineveh remains, bronzes, sculptures, &c. &c. The majority of these noble rooms are highly decorated with carving and gold work, the ceilings painted in fresco, with allegorical subjects, and the walls covered with silk hangings of the richest colours and designs, or tapestry from the famous manufactory at Gobelins.

But the most attractive objects in the Louvre are the pictures by the old masters; and towards them the discriminating visitor will make his way, despite the splendour of the Apollo Gallery, through which he will have to pass, and heedless of the peculiarly French glitter and display—walls of crimson covered with flying bees of gold; great windows which give no light; highly carved doors which never open and lead to nowhere; fleurs-de-lis encircling imperial "E's;" vaulted ceilings, so new and brilliant, and dazzling with painted allegory, as to pain the eye; medallions, flowers, arabesques, emblems, escutcheons, &c. &c., which everywhere surround him. So passing up the grand staircase, built after the designs of Fontaine, and through the Apollo Gallery aforesaid, he enters the Salon Carré, newly decorated by M. Dubau, the architect of the Louvre, in a style at once massive, elegant, and appropriate. Colossal caryatides and genii representing the arts support a vaulted ceiling in white and gold, round the frieze of which are inscribed the names of the most celebrated masters in art. In this splendid apartment are collected some of the largest and most notable of the works of Raffaele, Vandyck, Rubens, Claude, and Murillo. Being a perfectly square apartment—as its name, indeed, implies—the correspondence in size of canvas rather than any in the style or era of the pictures has been observed, so that there exists in this saloon a harmonious distribution of parts—the canvases being fixed close to the walls and not leaning forward—which is seldom seen in a room devoted to paintings. It is, indeed, the most superb saloon, perhaps, ever devoted to the exhibition of works of art—a casket entirely worthy the jewels it contains.

A wide doorway opens from the SALON CARRÉ to the LONG GALLERY. This splendid apartment is 1,322 feet in length, by a uniform width of 42 feet—more than a quarter of a mile in length, and furnishing wall-space for upwards of three miles of paintings! The Long Gallery forms, in fact, the south wing of the entire edifice. It consists of two stories, the lower of which contains the apartments of the directors of the museum, the grand library, formed principally by Louis Philippe, and guard-houses for troops on duty at the palace, &c.—the upper gallery being occupied, as we see, by the national collection of pictures. This part of the palace was commenced by Ducereau, in the reign of Charles IX., was continued as far as the central archway by Henry IV. of France and Navarre, and completed by Louis XIV. It was the intention of the latter monarch to have carried out the plan conceived by Henry IV., of connecting the Louvre and the Tuileries by a great northern and southern wing; but the funds voted by the government for that purpose were devoted by Louis to the erection of the palace of Versailles. For many years nothing further was done in the way of building in the great square of the Louvre; till, during the consulship and empire of Napoleon, the northern wing was about half erected. A slumber of many more years came over the design, and now again it is being carried forward with great activity by the present emperor. The style of the external front of the Louvre is not by any means uniform, each architect and restorer of the building appearing to have ignored the works of his predecessor in everything but the height of the external walls. But though the grand front of the Louvre, that towards the Place du Caroussel, is irregular in style—one part partaking of the Grecian and another of the Roman, while a third inclines to the florid Renaissance—the great length of the building, and the recurrence of alternate circular and triangular pediments filled with bas-reliefs, give to the whole a highly imposing and pleasing appearance—in fact, a more picturesque outlook than the regular architecture of the eastern or river front, though the latter had the advantage of being erected by one architect and in one style, the Corinthian.

But to return to the pictures in the Long Gallery. In this immense arcade no attempt at architectural display has been made. In truth, the very length, height, and width of the gallery render ornament unnecessary. The walls, to the height of about three feet, are encased in the red marble of Normandy, the pictures hanging above, with the smallest nearest to the spectator. A good uniform light has been obtained by means of skylights pierced through the roof. The gallery was formerly lit by side windows, but these being found insufficient, are now hidden by handsome crimson curtains, which, with the ottoman seats down the centre of the room, give it a rich and luxurious aspect; various groups and busts in marble and plaster are placed in appropriate situations, and serve to break the uniformity of the view. Nor will the lover of pictures fail to notice the charming air of freshness on the surfaces of the paintings, and the clean, bright look of the gilded frames—a perfect contrast to the dingy appearance of the old paintings in the English National Gallery, and a further argument, if any were needed, in favour of their removal to a purer atmosphere.

The number and variety of the pictures in the Long Gallery have enabled M. Frederic Villot, the intelligent conservator of paintings in the Louvre, to adopt a chronological arrangement in their hanging. Thus, on either side of the gallery, are hung pictures from the thirteenth to the eighteenth century—a period which embraces the birth, triumph, and partial decline of art in Europe. Of course, it will hardly be expected that we should give anything like a catalogue of the pictures exhibited; and, indeed, if our space permitted, such a course would be but a mere dry enumeration of names and dates—a great body of facts without a living soul of knowledge.

The number of pictures here bearing date previous to Raffaele is remarkable. Thus, in the Italian, Roman, Venetian, and Florentine schools, of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries, we have examples either by, or in the style of, Cimabue and Giotto, Taddeo Gaddi and Leonardi da Vinci, Mantegna and Roselli, Luini and Giorgione, Salario and Lorenzo Costa, Mariotto and Ludovico Mazzolini, with several other painters of less note. In the Dutch and German schools, also, there are several specimens of Van Eyck (about 1390—1441),* Quentin Matsys (1460—1531), Hans Holbein (1488—1554), Hans Heining (1480), &c. The French school was not founded at so early a period, and the style of art known as the English school of painting is without record.

If a painter—not belonging to the pre-Raffaellite school—looks attentively at the works of these early artists, he will discover, despite their crudities, much to admire, much to imitate, and much to avoid. Though the faces are often positively ugly, and though gracelessness of position and want of perspective are evident, in spite of elaborate gilding and high colouring, there is discoverable, in all these uncouth-looking saints, these staid virgins and unchildlike children, these unpoetical angels, and these imitations of such minute objects as could not be seen in nature—if the spectator stands at a sufficient distance to command the entire subject—a painstaking love of art, and a sincere desire to do the very best that could be done with the means at hand, which modern painters would do well to take to heart—not, however, so closely, as to outrage modern taste and modern knowledge.

But passing onwards, the intelligent visitor will pause admiringly before some of the more important of the great works here exhibited. How shall we pass slightly by that famous conception of Murillo's (1618—1685), which was purchased for the nation, at the sale of Marshal Soult's collection, in 1852, at a cost of £22,000—the largest price, perhaps, ever paid for a single picture?—or how express our enthusiasm at these efforts of the great Raffaele (1483—1520) which grace the walls of the Long Gallery? There are no fewer than twelve undoubted specimens from the hand of that great master here, besides eight paintings in his style, which may or may not have had the benefit of his artistic touch. Raffaele d'Urbino appears to have been before his age and art, for he certainly introduced a style of painting which has never been excelled. One of his pictures, known as "La Belle Jardiniere," the Virgin contemplating the infant Jesus, with the child John in the background, would have stamped him as a great artist had he painted no other. There is here, among others, a good copy of "The School of Athens," that famous and world-known composition. It is said to be the best copy of the original in the Vatican now known in Europe.

Salvator Rosa (1615—1673) is represented by four capital subjects, all undoubted originals, besides a couple of marine paintings in his style by unknown artists. Guido Reni (1575—1642) has the large number of twenty paintings here, whose histories are well authenticated, besides a "Sleeping Jesus" attributed to his pencil, and two paintings after his style, one of which, "David vanquishing Goliath," may be compared to the original in this gallery. The three Carracci, who flourished between the years 1553 and 1619, are here illustrated by thirty-two paintings, all fine; Correggio (1494—1534) by two exquisite paintings, "The Marriage of St. Catherine and Alexander" and "The Dream of Antiope;" Angiolo Bronzino (1502—1572) by two subjects, "Christ appearing to Mary Magdalene" and the painter's own portrait, the former a fine study; Luca Giordano (1632—1705) by three, of which "The Presentation of the Child Jesus in the Temple" is confessedly the finest; Giorgione, sometimes called by his surname Barbarelli (1477—1511), by two authentic subjects and one doubtful painting, "St. John presented to the Saviour," from the collection of Louis XIV.; Castiglione, the prince of the Genoese school (1616—1670), by a fine painting representing "Melchisedec, King of Salem, offering the Bread and Wine to Abraham," and seven others; Christofano Allori, also surnamed Bronzino (1577—1621), by a single exquisite piece, entitled, "Isabella of Arragon at the feet of Charles the Eighth;" Michael Angelo, the chief of the Lombard school, by four large paintings, of which one, "The Death of the Virgin," is alone worth the journey to Paris to see; Andrea del Sarto, sometimes called Vannucchi (1488—1530), by three original, and one more than doubtful, pieces; Giotto, painter, sculptor, and architect (1276—1336), by one authentic painting and several after his peculiar style, one of which latter, "A Virgin and Child," is really beautiful in its simplicity; Lanfranco (1582—1647), by five beautiful pictures, one of which, "The Coronation of the Virgin," has been engraved by Baudet; Panini (1695—1768) by eleven fine architectural subjects; Bartolomeo Schidone (1580—1615) by a half-length figure of "St. John the Baptist," and three religious subjects; Sebastiano del Piombo (1485—1547) by a single picture, called "The Visitation of the Virgin;" Tintoretto (1512—1594), the pride of the Venetian school, by five subjects, including "Susanna at the Bath," and his own portrait; Paul Veronese (1528—1588) by no fewer than twelve specimens of his art, besides a doubtful picture or two, the best of them being "The Pilgrimage to Emmaus," which has often been engraved, and was formerly in the collection of Louis XIV. Vasari, the author of the first dictionary of painters (1512—1574), is represented by four fine subjects, the largest and best of which is "The Salvation of the Virgin by the Angel Hail, Mary, Blessed art thou!" These, with nine pictures by, and after the style of, Leonardi da Vinci, and thirteen by Domenichino, also called Zampieri (1581—1641), form the most noticeable pictures of the Italian school in this collection. Murillo, has six other pictures in the Louvre.

The Dutch, Flemish, and German schools of painting are well illustrated in this gallery; but for want of space we must refrain from any notice of them.

* Dates given in this manner imply that the person spoken of was born in the first and died in the last-named year; when only one year is given, it means the time about which he flourished.

DAVID TENIERS THE YOUNGER.

ANTWERP is a fine old city—the mother of Flemish art. There is something more than the quaint beauty of its old streets, its strange antiquated buildings, to interest the visitor. There Rubens was born, and Vandyck, and Jordaeus, and Gaspar de Crayer, and Porbus, and Teniers, the imperishable lustre of whose names have made old Antwerp a place of pilgrimage to all true devotees of art.

The story of the life of Teniers we have told before.* Not often is it that a great man finds, as it were, his genius hereditary, and his son as great as himself. It was so with the family of Teniers. The son equalled his sire, if he did not surpass him. From his earliest youth he loved art; he loved it when a pencil was a toy, and loved it to the end.

There is something remarkably interesting in the fact that the young painter was cheered on his path by the encouragement of the great Rubens. What a wild flutter at the heart, what a whirl of contending emotions must have rushed upon were a hard matter to tell the original from the copy. Copies they could scarcely be called; he appeared to enter into the spirit as well as the mannerism, and the result was so good that the master seemed not only imitated, but renewed. Some imitators, and indeed the great majority, fail in their imitations, for that which they seize is of no use but to the rightful owner; borrowing on all hands, they succeed in producing a species of mosaic work; but every stone betrays its original formation. What Teniers borrowed he made altogether his own; the theory of skilful plagiarism being the truest originality, was verified in him.

You cannot mistake his pictures. They are thoroughly characteristic. He did not only study the masters, he studied nature—did not take for his models the sculptured glories of old Greece and Rome, but Dutch boors, beer-drinking, dice-throwing, tobacco-smoking Flemings, that the Grande Monarque called "Mugots," short, thickset Dutchmen inside and the lad—he was not yet fifteen—when Rubens suddenly entered the studio, and the student saw the mighty master face to face! We are told that everything was in confusion—Rubens totally unexpected—that the boy trembled, not with fear, but with enthusiasm—that Rubens stopped before the easel, glanced at the half-completed picture, took the brush from the hand of Teniers, and by word and action showed him things he knew not, made the picture to present new and unexpected beauties, and in that one meeting gave the lad a lesson and a painting—more than this, gave him those kind and cheering words that rang in his ears when he had to paint for a draught and a crust, and lighted his way on the path of fame till he reached his high position.

Teniers could adopt any style, and so faithfully assume the touch, manner, design, and colour of another artist, that it outside smoke-begrimed beer-houses—laughing, singing, card-playing, quarrelling, fighting—snoring peasants, such as those depicted in the engraving which we now present. What a life-like picture it is! all motion and hilarity, every figure in full swing—dancing and meaning to dance; one can almost fancy that we hear the shrill shriek of the bagpipe and the laughter of the boors. His peasants are not the marionettes of a puppet theatre: his nature is not borrowed from scenes at the opera: he never utters the complaint of artificial French painters, that nature is too green, or wants harmony: he has learned in a better and a nobler school; studied art at a higher fount; copied older models than those of Boucher or Laneret; confined his observation to no rose-coloured boudoir; but has mingled in rustic life himself, joined in its rejoicings, and its quarrels, and its fights, and has, doubtless, footed it as well as the best in many such a scene as the "Flemish Fair" that we have before us now.

RAFFAELLE'S "BEAUTIFUL GARDENER."

WITHIN the last few years, the noble collection of art-treasures in the Louvre has received a valuable accession in the painting is a representation of the Virgin with the children, Jesus and John the Baptist. Among the choice productions which adorn by Raffaele which bears the name of "La Belle Jardinière," or "The Beautiful Gardener," in the catalogue, and of which we are enabled to present our readers with an engraving. It the walls of the Louvre, there may be more elaborate compositions, and pictures on a larger scale; but there are certainly none more finished or more delightful to behold. Vasari relates, that Raffaele, after having painted "The Consignment of Christ to the Tomb," which is now in the Borghese Gallery at Rome, went to Florence, and there painted "The Beautiful Gardener," which he intended to send to M. de Sienne; but as Bramante wrote to him, stating that the pope had consented to allow him to paint the halls of the Vatican, he set off in haste for Rome, entrusting to Ridolfo Ghirlandaio the task of finishing the blue drapery of the Virgin. The picture was purchased of M. de Sienne by Francis the First; and in the time of Louis the Fourteenth it adorned the cabinet at Versailles. In the carefully prepared catalogues of the Louvre, it is valued at £16,000 sterling. Although Ridolfo Ghirlandaio painted the drapery of the Virgin, he claims no part of the honour of the work. Even on the border of this drapery may be read the signature "Raphaello Urbino.," which is undoubtedly traced by the hand of Ridolfo. M. Quatremère de Quincy, the able Secretary of the Academy of Fine Arts, speaks of the painting in the following terms:—

THE BEAUTIFUL GARDENER - FROM A PAINTING BY RAFFAELLE.

"There is the same freshness and excellent preservation in the charming picture of the Virgin which Raffaele executed for M. de Sienne, and which is called, 'The Beautiful Gardener.' Her costume, which really has something of the villager's about it, has perhaps given rise to this name. It is one of those naive compositions which, for the due proportion in the size of the figures, may be placed at the head of those in which Raffaele, before rising to the ideal of his art, as he afterwards did, confined himself to the expression of simplicity and that modest grace, of which the manners of the country supplied him with models among the young village girls. Nothing can surpass the purity here depicted. The tone of colouring and the style of drawing are in admirable harmony; and this harmony has never produced anything more lovely than the forms of the children Jesus and John. Three circumstances prove that this picture belongs to the same period as 'The Consignment of Christ to the Tomb.' In the first place, the date marked on it, which is 1507; then there is a drawing of it by Raffaele in the Mariette Collection, on the back of which are rough sketches of the figures belonging to the above-mentioned work; and, in the last place, it is known that Raffaele set out for Rome before finishing the blue drapery of the Virgin, which was finished by Ridolfo Ghirlandaio."

Lepicieux, in his "Catalogue Raisonné" of the king's pictures, gives a remarkable explanation about this one: "As Raffaele," says he, "makes the child Jesus rest upon one foot of the Virgin, I think he intended by this trait to indicate the respectful tenderness of this holy mother, who, in her son, sees her Saviour."

As to the title by which this picture is known among artists, Lavallée has sought for its origin with more laborious effort than was worth while. "It is possible," says he, "that the model which Raffaele employed was a gardener, remarkable for her beauty, and that hence was derived the name of the picture. But this is merely a supposition, and it appears to me more probable, that this title, which there is nothing in the painting to occasion—unless it be the flowers with which the Virgin is surrounded—arose from the capricious custom, not uncommon among picture-dealers, of fixing upon some casual circumstance as a means of distinguishing the numerous works of a great master from one another."

This painting of "The Beautiful Gardener" was engraved by Gilles Roupelet and James Chéreau. In the year 1803 M. Boucher Desnoyers established his reputation as an engraver by making a drawing and engraving from it, which he dedicated to M. Denon, the General Director of the Napoleon Museum. The plate proved also a source of great profit to the museum. It is now, and will long remain, unquestionably, the most successful rendering of this delicious painting which breathes so much purity and grace.

WOUVERMANS.

SOME artists have made it their pride, especially Flemish artists, to paint the tap-room, and the jolly idlers, the drinkers, smokers, and vagabonds of society—men who are only their own enemies, we are told, but who are truly everybody else's also. Van Ostade, Brauwer, Teniers, and the prince of caricaturists, Pierre Bamoche, were all fond of representing taverns where the peasant with a jug of beer slowly quaffs and smokes as if there were no other object in life. Wouvermans, on the other hand, paints castles, and huntsmen, elegant life, military exercises, the games of the old nobility; not those who haunted the purlieus of the courts, leading a life worse than that of the tap-room, but those who frequented the riding-school, the fencing-room, and whose science was of the Epicurean school, men who drank deep, slept little, were keen upon a scent, good shots, and excellent riders. These robust and happy ones of this earth led a gay and rude life, studying falconry, and educating the needful animals, or penetrating the mysteries of the kennel—a race not yet departed, though changed in costume and certain details of manners, yet still the same. They wore a costume suited to the painter's art—the feathered beaver of loose Bassonpierre, the fine lace collar, the doublet with frogs, the open boots which now have taken refuge on the stage, to be worn by villains and robbers. They wanted nothing. They had beautiful, though rather masculine ladies to love, fine carriages, packs of hounds, hunters, and Spanish horses with fiery heads and glorious manes—and last, but not least, they had Wouvermans to paint them and give the men existence long after their castles were mouldered in the dust, and their very names were forgotten.

Prancing cavalcades, encampments, charges of cavalry, horse-markets, stables, forges, ring-races, halts in woods; all these are Wouvermans' choice morsels. Everywhere he introduces the horse, an animal he has profoundly studied, and of which he has deservedly made a poetical animal. It is his favourite study, and he always introduces the animal under favourable circumstances.

Were we to judge from his pictures—and this shows what erroneous opinions must have been put forth relative to artists, judging them simply from their works—Wouvermans would be described as having led a sunny life, hunting, riding, and banqueting in hall and bower; while the truth is, he never left Haarlem, and was long unknown and obscure, always retired, laborious, and quiet. He was born in 1620, and died on the 19th of March, 1668. From his father's studio, Wouvermans passed to that of Wynants. There he acquired the best qualities of this master—a powerful execution, a delicate yet firm touch, which rendered the inequalities of scenery, sandy hillocks, stones, plants, &c. with equal fidelity. Wynants' lessons were confined to landscape, while Wouvermans had a perfect passion for horses. He studied the animal, therefore, in the riding-school, in the stable, in the inn yard, everywhere, and succeeded in investing the horse with a charm of grace and elegance in his pictures, which is one of their chief attractions. His success was so great that his study must have been laborious and patient, there being no such thing as mere intuition, even with the brightest genius.

Moyreau has engraved eighty-eight horses from Wouvermans, and even the student of zoology may learn here almost as much as from nature or Buffon. Like Cuyp, who lived to paint only fine fat cattle, Wouvermans' delight was to represent the powerful, handsome, healthy horse; not the broken-winded "roarer," suited better to the caricaturist than the great painter. He was most learned in all details, knew every piece of the harness, the cut of saddles was familiar to him, he could tell the right length of the stirrups, of the girth, the reins, and of the bit; while he never forgot the shape of the pistols or their correct positions.

Having mastered his subject thoroughly—the secret of many successes we cannot sometimes explain—he combined with it an exquisite perception of scenery, and set to work to illustrate the romance of horsemanship. Many painters before him had introduced horses into their compositions, particularly into battle scenes; but Wouvermans was the first who worked up the graces of equitation, who, choosing to paint stout country gentlemen, elegant cavaliers and huntsmen, made of the horse an essential feature in his picture; for we know not a single exception among his productions—all contain a horse, or a part of one. This is so true, that Wouvermans, as if jealous of making his favourite animal subservient in interest, never selects a moment in the chase when attention is drawn to the animal pursued, but watches for the opportunity of developing the grace and intelligence of the horse—in this respect unlike Rutard, Oudry, Snyders, and Rubens. The bounding deer, leaping a ravine, or listening to the coming hunt, his elegant form in the foreground of a picture, draws off the interest from the horse. He, therefore, generally supposes the hunt, or paints the meet, the halt, or the return.

Had Wouvermans been paid for his pictures what is now their value, he too would have had his pages and his falconers, his hunters and his beautiful white hounds with silky coats, a heron-pond in his park, bay, black, and gray horses, and that white charger; in fact, all those that appear in his pictures, neighing, prancing, drinking, eating. But Wouvermans was modest and timid, and these qualities hindered much his success both as to money and fame. He trusted to dealers to fix prices on his exquisite hunting groups, and he took without grumbling any price that was offered him. Besides, in Haarlem Wouvermans had a formidable rival in Pierre de Laer, known as Bamboche. When painting his scenes of real life—those elegant cavalcades which might any day be seen in the country—Wouvermans did it with so much ease and native grace that he appeared to invent nothing, simply because he was true and graceful like nature herself; while Bamboche astonished people by his compositions about thieves, terrible dramas of the hidden life of towns, things less familiar to the common eye than grooms, captains, and squires.

One De Witte, a Haarlem picture-dealer, having requested Bamboche to paint him a cavalry piece, the artist asked 200 florins, and would not take a penny less, upon which the dealer went to Wouvermans. For the money which Bamboche had scornfully refused, our artist painted a masterpiece, and thus began his fame. De Witte made a great stir about the unknown talent, and called together all the amateurs of Haarlem to admire a picture, which the dealer valued all the more that it enabled him to be a little avenged on Bamboche. Wouvermans got on better after this; he was better paid than before, and, as the learned Houbraken says, "was now well received by rich Meccenas." The minute Dutchman, whose work ought to be translated, quotes also as an instance of the pecuniary success of Wouvermans, the fact that he gave his daughter 20,000 florins when she married Henri de Fromantjou, an artist of fame. And yet what was this to the fabulous prices attained by his pictures after his death, when the Elector of Bavaria, the Dauphin of France, and others, contended for them, and bought them up, no matter at what sacrifices?

If we examine the paintings of Wouvermans with the eye of a connoisseur, we shall admire not only the painting, but the choice of the subject, the gallantry, and the picturesque character of the scene, which always breathes of chivalry and feudalism, which, however brutal and degrading in itself, always looked well at a distance. Even the haughty, and often absurd and petty, Louis XIV., who exclaimed, when shown some drinkers by Teniers, "Take away those scarecrows," would not have had his royal delicacy offended had he chosen some subjects from Wouvermans to adorn his cabinet. There would have been the persons he wanted to work upon; the rough country gentlemen he was to attract from their turreted homes to learning the mincing step and courtly vices of the palace of Versailles—sure presage of that Capuan voluptuousness which was to end in the great storm of 1793.

But Wouvermans shows little interest in the tender passions, none at all in its gentler phases; if there be any, it is the rough love-making of the fields. The trumpet sounds to mount; the officers come forth in their heavy boots and cuirasses. They have been drinking stilly, and perhaps one may linger to say a word of gallant impertinence to the girl of the inn, while he roughly tries to snatch a kiss. What else can you expect from men who drink strong liquors, and wear such boots?

Look at "The Officers' Halt" (p. 260). These are men and horses only to be found in the paintings of the Flemish school. Mark the two steeds, on one of which an officer is mounted, who has just quaffed a huge draught of strong ale, and is holding out the pot to a girl, who is, however, delayed by another worthy in gay apparel, who pinches her chin familiarly with one hand, while he clutches his horse's bridle with the other. This animal is admirably rendered—position, form, head, harness, all are painted with vigour and truth. All the accessories of the picture are admirable. The beggar whom no one notices, the distant hills and the river beneath them, the ferry-boat, the card-players round their table, the boys playing with the dog, the great tree shattered by many a storm, the tent, all demonstrate the power and vigour of the painter.

But Gersaint * truly characterises his touch, when he says, "Teniers and Wouvermans are the two painters who have worked hardest, though they are so opposite in character." The finish of Wouvermans is exquisite, it is something extraordinary—we may even go so far as to say it is too finished at times. His greensward sometimes looks like velvet. Gessner has noticed this.

It appears to be a well ascertained fact, that Wouvermans, towards the end of his career, threw into the fire whole portfolios of drawings and studies from nature. The reason for this is not really known. Some say, that he wanted to deprive his son of these rich portfolios, for fear that his native idleness would be thus encouraged; while others allege, that he wished to deprive his brother and rival of the advantages which he might have derived from such studies. This version is as odious as it is unlikely. It resembles a story told by Roestraten, who says that De Witte, informed of the death of Bamboche, took possession of a chest full of studies, drawings, and thoughts, which he gave to his friend Wouvermans, who having pilfered all that was useful to him, destroyed the rich materials of his friend by burning. A more absurd and ridiculous story was never imagined. Bamboche died in 1673 or 1674, six years after Wouvermans.

This great painter breathed his last in 1668, leaving a son who became a monk. Of his two brothers, John and Peter Wouvermans, the first is the ablest. His other pupils were Bernaert Gaal, Emmanuel Murant, John Van der Benc. His successful imitators were Hans Van Lin and John Griffier.

His "Horse Market" is one of his great pictures. In this he has surpassed himself. The rascally cunning-looking horse-dealers, making their horses prance before the buyer with whip and spur, are admirably represented. It combines many rare qualities. His "Parc aux cerfs," not that horrid den of the same name which Louis XV. patronised, but a real collection of deer, is admirable. In fact, in the delineation of animals he is always excellent. Sometimes his real life is carried too far, becoming simply dirty. The same was true of Teniers, whose drunkards are extremely offensive.

But the men and women of Wouvermans are always model men and women; his ladies are those bounteous dames who adorn the court and the palace. He scorns the poor, at least on his canvas, though probably as sympathetic with them as any other noble and generous heart. It is not necessary that we should believe Wouvermans a servile worshipper of wealth and rank; a man of genius could not have been anything of the kind; but his natural love of the beautiful and the gorgeous drove him always to the representation of life in the upper classes.

And he dearly loved the aristocracy of animal creation. No knackers' horses for him, no ill-used and battered donkey under a shower of blows, no fitting subject for the Cruelty to Animals Society would obtain notice from Wouvermans. Shakespeare has a scene which Wouvermans would have been delighted to illustrate:—

* Gersaint, "Catalogue de M. Quentin de Lorigniere." Paris 1744.

Look when a painter would surpass the life,
 In liming out a well proportioned steed,
 His art with nature! workmanship at strife,
 As if the dead the living should exceed;

So did this horse excel a common one,
 In shape, in courage, colour, pace, and bone.

Round-hoofed, short-jointed, fetlocks shag and long,
 Broad breast, full eye, small head and nostril wide, shapeless hillocks, with a yellow tint; those heaps of sand, covered here and there with brush, at the foot of which winds a small stream, that looks all but motionless. But the true poetry of Philip Wouvermans, the ideal which is depicted on his harmonious canvas, is a dream of happiness; not of that happiness which love-sick painters find in a gentle look, or in a green and rich field, in the solitude and silence of desert places; but of that real happiness, so easy to the rich, full of

THE OFFICERS' HALT.—FROM A PAINTING BY WOUVERMANS.

High crest, short ears, straight legs, and passing strong,
 Thin mane, thick tail, broad buttocks, tender hide Look what a horse should have, he did not lack,
 Save a proud rider on so proud a back."

Wouvermans has none of that soft melancholy which some of the Flemish school were so fond of. It is true that at times, unconsciously, he painted landscapes sweetly sad, like the bleak shores of Wynants: he painted, too, some of those comfort and dignity, which is the result of health of body and peace of mind. These few remarks may enable the reader to appreciate the characteristics of this powerful and pleasing artist, whose pictures are still the delight of amateurs, and are rated at no more than their value, despite their number. A large number of his best pictures are in St. Petersburg, alongside Teniers, Rembrandt, Rabens, and others. His paintings, however, are also to be found in all the great galleries of Europe.

KAREL DUJARDIN.

THIS artist, whose name is less familiar than that of many others, was also a landscape and animal painter. Most of the Flemish artists may be described in the same way, and are yet different in their characteristics. Words are not the fittest representative of their peculiar types, but a glance at once separates Cuypp from Dujardin, Potter from Berghem. How shall we describe the peculiar style of the artist we now treat of? To succeed would be difficult.

When, reader, you take a country walk, you sometimes rest on a stile, or under a hedge, or on a fallen tree, and looking around you, various objects meet your eye—a few clustering even arid materials he makes a fonds appear, exhibiting fully his style and manner.

Pilkington and Deschamps inform us that he was born in 1640. Biographers are not always consistent in their dates. In 1652 appeared some admirable engravings by Karel Dujardin, perfect masterpieces, which certainly were not executed at the youthful age of twelve. We must, therefore, place

Dujardin's birth at least as far back as 1635, as it is well known that these were the productions of a very precocious talent. It is not known for certain who was his master; some call him a pupil of Berghem, some of Paul Potter. But, however this may be, he went early to Italy, and on arriving at Rome, joined the jolly club of Flemish drinkers, into which all were admitted under a nick-name, which in his case was Goat's Beard. His easy and impulsive nature, to which pleasure was a necessity, gained him many friends. His countryman, Pierre de Laer, had introduced a style among the Romans, of which they were very fond, and Dujardin following it up was well supported. He painted little landscapes, with a cow, some sheep, a miller and his ass, a girl holding up her petticoats to cross a ford (p. 261); and was well paid for them on account of their excellence. With youth, spirits, and money, Dujardin led an easy, jolly life, contracting many debts, and wasting much talent to pay them. But he studied like a true Dutchman; he saw the vulgar side of everything, and made that side picturesque. The quacks of a fair, so common in Rome, were a favourite subject. He admired their genius, he caught their pantomime, and before he returned to his atelier, his picture was finished in his head. The rough idlers of Trastevere, with their robust wives, filled the foreground, or, perhaps, a muleteer whistling or searching his pockets for a coin, to give the boy with a black face and a paste-board nose, who went about collecting.

Dujardin's early style was a comical mixture of Bamboche, Jean Miel, and Michael Angelo des Batailles. The Italians were much struck by his pictures, and naturally so, for he invested the every-day scenes he painted with his own gentleness, his own gay and lively spirit. It was something between the finish, so much esteemed at Amsterdam, and the ordinary satirical character of the artists of that school who lived in Rome—semi-Romans themselves.

The price which the Italians put upon the works of Karel did not suffice for his increasing expense. The same could be said of him that was said of Bamboche by the historian Passeri, amico della recreazione e del buon tempo. To create for himself new resources, he tried the portrait style, and succeeded well, because an artist like him could not do anything badly. He composed portraits very simply, in general without any details, half-length, with all the usual sobriety of his genius. We speak here of sobriety in the picturesque sense, for in private life he knew nothing of it. His character is marvellously well painted in the portrait which exists in the Museum of Amsterdam, where he is represented clothed in a black silk cloak, his hand upon his breast. His great intelligent and open eyes announce frankness, penetration, and jollity; his mouth is broad and somewhat sensual; but his great lips reveal a fine irony which has no bitterness in it. The expansive and hearty temperament of Karel Dujardin is the secret of his weakness; it explains his love of pleasure, his debts daily paid and daily renewed, his love for the comic side of vulgar things, and that want which drove him to seek impression from the three great sources,—life, nature and art.

But at last he determined to see his country again, which he had left when very young. He started for Holland, but passing through Lyons, he met some friends, who easily kept him there, and the sight of some of his works brought round him a crowd of amateurs. Forgetting the object of his journey, Karel renewed the life he had led at Rome, a life of luxury and adventures, to pay for which he had but to paint the fresh morning dew. Few painters have succeeded so well in depicting the dawn, such geniuses as Claude Lorraine and Elsheimer always excepted. Dujardin lived at Lyons, in the house of a rich old woman, who gave him plenty of credit because she took a fancy to him. At last, however, the artist's debts became so numerous and so pressing, that poor Karel Dujardin, in his distress, had recourse to his principal creditor—his old landlady. She took a usurious interest for her money. She made him marry her.

Having thus settled his affairs, the newly-married man took the road to Amsterdam, where he was well received. He was the more liked because he did not altogether resemble his countrymen; in the same way that the Italians liked him because with them he was a Dutchman of the south, while the former called him an Italian of the north. He painted some local portraits, but they wanted the interest and charms of Rembrandt's similar productions.

It is when the merry painter depicts tumblers and quacks, muleteers before an inn, or a trumpeter on horseback at the door of a pot-house, drinking the glass of wine handed to him by the maritornes of the place, that we have no need to criticise and compare. Karel's characteristic is to reach the picturesque by simple efforts. More simple than Berghem, as agreeable as Wouvermans, and less proud than Bamboche, Karel Dujardin has all their strong sense of the picturesque. He is very fond of bringing in old walls, those walls which our modern masters have so often copied; sometimes he fills up the background with them, ivy-clad and half-ruined, mossy and covered with wall-flowers, or warmed by the golden foliage and the purple tints of a virgin vine, which in autumn resemble the rays of the setting sun. The rustic walls of Karel are in general sufficiently lofty for them to throw up the whole figure.

To be married to an old woman, when one is young, may be bearable on a day when you obtain a receipt in full for all your debts; but the awakening is unpleasant. Dujardin felt little relief from the cares of home in the popularity he was gaining among the tasteful amateurs of his native town. One of these, a certain John Reinst, determined to go to Italy, and his friend determined to go as far as the Texel with him. He had no idea himself of going to Italy; for he went to the Texel in slippers. Nevertheless, next morning he sent to his old wife for some linen, saying, he would soon be back. He never saw her again.

He took up his residence in Rome, and though a Protestant, was sufficiently influenced by the locality to paint two Romish subjects, which were highly prized, while his "Christ between the two Thieves," in the Louvre, is a very fine production. But simple nature is his forte. His "Grove of Trees," in the Louvre, is perfect, with its river crossed by farmers driving before them a troop of oxen, donkeys, and sheep. The farmer's wife is mounted on a cart drawn by a white horse, while a peasant, lifting up a young girl in his arms, is about to carry her across the ford. The familiar figures form a charming contrast with the solemnity of the forest trees, which lose none of their mysterious grandeur by contact with the brute creation.

Karel Dujardin took it into his head one day to go to Venice. He found some countrymen there, and, amongst others, Glauber, a pupil, like himself, of Berghem, and a very distinguished painter. A Dutchman, who dealt in pictures, offered him a home in his house, with the hope of making money by his talents; but the hope was not realised, for Dujardin was taken ill and died, in 1678. John Glauber says, that his companion died of a surfeit, caused by eating too much after an illness. A Dutch amateur, Gabriel Van der Leuw, who was just then at Venice, took care to have Dujardin buried; and though he died a Protestant, his body was still dressed in the robes of a Capuchin friar, in obedience to the customs of the country; after which he was buried according to the rites of the Roman Church.

"Crossing the Brook," of which we have given an engraving, is a fine picture; the foreground is rich and admirably painted; the man in the sheep-skin coat is touched off with a truthfulness which is peculiarly characteristic of the Flemish school. The sky, the distant hills, the horses, and the long wall, are exceedingly picturesquely rendered; while the woman, the ass, and the dog, as well as the cow, exhibit a power and truth which exemplify the style of Karel Dujardin very effectively. The original is in France.

Sir Robert Peel possesses two Dujardins, the Bridgewater Gallery one, Lord Ashburton had two, Mr. Hope has one, and the collection of George IV., in Pall Mall, two.

All his paintings are valuable and deserving of study.

GERARD DOUW.

It was about the beginning of the seventeenth century that genre painting came into fashion. This word has recently been adopted, and it comprises the representation of common life in its every-day relations, as opposed to religious and heroic subjects, or to those of an elevated character, such as are generally supposed to fall within the province of historical painting. According to the mode in which the subject is conceived such works may be divided into two separate classes; the one representing life in its more soft and gentle relations, under the regulation of established customs and civilised manners, whilst the other exhibits its more rude and vulgar side with the unchecked license of a free and often unbridled humour." Both comprise works of great excellence, and both engage our interest.

Foremost among the artists of this school stands Gerard Douw. His name is sometimes written Gorkard Douw. He was born at Leyden in 1613, and died in 1674, aged sixty-one. In early life he received instruction from Bartholomew Deland, an engraver; and Peter Rauhorn, a painter on glass, found in young Douw an apt pupil. The boy loved art, and at fifteen became the disciple of Rembrandt. We have already presented to our readers a memoir of this well-known painter. To this great painter is to be ascribed that excellence in colouring, that breadth of light and shadows, which afterwards distinguished the works of Gerard Douw; but with all the genius for grandeur of design and startling effects of chiaroscuro, he united that extreme delicacy of finish which is one of the chief characteristics of his works. Sandraart relates that having once, in company with Bamboccio, visited Gerard Douw, they could not forbear admiring the extreme neatness of a picture which he was then painting, in which they took particular notice of a broom; and expressing their surprise at the remarkable neatness of the finishing of that minute object, Douw told them he should spend three days more in working on that broom before he should account it entirely complete. In a family picture of Mr. Spiering (Douw's principal patron) the same author asserts, that Mrs. Spiering sat five days for the finishing of one of her hands that lay on an arm-chair.

Everything that Douw produced had pre-eminently the true and lovely tints of nature, and his pictures still possess their peculiar advantages, they retain their original lustre, and have the same beautiful effect at a proper distance as they have when submitted to the closest inspection. The picture known as "The Dropsical Woman," an engraving of which we present to the reader (p. 265), is a most perfect and complete specimen of this master's style, possessing at once the broad effect of sfumato, and the most delicate and careful detail. The execution of the painting is astonishingly fine, and although the shadows appear a little too dark, the whole has an inexpressibly bold effect. This picture fell a prey to the French plunderers, and was carried to Paris, and is now preserved in the Louvre. It is one of the most pathetic pictures of this great master. It is the chef-d'œuvre of his daylight works. In representing the chamber of an opulent family, everything in the room presents the most magnificent appearance; it is richly decorated and furnished. A sick lady sits in an arm-chair, her laughter kneels before her, weeping and kissing her hand, the bitterness of death approaching, a servant gives her the medicine, and in the front of the picture stands a physician fantastically dressed, turning to the window and examining a bottle full of water. This picture was given by the Elector Palatine to Prince Eugene, and after his death remained in the gallery at Turin, until the French carried it off and placed it in the Louvre. In 1815, they bought off its restitution, at the price of £1,000.

The subjects which the painter invariably selected were of the simplest description, sketches of common life; but in this modest sphere he brought into full play the various passions by which the heart is governed. There was a deep, earnest truthfulness, or truthfulness which in its very simplicity and homeliness was understood by all, about every one of his works that assumed the popular character, depending on the fickle fashion of the day, but lasting in other times and in other lands. There is one striking peculiarity about his paintings which cannot be overlooked. The scene he depicts is looked upon in the right way, and never opening upon the eye is about them all mortal. It is the result of the study of the great Rembrandt. He would direct his mind to that natural, showing the utmost attention to the most minute particulars, the smallest and most insignificant objects in the design. With him nothing was insignificant. He knew that perfection depended as much on the careful study of detail as the broad, bold outline, and effective contrasts of light and shadow. Inferior to Teniers in some particular, he surpassed him in all the particulars of the former, such as the studied perfection of minutest detail; so that when a picture is entirely and elaborately executed in every part, it is said to have all the finish of a Gerard Douw. And this is saying much in praise of the great painter, the faithful disciple in the school of nature, who copied and improved, but never imitated, the way to manner's art or style.

Gerard Douw is faithful, but he seldom approaches to coarseness. There is the evidence of a merely balanced critical judgment in every one of his pictures, which shows that he was no mere copyist, even of nature. The subjects selected are those of humble life; not the noble cavaliers of Vandyck, or the gorgeously-irresplendent ladies of Louis XIV., but simply honest men and retailers of articles in daily use; yet there is no vulgar feeling, and nothing that approaches burlesque. Every subject is ordinary and commonplace, but they are all within the circle of kindly family life, and appeal to a far larger class than pictures of higher pretensions.

THOMAS BEWICK, THE ENGRAVER ON WOOD.

The name of Thomas Bewick is familiar, not only to those who are lovers of the art of engraving, or students of natural history, but to all who take an interest in the works of original genius. It is the greatest of all mistakes to imagine, as some do, that the reputation of this gifted man rests upon his being the greatest improver, and all but the inventor, of the art of wood-engraving. This is far from being the case. As the first man who ever produced a block of wood in engraving worth looking at, Bewick certainly deserves to be handed down in the annals of the art; but it must be repeated, is far from being the greatest merit of his exterior any man. His character, as portrayed in his works, exhibits an extraordinary union of qualities, and it is indeed one of its main causes his works to be looked at, not only by persons unaccustomed with a relish as keen as they were naturally created on their first publication half a century ago. As a very complete memoir of Bewick's life and progress, by his extraordinary talents, has ever been given to the world, it is still not a proper cause for devoting ample space to the history of a man and an artist, who to that minute truth and true eye for nature, which the best of the English painters have imitated, added much of the humor of Hogarth, and the moral satire of Thomas Bewick's own art, as strong as any the truth of his landscapes, and a man of a noble and a noble character, and a noble man, as his annual publications.

Thomas Bewick was born in the year 1733, at a little village, or hamlet rather, called Cherryburn, in Northumberland, in the parish of St. Mary, Tynemouth, and not far from the large village of Ovington, which is together with his church, and his house, and parsonage, with his eight beautiful children, a narrow way, or road, which runs for many miles up the valley of the Tyne, between Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and Carlisle, in Cumberland. He was the son of poor, but highly respectable parents, who seemed early to have got a glimpse of some of the singular gifts of this their eldest son, and who, whilst they formed his mind to morality and virtue, gave way to the bent of his genius, and had the sagacity not to discourage the boy's pursuits, which, to many parents in their position and situation in life, would have appeared trifling or even pernicious. Thomas Bewick, together with his younger field"—as far as a boy could pursue them. His great delight was in angling, with an artificial fly, for the trout and salmon, with which the river Tyne was at that period abundantly stored; following the hounds on foot when a hare hunt was in progress; and seeking the nests and haunts of all species of birds. All this time he was unconsciously cultivating that brother John, who died prematurely, had such plain education given him as that part of the country at that time afforded. The greater part of it he obtained under the Rev. Christopher Greyson, at that time master of the school at Ovingham, which in the north of England had some reputation. As a boy, Bewick was remarkable for the ardent love he showed for those pastimes that are styled "sports of the aculty, afterwards so remarkable in him, a correct eye for nature and her scenery. As a young draughtsman, his talent was very precocious. The few pence that would have stocked an ordinary lad with marbles, tops, and whipcord, were expended by Bewick in materials for drawing. Some of these boyish sketches are, we believe, yet extant. They embody some faint glimpses of the characteristics of his mature works, and prove how true is that aphorism of the poet Wordsworth, that—

The father of Thomas Bewick had the good sense, being a wonder was, that genius was not constrained into idleness and an unsettled habit of mind, which afterwards proved were the very reverse of the artist's character. This, however, was not the case. The father could not help appreciating the won-superior man in point of discernment, to understand, and in some degree appreciate, the bent of his son's genius. That either the parents of Bewick, or any of those with whom his earlier years were passed, could foresee the eminence which he was to attain, is not to be thought for a moment. The derful power of correctly seizing and sketching natural scenery or animals which his son so soon exhibited; and his disposition did not lead him to think of resisting young Bewick's inclination to be an artist. To this resolve the real delicacy of the youth's constitution, which was seen by his parents, probably contributed. Though powerfully made, and of great stature, Thomas Bewick, like Robert Burns, was liable to bilious disorder; but, unlike the poet, he resisted steadfastly through life the fascinations of convivial society, so dangerous for such temperaments. The artist was, in fact, from his youth upwards, by inclination and by habit, a self-denying and abstemious man. His disposition was eminently social; but even when his company was most in request, he indulged with prudence and refrained with satisfaction. He was eminently domestic also, a quality which always acts as a safeguard for those who are so happy as to possess it.

We have already shown that the early life of this extraordinary man was really, though, perhaps, not ostensibly, spent in the cultivation of the art in which he was to excel. Most of his hours, after school and holidays, were spent in the fields, or on the moors, or by the river's side. It is true, the fishing-rod and the fowling-piece were often in his hand, especially the former; for never was there a keener or more enthusiastic sportsman than Thomas Bewick; but whilst capturing salmon or trout, or bringing down an occasional wild duck, his eye was all alive to his art. Every turn of the river—every wooded glen—gave him materials for a picture of some sort, which on his return home were transferred to paper. It soon, however, became necessary that the youth should learn some calling. This was now felt by his friends to be imperative; and at his own earnest request young Bewick was, therefore, bound apprentice to Mr. Ralph Beilby, engraver, at Newcastle-upon-Tyne; being fourteen years of age, active in habits, and manly in stature. In his master, the young artist was in some respects highly favoured, in others by no means so. Mr. Beilby was a very worthy man, of excellent disposition and character. As a tradesman, he was steady, industrious, and honourable. As a man, he was moral and very well-informed. Thus far the young artist could not have had a happier model than that afforded by his master. Here, however, these advantages stopped. Mr. Beilby, though a pains-taking engraver of such things as Newcastle offered to him, was as little of an artist as it was possible for a person of his profession to be. In fact, at that period, 1767, a Newcastle engraver was not called upon to be an "artist," in the modern acceptation of that general term. His graver was exercised altogether in cutting, in copper-plate, invoices for merchants, adorned, perhaps, with some little rough device; copy-heads for writing-masters; cards for professional men and others, and similar trifles which it is needless to name. To this line of engraving good Mr. Beilby was no doubt quite equal; but as an artist, properly so styled, his pretensions were small. Some of his little sketches in Indian-ink, and in colours, are in our possession. They only prove that, as a draughtsman or colourist, his talent was as little as can well be conceived. As an engraver, his efforts, we believe, never extended beyond the subjects we have indicated.

It is needless to say, that from his master, therefore, young Bewick could derive no lessons in art. Useful lessons in life—lessons invaluable in their way—he, no doubt, did receive and profit by, as he loved to acknowledge; but as an artist, it is quite safe to say, Thomas Bewick was self-taught. He was the nurse and fosterer of his own genius, and the maker of his own art. His wonderfully correct eye and fine natural taste were his only instructors. In plain truth, he was amongst artists precisely what Burns was amongst poets. The parallel, from the first, was, as far as genius is concerned, complete. Both were the sons of poor men. Both were born amidst picturesque and strongly marked natural scenery. Both had a plain and homely education. Both showed precocious talent, and gave early indications of that glorious, bright, and divine spirit which their Creator had vouchsafed them. The excellency of both lay in a close adherence to nature. Neither of them elaborated great or extensive poems or pictures. Burns was neither an epic poet nor dramatist. Bewick was never a painter, nor an engraver from the pictures of others. The genius of both resides in their sketches from nature; thrown off with that fire and vraisemblance which true genius only imparts. In this both are unrivalled; and probably never will be rivalled. The long and short descriptive poems of Burns, and the sketches in the shape of "tail-pieces" by Bewick, may be set side by side. In some instances the stanza and the picture seem to be actually inspired by the same identical bit of scenery. Such scenery was never so given before, and, perhaps, never may be again. Further it is impossible to go. We must now, however, return to Bewick's earlier life.

His apprenticeship with Mr. Beilby was passed in a manner highly satisfactory to both master and scholar; the mere mechanism of the art of cutting on copper Bewick easily learnt; and having become a master of this portion of the engraver's craft, his inventive genius turned itself to the cultivation of the art of engraving on blocks of hard wood. It is not improbable that the cheapness of the material might be one of the motives which influenced his mind to turn to this pursuit. From early life a rigid and close economy was one of the leading features of his character, and it clung to him through the whole of his career. Never was Bewick known to throw away a shilling even when a comparatively wealthy man. It was about this time, he used to tell his friends, that he tried upon how small a sum he could contrive to exist—and he reduced himself to two pence per diem for provisions! This may hardly seem credible now-a-days; but the sceptical should reflect that during Bewick's apprenticeship the taxes of England had not reached nine millions a year; and that the squandering, borrowing, and funding system was, with the artist, only in the early years of its apprenticeship. Be this as it might, however, Bewick, whilst still an apprentice, was beginning to create the art of wood-engraving. This must not, however, be taken too literally. Some rude attempts at engraving on wood blocks had been made prior to Bewick's; but the results were contemptible; and the art was deemed, until he took it up, not worth pursuit. That he made the art is, therefore, strictly true, and quite undeniable; but in the rigid sense of the term he cannot be said to have invented it. The idea was another's; the execution his own.

In this happy and laudable way his apprenticeship was passed. Always attached to his parents and family, and loving the country of his youth, he often used, during the summer months, to walk up to Cherryburn, a distance of nearly fourteen miles, to see his parents when the Sunday, his only day of leisure, was fine. The best road was on the side of the water opposite to his father's habitation, and the young artist was obliged to trust to a ford in order to reach his parents' house. It sometimes happened, however, that he miscalculated the state of the river. In mountainous countries heavy spouts of rain often fall amongst the hills and suddenly swell the streams that rise there, whilst those who live near the river's mouth are unconscious of what is going on. Thus it is with the Tyne, the sources of which are amongst lofty hills, trodden only by a few shepherds, and inhabited by sheep or grouse. It often happened, therefore, that when Bewick arrived at the ford just below Cherryburn, "the waters were out," and the stream too deep and impetuous to be crossed. On such occasions he used to make signals; collect his friends at the other side, shout his inquiries and news across the impassable torrent, and then very contentedly walk back to Newcastle.

A young man of Bewick's amiable disposition, rigidly prudent habits, and great ability, could not but soon become a favourite with his master. This was accordingly the case. Mr. Beilby soon entertained a highly favourable opinion of his prudence and probity as well as great talent; and the result was a partnership between himself and Mr. Beilby, which was arranged soon after the expiration of his term of apprenticeship, about the year 1774. Bewick had by this time brought the art of wood-engraving to great perfection, and being now in a position to act for himself, he resolved to introduce it to the world, which he immediately and successfully accomplished.

In 1775, one of his earliest attempts at wood-engraving, "The Old Hound," was exhibited before the Society of Arts and obtained a premium. In this attempt are to be traced some faint scintillations of his genius. The position of the huntsman's horse is spirited, and the drawing good—that is to say, what would he at that time so esteemed; but very inferior to his after performances. About this time Bewick went up to the metropolis, under what impressions is not very well known. It is probable he wished to try the ground there before his partnership with Mr. Beilby was finally settled and concluded. His ideas of arts and of artists in London, as acquired by this visit, seem to have been highly unfavourable. It does not appear that he complained of any want of attention; for his very earliest essays with the graver upon wood were universally admired, so unique was deemed the art and so intractable the material. The habits and manners of the metropolis were, however, the reverse of his own. His love for the manners and scenery of his native county, so different from those of the south of England, was intense to a degree almost ludicrous; and the result was such a distaste for metropolitan art, manners, customs, and habits, that when he afterwards published those works, by which he became known over Europe, he would not suffer them to be printed, nor the engravings to be struck off in London. Nay, so far did he carry this strange dislike to everything metropolitan, that when it was proposed to bring a pressman from London, accustomed to strike off engravings, he sternly answered, "Hold your tongues. No cockney shall touch my blocks!"—and in this resolve he was quite implacable and fixed.

As soon as his engagement with his partner, Mr. Beilby, was finally settled and brought to a conclusion, Bewick planned and executed the volume of the "History of Quadrupeds," by which his fame as the great wood-engraver was at once established. The literary portion of the book was mostly performed by Mr. Beilby, who, although no artist, was a man of some taste and some judgment, and not destitute of literary tact. The book was printed at Newcastle, by Solomon Hodgson, a man also of good ability, and a zealous friend and warm admirer of Bewick. Up to this time, such fame as Mr. Bewick had acquired rested altogether upon the novelty of engraving on the material he used. To cut fine lines on wood passed for a sort of half-miraculous achievement. But in this work, which was brought before the public in the year 1790, the wonderful life and correctness of Bewick's drawing were fully manifest. This was especially apparent in his cuts of the more domestic animals with which his eye was familiar. His cut of "The Chillingham Bull," a portrait of one of the breed of indigenous wild cattle still preserved at Chillingham Park, Northumberland, had excited much admiration some years before; but this drawing, good as it is, was eclipsed by that of many of his quadrupeds in the history now first published. The horses are, without exception, drawn and engraved with wonderful accuracy and life. So is the ass, and so are most of the dogs. The Spanish pointer, in particular, may be instanced as one of the finest portraits of this breed of setter ever achieved. It has been copied and recopied so often, that the public are now familiar with it; and as an animal portrait, it probably never was surpassed. In this volume the tail-pieces are inferior to those with which he afterwards adorned his two volumes of "British Land and Water Birds." He had not then fully found out the secret of his genius for sketching natural scenery. Here and there the volume unquestionably exhibits indications of his talent in this line; but they were comparatively faint, and are not prominent enough to be free from eclipse by the fine drawing and cutting of the animals with which the book is filled. The publication of this volume may be styled the commencement of the era of engraving on wood. The admiration it excited was universal. No arts of puffing, nor the usual manoeuvres of the craft of modern bookselling, were used; and assuredly none were needed. The sale of the volume, from the first steady, soon became rapid and great. A second edition was speedily needed; and others have continued to be published from time to time, so steady has been the admiration of the world of this work of genius. Bewick's reputation was not now confined to the North of England. It gradually became national; and proposals were soon made him by London booksellers and publishers to adorn projected publications by an art now considered as strikingly beautiful as unique in character.

About this period Bewick married. His fortunes now permitted even a man of his prudent and reflecting habits to encounter the mixed cares and pleasures of a family. His habits were essentially domestic; and he had also with him his younger brother, John, who, sharing his brother's talent, had become the apprentice of Messrs. Beilby and Bewick. His constitution, however, eventually suffered from a town residence and the labour of engraving. His lungs became affected, and he died of consumption in the year 1796, after having, under his brother's able tuition, attained high excellence in his art. So distinguished was he, that, in 1795, his name was appended, with that of his brother, to illustrations on wood of Goldsmith's "Traveller," and "Deserted Village," and "The Hermit" of Parnell, published by Bulmer, who was noted in his day as printer. The combined beauty of the engravings and typography gave great popularity to these reprints. Amongst others, they attracted the curiosity of George the Third, who was in some degree a patron of the arts. On being told that the cuts were engraved upon blocks of wood, the king at once gave utterance to his disbelief of the statement. His Majesty was tolerably notorious for adherence to opinions or notions which he had once formed or imagined; and to his scepticism, as to these extraordinary works, he resolutely stuck, until the blocks were sent for his inspection, a process which even his prejudice could not resist. It does not appear that George the Third ever bestowed upon this self-taught artist, and maker of the art of wood-engraving, any favour or patronage. Royal patronage, however, Thomas Bewick never wanted; and had he wanted it, he was too proud to ask it; for his disposition was as independent as it was plain and manly. At all events, he never had it, and certainly never sought it. In 1796, the year of John Bewick's death, was published "The Chace," of Somerville, ornamented with engravings on wood by Thomas and John Bewick; after which, the name of Bewick became celebrated as the great improver and head of his art.

Between the years 1790 and 1797, Bewick had been strenuously labouring at that work which is perhaps his greatest, as it certainly is the most finished,—"The History of British Land-birds." This admirable volume was published in 1797. The drawing, execution, and portraiture (for portraits they are) of the birds are beyond all praise; and in the tail-pieces the artist has put forth the whole strength of his now matured genius. As sketches of real nature, some of them are almost unapproachable; and others to exquisite drawing unite the moral satire and humour of Hogarth. There is an amusing anecdote connected with this publication, which is very characteristic of the artist. When a joke and a bit of moral satire were united, to Bewick's mind they were irresistible; and on this occasion his love of lowering the false pride of human nature, conjoined with a jest, led him a little too far across the debateable line of decorum. His friends remonstrated, the printer remonstrated, and the publisher implored; but the sturdy artist was not to be moved. He insisted upon it that the whole was a piece of effeminate squeamishness, and that "the folks, as he expressed it, would have more sense!" For once, however, Bewick was deceived in his calculation of the sans of the public. As soon as the book was published, the outcry against the luckless tail-piece became too loud to be trifled with, and in the greater part of that impression the vignette in question is daubed over with Indian ink! In the succeeding editions the block was altered, and in some it is omitted, and another vignette substituted. The unqualified admiration which this volume excited secured the publication of a second; and after a long and persevering quest of specimens of some of the very rare birds which are there portrayed, the second volume of "The History of British Birds," containing the Water-birds, was published in 1804. It may safely be pronounced to be equal, though not superior, to its predecessor. The figures and characters of the aquatic fowls, especially of the gulls and ducks, are exquisitely given, and the delicate pencilling of some of the plumage is beyond all praise. But amongst the most captivating things in this volume are some of the marine sketches, upon which Bewick has brought to bear all the delicacy as well as all the force of his talents, and which are in some respects unrivalled. Before this volume was ready for the press, Mr. Beilby, the worthy partner of the artist, had retired with a handsome independence from business; and, in the literary portion of the work, Bewick was assisted by the Rev. Mr. Coates, then the incumbent of Bedlington, a rural parish in Northumberland, not far from the coast. To the exertions of Mr. Coates and his friends the artist was indebted for various specimens of the rare aquatic fowls, with which the wilder portions of the unnatural combinations of animal with animal, which the plan of the fable involves, spoils the vraisemblance of the whole, however beautiful the drawing. To depict a wolf conversing with a lamb; or a fox with a stork or a cat, includes so much that is unnatural, that, be the art what it may with which the scenes shall be depicted, the "incredulous odi" still steps in and spoils all. The consequence has been that this work, which, had it appeared early, would have made a reputation, is deemed inferior to the works on natural history, and is consequently much less known. Whether Bewick entertained a presentiment that this was to be his last published effort, it is impossible to say; but it may be interesting to some to be told, that the tail-piece at coasts of Northumberland and Durham abound. Many were obtained from the Fern Islands and the sands near Lindisfarne, and others from that rude coast which runs from Seaham, in the county of Durham, to the mouth of the Tees, increasing in boldness, till it ends in the enormous cliffs of Whitby and Scarborough in the north-east angle of Yorkshire.

This was Bewick's last great work. In 1818 were published "Select Fables of Æsop and others, embellished with woodcuts by Thomas Bewick;" a work which he had long contemplated, and which was a favourite with him to the last. Though admirably executed in many respects, candour will not permit it to be ranked with his "Land and Water Birds."

page 162 of the first edition bears the date of his mother's death; and that at page 176, of his father's. It is also a curious trait that the concluding vignette is a view of Ovingham church-yard, the burying-place of the Bewicks, through the open gates of which a funeral is in the act of passing. To those who knew Bewick personally, this final embellishment conveys touching recollections. Soon after the publication of his "Select Fables," Mr. Bewick planned and commenced a "History of British Fishes," which, however, although some progress was made, he did not live to finish. Some of the vignettes intended for this work have been published separately. They are mostly of exceeding beauty, and quite equal to the finest efforts of his earlier life. From a boy, Mr. Bewick's constitution was in some respects delicate, and towards the middle of life he underwent more than one severe attack of illness, by one of which, in particular, his strength was reduced so low that existence might be said to hang upon a thread. The effects of this attack he never completely shook off, and for the last three or four years of his life, his decline was very visible. He himself was perfectly conscious of it; and used to nourish the hope that his son Robert, now also deceased, might finish that "History of it was proposed to place in the extensive and fine library of the Literary and Philosophical Society of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, an institution of which he was for many years a member. This was a matter of some tact and management. To persuade the artist to sojourn in London for the purpose of being modelled was a hope worse than forlorn. The land of Cockneydom he utterly disliked, and within its confines he would not enter. At length it was arranged that Mr. Bailey, the sculptor, should come down to Newcastle and Fishes" which he knew he could not live to execute. In this hope he has been deceived, the book, though much was done to it, being still quite incomplete.

Mr. Bewick, it has been already stated, always enjoyed the high respect of his fellow-townsmen, and was a favourite with all classes of society, to whom his simplicity of manners and great bonhomie were always welcome. About the year 1822, it was agreed, amongst several of his most intimate friends and zealous admirers, to procure a bust of him, which make the model—which was done; and the bust, which is a perfect likeness, now adorns the library of the society. The modelling of this bust gave rise to more than one amusing and characteristic controversy, between the sculptor and engraver, which it was no easy matter to decide. Bailey, after the custom of his school, wanted to throw over the shoulders of his sitter a bit of drapery, which conventionally passes for a fold of a Roman toga, or Grecian tunic, as the case may be. The artist, however, strictly eschewed either toga or tunic.

He worked in a coat and waistcoat, he asserted, and walked about, and eat and drank in a coat and waistcoat; and in a coat and waistcoat he would be chiselled. Bewick had no idea of going down to posterity in masquerade; and to his resolve he accordingly stuck. The result is, that the marble exhibits not only the strongly lined and expressive features of the engraver, but also a portion of his coat and waistcoat, neckcloth, and carefully-ruffled shirt, in which he dressed for the occasion. Whether this may be "classical" we cannot say. We fear not. But, at all events, it was never denied that it improved the likeness; and that, we presume, cannot be construed into a fault by any metaphysical process whatsoever. To another of the engraver's demands, the sculptor, however, was compelled positively to demur. To the latest period of his life, Bewick's countenance retained very visible vestiges of the severity of the small-pox. Upon the principle which induced Cromwell to insist upon Walker, the portrait-painter, giving every wart as well as every feature of his face, Bewick insisted upon Bailey's essaying to put in some of "his beauty-spots," as he termed the pittings of the small-pox. To this requisition, however, the sculptor positively demurred; asserting that the marks of the small pox could not by any art be expressed in marble; and so the controversy ended, much to the discontent of the engraver, who was thus forced to impose upon posterity a smoother physiognomy than was really his property.

Bewick was now making some progress in cutting the blocks for the "History of Fishes," but in the midst of this work, his health began to decline. Through the year 1827 his strength gradually sunk, though his mental powers remained to the last, and in 1828, towards the summer, his state became quite hopeless, and gradually ended in death, for which he had long been prepared. His funeral, at his own request, was strictly private. He was buried in the church-yard of Ovingham, the burying-place of the family. The village stands close by the side of the River Tyne, on the north bank; and is a prominent object to travellers going westward by the railway from Newcastle-upon-Tyne into Cumberland. No lover of art can pass it without feeling the spot hallowed in his gaze, when told it contains all that was mortal of Thomas Bewick.

It now remains to say a few words as to the genius and works of this extraordinary man, whom the poet Wordsworth has designated as—

"The genius that dwells on the banks of the Tyne."

There exists amongst some persons a mistaken idea that the fame of Bewick rests, for the most part, upon the fact of his being the maker and father of the art of engraving on wood. This is a sad error. It is true, indeed, that the name of Thomas Bewick must always have a niche in the history of art as the creator of this line of art; but the charm of his works is quite distinct from this. We do not admire the wood-cuts of Bewick because they were the first, but because they are the best. Bewick's excellence is, in truth, more pictorial than as a mere engraver of pictures. He had a more correct eye for nature and her forms than, perhaps, any painter that ever lived; and it is for their wonderful spirit, life, and truth, that we admire his figures of animals, and sketches of landscape, and not because they happen to be engraved on wood and cut with a delicacy that is certainly wonderful, when the material is considered. In this faculty of fine cutting, Bewick was equalled, however, by some of his pupils. Some portions of his finest portraits of birds and most striking tail-pieces were executed by them after Bewick had drawn them upon the block. But this is mere nicety of hand; mere mechanical excellence. Many wood-engravers, since Bewick's death, have cut even more finely than their great predecessor in art; but where is the engraver on wood whose name stands beside that of Bewick? Nowhere. No. Because his real excellence lay less in his hand than in his mind. No man ever formed, perhaps, so full, lively, and correct an idea of that which he was to transfer to paper as did Bewick. Hence his figures of animals are portraits. We know a bird, drawn by him, by its air and physiognomy, just as easily as by the pencilling of the feathers. Every species has its character in air and features. Thus we have the majestic eagle; the keen pitiless hawk; the airy lark; the pert, vulgar sparrow; the light, elegant snipe; the awkward, strong, lean, sailing heron; the swift bustard; the clean, harmless, happy-looking sea-gull; the fat, sleepy duck; the timid partridge; the insignificant wren; the vivacious, impudent magpie; in short, the whole diversity of character that the feathered tribes so wonderfully exhibit. In the same manner his landscapes always seem to be transcripts of real scenes; and no doubt many of them are so. Bewick would not assent to any unqualified assertion on this point; but his denial does not decide the matter. Of his strict veracity nobody doubted; but his memory of the most minute forms of things was so extensive, and his eye so wonderfully correct, that it is believed he drew portraits of natural scenery without being conscious of it. To those who know minutely the character of the scenery which is embodied in his exquisite vignettes, it is evident that all is a faithful transcript of nature. The shapes of the hills, the sweep of the moors, the character of the cliffs and stones, the features of the river scenery; and the composition of the rocks in his marine sketches, all unite to demonstrate this. In fact, Bewick's theory of art was to copy nature. Of all artists that ever lived, not one was ever so free from metaphysical fantasies. Bewick's reverence for the wisdom of the Creator was great and earnest. He loved nature, because it was to him, as it were, the handwriting of an omnipotent, all-wise, and all-benevolent master. Hence he dreamed of improving the works of Him who made the universe—the sea, earth, and skies, and "all that in them is." So humble are some people's conceptions of their sphere of action. Hence Bewick sketched what he saw; and that alone. He could love nature in her humblest guise. No need of holiday-time for him; and hence it happens that the simplest of his little landscapes often charm as deeply as his most elaborate transcripts of Northumberland scenery. The secret is in their verisimilitude. They are as the Creator made them. That is all; but surely that is enough.

There can be no doubt that Bewick's excellence in his walk of art was the result of his entire character, joined to a correctness of eye that was almost miraculous. His great love of locality was the prominent feature of his character. He carried it to an extent that to strangers seemed absurd and ludicrous. The scenery, the men, the women, the idiom, the music, of his beloved Northumberland were to him paramount. He was excessively fond of the old Scotch and Irish airs, as all persons of real musical feeling are; but the airs peculiar to Northumberland, which, with one or two exceptions, are really very inferior things, he preferred before them all. We have seen him sit for hours listening to the music of a blind minstrel and his boy, who used to perform these old airs admirably well; but the finest of Ireland's pathetic ditties, or the most spirit-stirring of Scotia's "pibrochs," could not move Bewick to such rapture as did the old Northumberland "Gathering Time," known popularly as "Bodies Abreast," when played on the Northumbrian pipes by his son Robert, who was a first-rate performer on the national instrument. This passion for everything Northumbrian gives his work character. All his scenery is the product of the district. The moors of Kielder, Millfield-plain and Flodden-field, the banks of Coquet, North Tyne, or Till, are all depicted in his vignettes. By those who know the district they are felt to be portraits; by all persons of taste they are felt to be nature unadorned.

Thomas Bewick was by nature very social, and loved to witness the amusements of young people. To sit at the head of the room, with an old friend or two, to see the young people dance, while his son Robert "screwed the pipes and garr'd them skirl," was a great delight to the artist. His admiration for his fair countrywomen used to break out; and he would exclaim, "There they go—queens of England!—queens of England!" They were undoubtedly so in his eyes. His conversation was, like his graver, strong, racy, and graphic. His general talent was great; and upon all questions he thought the flow of the drapery—so peculiar, that it becomes almost harsh, but still so beautiful, so suggestive of deep and earnest thought, that they have not been inappropriately called poems. On a previous occasion* we presented a biographical sketch of this great man—this Crichton of art—and dwelt such as representing the soldiers at the Crucifixion in the costume of the middle ages; but his Christian pictures were symbolical more than historical. Here is the picture of "The Prodigal Son." The artist has seized upon that part of the parable which forms the turning point in the prodigal's history. He somewhat critically on his various productions; we now give another of his works, and it needs no comment. He was prolific in sacred subjects—the story of the evangelists enkindled his enthusiasm—what they described he portrayed. In some of these pieces he has been accused of anachronism, has descended the last step of degradation, and the child of Abraham has lost all—his wealth and summer friends together—and the Jew feeds swine, and fain would fill his belly with the husks that the swine do eat. The broad, rough outline, the grouping, the expression, the tone of the whole is worthy of the high fame of the "evangelist of art."

JEAN BAPTISTE HUET.

The French are an amusing people. They are also a fickle people. One day they fancy a thing, and next week it has passed away like the baseless fabric of a vision, falling away into the deep abyss of things forgotten, dead, perished. Look back but one century in their history. An ancient and effete monarchy is followed by an attempt at constitutional liberty, which is speedily succeeded by civil war and revolution, a short triumph of anarchy, a sham republic, an empire, monarchy once more, then an empire again for one hundred days, again the old monarchy, which was finally overthrown by a bastard kind of government, itself falling unresistingly beneath the indignation of society, and being succeeded by a republic, which, yielding to fraud and perjury, ends in an empire once more. In no other history can such a story be told of two generations of men, though many still live who have seen all we have outlined. A people who can submit to or perpetrate such eccentricities, must be a people pur se, sui generis, different from the rest of the world, and scarcely to be appreciated or judged by the same standard we should apply to the inhabitants of any other land.

In art and literature the French are as fickle as in politics. They do not steadily pursue the study of their authors as they arise; now enjoying the beauties of one, and then of another; luxuriating in the feeling and beauty of one style to-day, and in the stern power of a more masculine tone to-morrow. A Frenchman who admires one author will not read any other with pleasure; and we know one learned man of law, who, buried in his dry and musty octavos and quartos, never warms his imagination or suns himself in the smiles of light literature except in two books, the Confessions of Rousseau and Faublas. Other authors he is content to know through a book of elegant extracts. The nation is the same as the individual. It can only patronise one school at a time. Thus at one time all France is romantic, then classical, and then poetical. It happened on a given day that J. J. Rousseau set the whole nation into a phrenzy about nature, and everybody determined to be natural and admire nature. The Queen of France put on a straw hat, and dressed like a milkmaid; the cottages where Louis XVI. played the good bailli, and where the other princes assumed characters equally suited to them, are still to be seen in the gardens of the Trianon.

Nobody spoke in those days of anything but gardens and flowers. P. Lambert had just published his "Seasons," and Delille prated about flower-beds in Alexandrines as long as the alleys of his parks. The descriptive style became the rage; lyrics were greedily devoured; people contrived to read Gessner's "Pastorals," translated by the great Turgot himself, under the pseudonym of Huber. This phrensy of love of nature, which in a few was sincere and real, was quite factitious in others. It was during this particular era that Jean Baptiste Huet made himself known.

He was not the son of an architect, as M. Brunn Neergaardt tells us in the reprint of his speech delivered over the tomb of Huet, but of an armorial-bearing painter to the court, who lodged in the Louvre; and it was in the Louvre that Jean Baptiste Huet was born, on the 15th of October, 1745. He received his first lessons from Dagommer, who was a man of talent, and whose drawings exhibited great taste. It is probably to his connexion with this artist that we owe his style and peculiar subjects in painting. He also received advice and assistance from Boucher and Leprince, so that he learnt to paint the nude human figure, landscape, and several other styles, all of which will be found mixed up with his favourite subject—animals, he being another Cuyt and Wou-vernans in this particular.

The same difficulty meets us at the outset that we have alluded to in connexion with so many artists. Nothing is known of his early career, except a tradition that, like all young men of his day, he was exceedingly attached to the society of ladies, and was very learned in that code of politeness which was the cloak and screen to the detestable vices of the age. He retained this affable, courtly manner throughout life; and some of those who knew him are still left to speak of that exquisite perception of what is due from man to man, which belonged to some of the devotees of the old regime, and which Huet never departed from. But of his actual life we know nothing at all until the 29th of July, 1769, the year of his reception at the Academy. His reception picture was "A Family of Geese attacked by Dogs." The sketch is said by those who have seen it to be admirably effective. The dogs have entered a poultry-yard, where are congregated a whole flock of geese, protected from their enemies by a frail barrier, through which they thrust their beaks, and utter the celebrated cry which saved the capitol. The flurry and alarm of the nest is admirably rendered, with the scudding hither and thither of the little goslings. This simple and effective picture is one of the best Huet ever painted; in no other has he displayed so much life and energy, for in general he paints his animals in repose.

After his reception, Huet naturally enjoyed the right of exhibiting his pictures at the Academy; and he exercised his privilege with great constancy, generally, but not always, with success. As long as he confined himself to landscapes and animals, he was warmly praised, in days when, Diderot excepted, criticism on art was sober and cold. The remark was often made, with some justice, that his pictures were too clear, too brilliant, and his colouring rather too deep-toned to be natural; but his landscapes were allowed to be dashed off de gout (a phrase much used by the Mercur style in those days); his animals to be given with spirit and effect; and his heads to be painted with elevated expression; while the whole was harmonious, light, airy, and pleasing. Unfortunately, Jean Baptiste Huet was not quite so simple—or rather was too simple—to stick to that style which was peculiarly his own. Having entered the Academy as an animal painter, he allowed himself to be dazzled by the success and example of his great fellow-associates, and, like them, he tried naked figures. It was at the time when Vien, to whom we shall allude in our life of David, began to suggest those reforms which were to be carried so far. Inspired with mighty ideas, good Huet determined to paint "Hercules and Omphale," and wishing to have the canvas commensurate with the dignity of the subject, he painted his hero much larger than nature, in a perfect state of nudity, by the side of a huge and rotund Cupid, to typify the subject on which he was addressing the queen. This attempt of the painter of "The Dog and Geese" was not very fortunate. At the sight of these colossal limbs, thus exposed to all Paris, the journalists were offended, the ladies were scandalised, and the successor of Bachaumont wrote a stinging page on the subject. Huet bowed his head, and returned to his sheep.

Here he was at home. In drawings, water-colours, painting in di-temper, oil-paintings, whatever his style, he excelled in doing full justice to the curly wool of the humble animal, to the soft eyes of the lamb, to the solemn physiognomy of the old ram. His sheep were living, bleating animals, and even Jacques Van der Does himself never did them more justice. It is greatly to the credit of Huet that he gave way to the opinion of the world, and confined himself resolutely to that department for which he was suited by his genuine tastes and habits. Too many men have striven to shine in branches for which they were not qualified, and have in general contrived to spoil themselves in even the one for which they were intended. Many a good artisan has been spoiled, it is said, in the endeavour to produce an artist; but many a good artist in a particular field has been ruined in the bold attempt to be universal.

But Huet having studied Rabelais' proverb, which tells us that "Il faut revenir à ses moutons," became celebrated, and was highly successful. If his pictures were a little imaginary in tone and deep in colouring, his drawings—the number of these was prodigious, chiefly on coloured paper—were perfect, perfectly charming indeed from the extreme correctness, the detailed minuteness of the thing represented; and then from the grace of the pencilling, and the admirable and successful mode adopted by him of using white, which was always brought in apropos—here under the humid eyes of a sheep, there on the nose of a goat, or on his white paw, or upon the creases of the horns, or the white wool. In this, like Demarne, the power of Huet was universal when animals were concerned. He was as successful with the beasts that roam through the meadow and pasture land, as with the cackling geese and crowing cock of the farm-yard, and equally so with the wild and savage inhabitants of a menagerie. Above all he drew them admirably. His drawings, even by experienced amateurs, have been mistaken for those of Gericault, when he painted the roaring lions of the Jardin des Plantes, in Paris—so admirably did he portray their character, masculine fury, and majestic air. Huet, like Karel Dujardin, had a peculiar affection for the humble and ill-used ass. He was equally successful in painting this tribe, as he was in rendering the woolly flock. They lived, moved, and breathed, as it were, on the canvas. In fact, it is said that, in a picture exhibited in 1775, "The Holy Family and the Shepherds," the superiority of the animals to the human figure was so marked that the critics smiled. And well they might, when there was really justice in saying that the importance given to the animals threw the Holy Family into the shade. The more admirable his animals in this picture, the more he was blamed. He was even accused of having given to an ass a wise expression of countenance truly ludicrous. For a painter to have wit is one thing—it is another to lend a portion of that attribute to a donkey.

But despite errors and omissions, Huet took his rank among the most celebrated artists of the day. His expressive copper-plates, full of taste and picturesqueness, pretty engravings taken from his animals, his landscapes, and his pencillings, executed by Demarteau in fac-simile, made him popular all over France.

At the Revolution of 1789, Huet was captain of the milice bourgeoise (now the national guard) of Sevres. The proof of this fact is found in the body of a document emanating from the President of the National Assembly, and signed Le Chapelier and Duke de Villequier, under the date of the 12th August.

The French Revolution, with all its errors and its crimes, natural and inevitable result of long ages of misgovernment, of ignorance, and infidelity, itself a natural result of blind Romanism and open vice in the priesthood—gave birth to deeds of heroic and Roman virtue. The mass of those who fought on the frontiers, of those who enrolled themselves to go and fight their enemies without thought of pay, were actuated by the purest ideas of patriotism. They hoped for better things from the Revolution, and they were not deceived; they saw a glimpse of liberty, and they went forth to combat for that liberty. Apart from the fearful contest between a worn-out oligarchy and a fierce and untamed democracy, bursting from abject Roman slavery into the cauldron of liberty that seethed and boiled around them, until it had swallowed up those who had lit the fire, the aspect of France was really heroic. Fourteen armies sprang from the ranks of the peasantry and artisans to go and combat the trained bands of the despotisms of Europe. Huet, married to a Mademoiselle Chevalier, had three sons, all of whom he had brought up in the sentiments and feelings of the hour. He had educated them as artists and citizens. In 1792, at the time when Prussia and Austria invaded the frontiers of France, when one long and tremendous cry went forth, "The country is in danger!" the three sons of Huet desired to enlist in the Seine-et-Oise battalion which was being formed at Sevres. But educated in ideas of obedience, of respect, accustomed to do nothing without the consent of their father, they scarcely dared to communicate their idea to him for fear of displeasing him. Bold before the idea of battle, they hesitated and trembled at the bare thought of avowing their glorious desire to their father. They ranged themselves in a line at last, the eldest at their head, and away they went to their father's workshop, a place they generally visited only during his absence. After some hesitation, the eldest son explained, that he and his brothers, having learnt the dangers of their country, had made up their minds to engage in a battalion of republican volunteers.

"My children," said Huet, embracing them, "I am delighted to find that this idea has come spontaneously from you, and that I have only to approve it."

"We will then at once go and enrol ourselves," replied the delighted eldest son.

"Go, my sons, and the blessings of your old father go with you."

They went and joined the regiment, and all three did credit to their name. They fought at Jemmapes; and one of them, the youngest, Jean Baptiste, who afterwards was an engraver, and who still lives, had his arm broken. As he had distinguished himself very much in a most terrible skirmish, in which many officers had perished, he was proposed as captain. But his two brothers served in the same regiment as himself, and he refused to be a captain when his eldest brother was but a lieutenant.

Jean Baptiste Huet, the father, painted much in water-colours and in distemper. This habit arose, probably, from his being employed to design for manufactories. M. Overkampf, being director of the manufactory of Jouy, was continually pressing him for cotton-print designs. Those who have travelled much on the continent, and put up in little inns in France, Belgium, and Germany—places where you obtain as good entertainment as in Russia and Turkey—have probably remarked dining rooms covered with tinted paper, representing a particular subject, and bed-rooms with curtains of cloth of Jouy. Estelle and Nemorin, with their shepherd's crook tied by ribbons; the story of Tom Thumb; and the popular legend of Genevieve of Brabant, were the ordinary subjects of these humble domestic tapestries. Divided into marked and touching episodes, these naïfs histoires are repeated all round the aloeve, alternating with symbolical ornaments. Sometimes two ill-sewn breadths bring the end of the story before the beginning; and the traveller must often, in the morning, while debating with himself the relative merits of early rising and sloth, have been amused by the sight of these popular decorations. Under the Directory and the Empire, the cloths of Jouy became mythological. Greek and Roman early history, metamorphosed, took the place of fairy tales, romances, and legends. The shepherds of Theocrites were substituted for those of Florian. What gods and goddesses, what fawns and satyrs, what heroes and fair beauties, have we not seen on the walls of French, Swiss, and Italian inns! The Swiss even beat the others in their crude and often somewhat coarse simplicity. It was about this time that Jean Baptiste Huet sketched and composed those drawings, which, printed on the cottons of M. Overkampf, rejoiced the grandmothers of the present continental generation, and which still amuse the traveller who takes up his quarters for one night at St. Flour. There are extant, from the hand of Jean Baptiste Huet, pen-and-ink sketches of great power, evidently intended for Jouy; these drawings, something between the styles of Gerard and Prud'hon, represent the adventures of Psyché, in little pictures separated by emblems, flowers, and garlands.

Huet has often been reproached with the extreme inconsistency of his painting, which, in fact, wants solidity and depth. This arises from the fact that he painted so much in water-colours and distemper. To quote an instance. "The Wolf pierced by a Lance," which he exhibited in the salon of 1771, was painted by this process, like a theatrical scene, so that the owner of the picture very nearly destroyed it by trying to unvarnish it. Luckily, he was warned in time by one of the sons of the painter. This wolf, which is the size of life, with a background of landscape, and a foreground of large plants, is one of the most important works of Huet. But as he could not very well have a live wolf in his studio, he suspended the dead body of one of these animals by cords, and inspired himself in presence of his inflamed and yawning mouth and fierce sparkling eyes. It is precisely this head which is the most successful part of the picture, both in touch and expression. The skin, too, is boldly rendered, and the variegated and spotted effects, the hair lying down or standing on end, are all faithfully depicted. The whole body of the wolf betrays somewhat of the awkward hanging position in which the wolf was placed in the atelier. The critics of the hour judged the execution of Huet from this piece, and, therefore, did not do him justice, as they did not appear to remark that it had the necessary defects of distemper and water-colours, and was not painted in oil. To form an idea of Huet's manner in this style of painting, the amateur must see "The Two Sheep," in the possession of M. Langlois, bookseller and publisher in Paris. It is the finest production of the master; and we use the word "master" in its highest acceptance. It is very rare for painters to represent animals the size of nature. Roos and Paul Potter have done it several times, and not with any great propriety. This is a matter on which there has been a great deal of discussion, but the arguments are rather against the system, in our opinion, than in favour of it. It appears to be a received opinion, that such an act is artistic heresy, and is justified neither by the attempt to produce illusion—which is not the object of high art—nor by the position of these animals in the creation. A small picture on the usual easel produces quite as much effect as a vast canvas, with this advantage, that we are awakened to the recollection of the pleasing harmonies of nature and its many charms, without being compelled to be too exacting in our imitation of the reality. Our good old Huet, then, was wrong to take a six-foot canvas to paint a ram and lamb; but, on the other hand, he has thrown into the subject all his energy and talent, all his brilliant colours, his most delicate touch. He executed this picture after nature in the Jardin des Plantes, in the year of the Republic VIII. (1801). The ram is magnificent; it breathes, it stands before us, as it were, alive; the lamb, lying down in the foreground, projects its head as it were from the canvas—as the French poet has it—

"Et d'un air indolent rumine sa pâture."

A knotty and gnarled trunk, a tall thistle, some mallow leaves on the left; on the right, a strawberry bush and willows, complete this charming composition, where the accessories, though rendered with power and accuracy, still allow the sheep and their soft wool to hold the most prominent position; the whole warmed by a golden ray of sunshine. This is, beyond all doubt, the masterpiece of Jean Baptiste Huet; and we were about to say, "Who will credit it?" when we recollected that anything may be said of favour-appointed directors of art. Nicolas Huet, painter of the Museum of Natural History, knowing that there was no work of his father in the Louvre, in that palace where he was born, offered this picture to M. de Forbin, then at the head of affairs, for nothing. He never received any reply. How often has it been matter of deep regret that no real discriminating and genuine artist should ever, except on rare occasions, be appointed to such posts.

We have already alluded to the name of Prud'hon, and we self to be ruined by the extravagance of his wife, and was compelled to sell his property and retire to an humble lodging, Rue Hautefeuille, No. 13. There he died, on the 27th of August, 1811.

The sons of Huet, we have said, were all three artists. The eldest son, who took the name of Villiers Huet, was a very able miniature painter. He even successfully contended with Isabey; but this latter having a name and connexion, Huet came over to England. In this country Huet—Villiers Huet, the republican volunteer of 1789 and 1793—was, strange to say, the delight of the court and aristocracy. He published in London, at Ackerman's, in 1806, some landscapes and animals, under the title of "Rudiments of Trees, Rudiments of Cattle, drawn and engraved by Villiers Huet." Miniature, it will be seen, did not prevent him from being, like his father, a landscape-painter and engraver. The second son of Huet—Nicolas, born in 1770—was appointed painter to the Museum of Natural History in the month of October, 1804. He there may add that he was not without his influence on Jean Baptiste Huet, whose intimate friend he was. He often visited him at Villiers-sur-Orge, where he had a pretty country-house and considerable property. Often, during the warm summer season, Mademoiselle Mayer came and passed whole months at Huet's; and Prud'hon, who had always brushes or pencils in his hand, never failed to leave behind him some of those admirable sketches on blue paper, which were the offspring of the leisure hours of his genius. The little circle of friends collected at Villiers was composed of artists and a few persons of rank and celebrity: the President Eymard; the architect Demarteau, nephew of the celebrated engraver in imitation of pencil-drawings; M. Legrand, an ingenious and clever engraver, who could also write the letter-press to accompany his plates; the brothers Constantin, painters and picture-dealers; M. Prevost, and M. Florent Prevost, chief of the zoological department of the Museum of Natural History, to whom we owe the recollection of these happy days. Married a second time to Mademoiselle Navacant, Huet suffered him-produced, with exquisite and unrivalled finish, two hundred and forty-six paintings of mammalia, birds, insects, reptiles, crustacea, mollusca, and zoophytes. Whole days might well be passed following with the eye the infinite delicacy of these learned pictures, where the genius of the artist is displayed with a faithful power of depiction, equal to that of a Chinese tailor. The admirable, the "adorable" finish, as Crepin says, with which are reproduced, for the delight of the naturalist, those birds with their rich plumage of green, and orange, and citron, indigo, and carmine; those insects which dwell in flowers, and show now burnished gold, now polished steel on emerald ground, now azure tones on a golden ground; those dazzling beetles with their metallic green backs, coppery edges, and burnished steel spots; and those warm and luminous flies, which the savages of certain lands attach to their moeccassins to light them at night, are all equally well depicted.

We often wonder at the exquisite fineness of the brush, which can succeed in conveying to the eye such microscopic details, which can let you see the antennæ, whether jagged or square, and which can enter into the minutiae of the smallest insect with a truth-like power which belongs to genius alone. It is a truth worth noting, that on the continent, since the days when Gaston d'Orleans first thought of having a painter in ordinary (Robert) for the finest flowers and the most curious plants of his garden at Blois, this kind of painting has reached its last perfection; thanks to the Redoutés, the Marechals, the Huets, and the Spaendoncks.

The third son of Huet—Jean Baptiste, the one who had his arm broken on the field of battle—was nevertheless an artist. He engraved with his left hand plates of animals, after his father, in a heavy, sleepy, and unsuccessful manner. A gallant man, a brave soldier, a good son, an affectionate brother, he was an inferior artist.

To return to Huet the father. He has left a name in the history of art, and he has richly deserved a place among the artists of the French school, of whom we shall speak more which may be seen near towns, that familiar kind of landscape which awoke the muse of Delille and Thompson. He even invades the province of Berquin, from whom he appears to have taken his little farmers and their pretty mother, and many other scenes of that well-known children's friend. Huet began with Boucher and Leprince; he finished with David and Prud'hon. But at both the beginning and end of his career he always preserved a certain physiognomy, and the connoisseur, far off as his picture may be, will always cry, "That is a Huet."

Certain artists should certainly illustrate certain poets. Huet would not convey to the mind the grander conceptions of Milton or Shakspeare, but he would admirably render many scenes in Spenser, Crabbe, or Keats. How he would have illustrated such a scene as this:—

"Here are sweet peas, on tiptoe for a flight
With wings of gentle flush o'er delicate white,
And taper fingers, catching at all things, fully in our life of David. Huet has been reproached with too much memory; but when even he did recollect the ideas of others, he contrived to invest them with his own particular style. Sometimes he steals a horse from Wouvermans; sometimes he goes back to Van der Does and Karel Dujardin, without forgetting Demarne. Huet followed, too, all the variations of Parisian life; he reflected all the ideas of his time. Though a townsman, he loved nature; he painted it in picturesque disorder, with its somewhat familiar phases most prominent; old bridges, stiles, gates, farm-yards—all these are freely scattered through his pictures. His shepherdesses have a little too much of the antique profile, and look as if they sprang from an idyl of Theocritus, and were called Amyntas or Palemon by name. With the exception of these somewhat classic figures, which we are surprised to find in a stable beside a milk-cow, his works are impregnated with the spirit of nature—not with the grand and sublime poetry of the vast scenery of the world—not that nature which inspired Ruysdael—but that soft, living, sweet, poetic nature

To bind them all about with tiny rings,
Linger awhile upon some bending planks
That lean against a streamlet's rushy banks,
And watch intently nature's gentle doings.
They will be found softer than ringdove's cooings,
How silent comes the water round that bend!
Not the minutest whisper does it send
To the o'erhanging willows—blades of grass
Slowly across the chequer'd shadows pass,
Why, you might read two sonnets, ere they reach
To where the hurrying freshnesses aye preach
A natural sermon o'er their pebbly beds:
Where swarms of minnows show their little heads,
Staying their wavy bodies 'gainst the streams,
To taste the luxury of sunny beams
Temper'd with coolness. How they ever wrestle
With their own sweet delight, and ever nestle
Their silver bellies on the pebbly sand!
If you but scantily hold out the hand,
That very instant not one will remain;

But turn your eye, and they are there again.
 The ripples seem right glad to reach those cresses,
 And cool themselves among the emerald tresses;
 The while they cool themselves, they freshness give,
 And moisture, that the bowery green may live:
 So keeping up an interchange of favours,
 Like good men in the truth of their behaviours.
 Sometimes goldfinches one by one will drop
 From low-hung branches: little space they stop;
 But sip and twitter, and their feathers sleek;
 Then off' at once, as in a wanton freak.
 Or, perhaps, to show their black and golden wings,
 Pausing upon their yellow flutterings.
 Were I in such a place, I sure should pray
 That naught less sweet might call my thoughts away,
 Than the soft rustle of a maiden's gown
 Fanning away the dandelion's down;
 Than the light music of her nimble toes
 Patting against the sorrel as she goes.
 How she would start, and blush, thus to be caught Playing in all her innocence of thought."

Here Huet would have been at home. We may judge this from those we have given. Examine the little opening scene (p. 277), the girl, the boy, the dog, and the sheep in the background, and then the milk-woman. This is an admirable production. The cow is of itself a picture. The quiet resigned physiognomy of the animal is truly and appropriately rendered, while the woman, the child rubbing its eye, the boy holding out his jar for milk, are all real, and seem to start from the canvas. Examine every detail of the scene, and the sharp, observant character of the man will be seen. The disorder is genuine, not studied; the position and look of the dog admirable; the cock, what our American brethren would call a genuine rooster. The overhanging tree is finished with great care. The colouring of the original picture is somewhat too brilliant, but it is not carried to an offensive extent. The shepherd keeping the flock is superior as a picture. The cattle to the left, the cow and the sheep, both are painted with all the vigour of outline and correctness of colour which Huet always gave to this part of the brute creation. The boy leaning over the cow to speak to the woman who is seated on the ground, is a careless effect of genius quite poetical. The dog, which appears to be watching the birds of the air, is an excellent feature in the landscape, which, whether we examine the finish of the trees and foliage, the truthful representation of the donkey, or the elaborate foreground, is extreme in its excellence. It is one of his later pictures, bearing date 1800. "The Landscape with figures of Animals" (p. 276) is remarkable from the peculiar effect of the cattle, one of which, standing on the summit of a rock, gazes with solemn attention at the scene below. It is admirable both in finish and detail.

Huet was very laborious, and his drawings were at one time easily found. They are now rare, though not expensive. The following is the list of his pictures, all displayed at the exhibition.

IX October, 1844, Vincent Botti, a painter and restorer of old oil-paintings at Florence, purchased of a broker of that town a picture, which had been daubed over by some unskilled hand in a most unjustifiable manner, for the purpose of veiling the nudity of the figure. The experienced restorer quickly apprehended that here, as in other cases, a masterpiece might be concealed behind this coarse daubing. Following out this idea, he proceeded with great care to free the picture from all incongruous touches; and, before long, he had the gratification of seeing a female figure of wondrous beauty, which he immediately recognised as one of the finest of Michael Angelo's creations, coming out, in all its pristine freshness, from beneath the covering which had so injudiciously been thrown over it.

The picture consists of a single figure, half the size of life, and represents the Goddess of Fortune sitting, with extended wings, upon a wheel, naked to the middle, the lower part of the figure being wrapped in the folds of a rose-coloured drapery. She rolls onward, her countenance expressive of unconcern and perfect ease. Her head inclines slightly towards the right shoulder; she stretches out her arms, and her hands scatter on the right a sceptre, crown, and laurel-wreath, on the left thorns and arrow-heads. The front of the goddess is surrounded by a bright radiance, which gradually deepens into black. It is said that Michael Angelo zealously studied Dante's poems, and more than one of his works embody thoughts of the celebrated singer: it was this fact which procured him the title of the Dante among the painters. The figure of Fortune is the expression of some lines in the seventh canto of the "Inferno," where it is said:—

"And she it is, on whose devoted head
 Are heaped such vile reproach and calumny
 By those whose praise she rather merited.
 But she is blest, and hears not what they say;
 With other primal beings, joyously
 She rolls her sphere, exulting on her way."

And truly the head, which is of enchanting beauty, is expressive of the most blissful ease and equanimity with which she looks down upon human things, evil as well as good. In all Michael Angelo's pictures it is manifest that the hand of a sculptor guides the brush. In the creations of this master-spirit, you feel the power of genius, and recognise a deep knowledge of the laws of anatomy; but in the figure of Fortune the painter has, with far-seeing delicacy, modified his usual superabundance of strength, in order to preserve the delicate form becoming the young and graceful goddess.

In order to establish the authenticity of this discovery, it was necessary to have recourse to strict and careful comparison. "The Holy Family," by the same master, which is to be found in the gallery of Florence, and the genuineness of which is not questioned, afforded an opportunity. This comparison has resulted decidedly in favour of Signor Botti's discovery, a systematic and conscientious examination having shown that both these pictures are painted on boards of the same wood, prepared by the same process—that is, covered with a thin coating of white, and painted in water-colours, over which is laid a coat of oil, known by the name of oil of Albezzo, which fixes the colours, and imparts to the figure what we call mezzo tempera. Lastly, the whole is washed over with a varnish, which gives it the appearance of an oil-painting. The wings of "Fortune" evidently show that the newly-discovered picture is painted by the process just described. Moreover, the same connoisseurs and artists have unanimously recognised an entire similarity of treatment in the "Fortune" and "The Holy Family;" for both these pictures, painted by the same process, exhibit the same treatment of light and shadow, the same colouring and disposition of the draperies, and, what is still more interesting, the same purity and perfection of drawing.

After the authenticity of the picture had thus been established, the discoverer publicly exhibited it in the Bartolomei Palace, at Florence. We understand that Signor Botti intends to make a tour, with his fortunate discovery, through the principal towns of Europe, first visiting Paris.

CORNELIUS BEGA.

Our readers already know Adrian Van Ostade. Cornelius Bega is a corrected edition of that artist; but there are many who prefer the original with all his errors. A profoundly original artist, reaching the domain of art by a purely individual road, never fails to make proselytes. Those masters who have imitated no one are always those who are most imitated themselves. Adrian Van Ostade had a school which gave to the world many charming painters: his own brother Isaac first, then Cornelius Dusart, Antony Goebauw, Michel de Musscher, and Cornelius Bega. Bega and Dusart were those who were best able to seize the artist's manner, and to reproduce his ideas most faithfully; but Bega, a more disguised imitator than Dusart, brought to his work a wit, an elegance, and a correctness, which were exceedingly remarkable. If we examine the pictures and engravings of Bega, without knowing the ground he works upon, we may well expect our readers to be surprised when we speak of elegance with regard to those peasants, cut, as it were, out of a log with a scythe—those illuminated clowns, humpbacked, short and fat, who, being out of all true human proportions, form a nation of caricatures. And yet, if we place Bega by the side of Van Ostade, we recognise that the latter has approached the truth and sublimity of ugliness, that he has taken his people seriously and has illustrated them seriously; while the former, less devoted to the worship of deformity, has loved to civilise his models, and has given them a coarse delicacy which is not in the master, and which is not either found in nature.

This excepted, Bega is a good painter, an excellent engraver, and altogether an agreeable artist, much sought after by amateurs, and well worthy a place in our gallery of distinguished painters, in the same way that he has figured in all the most celebrated cabinets of Europe, beside, or rather a little below, Van Ostade. Unfortunately we know little about him, and in fact scarcely anything at all, save the history of his death which, say some biographers, is a glorious leaf in his biographical sketch. The date of his birth is supposed to be 1620. His mother, Maria Cornelisz, was daughter to the painter Cornelius Cornelisz, so well known under the name of Cornelius Van Harlem; his father was a sculptor in wood, and was called Begyn; but young Cornelius, being as dissipated as he was clever, was driven from the paternal home, and took the name of Bega instead of Begyn, determined not to bear the name of a parent who thus treated him, and desirous of making his own illustrious. Thus speaks the illustrious Houbraken. Deschamps, on the contrary, says that Bega changed his name to oblige his father, and that he really did oblige him by so doing. It would have been better to have changed his conduct, says the solemn writer.

However this may be, Cornelius Bega, no longer Begyn, was received into the atelier of Van Ostade, and felt the influence of this master, just as he would have felt the influence of any other. He was of a timid, supple, and easily-managed character. His two passions, woman and art, utterly absorbed him. In gallantry he was wildly reckless; in painting he was always led away by ambition. That our readers may at once understand his character, we may as well relate the circumstances of his death. In 1664, a woman he passionately loved was attacked with the plague. The painter, despite all warnings, went to see his mistress, and nursed her with the utmost care. When her last moment was announced to be at hand, he came to press on her forehead one last kiss of affection. But now the doctors and the mother of the young artist kept him by force away from the bed. Bega, unable to approach her, took a long stick, one end of which he gave to his mistress; she kissed it three times with her dying lips, and he, on the other hand, in his wild despair, sent his three mad kisses in the same way. Houbraken, who gives all these details, adds that Bega, under the influence of such an adieu, and overwhelmed by the grief he experienced, was himself attacked by the plague, and died a few days after, in the same year, 1664, aged only forty-four years.

In the work-shop of Cornelius Bega we shall find all the models of Van Ostade; but his peasants are less grossly vulgar, and more jolly, than those of the master. They have the kind of free and easy manner, in which the serious good humour of Van Ostade is replaced by an air of drunken joviality and independence. The women even have a way of walking and standing which makes possible beings of them, beings in human form, not squat and heavy Esquimaux rolling in fat and blubber. Perhaps, too, they appear a little less gross by the contrast they present with the rusties, who are still stumpy and ugly, despite all the intentions of the artist, and the refinement he tries to adorn them with. The hands of the women of Ostade are like mallets; in the pictures of Bega the women have hands somewhat human in shape, their profile is not so heavy, and their general outline is easy to distinguish, even under their heavy, flapping clothes.

The power of art is great indeed. We may say that the models of Bega are ignoble, like those of Van Ostade; that the study of ugliness brings forth disgusting results, and nothing more; that there is nothing elevating in the sight of tap-rooms, where drunken clodhoppers clutch their glasses with one hand, and chuck the fat dame of the house under the chin with the other. We know that all this is neither edifying nor graceful. And yet, because the Dutch master has succeeded in combining the two elements of art, chiaroscuro and touch, because he has found an expression in the grimace of his drinkers, because he has caught it and rendered it with great feeling, he has succeeded in pleasing amateurs, and has earned the privilege of charming mankind, as long as there shall be men fond of truth in art, that is to say, partial to that happy mixture of falsehood which art allows to be affixed to the true in nature to produce the ideal.

A very great man in his day, but one utterly forgotten now, once stood before a Bega, and a Bega representing a collection of peasants and their women in a pot-house. "Would it be possible to cajole such matrons? to make that delicate, poetical, ideal thing called love, glide into the ears of such female towns (beggars of the Lesage school, who take without asking, to read it in their bleared eyes, to have it spoken by those mouths split from ear to ear? I cannot believe it." "Doubtless," replied the owner of the Bega; "but if these paintings had no truth, no value; if the extreme vulgarity of the subject were not elevated by the dignity natural to everything human; if some of the effects of the mere art were not beautiful, it would be difficult to under-rose-tinted room, with a hot-house atmosphere of exotics, and odours from the sweet south. Such language was, of course, natural to them. The spectacle of men and women drinking in a pot-house is not ennobling or brilliant; but it was not to the drinking only that they alluded. It is time that these degrading views of human nature should be exploded. The stand how for two centuries the choicest amateurs have admired such works, and introduced them in the galleries of Choiseul and La Vallière, in those of the Prince of Conti and the Prince of Hesse."

The speakers were French noblemen—gentlemen who understood only love in a boudoir with satin curtains, in a kid-gloved diplomatist saw before him men and women who were sufficiently debased and immoral to be poor, to be coarse from exposure and hard work, to want that delicacy of outline which hot-house rearing gives; and therefore they could not love. If the passions and feelings of the ex-ambassador, and those of the poor clodhopper, could have been analysed, we have little hesitation in anticipating the result. The lower orders, the working millions, are capable of pure affection, of devoted love—aye, and of devotion and affection and love for those whose beauty has faded, who have been rendered ugly by toil and suffering—even to a higher extent than any other class, their homes being all they have. It is the drunken poor only who ill-use their mates. In every country in the world where Christianity and civilisation have penetrated, the

Cornelius Bega precisely possessed that delicacy of touch, that "agreeable artifice," which enabled him to make up for the triviality of the subjects he had studied with Van Ostade by the power of his talent. Bega possessed, as we have already said, two qualities essential to a great master—chiaroscuro and touch; and he used them ably to render his thoughts, or industrious and sober poor are some of the best of its citizens. A man may be ugly as sin, poor, wretched, ignorant, and yet feel and inspire pure and delicate affection; a man may wear kid gloves, and be as gay as a peacock, and have no feeling deeper than words. When men sneer and condemn the poor and ill-favoured, be sure that the Bible is not in their library.

To return to Bega. Boileau, whom the French place very high as a critic, and who, though not the genius they consider him, was yet a very clever man, says, speaking of Dutch art—rather his feelings and sentiment, which were very acute. He understood thoroughly the effect of a composition; he knew well the effect of light and shade, and their due proportion, and the repose required in a painting and an engraving. He knew how to bring out his little personages upon simple backgrounds, to detach them from each other, less by the essential differences of tones than by the play of light and chiaroscuro. A figure treated in demi-tint, or cast frankly in the shade, supports the figure that is lighted up so brightly—a kind of link between the different parts. The art of lighting up a picture was the distinctive talent of Cornelius Bega. We have seen "Interiors" of this master rival, in harmony and brilliance of effect, the finest works of Adrian; and we may particularly quote those which figure at Amsterdam, in the celebrated collections of Smeth and Van Leyden, as well as those which were scattered by the Laperrière sale in 1817. In general, Bega is very sober in details, unless he undertakes to paint the studio of an alchemist; for then the subject allows a great quantity of utensils, of Bohemian glasses, of Leyden bottles, of furnaces, of stills of various dimensions, vases in every shape, vials of all colours; all, in fact, that we suppose would be found in the laboratory of a learned man seeking the philosophical stone, without reckoning papers covered by equations and cabalistic figures. Cornelius Bega, however, even in his "Alchemists," has never failed in harmony, that is to say, in producing a harmonious whole, making the smaller lights give way to the larger, bringing in here a bit and there a bit, and strengthening the whole by bold floods of shadow.

We must allow that in touch Bega is inferior to his master. Sometimes his painting is dry and hollow; one would fancy it was unfinished; but if it has not the soft firmness, the roundness of Ostade, it is still pleasing and agreeable. His picture in the Louvre is not one of his best. His "Dance at an Inn" at Dresden is full of spirit and power, redolent of truth, rich in caricatures, but badly executed in comparison with others.

Look at that fiddler in the engraving (p. 281), at his mouth and moustache, at that mysterious head poked in at the door above, observe the heavy-nosed Dutchman, with an arm round an old woman's neck, and that other "greasy citizen" with his arm round that fat wench's neck; mark the pair who are dancing, the man with his old cap in hand, and a ludicious attempt at grace; examine the countenance of that sot, who can hardly draw his pot from his mouth to grin a horrid grin at the dancers. Then look up at the roof, see how pointed are the details, how exquisite the contrast of light and shade. Everything combines to make it a gem of Dutch art in its peculiar way. It is also a sketch of manners in an age when physical and animal enjoyment appeared all men had to live for.

Bega has been much more finished in style, when he has attempted pictures of a nobler style, conceived in the ideas of a Miéris and a Metz. The catalogue of the famous Poullain sale, drawn up by Lebrun in 1780, says, speaking of a Bega: "The interior of a chamber, in which is seen a young woman standing up and singing before a music-book placed on a table. A man is accompanying her with the violin." This picture is of a very superior order to any of the others from the studio of Bega, and is painted with more care and finish than usual.

But it was as an engraver that Cornelius displayed his genius. He was a real artist with the steel-point. The vigorous command of chiaroscuro, the art of bringing up the composition, of detaching each figure, the keen comic humour of his mind, all are visible and admirably rendered. His personages, maliciously ugly, sly-looking, are lighted up with Rembrandt-like vigour. White paper, which should always play a part in line-engraving, is made prominent use of by him. Fine proofs of Bega are therefore remarkable for a careful economy of labour. Some are naïve and simple, such as the "Wife and her Husband." In those miserable huts where lived the laborious poor—industrious, frugal, and clean—there is light enough. Bega gives them plenty of sun; that luxury of the poor. The Dutchman loves the great luminary. These engravings are as happy as they are bold.

Bega belongs truly to the class of great artists.

KAREL DUJARDIN.

OF DECAUVEN'S life and character, of his strange marriage, and his sudden death at Venice, we have already spoken (p. 261). But there is much still to be said of his genius and characteristics as an artist.

Far less elaborate than many of his contemporaries, Karel was above all picturesque, that is to say, he knew how to transfer his subject to the canvas in an effective and pleasing manner, not merely slavishly copying nature, but interpreting her mysteries. He knew how to co-ordinate and combine the features of his undertaking, to simulate disorder and carelessness. He knew the difference between the beautiful in reality, and the picturesque in painting. Regent-street is a more symmetrical and beautiful street than any of the crooked lanes and half-paved alleys of Constantinople; but the artist would pass Regent-street with disdain, and delight in the confusion and diversity of an Eastern landscape. A grand and symmetrical palace would please the eye of an artist, and give him pleasure when he gazed on it; but to paint, he would turn eagerly to the crumbling ruin, and even the motley farmhouse or the house with the seven gables. What is often delightful in the actual and the real, does not give any of that ideality which is wanted in a picture. From St. Peter's at Rome we turn with delight in painting to a group of Calabrian bandits, just as we should turn in person from the Calabrian bandit to the great church. Karel felt all this when even he descended to the rank of a caricaturist. It has been reasonably enough argued, that an old cart-horse, a cow, a donkey, or a goat, is always a more picturesque object than a splendid horse. If, certainly, we turn to the wretched daubs of race-horses, this may be true. But the Arab steed of the desert, the tall cavalry of the battle-field, yield quite as much matter of interest to the artist as the most ancient animal that ever excited our sympathy by its limping gait. Wouvermans has proved this effectually.

The same may be said of the earth. A smooth and well-clipped lawn is not half so pleasing to the eye, in a painter's landscape, as a rough rock clad with moss and crowned by stunted bushes, with here and there a patch of green, just to bring the gray spots out in bolder relief. A rough, rude, unequal surface, is better than a regular line, for all the purposes of art.

The ardent student of nature, the traveller in search of the picturesque and lovely, will, like the artist, shun the richly cultivated park, the low, fertile meadow, the garden laid out in alleys with beds of flowers that show every hue of the rainbow, and turn gladly to arid and uncultivated wastes. Few persons in the world love the exquisite loveliness of our own calmer features in scenery more than we do ourselves; but when we have felt our souls elevated most towards our Creator, when our minds have been imbued with admiration of the beautiful, the sublime, and the grand, it has been while climbing the hills of Switzerland; when roaming over the vast prairies and beneath the leafy arches of the American continent; or upon the wide ocean in a storm. We prefer the park and the meadow as our dwelling place; we remember the other as a mighty panorama that warmed our hearts to emotions which nowhere else were experienced.

Dujardin never chose the merely symmetrical and beautiful. He selected subjects which, perhaps, trifling in reality, were picturesque when transferred to paper. A Swiss peasant-girl always looks well in a picture. She rarely or never does in real life.

If the Dutch painters have secured a wide place for themselves in history, it is not by the sublimity of their expression or the grandeur of their thoughts; it is rather by devoting themselves to what grave classic men call the secondary items—colour, chiaroscuro, and touch! Chiaroscuro has intellectual beauty in it, because it awakens in the mind the idea of a happy harmony between the characters of the scene and of the day which illumines it. Pleasant and agreeable subjects require a serene light, and terrible events and scenery are better illustrated by the light of a sinister and dark sky.

"An artist," says a critic, whose name we do not recollect, "is very much below the dignity of his profession, who thinks it a matter of indifference what kind of weather there was the day Cæsar was assassinated." Karel Dujardin, who knew so admirably how to combine and arrange soft lights, dark clouds, affects in his crucifixions terrible and marked contrasts, a rough opposition between clear light and dark shadows—a rough and suitable effect, when painting so solemn and at the same time so terrible a subject.

Most of the paintings of Karel are extremely well preserved; and on the general subject of the preservation and cleaning of pictures a few words may be said.

Many volumes have been written on the art of cleaning pictures, of restoring them, of moving them about, and of re-canvasing them. M. Xavier de Burtin, in his "Theoretical and Practical Treatise on the Knowledge required by every Amateur," indicates many methods which may be used for cleaning pictures, and lays it down as a law that an amateur should know all the necessary processes, and put them in practice himself. After having examined and carefully appreciated every one of the processes proposed by this author, one of the most eminent critics of the day declares that he found most of them so dangerous, that, far from advising amateurs to clean their pictures themselves, he calls upon them to abstain from so delicate an operation, unless after long and careful study and much practical experience, which can only enable them to succeed.

"Nevertheless," he remarks, "however inexperienced an amateur may be, there are two operations which he may himself undertake without difficulty, that is, washing his pictures and cleaning the varnish. A careful amateur may adopt the Dutch custom of cleaning his pictures twice a year; at the end of the winter, to carry off the coating of smoke which always alights upon them; at the end of the summer, to get rid of the fly-blows, so fatal to painting if they are allowed permanently to remain on canvas, panel, or copper. This cleaning is effected by means of a fine sponge dipped in cold clean water, and by drying it afterwards with a fine and old piece of linen. If the picture loses its enamel, pass over it a coat of white turpentine; this process does no harm to the painting, and first-rate connoisseurs look upon it as an indispensable method for preventing the extreme aridity of the picture."

Oil-painting alone admits of this cleaning, which at Venice was quite an art, and is even still to this day. There it was that Karel Dujardin executed one or two of his best works.

There is a slight irony, a gaiety, a wit, about Karel Dujardin, which makes us always recognise and welcome him; he is fond of rustic beauties; he has, in representing them, more delicacy than Bamboche, more nature than Berghem, though a less fertile and abundant genius. His sentiment is like that of Vandervelde, but he has neither the profundity nor the melancholy of Paul Potter. Even when he paints or engraves dead horses, his slaughter-house, his knacker's yard, has nothing of that sinister aspect which Paul Potter impregnates them with. But, as an engraver, he is by no means inferior to that master. It is impossible to carry further the science of the model, the intelligence of every detail of life, and every sign and mark of death. In the same way that he knew in his paintings exactly where to dash the pencil, so in his engravings he scatters his touches with vigour and intelligence. By a few bold outlines he indicates the bony outline of the animal, the joints and prominent parts.

More delicate than that of Laer, the pointe of Karel the engraver is always picturesque. He likes to show off the differences and contrasts of reality, the dirty wool of the sheep, the knotted and entangled fleeces, the hair of the pig reeking with the filth of the farm-yard, the pig itself wallowing in the mire with ineffable delight. Their snouts, their heads, are the beau-ideal of idleness. Never was the father of pork better rendered; never had he a more patient artist.

The pigs, the horses, the cow, in the picture of "The Shepherd behind the Tree," the ass in "The Peasant Girl," and the two mules, are models. They demonstrate the keen observation and the laborious industry of the artist. Form, attitude, movement—all is true and real. His sheep and his goats are gems, and no serious critic will accuse him of mannerism here. His engravings, then, are extremely valuable. Everybody who has watched the progress of engraving knows "The Two Mules," published in 1652. It is founded on the fable of La Fontaine, the six lines of which, that refer to the picture, it would be a pity to translate from their native simplicity into English:—

"Deux mulets cheminaient, l'un d'avoine chargé
L'autre portant l'argent de la gabille;
Celui-ci, glorieux d'une charge si belle,
N'eut voulu pour beaucoup en être soulagé,
Il marchait d'un pas relevé,
En faisant sonner sa sonnette."

The two animals are admirably rendered. The one steps proudly along with his magnificent harness. But, despite his fine feathers, his leg is not better shaped, nor his form more elegant. The animals are the same, though differently equipped. Though his fringe is so glorious, his knees are lumpy and knotty. There is that quiet satire in this picture, of which Karel Dujardin was very fond.

Karel Dujardin is best known by his pictures of quacks, so admirably engraved by Boissieu. That of the Louvre (p. 284) is the most celebrated. On a bright and soft morning, a charlatan has erected a stand in a village. Elevated on a scaffold, in the costume of Il signor Scaramouche, he is standing on tiptoe and making antics to half-a-dozen rustics. A man with a black mask accompanies him on a guitar, while a monkey chatters and makes faces. A great sign-board explains what is to be shown in the stable, which serves as a theatre, and open before the quack is his box of elixirs, alcuni barattoli di argenti; but without waiting for the speech of Scaramouche, Punchinello pokes his nose through the curtain. The ruin in the distance, the cloak worn by one of the peasants, the warm light which animates the whole, give a locality to the scene, and remind us of Karel's Roman studies. This picture is full of what we call humour, and would do no discredit to Wilkie.

Taking the whole of his productions, Karel Dujardin must be placed in the first rank of great Dutch painters. Landscape painter, animal painter, inventor of ravishing compositions, he stands beside Berghem, Vandervelde, Paul Potter, Pierre de Laer, and even Albert Cuyp. He is inferior to some of these masters in certain particulars, but his superiority in all other raises him to the first rank. His brilliant and intelligent touch—so easy and bold—is above all praise; his colouring, though silvery and golden in tint, has preserved after two ages its freshness, its purity, and force. His chiaroscuro is admirable. Generally, to bring forward his figures, he uses, like Pynaker, a kind of broken light. Suppose he has painted an ass standing up. If he has a white spot on the nose, and his ears are black, the vigorous portion of the black ground of mountains will pass just over the white spot and below the black ears. If he wishes to bring out in bold relief the crupper of a white horse mounted by a musketeer, the painter introduces a dark brown wall. Through a door in this wall comes forth a servant with a jug of ale. A pig-trough and two dogs will complete the scene.

But what skies! Adorable, says a French critic. Nobody ever succeeded in painting them with more clearness, more lucidity, more softness, with more harmonious beauty. The southern sky is bold and dashing without crudity—it dazzles but does not pain the eye—it rejoices the heart. The skies of Adrian Vandervelde are sometimes of a hard blue; those of Ruysdael always veiled by clouds, sad and melancholy; but the skies of Karel Dujardin are sunny and cheerful, like the man who painted them. His clouds are like flocks of white wool; he rolls them, he piles them one above another, so that they look like a little chain of hills coming gently down to die at the feet of the sun, as mountains slope down to the sea. Karel Dujardin combines the light of Italian summer with the calm tranquillity of Holland. This is high praise, but it is given where it is due.

FLOWER-PAINTING.

THE highest purpose of the artist is, of course, the realisation of beauty; his true creations are ideal, and the mere reproduction, mimetically, on canvas, of a natural object, such as a stone, a fish, a piece of wood, a loaf, or a candle, if executed to perfection, does not constitute a claim to be considered as possessing a genius at all akin to that which inspired the labours of Titian, Raffaele, or Correggio. Thus much, however, may be admitted without at all depreciating the importance of that skill which Van Hysum acquired, and which is wanting to so many of his followers. A flower, like a human face, may be painted poetically or otherwise. It may be a dead, material thing, a copy of nature with no excellence but practical accuracy; or it may that they chose them particularly for artistic imitation. The Athenian may be said to have inwoven with his daily existence a poetical garlanding of those brightest productions of the soil, the fascinating flowers of the earth. At his birth, chaplets and festal crowns were hung about the house; his name was given to him at a flowery feast; his bridal was adorned with a luxury of wreaths and coronals; his grave was strewn with sweet offerings; and the favourite seasons of the year were in the same manner symbolised by flowers—gifts to the gods, tokens to friends, emblems of beauty, and sacrificial offerings to the shades of the departed. A similar feeling has in all ages and countries inspired mankind. The simplest savages, deficient in all other poetry, and otherwise rude in be formed with beauty, and beauty, too, of the most delicate and delicious kind. The peaches of Apelles won him a widely expanded fame, not excelled by that which was gained by the portraits of his beloved Campastre; the corn of Thyro became proverbial; and many other names come to us from antiquity, famous only because they vied with nature's own hand in their mimic fruit, foliage, and flowers. Stories are told of an artist who painted grapes so tempting that the birds flew at them and pecked them, until some cunning pencil wove, with subtle colours, a veil that seemed to screen his lovely works from the touch, though it did not conceal them from the eye; of another, who gave his plums such a bloom that children cried at seeing them; of another, whose flowers, by an ingenious contrivance, appeared to give forth the natural perfumes of the gardens; and it is well known that the fondness of the ancients, especially the Greeks, for every species of flower, especially fragrant ones, was such, taste, love to decorate themselves with garlands; and we find the custom equally prevalent among the Indian races, the African tribes, the uncouth nomads of Australia, the original natives of North and South America, and the populations of barbarians who, in antiquity, inhabited the European continent. Wherever any progress in the mimetic arts has been made, flowers, therefore, have naturally entered within the circle of the artist's studies; though, of course, the sculptor must fail in the attempt to reproduce their beauty, consisting, as it does, less in rich, graceful, and expressive form, than in colour, tone, brilliancy, and freshness. In many modern countries, however, they have been chosen even for plastic imitation, though the only material hitherto used for this purpose, with any great success, has been wax. Painting, however, is peculiarly adapted to the representation of flowers, and accordingly in all galleries and exhibitions we find it applied to this object. The artists of the Low Country school have been especially addicted to it, far more so, indeed, than those of Italy. The ambitious artists of the south disdained such separate details of nature. They loved to imagine and to realise in their

ANTHONY VANDYCK.

ANTHONY VANDYCK was born in Antwerp in 1599. He perhaps owed the early development of his predilection for art to his father's calling—that of a painter on glass—and his mother's taste, which led her to embroider designs both in landscapes and figures, some of which she executed with great skill. She was glad to find that her son was disposed to follow the same bent as herself, and gave him all the instruction in her power, and induced his father to place him in the studio of Henry Van Balen, a historical painter of some repute, who had studied under Rubens. While here, he of course became familiar with the works of the latter; and such was the admiration which he conceived for this great man, that he could not rest satisfied until he obtained admission to his school in 1615. He proved himself in every way worthy of the privileges which he now enjoyed. His assiduity, zeal, and attention attracted the notice of his master, and caused him to bestow on him a greater amount of teaching and encouragement than his other pupils ordinarily met with. He evinced his confidence in him by employing him very soon in making the drawings of his own works from which the engravings were to be taken. His fellow-students, however, were not less forward in acknowledging his talents than Rubens himself, as was shown by a well authenticated anecdote.

During the absence of their master the pupils were in the habit of persuading his old servant to admit them into his painting room, that they might inspect his works as they progressed. On one occasion, however, the easel was thrown down, and to their great consternation the painting was seriously injured. After consulting as to the course to be adopted, they resolved to request Vandyck to repair the damage. He reluctantly consented to make the attempt, and with such success that his comrades declared they could not distinguish his workmanship from the remainder. When Rubens returned, however, he at once detected the difference, summoned them all before him, and questioned them as to the cause of the alterations. They frankly confessed the truth, and the matter was passed over without any further notice or remark.

When Vandyck had made considerable progress, Rubens advised him to visit Italy, where he would acquire just and pure notions of form from the remains of Greek and Roman sculpture, and could study the application of those principles of art which he had already learned in the great works of the Italian masters. As a proof of his esteem, Rubens presented him, when leaving his school, with three of the finest of his own paintings, an "Ecce Homo," a portrait of his wife, and a night scene representing the seizure of Jesus in the garden of the Mount of Olives; and also with one of his most valuable horses. It does not appear, however, that Vandyck followed his advice as to the journey to Italy; because we find that he was so flattered by the invitation of the Earl of Arundel to come to England, that he accepted it. There is a great difference of opinion amongst his biographers as to whether he came direct to England after leaving the studio of Rubens, or first paid a visit to France; but from an order for the payment of £100 to Vandyck for special services rendered to Charles I., bearing date 1620, it seems likely that he first visited England. Whether this £100 was a gratuity, or was a regular payment for work and labour done, does not appear. A "Head of James I." in the collection at Windsor, has by some been supposed to be the production for which the sum was paid. The only other work of this period which is attributed to him with any show of proof, is a portrait of the "Earl of Arundel," his patron, which was engraved by Hollar.

He took his departure from England on the 28th of February, 1620 (o.s.), and in a pass given him to enable him to embark, he is designated one of "his Majesty's servants," and he is described as having obtained leave of absence for eight months, from which it may be inferred that he had obtained a regular engagement from the king. He now made his way once more to Flanders, where, however, he was destined to offer up his devotions at the shrine of another deity than Apollo. He fell desperately in love with a young country-girl residing in the village of Lavelthem, near Brussels, named Anna Van Ophem. So powerful a hold did his passion acquire over him, that he was unable to tear himself away from the presence of his charmer for a considerable length of time. Month after month passed away in "dalliance sweet," and Italy seemed to be totally lost sight of. By the persuasions of the fair Anna, however, he painted two pictures for the parish church, one of them representing "St. Martin," the patron saint, on horseback, dividing his cloak with a beggar. The saint was a portrait of Vandyck himself, and the horse of the one which Rubens had presented him with. The same subject had been previously treated by Rubens almost in the same manner. The parish authorities some time afterwards disposed of it to a M. Huet of the Hague; but as soon as the villagers heard of it, they rose in arms, and resisted all attempts to remove it with such vigour that the purchasers had to fly in order to save their lives. Similar zeal in its defence was manifested at a more recent period; when in 1806 the French seized upon it, the inhabitants offered so strenuous a resistance, that a reinforcement of troops had to be sent down from Brussels before it could be carried away. It remained in the Louvre until 1815, when the allied armies entered Paris and restored it to the rightful owners.

As soon as Rubens heard of his pupil's infatuation, he hastened down to Lavelthem, and succeeded in rousing him to a remembrance of art and fame, and inducing him to break the silken chains which bound him. He took a hasty leave of his mistress, and started off for Italy. He first directed his steps to Venice, attracted by the reputation of the colourists of that school, whose manner his master had admired and to some extent adopted. He paid particular attention to the works of Giorgione and Titian, and occupied himself mainly in copying and studying them, until the low state of his funds obliged him to set out for Genoa. This city was at this period at the height of its celebrity, and was the abode of the wealthiest nobles and merchants in Europe. Rubens had been received in it with great favour, so that his pupil visited it under auspicious circumstances, and his own graceful manners and rising talents as a portrait painter confirmed the good impressions formed regarding him from his master's prestige. The Spinola, Raggi, Brignoli, Pallavicino, and Balbi families eagerly availed themselves of his services, and their palaces still contain some of the best specimens of his works.

From Genoa he proceeded to Rome, and while there was a guest in the palace of Cardinal Bentivoglio, who, from his long residence in Flanders, was very fond of Flemings. By his order Vandyck painted a Crucifixion, and a full-length portrait of himself. The latter is considered one of his best works; the colouring bears evidence to the benefits he derived from his residence in Venice. In the pontifical palace there is an Ascension and an Adoration of the Magi by him, which it is presumed were painted by a commission from the Pope. Many other works executed at this period are still to be found in the palaces of the nobles. His stay at Rome only lasted two years, and its termination was owing, it is said, to the ill-concealed dislike of the Flemish artists residing there. They appear to have been mostly men of dissipated habits, pot-house frequenters and tipplers, passing their time in modes altogether foreign to Vandyck's tastes, who had a good deal of the fine gentleman in his composition, even if his natural good sense had not shown him that coarse sensualism is fatal to excellence in any walk of life. He was fond of fine dress, and grand equipages, too, which led his countrymen to believe him proud, and from this to calumniating and depreciating him there was but one step. They declared that his drawing was wretched, and his colouring worse. Disgusted by their conduct, Vandyck left Rome and returned to Genoa, whence he shortly after passed over into Sicily. While in Palermo, he painted the portrait of the celebrated blind paintress, Soffonisba Angosciola, then in her ninety-first year. Vandyck appears to have derived great enjoyment from her society, as he afterwards declared that he had received more instruction in his art from a blind woman than from the works of the most celebrated painters. He left Sicily in haste, in consequence of the outbreak of the plague. During his rambles on the Continent, he met the Countess of Arundel travelling with her two sons. She begged of him to return with her to England, but he declined and returned to Genoa.

After a short residence in Florence, of which little is known, making his stay in Italy on the whole five years, he once more bent his steps towards home, where he had every reason to expect a cordial welcome, as his fame had already reached Antwerp, and the citizens were naturally disposed to do him all honour. As soon as he made his appearance he was overwhelmed with commissions. The first work of importance which he undertook was an altar-piece for the church of the Augustines, representing "St. Augustine in Ecstasy, surrounded by Angels." Sir Joshua Reynolds condemns it, because it wants any large mass of light; but this was not so much the painter's fault as that of the monks, who insisted on his making the saint's garment black, instead of light, as he had originally intended it. Another instance of equally mischievous interference occurred with regard to a painting, the subject of which was "The Raising of the Cross," which he was to execute for the canons of the collegiate church of Courtray. To give his countrymen a full idea of his powers, he resolved to exert himself to the uttermost upon this work, and succeeded to his own satisfaction. On taking it to the church, the canons, instead of allowing him to put it up at once in the place it was intended to occupy, insisted upon having it unpacked before their eyes, that they might at once form a judgment upon its merits. After remonstrating in vain, he complied with their request. They glanced at the canvas contemptuously, declared that the Saviour's head was like that of a porter, and that the others were masks, and turning upon their heels, told Vandyck that he himself was a mere dauber, and left him. The picture was, however, put up, but the canons, in their cross stupidity, refused to come and look at it again. The painter was, however, not long in getting justice: connoisseurs saw it, artists saw it, travellers saw it, and the voices of all competent to form an opinion were unanimous in its favour. The canons now found themselves in an awkward position, but they were either cowardly or magnanimous enough to join in the general admiration, and, as some amends for their former insults, met in full conclave and commissioned him to paint two other pictures. He sent back their order with a contemptuous refusal, telling them there were enough daubers in Courtray without sending to Antwerp for them.

Vandyck stayed in Flanders about five years after his return from Italy, and during the whole of this time was very busily employed. Thirty pictures at least were painted by him for various churches and chapels, in addition to a great number of portraits of the most celebrated men and women of the age—The Archduchess Isabella of Austria, the Cardinal Infanta of Spain, the Queen-mother of France, and her son Gaston, Duke of Orleans, both of whom were then residing in exile at Brussels; equestrian portraits of the Prince Thomas of Savoy, the Duke of Aremberg, the Duke of Aloa, Antonius, Triest, Bishop of Ghent, and the Abbé Scaglia. He also painted portraits of most of the leading generals who fought in the Thirty Years' War, Gustavus Adolphus, Wallenstein, Pappenheim, Tilly, the Emperor Ferdinand, and others.

Passing over a hasty visit to the Netherlands, during which he painted portraits of the Prince and the Princess of Orange and their family, we shall proceed to notice Vandyck's residence in England, as the period of his life possessing doubtless most interest for our readers. The immediate cause of his coming over is not known; there are no traces of a direct invitation from the king; but it is more than probable that the sudden restoration of his patron, the Earl of Arundel, to the favour of Charles I., which he had lost by the marriage of his eldest son, Lord Maltravers, with the Lady Elizabeth Stuart, daughter of Esme, Duke of Lennox, had something to do with it. He arrived in London in the beginning of April, 1632, and met with a very cordial welcome from the king, who assigned him apartments in the Blackfriars and a summer residence at Eltham, and appointed him principal painter in ordinary to their Majesties. Within three months after his arrival he conferred upon him the honour of knighthood, accompanied by the gift of a gold chain, to which was attached the royal portrait set in brilliants. By this time he had painted the family group containing Charles, his wife, and children, which now hangs in the Vandyck-room of Windsor Castle. He was henceforth kept in constant employment either by the king or by the nobility; and in October, 1633, the former settled a pension of £200 a-year upon him—a large sum according to the value of money at that day; and this, combined with his private earnings, enabled him to gratify his extraordinary love of display, a failing which he must have contracted by his residence with Rubens, who was very wealthy. His establishment was now kept up on a scale of gorgeous magnificence, as he aspired to rival the court nobility in dress, equipage, and entertainment. He made a practice of inviting all those who came to sit for their portraits to remain and dine with him afterwards, so that he might have an opportunity of observing their expression more closely, and amending his sketch. He was very fond of music, and affected to be a great patron of those who made it their profession. Owing to the king's custom of rowing down to his house in his barge, and sitting with him for hours at a time in his studio, it became the fashion amongst the nobility to do the same. His house consequently became a regular place of resort, a species of morning lounge for the fine gentlemen of the day. As they were of course all given to gallantry and intrigue, Vandyck must needs be so too, and managed to spend very large sums of money upon divers fair ones, whose favours he enjoyed. The natural consequence of all this folly was, that his constitution began to give way, being undermined by luxurious habits, indolence, and dissipation, and his circumstances becoming embarrassed, he is said to have been silly enough to seek to retrieve his fortunes by the aid of the philosopher's stone, for which he searched diligently for a long while, we need hardly say in vain.

The king saw what a sad life his favourite was leading, and wisely concluded that the best remedy for all bachelor ailments was matrimony. He accordingly got him married to Miss Maria Ruthven, the daughter of an eminent physician, who had suffered a long imprisonment in the Tower, during the preceding reign, upon a false charge of treason. The lady was poor, but high-born, and she and Vandyck, for aught we know to the contrary, lived very happily together.

The painter now applied himself almost wholly to portrait painting, and neglected history. There are few old families in England which cannot show one or more portraits of their ancestors from this painter's hand. He, however, executed a good many historical pictures, most of them New Testament subjects, for his kind patron, Sir Kenelm Digby; but he aspired to something which should prove a still better exposition of his talents than anything he had yet achieved.

Rubens had painted some splendid pictures upon the ceiling of the banquetting-room at Whitehall, and their richness was so great, that something of the same kind was evidently needed upon the walls also. Vandyck therefore proposed to the king, through Sir Kenelm Digby, to execute a series of pictures illustrative of the history of the order of the garter. The scheme pleased the king, and he ordered the designs to be prepared forthwith, with the intention of having them worked in tapestry; but upon coming to calculate the expense, he found it would amount to £75,000, an enormous sum, considering the then state of the exchequer, which the people of England had made up their minds upon no account to replenish till Charles began to mend his manners and reduce their grievances. So Vandyck's proposal was laid aside for the present. The same sad necessity caused the prices which he charged for the pictures executed for the royal family to be cut down greatly; and altogether, between bad health and pecuniary embarrassment, and the political troubles, the period between 1635 and 1640 was a dull time enough for Sir Anthony Vandyck. To shake off his melancholy, he undertook a journey to Paris, hoping to obtain employment at the grand gallery of the Louvre, which Louis XIII. was then about to decorate with paintings; but in this he was disappointed, and returned to England after a sojourn of two months in the French capital.

offered a gratuity of £100 to the physician if he succeeded in saving his life. It was all in vain, however. The gossip of courts, the favour or neglect of princes, the breath of popular applause, or civil discord, could trouble him no more. He died in December, 1641, at the early age of forty-two, and lies buried in the north side of the choir of St. Paul's Cathedral, near the tomb of John of Gaunt.

He had one daughter by his wife, named Justiniana, who married Sir John Stepney, of Prendergast, Pembrokeshire. Their last descendant, Sir Thomas Stepney, died in September, 1825.

From Vandyck's portraits we learn that he was handsome, lively, and intelligent-looking. From contemporary chronicles and gossip we learn that he was graceful in his carriage, and

FRANÇOIS LANGLOIS, THE BAGPIPER.—BY VANDYCK.

He found but a poor prospect before him here. The parliament and the Roundheads were carrying things with a high hand, and were certainly inspired with no love for such ungodly vanities as painting. In March, 1647, Vandyck saw the royal family who had so long been his kind friends dispersed; and his patron, the Earl of Strafford, was brought to the scaffold in the May following. One calamity followed another; gaieties were over, the nobility had weightier business on hand than getting their portraits painted. London was filled with stern Puritans who never lounged in studios. So Vandyck did what was very natural under the circumstances—became sick unto death. Charles had just returned from Scotland, and on hearing of the illness of his old friend, winning in his manner. He was generous to a fault, extremely sensitive, and, as we have already said, was vain and fond of show.

Many of his historical paintings displayed the highest skill. One of them, "Christ crucified between two Thieves," Sir Joshua Reynolds pronounced one of the finest pictures in the world. His heads always display wonderful expression, deep pathos, and a refinement carried in some instances to the verge of delicacy. But to see him in his glory, we must traverse the galleries of our old nobility, and see his knights and dames of the seventeenth century looking down on us from the blackened canvas, with their grand air, their haughty but not unpleasing dignity.

J. LOUIS DAVID.

ART is an idea, an abstraction. At all events it is so in the sense that every man has his own conception about it, each man his own peculiar notions. In addition to this, notions have their separate theories: one notion is positive, another imitative, another poetical, another classical, while all have their oddities and fancies. We, perhaps, more than any other country, have set at naught mere schools and academies, and allowed each individual man to work out his own individuality. There are attempts at schools, it is true; but it must be said, they are not successful. The very many painters in England who have kept apart from schools, are really those who have held the highest position.

Truly Art has avowed many theories relative, in most cases, to schools; but the greatest expressions of genius which belong to art are those of single men, who, like John Martin, have worked out their own conception apart from academies, theories, and schools. But if, to a certain extent, this be true of England, it is scarcely true elsewhere, and is not true even in the case of David, whose greatest glory is to have founded a school, which has gone on copying and imitating ever since. Before we judge the school, then, let us inquire into the history of the artist.

This great historical painter came in time to save the French school from utter extinction. Since those days when the fascinating and licentious Watteau had left the slips of the opera covered and concealed by rouge and vermillion, Art in France had fallen into a kind of voluptuous intoxication, a faint and vapid imitation of this eastaway amid the pupils of Rubens. Despite the solemn absurdities of Lemoine, who was so serious in his part of a painter as to fall on his sword and die, French Art was at the lowest ebb—a mere type of universal debauchery, the emanations of sensualism, and the dreams of bestiality. There was not a shred, not a remnant of decency or delicacy left. The alcove, which the Flemish school concealed in their studios, or hid away in the corner of a picture, shaded and modestly veiled, was now the subject-matter of all French productions, the artists of that country seeking to outdo each other in their endeavours to pervert and degenerate the human intellect.

Art, literature, morals, manners, all were sinking into the same vortex under the baneful influence of such courts as those of Louis XV. and the Regent of Orleans, the members of which were on a par with, if not below, the average of the populations which fill our bridewells and our Magdalen hospitals. Casual observers have often been surprised when gazing at pictures like those which adorned the walls of ladies' chambers under the Regent, have been naturally horrified at the violence and brutality of the people at the commencement of the Revolution, and have condemned artists and people as they had previously condemned writers and philosophers. But the true criminals must be sought elsewhere. The tone of public morals, the stamp of public character, in times like the last century in France, must be taken from above. The court, the aristocracy, the church, the women of rank, were all equally corrupt, equally profligate, equally vile and contemptible. It would have been difficult to find at Versailles or at the Tuileries men and women capable of loving a Milton or a Dante, of admiring a Michael Angelo or a Raffaele, of understanding or appreciating a high-class production of any kind; and Voltaire, Piron, Boueher, Watteau, and the novel of Faublas, were the fitting children of such a soil as that which educated and fashionable society presented at this period. Poets, painters, authors, philosophers, historians, in France especially, must be read and admired; and as to be read and admired it was necessary to be cynical, irreligious, and indelicate. poets, painters, authors, philosophers, and historians were cynical, irreligious, and indelicate.

It is an error to suppose that intellect forms the character of the age; it is the characteristics of the age which form the intellect. It will be noted by all careful observers, that as society has become refined, so has literature softened down and been purified; and this is the more evident when we remark, that literature is generally a little more loose and bolder than the language of the most refined society in a civilised country.

In France, in the time of Watteau, the very name of love had been degraded and materialised. We no longer saw fond affection beaming from an averted face, a languid eye, an expressive smile, love timidly venturing on a stolen kiss; all was bold, audacious, unblushing, and daringly painted on the wainscoting of boudoirs, the interior of ladies' bed-chambers; a style of dress somewhat too négligée; or ideas, unfit for pencil or brush, crudely and coarsely expressed. Scenes of country life no longer breathed innocence and purity; they were excuses for rough and dubious scenes; while even landscape was degraded into the representation of a nature stiff and impossible—a nature reminding one of the painted scenes of a ballet, and not of the reality. The imitators and followers of Watteau had none of his talent, none of his soft and lovely skies, none of his truth and power of colouring.

Art was then, like society, religion, virtue, morals, and even national existence, about to perish at the end of an orgy and debauch fit for the purlieus of some demoralised capital. Never did a nation present a more degraded or melancholy spectacle than did France towards the latter end of the last century; without faith, honour, or even the last semblance of virtue—its best outward sign—modesty. To save Art, a revolution, a change as radical and as sweeping as that which was about to save the body politic, was needed. This mighty and tremendous change was effected by David—not wholly, not completely; for French Art has never yet risen to the very highest level, never soared to those tremendous heights which dazzled the minds and fired the genius of Rome, of Florence, of Venice—but effected to an extent which is fortunate for France. Not that the voluptuous, even the painfully indelicate, style of art has been wholly discarded in France; by no means. The students of this disagreeable branch of painting still exist, as do the imitators of the abbés and petit-maitres. They must and will remain while France is France. But a more severe, a more chaste, a higher tone has been given; and the men of talent and genius who attain to eminence in France, discarding the boudoir and vulve, have elevated their thoughts above the palled copyists of Boucher and Watteau, and obtained a deservedly high place in the art-history of modern Europe.

Several attempts had been made, previously to the day of David, to turn the foul current into a pure and wholesome channel. But only another Hercules could cleanse the Augean stable. Vien made one or two timid attempts to check the torrent, but was swept away in the mud which he stirred to the surface. A more vast and capacious mind, a more daring and original genius, was required to effect a real, a radical cure—one who would boldly grapple with the tide and hurl it back under the influence of the beautiful, and of the beautiful as accepted by the great verdict of antiquity. It was a mighty stride to take, from the effeminate Boucher, who showed you how to treat a leg elegantly, or made a cripple look graceful, to the painter David, who was to profess the worship of the beautiful with all the severity of a Florentine.

It is the mistake of France to rush to extremes. She is eternally either turning liberty into licence, or groaning beneath the heavy load of despotism. In the same way in art. From a romp in the hay-field, she turns to the rape of the Sabines, and that art which was familiar, funny, coarsely humorous, is now nothing if not classical. A man christened his son Brutus, and was painted in a toga. It may have been necessary to excite this enthusiasm for Rome and Greece at the time; but the dull monotony of classical subjects, as depicted by artists, would soon have wearied the world if Scripture and modern history had not furnished the artist with fresh materials to work upon.

Singularly enough, the man who was to commence the revolution against the immodest Boucher was his own relation. The last of the corrupters of painting in France, he who closed the long procession of the carnival of materialism in France, sent forth from his own family the regenerator of his art. The nephew of François Boucher was Louis David.

Born in France in the middle of the eighteenth century, in 1748, David was educated at the Collège des Quatre Nations. He derived little advantage from the education he there received, already influenced as he was by the desire of painting. His copy-books were covered with rough and shapeless sketches, and when he should have been writing a speech of Scipio or of Hannibal, the young rhetorician preferred painting one of them with a Roman helmet. His father, who was a mercer on the Quai of the Megisserie, having been unfortunately killed in a duel, David fell, at the age of nine years, under the tutorship of a maternal uncle, who wished to educate him as an architect, believing him to be possessed of a solid and reasoning mind. But the young student, while possessed of much calm good sense, had a fiery and ardent disposition. He rebelled against the authority of his tutor, by whom he did not feel himself to be appreciated.

One day he was sent by his mother with a letter to his great-uncle, Boucher. He found the artist engaged in painting one of those voluptuous pieces he was in the habit of supplying to Madame Dubarry—pieces which were not without originality and talent. The sight of the easel, the palette, and the brushes inflamed the imagination of young David, who, while Boucher was reading the letter, remained in silent amazement before the picture, no doubt mentally revolving, like Correggio, his own career.

He resolved to become a great painter.

His friends were compelled to yield to so energetic a will, and David became a pupil of Boucher, as Guerin was the teacher of Gericault. But Boucher, despite his weakness in yielding to an immoral and degrading style for the sake of momentary triumphs, had a conscientious mind and much greatness of soul on occasions. In those days he hesitated not to corrupt still more the vicious strata of society; but he at once acknowledged that his lessons might be pernicious and injurious to David, and he advised him to go to Vien, who would give him more wholesome instruction. In 1772 the pupil of Vien wished to try for the "prize of Rome." His genius was, however, in an anomalous state, and his judges were the men of the school he was about to overthrow. He tried twice, and twice failed.

David suffered all the usual difficulties of a young man beginning life in any profession, when without rich friends. He often wanted the means of devoting himself peaceably to study, and the gnawing cares of want were added to what he considered injustice. His sufferings were, however, not of a very long duration, and he was delivered from his misery in a very unexpected way. David was saved and started by an opera dansuse. The celebrated Mademoiselle Guimard, whom Paris adored, and who was surrounded by a court of scamps, the friends of the Prince de Soubise, her ruined lover, had just built in the Chaussée d'Antin, under the name of Temple of Terpsichore, a "delicious hotel," where the petit souper was regarded as one of the objects of man's existence. To embellish her dwelling, the renowned courtesan addressed herself to Fragonard, a charming painter, a painter especially of love and love-scenes, wholly, says a French writer, without prejudices! A quarrel took place shortly, however, between Guimard and her decorator. The latter had painted his fair employer as Terpsichore, but returning secretly to the salon, with brushes and paint, he re-touched the head, and made of her a furious and raving Nemesis. The dansuse came into the room, where, seeing herself disfigured in this way, she flew into a passion, and overwhelmed the artist with reproaches and insults. She called in her friends to show them the horrible head, forgetting that in her rage she was assimilating herself to the caricature. Everybody began to laugh. Fragonard, avenged, abandoned the decoration of the hotel, which was then handed over to David. One day, the young man appeared pensive, and sighed profoundly as he thought. Mademoiselle Guimard overheard him, and asked the cause of his oumi. David confessed his want of money to pay his models, and to wait at leisure the chance of a coming trial.

The good-natured opera-dancer—she who had so much money, so easily obtained—brought him all the money he wanted.

David was a true Frenchman. He took the money, and took heart at the same time, finished the decorations, and began to work hard again for his third trial. A third time he was rejected. He gave way to utter despair, and shut up in his room, determined to allow himself to die of hunger, another victim to the eccentric faintness of heart so often felt by men of genius. He was living in the Louvre, in the apartments of Sodaine, a clever poet, who loved him as a son. This worthy man, uneasy at not seeing David, went and knocked at his door. He obtained no answer, and, in a state of great alarm, rushed to the house of Doyen, and induced him to come also. They both began knocking and imploring, and finally induced him to open. On recognising the voice of Doyen, who alone, of all the members of the Academy, had been favourable to him, David had dragged himself to the door, pale, thin, half-dead. Restored by his friends to life and hope, he presented himself a fourth time, and, in 1775, carried off the great prize.

Natoire, who had been director of the school at Rome, died this same year, and Vien was selected to take his place. The master and pupil then started together for Rome, and enjoyed, during the journey through Italy, one long draught of admiration. David, on arriving at the Vatican, wandered with delight and surprise through those halls filled with master-pieces, elevated even more by history and antiquity than by intrinsic merit. He began immediately to draw bas-reliefs, to copy antique statues and the Italian masters, choosing always the most pure. At once a resolution began to prepare itself in his mind, still affected, however, by the recollections of his country, by the first impressions received; and seeing in Valentine the genius of his nation, he executed a copy of the "Last Supper" of that vigorous French master. Thus floating and uncertain between his reminiscences and the imposing models which he had under his eyes, he painted a picture of the "Plague," which is in the Lazaretto at Marseilles, and in which will be found something of the old manner of the eighteenth century, with an evident leaning to originality and reform. The old painter, Pompey Battoni, said of one figure of a man struck by plague, who occupies the front of the picture, that it was worthy of Michael Angelo.

A great movement was taking place at Rome, a movement which was destined to carry David with it. Canova was meditating the reform of statuary, Raphael Mengs was restoring a solemn and earnest tone to art-criticism, and endeavouring to revivify in his own paintings the examples of Raphael d'Urbino, so long neglected. About the same time the learned Winckelmann published his "History of Art," in which he reproduced the principles of the Greeks, indicating the most delicate beauties of their art with all the passion of an antiquary. The moment then had commenced, and a revolution was to emanate from these efforts, such as Diderot foresaw, and which was to be contemporaneous with that in the body politic. When David returned to Paris in 1780, he was already completely transformed, in the sense, at least, that he had made up his mind to cease taking his subjects from real life, and to choose them from the antique, or from a nature suited to a noble and energetic style.

It was when influenced by these new ideas that he composed his "Belisarius," of which we offer an engraving (p. 300), and which was the last instance of his indecision, the line of demarcation between the past and the new school which he himself was about to create. As for the execution, in the original it has all the breadth which should be found in an historical picture; the drapery is not copied with any of that smallness which is found in the copy in the Louvre. "But," says a French writer, "the emotion fails, because the artist is not moved, and though he has written on the stone the simple words, Inte obolum Belisario, Vandyck had already treated this fine subject. Some amateurs recollected this, and hastened to place the picture along-side of the engraving. The soldier was much admired, who, in the attitude of astonishment, contemplates his general reduced to beg, and seems to say, 'Is that Belisarius?' The intention of the Flemish painter was so striking, above all in the movement of the arms of the warrior, that if his head had been covered up, his arms would have expressed astonishment. It was felt, on the contrary, that David had given to the soldier, on whose action all depended, as forced a gesture as that of Vandyck was natural and expressive. Nevertheless the multitude were delighted, and carried David in triumph round his picture."

The story doubtless assisted the success of the picture. It is one of the many in Roman history which strikes the imagination forcibly.

Whole books have been written to tell the tale of the blind old general, who went forth into the world to beg his way, after commanding some of the finest armies in the world. We only allude to it, in addition to describing the picture, because it is a really good subject, one which will bear trying again, and which we recommend to the young artist as a pleasing experiment. The story of Belisarius is simply this, setting aside all the romance of Marmontel:—

He was a favourite general of one of the emperors of Constantinople, and was sent forth at the head of large armies to resist the barbarians. He was successful, and gained great glory, but met with the usual reward of men who trust in princes. Having done his duty, he was cast aside, then forgotten, and suddenly re-appeared, recognised by a soldier who had served under him, begging, with his child in his arms to guide him as he went.

The renown of David was spreading. From all sides came ardent young men, who insisted upon having him for a master; and he was pressed to open that school which afterwards became so celebrated. A lodging in the Louvre was allowed him; the Academy received him unanimously; Louis XVI. named him painter to the king; and fortune, as if never weary of her favours, came to meet him with the hand of a richly dowered young girl, Mademoiselle Pecoul, whose father was an architect and builder to the king.

In 1784, the King of France having desired of his first painter "The Oath of the Horatii," David determined to go and paint the heroic Romans in Rome itself. He accordingly started on a second journey to that capital, and there painted his picture, which was rapturously received by the Italians. Nothing was talked of but the Horatii and the French painter. The cardinals wished to see the "rare animal," as David himself expresses himself in a familiar letter to the Marquis of Biere. But when "The Oath of the Horatii" was received in Paris, the intendant of the king's household, M. d'Angivilliers, affected to speak of it with disdain. He was one of those men of routine who were frightened at the new school. He could not bear the Borgheze Gladiator, and objected to "that thing" being given to pupils as a model. His first care was to take a compass to measure the painter's canvas; and as he found it to be thirteen feet instead of ten, he was quite alarmed, and complained that an artist should have been audacious enough to pass the dimensions assigned to a picture. He was punished, at a later period, by the rough remark of David: "Well, then, if it really is too big, take a pair of scissors and cut it."

"The Oath of the Horatii" (p. 292), to be correctly judged, must be connected with the period at which it was painted. When we recollect the soft and languid compositions of the contemporaries of David, and how insipid was that continual representation of Sybarites, without even the old peculiarity of a fixed style, one is surprised to see these masculine figures arise, and to have represented to us a Roman interior reconstructed on archaeological principles so well suited to the great drama, the sublimity of which was no longer understood. The stupefaction of the world must have been great indeed when they saw an artist, at the same time that he evoked one of the most striking episodes of ancient history, restore the costume, the manners, the architecture of the heroic times, choose a simple background, and find so admirable a movement of enthusiasm in these warriors animated by the genius of Rome, and such marked masculine and real faces. We pass, as it were, from the insipid nonentities of Dorat, to the sublimity of Shakspeare or the heroic verse of Milton. This serious model, this severe expression of reality, this firm position of the feet and hands, which is to be seen in every fibre, may appear exaggerated now, as doubtless it is, when we more thoroughly understand what an historical picture should be. But what a contrast, at a time when nothing was seen but soft carnations, indecent subjects, pretensions or disgusting pencils!

Scroux d'Agincourt, the illustrious author of a continuation of Winckelman's work, accuses David of having committed an historical heresy in certain parts of the picture. The author, however, defended himself on solid ground; he had profoundly studied all that was connected with his subject. He knew Plutarch by heart. He was very fond of the Latin classics, thology or history. Talma must yield to David the chief part of the honour of having brought about this transformation in scenic costume; for it was in the society of David that the celebrated comedian learnt to love the antique, and to see the extreme absurdity of Nero appearing in red-heeled shoes and gartered breeches, Venus in a hoop and powder, Jupiter in a wig, and Cupid in the costume of a débaucheur. It was David who cast the Roman toga on the shoulders of Brutus, as represented by Talma, who appeared suddenly in the costume of the hour, to the great astonishment of the French public, and to the great disgust of the old stagers.

An anecdote of David will characterise his stiffness and hardness of character, and illustrate the heathen time in which he lived, better than the most lengthened statements. It is an especially Livy. He is in general, therefore, exceedingly correct in all that requires historical knowledge, in manners, customs, scenery, &c. At the time, his taste was so highly rated, that everybody began to model their furniture and dress upon his ideas. It was immediately after the public exhibition of "The Oath of the Horatii" that antique ornaments came into fashion. This illustrates completely the character of the French, heikle and impulsive to the last degree. Everybody was led to have the furniture of Tarquin the Proud, to drink in the patera of Herculaneum, to light themselves by the lamps of the Villa Albani. The ladies' dresses were cut in imitation of the chlamys, while their shoes were exchanged for coturni. Statues, medals, and Etruscan vases dislodged the furniture of past times, and for the first time the characters in tragedy were clothed according to the traditions of myanecdote that could be true only of a Frenchman. Madame de Noailles asked of David a "Christ," which the painter refused to execute, because he never painted religious subjects, they not inspiring him in the slightest degree. This might have been true of the ridiculous representations of saints and nuns, which adorned chapels and oratories; but it is incomprehensible how any man of genius could fail to be inspired by the history of Christ himself. David at all events, Frenchman as he was, would not, or could not be inspired. But as the Marechale de Noailles insisted, David painted a "Christ" for her, with the features of a handsome soldier in the Gardes Françaises. He often declared that the Scriptures spoke not to his heart; and one of his great reasons for regarding Raffaele as so far above all other painters was, that he could be inspired by subjects which left him utterly and hopelessly indifferent! Here speaks the countryman of Piron, of Voltaire, and others, who, with all their genius, have done so little for poor humanity. But we must take David as we find him—incomplete, weak in many things, but powerful even in his defects and errors. His was an essentially pagan genius; his god was Socrates, his religion love of country, liberty his worship. His heroes were Brutus, Horace, Leonidas; and, if he could not feel the soft and ennobling and vivifying poetry of Christianity, or understand the consequent superiority of modern society, he was at all events a worthy pupil of the Grecian statuaries and of the philosophers of the portico. His outlines are always classical; his arrangements are guided by good taste; while the attitude of his tranquil figures is that which we should expect to find on the walls of an Athenian temple. He wanted but to feel the elevating “Cato went to meet death, and Socrates waited for it to come to him.” David had painted him holding a cup, which the slave in tears had offered to him. “No! no!” said Andre-Chenier, “Socrates will not seize it until he has finished speaking.” The scene and the contrasts are indeed remarkable. The executioner is much more moved than the victim. Around the master are grouped all his disciples, their minds divided between grief and admiration. The younger ones are striking their heads against the walls of the prison, and are giving other signs of despair. Crito is deeply attentive to his last words. Plato sits at the end of the bed, wrapped in his cloak, his head bowed, meditating on the last speech he is listening to; he does not dare to look at Socrates, as if the serenity of the master shamed his grief. In the background you see a dark staircase, by which the family of the philosopher is spirituality of Christianity to have been an immortal painter.

Since the Renaissance, there never was a painter capable of conceiving and executing the death of Socrates better than David (p. 301). Socrates is speaking with his friends on the immortality of the soul, when the servitor of the Eleven comes to bring him the cup of hemlock, turning away his eyes and weeping at his task. The philosopher is about to take the cup of poison with his right hand without looking, as a man who, wholly absorbed by a serious conversation, declines to interrupt it by noticing any ordinary event. His left hand, one finger of which is raised to heaven, points out clearly the subject of his discourse, and his way of taking the cup indicates sufficiently the calm and quiescence of his mind. A French poet, speaking of death, alludes to the celebrated dying scenes of antiquity, and says:—

being taken away—that family which has just said a last adieu to him. A critic has remarked: “It is a great pity that David did not devote to the execution of this masterpiece the ideality which should be in harmony with the subject. Poussin had himself established and applied that law of propriety which makes the artist choose on the palette tones in conformity to the character of the thought which is to be translated. He would have treated the death of Socrates in a Doric way, as being the most severe. He would have wielded his brush with breadth, have affected sober colours, avoiding pleasing in order to move. David, on the contrary, having devoted himself with too much complaisance to his best work, has fallen into a too finished, over-careful, and fastidious style; so that it is much better to see his picture as represented in the engraving, if we wish to admire it without reserve and see it in its true light. That is, the finest composition of all schools of painting.”

"The Death of Socrates," which the critic thus speaks of, is not certainly "the best composition in any school of painting;" it owes much to the subject itself, which is the most marked fact perhaps in the whole of Athenian history, as Socrates was, without comparison, the greatest man of the pagan world. It is, however, too well known to require description.

David has often committed the same fault which is very surprising in an artist, all of whose works were in every other respect so vigorously treated. His "Brutus," for example, is characterised by a certain affectation in the pencilling, which is out of place in such a subject. The furniture is painted with the care which we might expect in a Méris or a Gerard Douw; the details are elaborated in the style of domestic pieces, and contrary to the usual historical style. It is much for a painter, who did not really understand the effect of light and shade, to have thrown a dark shadow over the form of the Roman consul. And, truly, it was right that in the shade should have taken place the struggle between the conscience of the father and the austere duties of the republican citizen—duties which have never been proved to be such as we in our philosophy cannot sympathise with—the man condemning his own offspring to death. There were other magistrates and other citizens besides a father. The head of Brutus certainly could not have been fittingly displayed in the light, while the headless dead bodies of his children are carried away, executed by his command. He is, truly, finely represented, in obscurity turning his back to the gloomy procession, hesitating between his pride at having been ferocious, and his sorrow at not having shown some heart and feeling. The rest of the picture has been generally condemned as cold, formal, improbable, and without moving effect. The daughters of Brutus are generally thought to have fainted too gracefully. Woman's nature, even though that woman be a Roman or a Spartan, is impulsive. A sister gazing at the corpse of a brother, just being brought in from execution, would not have preserved such order, it is thought, in the folds of her garments and in the arrangement of her hair. It has been objected, that the severity of the father is enough without imparting to the women even the semblance of coldness or calculation. The wild despair of the women would indeed have formed an admirable contrast to the restrained emotion of the father, and the artist would have avoided the error of introducing two unities into one action.

The great revolution, which was to burst on the world like a thunder-clap, approached with rapid strides, and David had already completed his. "Brutus" bears the date of 1789, a date big with mighty consequences to the whole world; a date, the deeds of which, terrible as were some of their consequences, saved continental Europe from utter corruption and chased away the leprosy of government, morals, and manners, to return no more. Society had fallen into so vile a mire, the seeds of decay and corruption were sown so deeply, that nothing but the whirlwind and tornado could eradicate them. For a long time all felt an uneasy foreshadowing of tremendous events. The existing form of things was known to be irretrievably bad, and so unmistakable was the impulse to better things, that the picture of "Brutus" was ordered for that very king, who, the weakest and best of his race, was to suffer for the monstrosities of those who preceded him—monstrosities only known in ancient times, under the reigns of Commodus, Caligula, and Theodorus.

David had been powerfully influenced by that philosophy which sapped the foundations of the past without providing an effective remedy for the future. He determined at once to devote his art to aid the movement of the public mind. At the very opening of the revolutionary scenes he used his brush in its cause. He undertook to paint the "Oath of the Tennis-Court," one of the finest incidents of the Revolution, a protestation against the insanity and violence of despotism. It is a magnificent historical scene admirably rendered, a scene in which one dominant feeling is expressed by a thousand different organisations, and yet despite the difficulties, the impression is one and the same. What a transport illumines every face! Here, thousands of arms raised in the air; there, hats waving aloft; there, excited representatives of the people collecting in groups, encouraging and embracing each other; all this strikes the mind as would a clamour of many voices. Upright on a table, and alone, calm amidst the general tempest, the President Bailly pronounces the words of the oath, in an attitude as calm and motionless as that of the law. Never was such another collection of men congregated, and this materially assists the painter. Here is Barnave, here Mirabeau, and away there in the crowd is Robespierre. Each man is moved according to his character. One strikes the ground with his feet and raises his clenched fist; another sitting on a bench timidly holds out his hand. The younger members, standing on chairs, mingle disorder with their enthusiasm. An aged man, dragged forward in an arm-chair, has his arm held up for him while he takes the oath; while others weep, some with rage, some with fear. In the centre foreground is a group composed of a Chartreux monk, a Protestant, and a Catholic priest. The Protestant is Rabaut Saint-Etienne, the Carthusian is Dom Gerle, and the priest is the Abbé Gregoire. All difference of opinions have disappeared, all hearts are beating in common, and this one group tells the amity of the assembly. The movement is everywhere,—in the hall, in the air, above and below. A stiff breeze has raised the curtains of the windows, to which are holding on some groups of people, and through which can be seen a thunder-bolt, which falls on the royal chapel. David understood at once, perhaps, how the sombre drama was to end, the prologue of which was occurring in the place devoted to the games of the princes.

On the motion of Barère, the Constitutional Assembly decreed that the "Oath of the Tennis-Court," commenced by David, should be executed at the expense of the public treasury, and placed in the hall where took place the sittings of the assembly. But David did not paint this work. He sketched it out in pencil and bitumen on an immense canvas. Despite the ugly modern costume, so difficult to make picturesque, the learned anatomist determined to lose none of his science. Before clothing his figures with their ample waist-coats, he sketched their broad chests in the most conscientious manner. The figure of the "virtuous Bailly" originally occupied the centre of the group, and was drawn so perfectly in the style of a Greek statue, that beneath his coat the muscles of his arm, the form of his shoulder, and the developments of his torso might easily be seen. In general, clothes are stuck fast on the body, like damp linen—an exaggeration which is preferable to the heavy and wearisome effect which would be produced by a simple imitation of costume on a canvas where it takes up so much place. David remained a Greek, even when he should have been a Frenchman. The love of the naked,—the remembrance, the earnest perception of the antique, made him pursue the human form even under the lace of the Constituants. He had the true stamp of great artists, who are the same in all things, rather inclined to bend their genius to the level of a work, than force the work into collision with their native talent.

This sketch of such great historical value, as powerful and bold as a cartoon of Michael Angelo, was put up to auction seven years ago at a very low price, and the government, which afterwards purchased it, allowed it to be sold to a private individual, with a little finished sketch in pencil by David himself, from which the engraving was taken.

The importance of the picture is best seen from a brief sketch of the scene which it represents—a scene which, followed up in the same united and harmonious way, would have changed the fortunes of Europe.

The meeting of the states-general of France was an event which plunged the whole nation into the wildest state of excitement. For a long time the writings of philosophers and satirists, and political economists, had been preparing the public mind for a change, which was imperatively demanded by the circumstances of the times. France was toppling, ready to fall. The throne had been dragged in the mire by its own occupants, and the efforts of a well-meaning but weak man could not save it. Individually without the one great vice of his courtiers, his court was still a scene of profligacy and iniquity, such as the pen of an English historian can scarcely write. The nobles were the same vapid, chattering, boasting, debauched set of infidels, who thought it clever and strong-minded to be irreligious, the height of glory to be debauched. The middle classes, though better and more moral, were not more religious, except where protestantism shed its quiet and unobtrusive light upon the home; the people were nothing, wretched, poor, oppressed. There were slaves, serfs of estates, in the days of Louis XVI.—men who belonged to the soil they dwelt on, the property of bishops and chapters.

But the nation was weary of all this. Famine with its grim horrors stalked through the land, scattering disease and death; and it was rumoured and believed that the whole was produced by vast and disgraceful speculations. The fore-stallers and regraters were pointed out. Men were discovered and hanged for emptying bags of corn into rivers, to produce scarcity. The peasantry never even saw white bread. Agriculture was neglected; the nation was in debt; the whole body politic was rotten, and it became clear that the dissolution of society was near at hand.

Reluctantly, unwillingly, the king summoned his parliament. It was called against the ideas of the court, and undermined and opposed from the very earliest moment. This was one of the chief causes of all the misery that followed. A frank yielding to popular opinion would have saved the court from much. What exasperated the French people and caused the reign of terror, was the emigration en masse of the rich and powerful, who, once on the frontier, launched anathemas at the people, and announced their intention of coming back at the head of foreign armies to put down the new ideas. Had the whole aristocracy accepted the revolution and rallied round the king, without listening to the syren voice of the queen, who was the chief cause of all the mischief; had the aristocracy have done this, and surrendered their exclusive privileges quietly, there would have been a limited monarchy, and France might have been gradually prepared for that republic which is the ardent hope of her educated classes.

But the resistance of blind conservatism began at once. The crown and nobility tried from the first to snub and keep down the tiers-état, that is, the representatives of the nation; and at last in a fit of vigour, or rather of delusion, respecting its own power, the court closed the doors of the meeting-house against the representatives.

Then occurred the great historical scene which is illustrated in the picture of Louis David. The representatives finding workmen at work, and soldiers guarding, knew very well the meaning of the act. It was an attempt to dissolve them under pretence of adjournment. They knew that if they submitted to the delay, it would be all over with them. Their existence depended on the support of the country, and that support would be gone if they bent to the arbitrary power of the crown. They accordingly determined to meet elsewhere, and the great racket-court of the princes was selected. The representatives poured in in great numbers, and, incited by Mirabeau and others, swore to be faithful to their delegation, and opened the career of revolution by openly opposing the power of the crown, which, by attempting what it could not carry out, lost all force and prestige. The scene of the "Oath of the Tennis-Court" killed the old monarchy. It exhibited it in a ridiculous light. It aimed at ruling by force, it insulted and tried to degrade the representatives of the people, who remained calm, dignified, and did their duty unawed by bayonets, unintimidated by violence.

From that hour the revolution knew its power, the crown began to feel its utter weakness and insignificance, which was made more completely manifest by the rapid emigration of those who had sworn to defend and guard the throne of Charlemagne, which since has been so unceremoniously tossed from Bourbon to Napoleon, from Napoleon to Bourbon, from Bourbon to Orleans, and thence back again to Napoleon.

There are few such scenes of unity in the French Revolution. It augured well; but the augury, like many others, meant nothing. The apple of discord was soon to fall amid that assembly, and bring about terrible, though perhaps natural, results. The year 1793 was the saturnalia of a nation of slaves, bursting without preparation into liberty, which, when not won gradually and by the genuine progress of the human mind, is always licence.

Elected to the Convention by the section of the Muscena, in September, '92, David exercised over the assembly the dictatorship of arts. Everything he proposed was instantly decreed. Two French artists, Ruter and Chinard, having been attacked at Rome by the sbirri of the Inquisition and taken to St. Angelo, David was immediately informed of it by a letter from Topino Lebrun, his pupil, and he obtained a decree from the Convention that the ministers should write energetically to the Pope. "He further obtained," says a modern writer, "that the office of director of the Academy of Rome should be suppressed, as he himself says in a letter, the autograph copy of which is before us, and from which oozes forth his hatred of the old institution in brutal and coarse words.

David voted for the death of the king. On the eve of the execution, Lepelletier St. Fargeau having been assassinated in the Palais Royal, David set to work, and two months afterwards he presented to the Convention the picture of the "Last Moments of Lepelletier." The victim of Paris was represented lying on the ground, the torso showing the bleeding wound in the side, relieved by the white linen; a sword, suspended by a thread perpendicularly over the wound, is thrust through a paper on which is written these words—"I vote the death of the tyrant." On this occasion David depicted nature in all its energetic truth with the same brush with which he had before produced the "Last Supper" of Valentine. He was even more true and more expressive in his painting of "Marat Expiring," which is certainly a masterpiece for execution, and in which he has almost idealised the hideous countenance of his hero, the lunatic revolutionist. The assembly accepted the present, and ordered that it should be engraved at the public expense, and that the honour of the Pantheon should be publicly given to Marat. With his head thrown back, and his hand outside the bath, Marat holds out a scroll, on which this is written—"Give an assignat to the mother of seven children whose husband has died for his country."

Marat's body was, a few months later, cast by a mob into the common sewer.

The part which David played in the Convention had its brilliant side; the chief direction of the fine arts, the command of all patriotic festivals, his solicitude for the laureats, to whom he had a pension of about £100 per annum voted for the five years they were to pass in perfecting themselves either in Italy or in the territory of the republic, were all proofs of his love of art. It was David who made to the assembly that famous report, which began, "A statue shall be erected to the people; victory will supply the bronze." At last, on the 19th Prairial, after Robespierre's speech on the "Immortality of the Soul," David developed his plan of the "Festival of the Supreme Being." There were to be choirs of young girls and boys in imitation of the ancient Panathenæa. Paris awoke to the sound of music on a vast scale. The altar of the country, placed on the summit of a mountain, was to be the front of an immense procession, in which the members of the Convention figured, with bunches of flowers and fruits in their hands. Dances, decorations, burning piles, thousand-coloured illuminations, gave to this fête unprecedented splendour and grandeur without a parallel; but it was one of those enormous pieces of showy clap-trap possible only in France. It was very nearly the death-warrant of all who conceived it. Compromised among the conquered of Thermidor, David's arrest was ordered. He was detained in the Luxembourg five months, then set free, and then arrested again. Supported in the Convention by Thibaudéau, Chenier, Merlin de Douai, and Boissy d'Anglas, who had experienced his worth in private life, he at last regained his liberty. Then it was that he painted the picture of "The Sabines," which is engraved in our pages (p. 293). The idea of this picture came to him, it is said, in somewhat of a romantic manner. While yet a captive, David learnt that his wife, though parted from him for some time, did her utmost to save him, and even confronted danger for his sake. Touched with this devotion, he resolved to paint her; but after some reflection he came to the conclusion that he, David, the legislator of painting, should wrap his allusions under a general and historical idea. The story of the Sabines came to his thoughts.

"If the picture of 'The Sabines,' " says a critic, who, though partial to Louis David, is sometimes severe, "were to be critically examined as a masterpiece, and the work of the chief of a school, we should have to protest against much of its immense reputation; for it has neither movement, nor chiaroscuro, nor comprehension of that skill which is displayed in the grouping of many figures. Besides, these are not the robust ancestors of the reapers of Leopold Robert. We can scarcely reconcile to our minds how it happens that such a delicate,

POPE PIUS VII.—FROM A PAINTING BY DAVID.

The story is familiar to all readers of history. The Romans having established themselves upon their rocky fortress, and being without wives, made an inroad upon their neighbours, the Sabines, and carried away their younger and more beautiful women. The Sabines, after preparations which consumed some time, came out to revenge the outrage. The Romans armed to resist their enemies, and a terrific combat had commenced, when the women, who had husbands and children on one side and fathers and brothers on the other, rushed in, placed themselves between the combatants, and stayed the contest. A treaty of amity and peace then took place, and elegant, and perfumed warrior as Romulus should have come forth from those Roman walls, whose heavy, massive constructions, starting from the Tarpeian rock, are seen in the distance. We wonder how it can be that this well-fed hero, with such delicate flesh, rubbed doubtless with aromatic oils, so gracious, so clean, so well combed, should be the nursling of the she-wolf, the founder of that savage colony of brigands who were destined in their savage ardour to conquer the world. It is hard to think that that gentlemanly delicate hand slew Remus. Poussin is more true, more historical. The heroes of David are gladiators, who stand to be admired before an assembled people, who are ready to die or kill elegantly. The personages of Poussin's paintings are coarse, barbarous, primitive; they move about naturally, if not nobly. It is a rough and vigorous scuffle, in which people tear each other's hair, and in which men snatch from each other superb women, the old woman who shows that she has nurtured Romans, and the mother holding up her child aloft before the armies. The armour-bearers are very fine in form, but too much in the style of the statues of the time of Hadrian; they are figures which do not move—which could not move."

who are handsome without seeking to show it; while the Sabines of David are scented with musk, pretty, and coquetish, and elegant, even in the disorder of their hair. Their gestures are theatrical, their position full of affectation. And yet in many of the figures we find the great master-hand: e. g., that of the old warrior who is sheathing his sword, of

The same critic, having exhausted his blame, turns to the other side of the picture:—"Everything, however, must be said. If the picture of 'The Sabines' is not a real masterpiece for three reasons: because the pantomime is improbable, in not being treated according to the proper fashion, and because the light is without play, and the composition without true optics—we must own that the figures, considered separately, are admirably modelled. The Romulus, the centre figure, is an Apollo with a helmet, a javelin, and a golden buckler; it is a figure of the finest time of youth; all is simple, pure, and clothed in a soft skin, with a wavy and gentle outline; while the whole reveals the serenity of the demigod. The figure of Tatiüs, more masculine and robust, and belonging to a less elevated type, is of itself a masterpiece, not only for the beauty of the torso, the individuality of the limbs, and the perfection of every form—severely studied even to their finest extremities, and firm as the muscles of the Laocöon—but also because the face demonstrates a fierce pride of which antiquity itself has shown few examples, except in the figures of Ajax. David, in this picture, seems to have added to the antique the passionate sentiment of Polydorus of Caravaggio. Some parts of the picture of ‘The Sabines’—the children, for example, especially those who, with their hands on the ground, seem to smile at the spectator—are admirably executed. The eyes seem to shine, and the very carnation has life in it. As for the horses, they have not the antique character so desirable in this style; they are not painted correctly from nature. At the time when David painted ‘The Sabines,’ it is true the horses of Phidias were unknown. It was many years after, that the fragments of the Parthenon were taken to England by Lord Elgin, and multiplied all over France by copies.”

The eminent critic might have added that Romulus and Tatiüs are very fanciful sketches, as far as costume are concerned. David preferred showing his power over the human figure, his admirable capacity for delineating sinew, muscle, and limb to correctness. A hero, who could display such a helmet, javelin, and buckler as those of Romulus, would not have been wholly denuded. Many other incongruities might be pointed out. The fact is, that David was not quite so great as many of his countrymen have tried to make him out to be. He was an earnest and studious lover of art, who did some very great things, but who never produced one of those mighty and suggestive masterpieces which have immortalised Michael Angelo and Raffaele.

In 1795, David proposed to M. Rousselin de St. Albin, a friend of Danton's, to paint him a portrait of the famous tribune. He traced the portrait from memory, assisted by a very feebly executed marble bust. This drawing is of inestimable value. It is dashed off boldly, with extreme fire and energy. Some pencil dashes, executed with extreme freedom, some vigorous cuts, have sufficed to place before us the revolutionary genius, in his crushed mask, half lion, half bull-dog, sublime in its ugliness. When he had finished it, David examined it for some time, and offering it to St. Albin, said: “Take that; I give you Jupiter Olympus.” These words were not without meaning from a man who wished to efface all idea of participation in the death of Danton. The gallery of Messieurs St. Albin, which we visited many times a few years ago, contains the most valuable memorials of the revolution; and M. de Lamartine derived much information for his late eloquent works from that unique collection, which, if still in existence, can by their politeness be always visited. David had many features in his political life, which the artist-historian can scarcely wish to touch upon. But we cannot forbear comparing the David, who was the devoted friend of Robespierre and St. Just, with the same man denying his fallen friends, and spurning his former völe, to accept the title of first painter to the emperor—he had been first painter to Louis XVI.—indeed, doubtless, by the thought of figuring in history as another Apelles to another Alexander. Young Robespierre asking to die with his brother—young Robespierre, to whom Napoleon owed so much of his promotion—presents a more noble spectacle than the fickle and versatile artist. But though David went as far as the most extreme men of the Mountain, Marat excepted, his artistic reputation saved him from the unmitigated obloquy lavished on the men of the revolution.

Napoleon ordered him to paint, for the sum of 180,000 francs, the two pictures, “The Distribution of the Eagles” and “The Coronation,” which are to be found at every stall in France. They are gigantic compositions. The first is monotonous, and inevitably so, from the crush of uniforms, which has in reality overwhelmed the beautiful and the true. In those days all, even art, bent beneath the sword. The style is inflated, and the perspective bad. “The Coronation” is more successful. It is wisely and nobly grouped. It contains about one hundred and fifty portraits, painted conscientiously and striking in likeness, especially those of Talleyrand, Bernadotte, and Cambacères, who stand in the foreground. The moment chosen by the painter is that when the emperor, having crowned himself with his own hands, is about to place the crown on the head of Josephine. The head of Napoleon is radiant, and the simplicity of the lines adds to the grandeur of the figure. As usual with all painters after Napoleon was emperor, David idealises the man. The group of priests is very excellent; there are some heads in the number, which seem to live and speak. The silk, the velvet, the ermine, all the stuffs, all the costumes, are admirably rendered; but the whole is cold; we seem to want more noise, more animation, more crowds, a long nave full of people,—less etiquette, in fact, and some other background, instead of those marble pillars which check the vision. David, who thoroughly comprehended the tone which suited each particular object, did not comprehend those great combinations of colour with light, which, by learned gradations of tone, arrive at magnificence and grandeur. In his ordinary style he had represented Pope Pius VII. with his hands on his knees, a useless actor, looking on at the imitator of Charlemagne. But the emperor ordered him to raise the powerless hands in sign of benediction. “I did not bring him from so far,” said he, “to do nothing.”

“The Portrait of Pius VII.,” by David (p. 296), has been very highly lauded. There is certainly a great power of modelling in it. The simplicity of the execution is great, and nature is reproduced with great fidelity, while the style is correct and firm. The hands are treated with the feeling of a Philippe de Champagne, and yet with more novetè. This is held, however, to be nothing but a little bit of Dutch imitation: the painter has added nothing of his own: if there be thought in the head, it is because of the original. There is none of the idealism of the great painter. David has done nothing but copy marked features—features which present a mixture of roughness and elevation of character—the Italian's look, and the movement of his black eyebrows. It is really a fine thing, admirably executed; but the beauty of the model, his expression, his rank, his renown, produced this of themselves. David, with the Pope before him, was what he always was—a first-rate artist, an incomparable master of graphic science and the art of modelling; but this reality is a little naked, without ideal, without interpretation, and the study of form appears to have absorbed everything. If we examine the portrait of the same Pius VII., by Lawrence, we find it full of poetry and grandeur: the head beams with animation, it shines with intelligence, and there is a lightning flash in the glance. Genius shines in the eyes of the sovereign pontiff through the plebeian envelope; the weight of the chin, the thick form of the mouth, are compensated by the delicacy, beauty, and dazzling brilliancy of the eye. Instead of the Pope of David, sitting tranquilly near a wall, nothing indicating his sovereignty except the Roman purple, Lawrence has given us a prince of the Church surrounded by splendours and amidst the wonders of the Vatican. If his face is uneasy, if his eyes flash, if his whole person is in motion, if his whole physiognomy flags, it is to remind us of the wandering and uneasy existence of the celebrated prelate.

David never was more poetical, never more successful, than in his celebrated picture of “Napoleon crossing Mount St. Bernard” (p. 297). One can gaze with pleasure on this robust horse, which seems to tremble beneath the weight of his illustrious rider, and one examines, with a curious eye, this beardless general crossing the rocks where are engraved the names of Hannibal and Charlemagne, while the breath of fortune sends the folds of his mantle waving to the summits of the Alps. This is a great picture.

the terrible invasion, the end of that bold bad man's ambition. The idea of the picture is happy, and the isolation of the hero Leonidas is good. He has just spoken familiarly with his soldiers, and promised them that they shall sup with Pluto. He is now mute, pensive, his mind is far away in the abode of the gods. The whole, the full sublimity of his sacrifice appears to him, and makes him radiant with solemn delight. As he was the soul of the troop, David has made him the centre of the picture. Around him all is in motion, all agitated; every one prepares; the trumpets sound the hour of death; a last crown is offered to Venus; and, to add to the emotion, a sketch of real life is introduced, in the persons of the slaves bearing burdens, and of mules carrying the baggage of the army. The execution of this picture, confided almost wholly to M. Rouget, one of the ablest practitioners of the school, is carefully soft and somewhat coquettish, too much so for the subject. These faults, however, escaped the masses, and the impression made by the picture was immense.

In 1816, David expatriated himself and went to Brussels. A law of amnesty condemned him to exile. He was lucky to escape the horrible massacres, equal in bloodiness to those of the Terror, which followed the Restoration. David was more consistent now than in earlier days. He would neither ask pardon nor yield to the earnest request of M. de Humboldt, who offered him, in the name of the King of Prussia, the title of minister of arts at Berlin. The brother of the king himself visited the painter, and wished to take him away in his carriage. "You will paint us," he said, "as you have painted that general," pointing to the magnificent portrait of the Marshal Gerard. The old quondam republican this time persisted in his refusal.

He lived ten years at Brussels, honoured by every one, loaded with favours by the king of the Low Countries and the Prince of Orange, adored by his new pupils, for he stuck to his art to the day of his death. As he was about to die, the consistent old heathen asked for the engraving of "Leonidas." He had it placed before him, looked for some time at it and said, "I am the only man who could have succeeded in conceiving and executing that head." These were his last words. He died on the 29th December, 1825.

The Restoration showed all its petty and mean pitilessness towards David; it carried its revenge even beyond the grave by a refinement of cruelty scarcely to be credited. Despite the earnest supplications of his family, of his friends, of so many illustrious pupils—despite all those speaking witnesses to his fame which dotted the Louvre, the government would neither pardon him alive, nor allow his body to return after death. His coffin was stopped at the frontier with a savage barbarity which raised a cry of indignation over all Europe. The liberal party in France made good use of the circumstance, and Beranger wrote upon the subject one of the most terrible of his songs.

David was great in drawing and in style, as Rubens was great in colour and fancy. If we wished to deny David wholly, we must deny the whole French school; the distinctive characteristic of which is to excel rather in substance than in form. David had nothing original about him as far as the execution is concerned; sometimes he is led away by the touch of Valentine; sometimes he falls into the porcelain and labouredly polished style of Van der Werf; sometimes he takes up the line of Dominichino, whose timid and grayish tones he adopts without warmth and without earnestness. Then, when he grew old and lived in Flanders, he allowed himself to be won by colour: he loved to unite Raffaele and Rubens, and ended by producing his "Mars and Venus."

The great merit of David is the thought, the conception. No French artist has ever had a higher idea of painting, though applying his art to the things of this world, and making the world his all in all. And yet, when we recollect how David was mixed up with the terrible and mighty deeds of the Convention, we wonder at his coldness. One would expect a striking evidence of fiery emotion, dashing colours—and we find tranquil forms, beauties correct as a statue, but as cold; imposing historical personages, motionless as marble. We seek the burning conception of the revolutionist—we find ourselves examining the productions of a solemn legislator.

The fact is, David wanted the vivifying influence of some spiritual faith. He was a mere materialist. Having no belief in Christianity, man became to him a machine with limbs and muscles. Hence his cold and stiff character; hence the want of mind, of soul, in his pictures. The inner man speaks not to us through the eyes: woman is, on his canvas, a mere beautiful animal, beautifully painted. There is no ideality, no poetry, no connecting link between the mere human frame and the speaking, living, thinking thing within. His best picture is "The Death of Socrates;" and here the head we admire is that of the philosopher, whose countenance is lit up as he expounds his theory of the immortality of the soul. David, imbued with the warm and elevating sympathies and the ennobling faith of Christ, would not have been the artist he was; he would have been truly great. His materialism stunted his conceptions and dwarfed his mind.

David had unbounded influence over his pupils. When he entered the workshop every one was silent, and none took the liberty to joke, so much were they impressed by his presence. It is true he was jovial and even familiar in his language, despite his dignity of manner; but his lofty stature, his imposing bearing, his look, and perhaps the remembrance of the terrible part that had been played by the ex-Conventionist, all this intimidated. His face would have been handsome, had its left side not been disfigured by an accident, which had swelled the cheek, and imparted a sidelong expression to the lip, which made him always look harsh and sneering. Though this deformity interfered with his pronunciation, he expressed himself neatly and with precision, like a man who had always moved in enlightened circles. He neither taught his pupils colour nor the manual process, which he disdained. His lessons were confined to teaching the great principles of art, to style, to the study of the antique combined with that of the natural model, and to perspective, which it was necessary, he said, not only to know, but to feel.

Two things will preserve the remembrance of David—his school, and his works. His pictures are certainly his best works. Gros, Girodet, and Gerard, are worth more than the Sabines. The enormous influence he exercised over the character of his era, and that era one of such greatness, will be his first title to glory. This influence was continental, and it transformed and changed nearly every school in Europe. David persuaded the Flemish artists that it was necessary to draw. He it was who persuaded the painters of Rome that pagan art was better than catholic art. In France he did good; he brought back art to something like a serious position; he organised magnificent foires; he brought about a revolution in costume, furniture, ornaments, and decorations. He was the absolute master of the arts.

And, moreover, alongside of that beauty which owes its success to contemporary ideas, there is another, independent of circumstances and fashion, an absolute beauty which is of all countries and of all time. This is to be found in David, when, in presence of the dead body of Lepelletier or of the bath of Marat, he forgot the lessons and teachings of systems to attack frankly nature herself. The painter then will live as long as the chief of the school; and should posterity forget the influence of David, to think only of his personal works, there will still remain in the minds of his countrymen a passionate image, like the "Oath of the Tennis-Court," or a calm, imposing, and sublime idea, like the "Death of Socrates."

A catalogue of the works of David would be very difficult to give; there are, however, certain of his pictures which should be recorded.

When it was nearly finished, the emperor came in suddenly to the atelier of the artist, who had hitherto concealed it from him. He saw this picture at a glance.

"Admirable!" he cried. "I must have that, David."

"Sire, I am sorry; but it is sold—it is an order."

"Paint another; I must have this."

Our views relative to French Art are, to a certain extent, supported by the author of a book which has appeared since the above was written. "The Purple Tints of Paris" * thus describes Art in France: "One of the distinctive characteristics of the French nation is its love of Art. No one can deny that it possesses this in an eminent degree, though, from want of proper calculation, the practical results are not com-

"Sire, I have sold it."

Napoleon, who was extremely passionate, and whose passion sometimes made him do little things, raised his foot in an instant of ungovernable rage, and put it through the canvas. He then walked away, leaving the amazed artist to gaze at the ruin of his admirable painting.

Next morning David was sent for to join the emperor's breakfast-table. Not a word was said on the subject of the previous day's discussion; but the manner of the emperor was so gentle, and he took the hand of the artist with so much affection, that David clearly understood that the man apologised, though the crowned head was too proud to allow it.

The picture was re-painted, and is, we believe, still in the possession of the Marquis of Douglas.

mensurate with the strength of the passion—at least, in the higher departments. The Frenchwoman, when she chooses the colour of her dress, and arranges its graceful folds, is an artist—quite as much as the cook or the historical painter. The maître, when he creates a table, a work-box, a vase, a watch, or a brooch, is pre-eminently an artist. Even the lad who displays shawls and muslins in a shop-window has the artistic feeling. It is not surprising, therefore, that the number of persons who apply themselves to drawing, and painting, and sculpture, is immense. In Paris alone there are rather more than six thousand artists, in our sense of the word, of whom one half are amateurs, and the other half gain, or endeavour to gain, a living by their profession. Almost the whole of them have spent several years in the atelier or studio of a master, and have acquired a certain esprit de corps, and a peculiar way of viewing things. The great majority are republicans, more or less fanatical—though some of the most successful gentlemen now affect aristocratic ideas.

“I have hinted that French love of art, in as far as it has to do with patronage, is by no means enlightened. To prove this would take me into a special discussion, and necessitate invidious remarks. I could give instances innumerable to prove that the small class of persons who buy pictures are directed in their choice more by accident than by science, and that the public willingly admires when it is told to admire. The history of the reputation of Prud'hon, now so popular, is a case in point. During his life-time he was only appreciated by a few friends, connoisseurs, but unimportant; and it was only twenty years after his death that he began to be talked of. At present, pictures which would scarcely be sold at all in his life, now fetch thousands of francs, and there is a disposition to overrate him. I know an instance in which an amateur, bewitched, and away it goes, like a pack of hounds after puss, until some other game crosses the track, when it turns aside and leaves the first victim of its enthusiasm astonished, and no doubt rather grieved, at its safety.

“It was not till about the time of the Fronde, that the young nobility of France, sent abroad by their families to travel out of the way of civil dissensions, acquired and brought home a real admiration for art. Some fifty gentlemen, with means and leisure at their disposal, began then to praise and buy pictures, and encourage genius to do its best. Then taste was, perhaps, never very refined. At any rate it rapidly deteriorated. Yet, up to the revolution, there was a constant, and, to a certain extent, enlightened patronage of art. A little previously, the wealthy bourgeoisie, more from imitation than any other cause, had begun to purchase pictures, and try to understand their beauties. Probably, had things remained who spoke with contempt of a now well-known painter, was rebuked severely by a critic, and was possessed, six months afterwards, of pieces by that very hand to the value of eight hundred pounds. A more singular case of the same kind would require the mention of individuals now living; but perhaps this sort of thing is sufficiently common all the world over to enable the reader to understand what must be its manifestations where it exists in an excessive degree.

“I compare the growth of a reputation, artistic or literary, in France, to the progress of the Giaour in ‘Vathek,’ who, after he has been kicked from the steps of the throne, rolls himself into a ball, and by some unaccountable attraction draws after him the deadly-eyed prince, Carathis, the war minister, the courtiers, the people—even the halt and the infirm. By some accident, one or two amateurs become convinced, with or without reason, that a man has genius, and begin running after him. Very soon the whole country is quiet, the education of their taste would have been successful; but time was not allowed them, and they were left heirs of a fashion instead of a science. They, as well as the people at large, had an intuitive veneration of art—though more as a name than as a thing. It was their impression that art was a great and beautiful manifestation of the mind, and they endeavoured, with less success than might have been wished, to appreciate its productions. France, therefore, possesses a wealthy middle class, really disposed to hail and reward the genuine artist, but without the power of recognising him when he appears. This accounts for so many sudden and ephemeral reputations. The bourgeoisie are conscientiously on the look-out for great men, and are easily deceived into supposing they have found them. Under such circumstances, we need not wonder that intrigue and quackery are almost necessary to whomsoever desires to succeed.

despise the bourgeois feeling, and those who truckle to it. One of their number is excommunicated because he did not insult a grocer who exclaimed, "Your picture is a masterpiece; but I cannot buy it, for it is six inches too wide." Another is accused of selling for two hundred francs what he had previously asked a thousand for. In truth, however, all the really professional men are obliged to be tolerably condescending to the ignorance and indelicacy with which they have to deal, and revenge themselves when alone by pasquinade and satire."

This is a very correct representation of the state of affairs in Paris. As we are on the subject of modern art, a few more extracts may be interesting. The same writer says: "Many young French painters affect an originality in their manner which they have not in their mind. Would-be men of genius are nearly always lazy. They think this one of the most valuable privileges of their character. My friend Basil belonged to this class, except, perhaps, that he had more talent than the world gave him credit for. He lost himself by yielding, to a most ridiculous extent, to that absurd habit of some intellectual men of 'wanting inspiration.' They wait for inspiration sometimes all their lives, and it never comes. The real way is to go and fetch it. Basil did not choose to do so. On one occasion a friend procured him, partly out of charity, an order from the wife of a wealthy banker for a kind of thing in which he excelled—a couple of bouquets in water colours. The money was paid in advance three years ago, and the bouquets are not yet in bloom. He does not intend to defraud her, but 'he wants to produce something excellent.' He is waiting for inspiration. His friends tell him that this seems dishonest. He colours, bites his lip, and says, 'I will set about it,' in a deplorably desponding tone; but he has not put pencil to paper yet. He has no studio of his own, but goes now to one friend's place, now to the other—sometimes with, sometimes without, materials; but upon almost every occasion he thrusts his hands into his shock of hair, and sits down complaining that he has no ideas, no inspiration. As may be imagined, he is often in want of a dinner, and is compelled to sponge upon a friend. He went to one the other day, and in his heavy, lumbering way, said, 'I have got no money, and yet I must eat.'"

David is the original of all these students. He it was gave the tone to the ateliers; it was he made the artist a republican, an eccentric individual, with a broad-brimmed hat and moustaches. It was in his workshop that first appeared the Loustie and the Rapin, thus described:—"The Loustie is generally an artist-amateur, that is to say, his parents have property; they see him some day, when a child, take a piece of chalk or charcoal, and scratch the portrait of his father or his schoolmaster. This is enough. It is at once determined that a great genius has revealed itself. The lad no sooner escapes from college than he is sent to a painter's studio. He is supplied with a handsome sum of money, and becomes very often the Loustie of the atelier; perhaps the most backward in the serious of his art, but clever as a caricaturist, and allowed to take any liberties as a practical joker.

"The Rapin is the servant of the atelier, something equivalent to a fag at a public school. A shabby dress is a necessary part of his definition. Most probably he has an immense bush of hair. He often becomes a clever artist, but no one knows him. His duties are to do all the work of the atelier: to run of errands, to set the model, &c. He often picks up a good deal of knowledge from the conversation of the students, and repeats it in a mysterious manner."

Such are some of the types found in a French atelier of painting—the ateliers of the descendants of the great master Louis David.

JOHN MARTIN.

If this remarkable painter did not receive during his life all his due, it appears at all events likely that now at last, when death has closed upon him, he will be granted the honours of renown and fame in full measure. But even during life John

Martin was admired and popular with a very extensive portion of the community. There was a grandeur, a magnificence about some of his paintings—his "Belshazzar's Feast," his "Crucifixion," and his "Pandemonium"—which struck the eye at once, and caused him to be appreciated. Vast conceptions in architecture have their weight in the eyes of the millions, and his were truly vast. His "Joshua commanding the Sun to stand still" is known everywhere. It has carried his reputation into all quarters, over the whole of continental Europe as well as this island.

And he is dead at last, having at length followed those great contemporaries of his, who divided with him public favour and applause. We, who knew something of him in those days when his drawing-room was the place where men of all kinds, authors, artists, singers, and public favourites in every style, were wont to meet, regret his death much, though aware that for some time past he had been lost to art. It is the more to be regretted, because he has left several admirable pictures unfinished. This had been discovered for some time past, and had caused him to retire to the Isle of Man, where he died a few weeks back.

John Martin was born at Cayden Bridge, near Hexham, Northumberland, on the 19th of July, 1789, and having in his early youth shown a very marked liking for the limner's art, his parents determined on sending him to a coach-builder at Norwich, there to learn the glorious art of heraldic painting. But this did not suit Martin; it was not at all what he aimed at. His ambition was above this; and disgusted and irritated at the drudgery imposed upon him in the coach-builder's employment, he threw up his apprenticeship. He now received some instructions in drawing of a different kind from one Muss, father of a very well-known enamel-painter of the same name, which had been changed from Masso under the impression that to succeed one must have a thorough English name. With these riches, and no other, John Martin started for London in search of fortune.

There have been so many stories told of what poor artists and poor authors have suffered in the upward struggle for fame and competence—for they are never insane enough to dream of wealth—that the reader will not require any minute details on this subject. Whether he dined on a penny loaf, or added to that solid luxury an ounce of beef, or, like the Paris artists out of luck, walked the streets without a dinner, and talked of the fine joint he had dined on, are things we scarcely care to know. Suffice it to say, he steeled himself in the fiery cauldron of genius—poverty, and came from it energetic, vigorous, ready and able to do battle with the world.

He began to gain a living by painting on glass and china, by making water-colour drawings, and also by the thankless task of teaching. But this was the outward and positive life; there was the ideal life too going on. He had already determined in his own mind to be a great artist, and it was at this period that he painted pictures on towels instead of canvas, for want of the more artistic preparation. The long hours of the night, that should have been spent in sleep, were devoted to earnest study, and especially to a deep elaboration of the principles of architecture and perspective—two elements he has used admirably in all his productions.

At last, eager for the fray, he began the battle of life, and came boldly before the world. In the year 1810, having, like most men of any note or success in any walk demanding study and reflection, married early, he painted his oil picture of "Clytie" for the Royal Academy Exhibition of that year. It was, like the first picture of David, in whose life there are points of resemblance with Martin, rejected at first, and then at the opening of the following season accepted, tolerably well hung, and very highly appreciated by good judges. In 1812 his fancy and imagination, those great illuminators of his genius, were very forcibly shown in the production of "Sadak in search of the Waters of Oblivion." This was a genuine development of his peculiar characteristics. "Joshua commanding the Sun to stand still" was a very successful picture, and gained him the £100 medal of the British Institution. In 1819 he became more grand and sublime in his "Fall of Babylon," which was speedily followed by "Macbeth and the Witches." In 1821, however, the whole artistic world was dazzled by the appearance of that gorgeous production, "Belshazzar's Feast," which gained him the £200 prize of the British Institution. It was a glorious picture of a wondrous scene, of which Byron says :

"The king was on his throne,
The satraps throng'd the hall,
And thousand bright lamps shone
O'er that high festival."

The background of enormous, vast, black architecture—on the left the luminous wall, played all over with a strange brilliancy—in the foreground the low tables sumptuously spread, with groups of men and women apparently just disturbed from the attitude of luxurious enjoyment, all with their eyes directed towards the blazing characters which Daniel is about to stand forward and interpret—his austere, prophet-like appearance presenting a striking contrast with the indolent and effeminate personages who encircle the festive board—all combine to form a grand conception, grandly rendered. His "Destruction of Hieronlanum" was less successful. In "The Seventh Plague" he has concentrated all the horrors which afflicted the whole land; and a few groups of men and women, with misery-stricken countenances, may be supposed emblematical of the whole afflicted race. "The Paphian Bower" was not in his style; but "The Creation," in which nature, under the hand of God, seems to grow visibly before us out of the darkness, without form and void, is admirable. In 1826 appeared his well-known painting of "The Deluge." This picture, through the broken light of a tempestuous evening, presents us with the terrible aspect of the earth when the universal flood had just begun to rise. The inhabitants, vainly hoping that it was only an extraordinary inundation, are flying to seek refuge on lofty places. The aged and the sick, the frightened young girls and children, are carried up the rocks by the strong men. The painter here has discriminated philosophically between the various developments of the human character. Here we see heroic self-sacrifice, men hazarding their lives to protect the helpless, women clinging to their children and refusing to leave them, daughters seeking to drag their mothers up almost inaccessible precipices. On the other hand, the interest of self-preservation is illustrated by individuals who in this dreadful hour break all bonds of natural affection, forget all duties, forsake all friends, and fly alone, not caring who may perish, so that they may be saved. The wild and rugged landscape; the stormy and rolling waters, which already threaten the "fenced cities," as though the ocean had broken its bounds; the dark and beetling crags; the confused and terrified multitude, in which they who wear the apparel of princes and queens cling in abject terror to any who may be near them; the clouds rent at intervals by streaks of fire; the night which blackens over all—these elements of the sublime and picturesque are blended into a tableau of the most wonderful interest and power. On a distant mountain-top, the ark seems to rest like a promise of salvation and peace, with a flash of lightning passing harmlessly over it.

"The Fall of Nineveh" resembles in many of its characteristics "The Feast of Belshazzar." Its chief merit consists in the grand proportion of the architecture, and in the artistic disposition of broad and bold masses of light and shadow. The same may be said of "Pandemonium," in which there is a grand series of "blazing cressets" casting a bright glare on innumerable fierce and defiant countenances, upturned to listen to the words of the arch-deceiver and enemy of mankind. The architectural conception is here vast and mighty.

Martin subsequently illustrated Milton, receiving £2,000 for the drawings. He did the same for the Scriptures in a popular edition. He then for several years devoted himself assiduously to those engravings of his own pictures which have so materially added to his reputation. He was earnest and laborious, full of ingenuity and originality, applied new modes of varying the texture and perspective effects of large mezzotinto plates, and thus led the way to a marked and general improvement in this important branch of art.

But while thus at work, he was almost wholly forgotten as a painter, when he revived the memories of the world by his very able picture of "The Coronation of Queen Victoria." His pictures had long hung neglected on his walls; and none but men of science, artists, and authors, went to see them. His long-standing quarrel with the Academy prevented his exhibiting. But now he had the inestimable honour and glory of painting dukes and duchesses, lords and ladies; his royal picture was talked of by the press; and prosperity came once more. It is always held in this country an honour to be painted by an artist who has painted a lord; and as Martin in his "Coronation" had painted not only many lords, but a queen, he found the demand upon his time very great. And yet he did not grow rich. A large family, a position in society to be kept up, a precarious and uncertain income, are things which men with fixed salaries can scarcely comprehend. Poor Martin did, to his cost, and his life was one struggle from the early days of his poverty to the uneasy hours of his death in the Isle of Man. But there is a fact in connexion with his life which must never be forgotten. Nearly all the great schemes for giving London pure water, for a vast sewer to collect the refuse of this vast city, and for other great sanitary purposes, came from our ingenious artist. A writer, who appears more intimately acquainted than we are with his private history, says:—"Notwithstanding the extraordinary amount of industry spent on his pictures and engravings, nearly as much time, and the larger portion of his earnings, were expended on engineering plans for the improvement of London, such as the embankment of the Thames and the drainage of the town; also on the ventilation of mines, light-houses, and the improvement of our harbours. The money he actually expended on those useful and ingenious projects must have exceeded £10,000."

His mind retained its faculties to the very last. He had several very great paintings in hand, which we fear no one can finish for him. They are of the usual character—"The Judgment;" "The Days of Wrath;" and the "Plains of Heaven." Of late years, Martin had fallen into a habit, derived perhaps from Etty, of using one colour too freely; and in one case, a very fine landscape is so blue as to leave the mind in doubt where the earth ends or the cerulean sky begins.

Martin was simple in his habits, independent in his ideas, no worshipper of rank or wealth, and yet he was sought for and respected by the high in place, far more than any toad-eater or parasite of power. His soirées were visited, not only by men of talent and reputation, but by ambassadors and princes; and there it was that, in our childhood, we timidly gazed, for the only time, at the genial countenance of Sir Walter Scott. Martin was much liked by literary men, and owed much of his early pre-eminence to the favourable criticism of the "London Weekly Review," edited by one of the St. Johns. And he died far away on a still little island of the deep, the Isle of Man, where for some time he had gone every year. Here, probably, he gathered fresh from nature many of his magnificent inspirations—his moonlights on the water, his bursting and golden sunlights, so powerfully used by him at times; here too he died, "and," says a local chronicler, "hallowed no doubt in their estimation will ever be the place of his sepulchre, where he will repose by the side of some of his departed relatives, in the cemetery on the hill, near the romantic churchyard of Kirk Braddan, one of the spots he admired so much, and loved to visit; and henceforth the deathless name of Martin, associated with that of our lonely isle—like the great Napoleon's, linked with St. Helena—will invest it with an interest and celebrity which will endure to the end of time; and we may truly predict, that strangers from all parts of Europe, landing on these shores, will, like pilgrims journeying to some far-famed distant shrine, visit the grave of Martin, and pay 'the sacred tribute of a tear' to the memory of immortal genius and sterling virtue."

Allowing for the enthusiasm of a friend and admirer, there is some truth doubtless in this; and it is pleasing, at all events, to think, that genius is remembered by man, when the spirit that vivified is gone, and the body slumbers in the grave.

BARTOLOMEO ESTEBAN MURILLO.

With Murillo we are about to take a view of creation, and to soar through the universe, not only as it was fashioned by the Creator, but such as the imagination of man has peopled it beyond its outward and visible form. The stern realities of life under all its humblest and yet most picturesque aspects, in contrast with the beings of imagination arrayed in their gentlest expression; on the one hand the thick shadows of our earthly atmosphere, and on the other the ethereal brightness of the heavens; here the pure and graceful beauty of incorporeal Seraphim, and there the squalor of the mendicant in hostile collision with the miseries of want, dirt, and disease; at once every aspect of life, and every accident of light, whether transfusing miraculously the celestial regions or shed upon the earth, giving life and vivacity to figures and landscape—all these lie within the rich domain of Murillo's art. In his loftiest moments, soaring into the azure expanse of the heavens, his spirit contemplates these luminous abodes wherein the faithful look forward in humble hope to endless and unequalled bliss! his fervid imagination sees floating around the Queen of Heaven gay swarms of infant beings, clothed by his genius with angelic attributes; the air to him is filled with floods of bright Cherubim, lighter than the golden vapours amidst which they frolic, fluttering, soaring, ascending and descending, crossing each other's path, intertwining their celestial forms, calling each other with wreathed smiles, joining hands in a living garland of joyous flowers, floating on the breeze and sporting in the sunbeam. The two elements which contend for the mastery of human life—reality and idealism, imagination and good sense—have been wonderfully combined by Murillo. Resembling in this the author of Don Quixote, he has been by turns thoughtful like the hero of La Mancha, and familiar and grotesque like Sancho. There is not a phase of existence, not an emotion of the soul, from the sublime impulse of ecstasy down to the eagerness of sensuality, which Murillo has not attempted to portray, and with him to attempt was to succeed. He closely studied the innumerable attitudes of the human frame, those assumed by pride or commanded by dignity, as well as those which spring from carelessness, idleness, or accident. Through angels, men, animals, trees, verdure, sea, and sky, he has traversed from one end to the other the scale of existence—a boundless vista, which, like the patriarch of old, he saw prolonged in his waking dreams through the glorious regions of paradise.*

He was born at Seville on the 1st of January, 1618, and not at Pilas in 1613, as erroneously stated by Palomino.† The Spaniards, even at that period, called Seville a wonder:

Que non a vista Sevilla,
Non a vista miraviglia,

they exclaimed then as now; and yet the city, which in their pride they found so marvellous, did not at that time contain the masterpieces of Murillo. The first master of the great colourist was Juan del Castillo, his uncle, who, being a disciple of the Florentine school, was, according to Bermudez, hard and dry in his colouring; but, on the other hand, a chaste and severe draughtsman, and calculated to form good pupils. Murillo learnt without difficulty all that was taught him, until his master having gone to establish himself at Cadiz, he felt himself very much out of his element at Seville; a simple scholar, uncertain of his way, and a prey to the indecision of early youth. In the mean time he employed himself in painting, to sell at the fair of Seville,‡ a stock of pictures, una partida de pinturas, the mercantile name which was given to a considerable branch of commerce between Spain and her American colonies, and as a colourer of flags and banners for the gorgeous processions of the church. Such was the humble beginning of Murillo; and if this employment inured the young painter to the difficulties of execution, and reduced the crudeness of his colouring, it raised him but little in the social scale above the workman.

Happily, however, a fellow-student of Murillo's, whom he had known in the studio of Juan del Castillo, arrived at this juncture at Seville. This young artist was Pedro de Moya, just returned from London, where he had studied under Vandyck. Passionately devoted to the style of the Flemish painter, Moya had made himself master of his learned and agreeable method; and as the manner of Vandyck was as yet unknown at Seville, its novelty created universal astonishment. To Murillo, above all, the sight of Moya's works was quite a revelation. He immediately felt how dangerous, how hard, and how contrary to nature was the practice of giving exaggerated importance to outline; and understood how the atmosphere, embracing all forms, blends some, assists the modelling of others, and subdues all. Thus a new horizon opened to his view; he felt a wish to travel, to go to Italy, to Venice, to the Low Countries, wherever his genius might have a chance of developing itself; and if Moya had not acquainted him with the recent death of Vandyck, he would have embarked for England. What to do without fortune, however, was now the question, for he could not heedlessly undertake such long and expensive journeys. The genius of Murillo at length furnished him with resources; he purchased a large quantity of canvas, divided it into squares of various sizes, which he primed and prepared with his own hands, and set to work to paint rapidly everything that his fancy dictated—Madonnas, devotional subjects, flowers, landscapes; * monks in one place, objects of still life in another;—he then sold his cargo to a shipowner, and thus furnished with some money, without acquainting his family or taking leave of any one, he departed for Madrid, where he arrived safely when scarcely twenty-five years old.

* Captain Bold, in his interesting "History of the Spanish School of Painting," thus sums up the characteristics of Murillo's style: "He is celebrated for the originality of his treatment and invention, the gracefully flowing character of his draperies, and the simplicity, the perfect nature and unaffected grace which distinguish his figures; consequently his subjects seldom fail to interest the most fastidious critic: human affections in all their variety, charity under all its forms, religion with all its fervour, love, and benevolence, were never more beautifully blended or correctly delineated; and had he possessed the advantages of a classical education, and a more intimate acquaintance with the antique, so as to have improved himself in the beau-idealism as well as the philosophy of the art, I have no doubt he would have transcended even the mighty Raphael."

† This error has been pointed out by Cean Bermudez, who procured at Seville the certificate of Murillo's baptism. Vide the "Diccionario Historico de los mas ilustres Profesores de las Bellas Artes en Espana." Madrid, 1809.

Velasquez was then in high favour at the court. A personal friend of the king of Spain, and an officer of his palace, he, nevertheless, received his young countryman most graciously; and, through the influence of one of the familiars of Philip IV., Murillo saw the doors of the palace of Madrid, of the monastery of the Escorial, of all the royal residences, of all the galleries, and all the museums, opened to him. In presence of the Rubens' and Titian's with which the royal residences were resplendent, the young painter forgot his travelling project. What occasion, in fact, had he now to go to Italy? Had he not unfolded in his gaze all that could enrapture the colourist in embryo, and even pictures of that Vandyck, already so much admired, though known only through the imitations of Moya?

It was, therefore, without quitting the apartments of the Cierzo and of the Escorial, under the eyes of Velasquez,† and with his friendly counsel, that Murillo accomplished the journey which he had projected into the regions of true colouring. About three years were employed by him in copying, as a student, the paintings of the great masters, and, above all, those of the Venetians and Flemings; but that nothing might be neglected, he also drew from the antique and the living model, while Velasquez, who had arrived at perfection in his fascinating style, familiarised him with the love of a faithful rendering of nature, the taste for pure truth, and the illusions of aerial perspective.

Joachim Sandiart, and some Italian authors, relate that Murillo visited America in his youth. These writers have been misinformed, and assert of Murillo that which was only true with respect to his illuminated squares of canvas, and his son Gaspard Esteban Murillo. They have evidently felt a difficulty in believing that a painter of such consummate ability could have arrived at such excellence without visiting the classic land of art. They have, accordingly, stated that Murillo, on his return from America, travelled in Italy; but, as a Spanish author‡ pointedly remarks, "Is it probable that such a journey would have remained unknown to so many of Murillo's intimate friends, who, in fact, never heard it mentioned except in books, although it is proverbial how closely

* "Compro una porcion de lienzo; la dividio en muchos quadros; los imprimo por su mano, y pinto en ellos asuntos de devocion."—Cean Bermudez, ubi supra, vol. ii., p. 49.

† "Velasquez, probably, little thought that the needy young man, whom he then patronised, was destined to acquire a name, and to execute works which would be more popular and more widely known than his own."—"A Handbook of the History of the Spanish and French Schools of Painting," by Sir Edmund Head, Bart. the lives of illustrious men are observed, known, and scanned, even in the minutie of their most trifling details?"* It is, however, certain, that Murillo, on his return to Seville, in 1645, painted for the little cloister of the convent of St. Francis pictures which attracted universal notice. It was no longer merely the style of Vandyck, such as Moya had imported it into Seville nearly three years before, but a surprising combination of all the different styles which Murillo had so profoundly studied when at Madrid, or at the Escorial, where he had copied successively the paintings of Rubens, of Titian, of Vandyck, of Ribera, and of Velasquez. No originality was yet to be traced in this singular fusion, in which the fiery splendour of Rubens was tempered by the gravity of Titian, or the graceful elegance of Anthony Vandyck mitigated the savage emphasis of Spagnoletto. Here and there, in spite of this blending, the pencil of the imitator more visibly betrayed each of the masters whom he had by turns admired. Thus, "Angels appearing to a Saint in Ecstasy" recalled the powerful contrasts of Ribera; his splendid picture of "The Death of Santa Clara" seemed a reminiscence of Vandyck, from the expressions of the head, the freshness of the carnations, and the correct drawing of the extremities. Finally, his "St. James ministering to the Poor" betrayed the direct influence of Velasquez. When the moment had arrived for exhibiting his own genius and a consciousness of his own powers, Murillo offered nothing but a happy selection from others; but through this appearance of imitation, however, the greatness of the master began to show itself.

Murillo took very good care never to show the feet of the Virgin when he painted her ascending towards heaven in the midst of a dazzling glory. He was apprehensive of conjuring up a profane thought at the sight of divine charms; this little morsel of nudity, which was not even remarked at Rome, would have been offensive in Andalusia. In spite of these pious precautions, however, the Virgins of Murillo are far from possessing those attributes of virgin beauty which the faith requires. Their luxuriant hair, their dark and humid eyes, inspire other ideas than those of divine transport; and, if they are represented as devoting themselves to household affairs, it is seldom otherwise than as mothers with plump hands, whom the cares of life have not robbed of the roseate hues of the carnation; but, by way of amends, Murillo has impressed upon the Son of Mary a character truly super-human. We fancy we see around the head of this infant a halo of glory, which needs no material representation. His beautiful head is lit up with intelligence; His glance open and penetrating, at once vivid and gentle, emits rays of genius; and He looks so great, even in the tranquillity of sleep, that we feel, as it were, conscious of the presence of a God. Everything around, even to the vulgar visage of the carpenter and the worldly figure of Mary, enhances the distinction of the infant, and indicates the divinity that moves within Him. The details of humble life, in the midst of which the infant Christ was brought up, add still further to the effect; and they serve as a contrast to the inherent nobility of soul, which perhaps would not exhibit so much character in another medium, for it appears to us singularly heightened even by the trivial accessories which surround it. "With Raffaella," it has been well said by a French critic,† "the Virgin is superlatively virgin; with Murillo the infant Jesus is really divine."

Let us follow for a while, as we walk through a celebrated gallery, or even as we turn over the engraved works of Murillo,—let us follow out the history of this young girl of lowly birth, the companion of that careless beggar-boy of whom we have already given a representation.‡ Here we see her on her mother's knee, while her matted locks are being combed, uttering cries which attract the notice of the dog of the house; as a child yonder under the trees, at the bottom of a prettily laid-out garden, she is amusing herself with some birds for which she has made a nest in her basket, or with the flowers she has gathered in her lap. At a later period, grown up, formed, and henceforth capable of inspiring and of feeling the tender passion, we see her stationed at her window, and fixing we know not on whom a bold look; leaning out anorously, her shoulders bare, and her hair parted at the corner of her forehead after the fashion of the students, she monopolises all the light, leaving in the half tint of the middle distance a duenna duly old and ill-favoured, thus bringing forward her own youth by this background of ugliness. But how is this? Unless our eyes deceive us, it is still the same who, doubtless converted, pardoned, and become by dint of repentance "Santa Rosa de Lima," holds a rose in her hand, and offers up her heart to the infant Jesus, perched upon the stem of the flower in the form of a humming-bird.

Contrast is the mainspring of Spanish art. Thus we have seen in our own days the French romantic school, based upon contrast, turn its first glance towards the land of Murillo and of Cervantes. From Hernani to Ruy Blas, it is Spain that has furnished the wardrobes of our literary colourists with their rags and their doublets, the silken basquine of the duchess and the tattered mantle of Don Cesar. No one has more frequently or more happily made use of contrast than Murillo. We do not thereby mean those abrupt oppositions of light and shade such as the terrible Ribera affected. Contrast with Murillo shone forth in the philosophy of the picture by the unexpected approximation of its different qualities, and by the antithesis of thoughts or of character. That he might not come into collision at once with mind and sight, Murillo, contrary to the practice of Spagnoletto, placed the dualism in the action, and the unity in the chiaroscuro,—the contrast being addressed to the mind, and the harmony to the eye. When he had attained the final perfection of his talent, he was commissioned, about 1670, to paint some large pictures for the church of La Charité, in which his subject and his genius were wonderfully well matched. He had to illustrate precisely the two extremes which are drawn together by religion and united by Christian charity,—luxury and destitution, rags and satin, ruddy health and wan disease. Fortunately he lived in the classic city of mendicants,—the blind, the paralytic, the one-handed, the lame, and the victims of scurvy and leprosy. All these models he had encountered simply in walking through the streets of Seville—a huge out-of-door hospital.*

But with what flexibility, what richness, what facile genius has he not executed his task! How can we enumerate, how describe in succession, so many pictures, varied in character, touching and sublime: "The Prodigal Son," "The Miracle of the Loaves and Fishes," "St. Elizabeth of Hungary," "The Paralytic at the Piscina,"† and all those miracles of evangelical charity reproduced by miracles of colour? Cast your eyes on that multitude that Murillo has painted in "the Miracle of the Loaves and Fishes," as numerous as it is represented in Holy Writ. "If Christ has fed five thousand men with five barley loaves and two small fishes," says M. Thoré, "Murillo has painted five thousand men on a space of twenty-six square feet." In truth, there is not one less than five thousand; it is an endless multitude of women and children, of old and young, a host of heads and arms which move with ease, without confusion, without inconvenience, without tumult; all gaze upon Christ in the midst of His disciples, and Christ blesses the loaves, and the miracle is wrought! Sublime signal of fraternity amongst men! mag-

We might be almost tempted to imagine that the picture composed itself, and to look upon it as a fortuitous piece of accident. The groups, however, are well arranged, and if sometimes the different parts are not duly balanced, as may be remarked in the "Saint Philip," formerly in Marshal Soult's gallery, it will be found to be a rare exception. Without doubt there are learned and profound painters who have possessed the talent of interesting the spectator by the occult equilibrium of the different groups which compose their pictures: they know that a man of taste will find a charm in the discovery of an effect, the law of which is a

The Prodigal himself is pale and exhausted without being disfigured,—the very image of his heart, which is withered, not degraded. There he stands divided between the shame of his recollections and the sweetness of his pardon. What consummate knowledge of the human heart! What philosophy! and how impressive and agreeable is the execution, in perfect harmony with the sentiment that pervades the scene. The colours are lively, the touch facile; it seems as if nature herself participated in the feast of this family, and shared in their joy; for "the splendour of a beautiful day smiles upon them," as Montaigne observes.

Only with such a temperament that we can possess the happy faculty of having a keen appreciation of the beautiful. He lived in friendly intimacy with Iriarte, an excellent landscape-painter, who, according to Murillo himself, painted landscape by divine inspiration.* Iriarte executed the backgrounds of Murillo's pictures, in which he introduced fine trees with light foliage, and smiling or overcast scenes in accordance with the subject, limpid waters and airy distances, which agreed perfectly with the intention of the master. Murillo, in turn, enriched the landscapes of Iriarte with beautiful figures. They possessed together more than double the talent required to paint a chef-d'œuvre. They differed one day on the trivial question as to which of them should commence a picture ordered of the landscape-painter by an amateur, who calculated on the alliance of the two friends. Murillo, in a moment of ill-humour, seized his palette, and painted at one sitting both the landscape and the figures in a manner that enchanted the purchaser, who discovered in him what he never expected—a new artist, an admirable landscape-painter. A similar incident is said to have occurred in the life of Rubens.

All Paris has seen in the gallery of M. Aguado, and in the Spanish museum of the Louvre, some landscapes of Murillo. They are composed in the style of Rubens, with breadth and in broad masses. Moreover, he generally made them subordinate to the more important branch of figure-painting, and the scene was then merely an harmonious accompaniment, or an invitation to the realms of poesy. We recollect that one of the pictures before which the spectator remained the longest, in the gallery of the fortunate marquis, was that of "Jacob's Dream of the Ladder." In a dreary country, in the night-time, within a few paces of a ruin, on the borders of a piece of still water, a traveller has thrown upon the ground his gourd, his wallet, and his stick, and has fallen asleep. The dream of the son of Abraham is represented in this landscape by one who knew how to give material embodiment to the subtlest visions of the mind. On the head of the dreamer appears a luminous ladder which rises up to heaven; two rows of Seraphim, scarcely touching the steps of this imaginary pathway, mount up towards the Eternal, and descend to communicate in whispers with the sleeping traveller. The landscape is profoundly tranquil; not a breath of air stirs the summits of the trees or the surface of the lake; no other noise is heard than the mysterious rustling of the Seraph's wings.

In 1812, M. Denon, Director-General of the Museums of France, exhibited at the Louvre the Spanish pictures constituting a portion of the spoils of the French army. The astonished public looked on these painters with wondering eyes, and, accustomed to the mythological style of the Empire, understood very little of Murillo. Some artists found him feeble, and M. Denon did not appear to take any further interest in the matter. Zurbaran had been placed on the peristyle of the building, and visitors stopped on the steps of the Louvre to gaze on his terrible monks. It was an age of romance, as Madame de Staël observes, that could understand the beauties of chivalry and Christianity. And yet, amongst these pictures exhibited for the first time at Paris, there was one which was always considered the chef-d'œuvre of its author—"St. Elizabeth of Hungary,"† and which must be pronounced to be the most perfect of his works, did not competent judges yield the preference to "The Miracle of the Roman Gentleman." Our readers will feel indebted to us for reproducing here the fine description which M. Viardot has given of the "St. Elizabeth:"—"This subject has wonderfully united the two opposite extremes of Murillo's style,—the squalid, ragged, and verminous misery of his little beggars, and the noble, simple, and sublime grandeur of his saints. From this also springs the charm of a perpetual contrast and a lofty moral. This palace converted into an hospital; on one side these ladies of the court, beautiful, fresh, and highly adorned; on the other, those children, miserable, poor, and rickety, who are scratching themselves and tearing their breasts with their nails, without clothes upon their bodies or hair upon their heads; this palsy-stricken wretch borne upon crutches, this old man who exhibits the sores upon his legs; this old woman cowering down, whose emaciated profile is defined so forcibly against a skirt of black velvet; on one side the brilliant graces of luxury and health, on the other the hideous harpies attendant on poverty and disease; and in the midst of these extremes of humanity, divine charity, which draws them together in the bonds of peace. A young and lovely female, who, over the veil of a nun, wears the crown of a queen, tenderly sponges the scald head of a child covered with leprosy, holding over him the silver water-vase. Her white hands seem to shrink from the work which her heart prompts her to perform; her lips tremble with loathing at the same moment that her eyes are suffused with tears. But pity conquers disgust, and religion triumphs,—that divine faith which bids us love our neighbour as ourselves."*

Velasquez was the painter of nature, Murillo the painter of religion. He combined with a feeling of reality all the poetry that can enter the soul of a believer. Pious even to godliness, he loved to give himself up to religious reveries, in some corner of those catholic churches, which, even in midday, are plunged in dim religious light. During a visit he made to Cadiz, to paint there "The Marriage of St. Catherine" for the high altar of the Capuchins, he hurt himself dangerously by falling from his scaffolding; and not daring, through an excess of modesty, to make known the nature of the injury he had sustained (rupture), he became a prey to the most excruciating pains †. While his pupil Meneses Osorio finished the painting for the grand altar, Murillo, being brought back to Seville, passed the rest of his life in suffering and in prayer. Towards the latter period of his existence he caused himself to be carried every day to the church of Santa Cruz, and was accustomed to pray before the famous "Descent from the Cross" of Pedro Campaña. It is related, that the sacristan being desirous one evening of closing the doors earlier than usual, demanded of Murillo why he remained so long motionless in that chapel. "I am waiting," replied the painter, "till those men have brought the body of our Blessed Lord down the ladder." ‡. Feeling that his end was approaching, he drew up his will, in which he expressed a wish to be interred at the foot of Campaña's picture, which was religiously complied with. He died on the 3rd of April, 1682, in the arms of Pedro Nuñez de Villavicencio, knight of the order of St. John, who had been his intimate friend, and who was, with Tobar

* We have read in a Spanish journal a detailed description—a very able one—of the "St. Elizabeth of Hungary." The colours of the picture are indicated. One of the queen's ladies is dressed in a silk tunic of ultramarine, with sleeves of a reddish violet (carmesi amoratado). The one who carries the basin of medicaments and the lint has an under tunic of white, over which is another of lilac. The queen wears the widow's black mantle trimmed with the fur of the marten, and under it a linen tunic. This Spanish journal, "El Artista," was edited by men of great learning and admirable taste—Messieurs Ochoa, Cardenera, and De Modrazo. Unfortunately, Spain has doubtless not had leisure to devote to art, and this journal, with a circulation of five hundred, was discontinued after the third volume. A complete set could not perhaps be found at present, the love of collecting being very rare with the Spaniards. We are indebted to M. Taylor for the obliging communication of the only copy in his possession.

and Meneses Osorio, one of his best pupils.* From Murillo have proceeded all the painters of Seville whose histories we propose to write. It was he who founded a public academy of design in his native city, and procured with great difficulty the co-operation of the professors Herrera, Vales, and Iriarte. He presided over it, and went there to teach the pupils the study of the living model. After placing the model in position himself, he explained to them the attitude, the proportions, and the anatomy.†

The truly extraordinary qualities of Murillo are fecundity, flexibility, and marvellous aptitude for painting everything—the heavens, the earth, tatters, and Cherubim. As we walk through the rooms of the Spanish museum of the Louvre, we are astonished at the marvellous flexibility of such a colourist. Sometimes he is grave and restrained, as in the full-length portrait of the cold inquisitor, “Don Adreas de Andrade;” at others we unexpectedly meet with the effects of a Rembrandt, and golden colouring,—such, for instance, as we recognise in the superb sketch of “St. Thomas of Villanueva.” ‡ Sometimes his style melts away even to effeminacy, but more generally he is vapoury. It is, perhaps, dangerous to copy Murillo; too readily the artist might sink into inanition of expression in exaggerating the modelling of his subject, or contract a mannerism of execution from which his original escapes, thanks to the charm and brilliancy of its colouring. If, however, there may be danger in copying Murillo, there can be none in admiring him, fearlessly, unreservedly, under a thousand varied aspects,—and especially when in his graceful mood. How, for instance, can we refrain from feeling deeply and tenderly his exquisite “Virgin of the Child;” § (p. 313.) In that picture the angelic choir swell their hymns of praise to that celestial Infant, whose deep, black, thoughtful eyes reflect the heavenly peace and harmony of their strain.

The gentle genius of Murillo ever leans to sweetness, ever beams with calm but piercing light. Religion, in his pictures, loses all her dread and awful aspect. She reveals herself only to the faithful, overflowing with grace and mercy, still glowing with the rays of the Sun that shone on Paradise. While Ribera appreciated only her mysterious, threatening, sinister, and sombre side, to Murillo she manifested herself in mercy, in tenderness, and in the glories of a dread sublimity.

Esteban Murillo has left a great number of pictures, which, previously to the wars of the Empire, were nearly all in the churches and convents of Spain at Madrid, at Seville, at Cadiz, at Granada, at Cordova, &c. &c.

Previously to this period the works of this celebrated painter were scarcely known in other parts of Europe. Nevertheless, the few which had found their way into France had their fond admirers and realised high prices. Since then royal collectors have contended for the honour of opening the doors of their museums to the productions of him who has been justly called the prince of Spanish painters.

We now proceed to draw up a brief catalogue of the works

* His funeral was celebrated with great pomp, the bier being borne, says Joachim Sandrart, by two marquises and five knights, and attended by a great concourse of people of all ranks, who admired and esteemed the great painter. By his own desire, his grave was covered with a stone slab, on which was carved his name, a skeleton, and these two words—VIVA MURILLOS.—Ibid. “Annals of the Artists of Spain,” by William Stirling, M.A., vol. ii, p. 888.

† Murillo was of the most kind, honourable, and amiable disposition, mild, unassuming, and virtuous; consequently was universally regretted, and proved an irreparable loss to the school of Seville, which thenceforth declined into the most corrupt mannerism.—“The History of the Spanish School of Painting,” by Captain Bold, p. 93. London, Moyes and Barclay, 1743.

§ This picture is known in Spain as “La Virgen de la Faja,” and in France as “La Vierge à la Ceinture.”

of the painter, in the public galleries of Europe, promising that we shall only enumerate those most worthy of the attention of amateurs. To commence with the artist's own country:

The Royal Museum at Madrid, so rich in pictures of all schools, although of great creation, contains forty-six important works of Murillo. Setting aside his portraits, his allegorical compositions, and the series of pictures representing the adventures of the “Paralid Son,” the following may be noticed:—“The Holy Family,” our Lord, as child, with a goldfinch in his hand, plays with a dog, while the Virgin and St. Joseph, the one spinning and the other plucking a bird, assist from their work to look at him. In this unfinished picture takes its name of “El Pajarito.” “The Adoration of the Shepherds,” “Our Lord in His Childhood as the Good Shepherd,” “Our Lord and St. John the Baptist,” the first giving the second water out of a shell, and therefore known as “Los Niños de la Concha,” (the children of the shell). “The Martyrdom of St. Andrew the Apostle at Patras,” “Two Ascensionists,” “St. Bernard fed with milk from the bosom of the Virgin,” who appears to him with the infant Saviour. “The Ecstasy of St. Francis” (p. 312). “St. Ildefonso, Archbishop of Toledo,” invested with the holy chasuble by the Virgin, in his cathedral.

The National Museum, of the same city, though less rich in the masterpieces of Murillo than the Museo del Rey, still contains some of his most remarkable compositions:—A “St. Ferdinand,” A “St. Francis de Paula,” full length, life size. And finally, “The Porciuncula,” Our Lord and the Virgin appearing to St. Francis of Assisi in his cavern in Mount Alvernum, formerly the altar-piece of the church of the Capuchins at Seville; an immense picture, figures life size.

The Royal Academy of San Fernando possesses some of the noblest masterpieces of Murillo. “The Resurrection of our Lord,” painted for the chapel of La Espiracion, in the convent of Mercy (now the museum) at Seville. “The Dream of the Roman Senator and his Wife,” and the “Roman Senator and his Wife telling their dream to Pope Liberius,” Companion-piece for the above, and painted for the same church. Sta. Maria la Blanca at Seville. These two marvellous pictures are generally called “Los medios Puntos” of Murillo. But the Royal Academy of San Fernando possesses a still more astounding picture, that of “St. Elizabeth of Hungary,” described in page 310. The three last-mentioned works were carried to Paris when the Emperor Napoleon collected at the Louvre the richest spoils of Italy, Flanders, and Spain.

Notwithstanding the glorious works we have enumerated, it is not perhaps Madrid that his chief pictures are to be found. Seville, in which he had possessed “Moses striking the rock in Horeb,” of which Mr. Stirling, in his “Annals of the Artists of Spain,” observes, “that as a composition this wonderful picture can hardly be surpassed,” “The Miracle of the Leaves on a Fish,” and “St. Anthony of Padua.”

The Museum of the Louvre. Previously to the fall of Louis Philippe, the Louvre possessed, in the collection bequeathed to his Majesty by an English gentleman, Mr. Frank Hall Stanfield, fourteen pictures by Murillo, among which may be enumerated:—“Portrait of Murillo,” bought in the Count de Maule at Cadiz; and “Our Woman seated,” called the mistress of Murillo, but apparently a slender evidence; it bears the date 1675, and various incidents in the life of the Prodigal Son. In the Galería Española, or the Louvre, purchased in Spain for the King by Barthelemy, there were thirty-eight pictures by Murillo, comprising “La Virgen de la Ceinture,” formerly entitled by the family of the Count of Aguilón at Seville, from whom it was bought for 25,000*l.* was, or about 5,000*l.* “St. Augustine receiving alms from our Lord,” “St. Bonaventura, writing his Memoirs after Death,” “St. Dominic of Alcala,” p. 310, and “Marble in His Youth,” formerly in the collection of Don Bernabé Iriarte at Madrid.

After the Revolution of 1818, these were withdrawn from the Louvre, which now contains only seven pictures by Murillo:—“The Virgin of the Rosary,” with the infant Saviour on her lap; full length, life size, called “La Vierge au Chapelet." "The Virgin of the Immaculate Conception," attended by angels, and adored by three ecclesiastics; painted in 1656, or 1657, for the church of Santa Maria la Blanca, at Seville. "The Holy Family"—The Virgin and Joseph, seven pictures, some of which are of great celebrity, the French government have just added, "The Conception of the Virgin," supported and attended by thirty cherubs; painted in 1678, for the church of Los Venerables, at Seville. For with the Saviour, as a child, between them, all standing; in glory above appear the Eternal Father, the mystic Dove, two angels, and a multitude of cherubs. "St. Augustine with a Child, on the sea-shore." "The youthful Mendicant." "A Flagellation." "Christ on the Mount of Olives." To these this masterpiece, the enormous sum of £21,612 was paid at the recent sale of the collection of Marshal Soult, Duke of Dalmatia.

The National Gallery possesses three paintings by Murillo: "The Holy Family;" the Saviour, as a child, standing between the Virgin and Joseph, and the Holy Ghost descending upon them from the Eternal Father, who appears in the clouds above. One of Murillo's latest works, and it was purchased, together with Rubens' "Braz a serpent" (No. 59), in 1837, for £7,370. "Peasant Boy looking out of a Window." Formerly in the collection of the Marquis of Painted for the Marquis of Pedrosa, at Cadiz; it was valued, says Cean Bermudez, in 1738, amongst the effects of the family, at 800 pesos, of 15 reals, or 600 crowns, equal to about £140. Brought to England after the War of Independence,

Lansdowne, and presented in 1826 to the nation by M. Zachary, Esq. "St. John the Baptist, as a Child, with a Lamb." Formerly in the Lassay, Presle, and Robit collections, at Paris; bought from the latter by the late Sir Simon Clarke, to whom it was valued, with its companion, "The Good Shepherd," at 1,000 guineas, and purchased at the sale of his pictures in 1810, for £2,100. Full length, life size.

At Hampton Court, in the Queen's audience-chamber, there is a "Portrait of Don Carlos of Spain," when a boy of four years old; dated 1665; he was, therefore, king of Spain when this was painted. Full length. And in the Queen's Gallery, "A Boy paring Fruit."

Dulwich Gallery.—This remarkable and varied collection contains twelve of Murillo's works of excellent selection. Amongst them are comprised:—"The Meeting of Jacob and Rachel;" background, a pastoral landscape. "The Virgin of the Immaculate Conception;" small. "The Virgin of the Rosary" ("Madonna del Rosario") with the infant Saviour on her lap; enthroned on clouds and supported by four cherubs; figures life size. "The Adoration of the Magi;" a composition of eleven small figures. "Our Lord on the Cross." "Three ragged Boys;" one of them a Negro, who appears to be begging for a share of a cake in the hands of one of the others; figures full length, life size. "Two ragged Boys;" one standing munching bread, and the other seated, and apparently inviting him to play at chuck-farthing; figures full length, life size. "The Flower Girl;" a girl with a turban, decked with a rose, and holding flowers in the end of her scarf. Formerly in the cabinet of M. Randon de Boissy, whence it was sold for 900 louis to M. de Calonne, at whose sale M. Desenfans purchased it for £640.

The Imperial Gallery in the Belvedere Palace at Vienna has only one picture by Murillo, "St. John the Baptist," as a child, with a cross of reed in his hand, and a lamb by his side, landscape background; full length, life size.

The Pinakothek of Munich is richer in Murillo's, of which it possesses seven: viz., "St. Francis healing a Cripple at the door of a Church;" in the background stand two Franciscan friars. "Two Boys seated on the Ground," one eating grapes, and the other a water-melon. "Two Boys throwing Dice;" a third, with a dog, stands by, eating bread. "Two Boys eating Bread and Fruit," with a dog by their side. "Four Boys, two of them playing Cards," at the door of a hut. "An Old Woman picking Vermin from the Head of a Boy," supporting his head on her lap, while he feeds his dog with a crust. "A Girl sitting on a Stone," pays for fruit out of a boy's basket.

The Royal Gallery of Dresden has two works of Murillo: "The Virgin, looking up to Heaven," with the infant Saviour in her lap; and "A Girl with a Basket of Fruit," counting the money which has been paid by a boy.

Next to Spain, Russia is the richest in pictures of Murillo. The Imperial Gallery in the Palace of the Hermitage contains between twenty-five and thirty, a portion of which came from the Houghton collection. Amongst these we may enumerate the following:—"Jacob's Dream of the Ladder," "The Annunciation of the Virgin," "The Assumption of the Virgin." "The Flight of the Holy Family into Egypt;" the Virgin with the infant Saviour in her arms, rides upon an ass, which is led by Joseph; two cherubs hover overhead. "The Flight of the Holy Family into Egypt;" the Virgin attended by two cherubs watches the sleeping Saviour, Joseph standing behind. "The Holy Family;" Joseph stands holding in his arms the infant Saviour, who leans towards His mother; she stretches out her arms to Him in return. "Nativity of our Lord;" the Virgin, lifting the veil which covers the manger, presents to the gaze of the adoring shepherds the divine Babe, from whose body proceeds light. "Our Lord on the Cross," around which stand the Virgin, Mary Magdalene, and St. John. "St. Florian, in a deacon's dress," resting his right hand on a millstone attached to his neck by a cord, and his left on an X-shaped cross; and beside him are St. Dominic and St. Peter the Dominican; in the background, through a grated window, his martyrdom is represented. "Martyrdom of St. Peter the Dominican;" kneeling at his prayers, he is killed by two assassins. "Boy in a red dress," holding a dog by the ear. "Boy with a Basket and a Dog." "Girl in a green and red dress." "A Gentleman dressed in black." To these we have now to add, "Our Lord and St. John the Baptist," as children, with a lamb and a basket of fruit; purchased at the late sale of Marshal Soult for the sum of £2,642; and "St. Peter released from Prison by the Angel," bought for the sum of £6,342 at the same sale.

The Royal Museum at Berlin possesses "St. Anthony of Padua, kneeling," with the infant Saviour in his arms; and "A Cardinal, seated in an Arm-chair."

Thus much for the Public Galleries. The private collections of the continent do not contain many works by Murillo. The principal ones are to be found in the galleries of—Don José de Madrazo, at Madrid; Don Juan de Goyanes, Don J. M. Escazema, and Don Julian Williams, at Seville; Prince Esterhazy, at Vienna; Prince Corsini, at Rome; the Duke of Leuchtenberg, at Munich; Count Portalis, the Marquis de Pastoret, and the Marquis de las Marismas, at Paris.

The private galleries of England can boast of numerous specimens of the great masters; but as it would carry us beyond our limits to particularise them, we must content ourselves with giving a list of their principal possessors; referring those interested in the subject to the admirable "Catalogue of Works, executed by and ascribed to Bartolomeo Esteban Murillo," in Stirling's "Annals of the Artists of Spain."

The Duke of Sutherland, the Duke of Wellington, the Duke of Rutland, the Duke of Devonshire, the Duke of Marlborough, the Duke of Bedford; the Marquis of Westminster, the Marquis of Hertford, the Marquis of Lansdowne, the Marquis of Aylesbury, the Marquis of Exeter; the Earl of Radnor, the Earl of Ellesmere, the Earl of Wemyss, the Earl of Elgin, the Earl of Lovelace, the Earl of Clarendon, the Earl of Lonsdale, the Earl of Warwick; Lord Northwick, Lord Heytesbury, Lord Ashburton, Lord Overstone; Sir Francis Baring, Bart., M.P.; Sir W. It may not be without interest to mention the prices realised by the pictures of Murillo at a few of the most celebrated public sales:—

At the sale of the Duke de Choiseul, in 1772, a "Fruit Girl," and a "Boy with a Dog," were sold together for £192.

At the sale of the Prince of Conti, in 1777, "The Good Shepherd with his flock," was sold for £56. "St. Joseph holding in his hand the Infant Saviour," for £64. "The Marriage at Cana," for £362.

At the sale of the Chevalier Erard, in 1832, "The Glorification of the Virgin" was sold for £400, and a "Nativity" for £144.

Not less than fifty-five of Murillo's works were brought to the hammer at the sale of M. Aguado, Marquis de las Marismas, in 1843. Amongst these were—"The Death of Santa Clara," for £760; "The Reception of St. Gil," for £124; "A Madonna," for £112; an "Annunciation," for £108; "The Glorification of the Virgin," for £716; "Santa Justa," for £321; "Children returning from Market," for £202; "A Fish Girl," for £276; and "The Portrait of a Monk," for £162.

1850, "The Assumption of the Virgin" was sold for £3,281; "St. John della Cruz," for £228; and a "Holy Family," for £405.

At the sale of Marshal Soult, Duke of Dalmatia, in May, 1850, fifteen Murillos realised a total sum of £46,530, including expenses:—namely "The Conception of the Virgin," £24,612; "St. Peter released from Prison by the Angel," £6,342; "The Nativity of the Virgin," £3,820; "St. Diego of Alcalá," £3,591; "Our Lord and St. John the Baptist as Children," £2,646; "The Flight of the Holy Family into Egypt," £2,163; "Ravages of the Plague," 810; "The Apotheosis of Philip II., King of Spain," 630; "The Virgin of Sorrows," £445; "St. Anthony of Padua and the Infant Saviour," £428; "Peasant Boys," £378; "St. Peter repenting," £231; "The Glorification of the Virgin," £210; "Crucifixion of our Lord," £130; "A Brigand stopping a Monk," £93.

Murillo has rarely signed his pictures. His "Holy Family" in the Louvre, however, bears the following signature:—

CHAPTER I.

IN one of the most retired quarters of the little town of Correggio, in the middle of the sixteenth century, there lived a poor simple and virtuous family whose existence was hardly known to their neighbours. The father of the family, a hawker by trade, had for a long time supported in a precarious manner, by hard labour and ingenuity, his wife and two children—the young and pretty Stella and the little Antonio. At last he was confined to a bed of grief by illness. Maria Allegri, his wife, placed then between a dying spouse and the two weak creatures who asked her for food to appease their hunger, prayed to God for strength to support the thousand trials of each day, and to sustain her to the end of her cruel mission. The time which was not occupied by attending upon the invalid, she employed in working, whenever it was her happiness to procure any. As she excelled in the imitation of flowers, the ladies of Correggio frequently entrusted her with the ornamenting of their head-dresses, and by this means she was enabled to obtain a scanty subsistence for her helpless family. During many months the humble expenses of the house were covered by the little emoluments arising out of the art exercised by Maria. But the continued exertion was rapidly undermining her constitution. So much trouble and grief, and so many sleepless nights passed by the poor woman, reduced her to such a state of weakness that one day she returned from the market, where she had gone to procure her small stock of provisions, quite pale and worn out. She fell heavily upon the chair, and seeing no other prospect before her but that of being obliged to depend upon the charity of the public for her support, she burst into a flood of bitter tears. Her husband, who was lying on his bed with his back towards her, turned around, and with much difficulty raised himself up on his elbow.

"What is the matter?" said he, in a weak voice.

"I feel ill," said Maria, "but do not be grieved about it. It will shortly go off, and I shall be as well as ever."

"It will shortly go off," repeated the invalid. "Thou wishest to deceive me. What dost thou think has brought this attack on thee?"

"Fatigue," replied Maria. "A day of rest will set me all right again."

"A day of rest!" returned Allegri, attentively and affectionately examining the countenance of his wife. "A day of rest sufficient to drive that palor from thy brow, to restore the brilliancy of thine eyes, and the colour of thy blanched lips! No, dear wife, thou deceivest thyself. Thou art more sick than thou sayest, and perhaps sufferest more than I do, and I unable to give thee any assistance."

Maria approached the bed, and, taking the hand of the sick man in her own, said in a penetrating tone: "Calm thyself, my husband. Hast thou not for twenty years taken care of me as thy cherished wife, and is there anything surprising in my devoting myself to thee now? For me labour—for thee repose—this debt of gratitude thou hast well earned by thy love and devotion of past years."

"Yes," said the invalid, looking round his scantily furnished room, "my life is drawing to its close, and I am forced to leave thee alone to bear the burthen which threatens to overwhelm thee with its weight. We were born under evil stars, and fate has ever been against us—driving misfortune upon misfortune upon our devoted heads."

"Who knows," murmured Maria, "what the future may have in store for us?"

"I cannot think of it without trembling," said Allegri, in a sombre voice. "To whom does the dying husband wish to leave the care of his beloved wife? Is it not to his son? And can I calculate upon my son undertaking that office? He has never returned anything for all the kindness we have shown him, but ingratitude and disobedience. What has he done for his sister, and what for thee?"

"He is so young."

"So young! At fifteen, Maria, I supported my father. At twenty I was the prop of the family; but old age is now come, and with it poverty. I shall die, and the consolation of knowing that I leave thee comfortable will be denied me. Antonio is a bad son."

A young girl approached the bed and took the hand of the invalid whilst the tears ran down her cheeks.

"Is it thou, Stella, my child?" said the father in a weak and trembling voice. "Thy presence is a balm to my heart. Alas!" continued he, turning towards Maria, "youth is a poor privilege to those born under the misfortune of poverty. Stella will suffer misery much longer than we have."

"Hast thou heard, wife, anything of her betrothed?"

"All is broken off," replied Maria. "Lucio's father is inexorable. Frightened by our misery, he has refused his consent to the marriage."

"Did not Lucio assure her he was at liberty to make what choice he pleased?"

"Yes, but his father will not now listen to him. He demands for the wife of his son a full wedding suit for the bride, and a dowry of at least fifty ducats."

The old man's head fell heavily upon the pillow. He closed his eyes and preserved a melancholy silence: in a few minutes he appeared to sleep. A boy about fourteen or fifteen years of age, whose eyes full of sweetness were humid with tears, approached Maria, who embraced him with much tenderness, and could only articulate with maternal fondness and emotion, "Antonio."

"Mother," said the boy in a firm tone, "I have heard and understand all. My father is right—I am a bad son. You have done everything for me, and I have not acquitted myself of the gratitude due you; it is time I should do so."

"What dost thou mean, Antonio?"

"I mean that I ought to work and bring the fruits of labour each day to thee," replied the child in a resolute voice. "It is well I overheard what my father has said, otherwise I should have continued in the same course which has caused his censure, and perhaps the end would have been that both thou and my father would have ceased to love me."

"Cease to love thee, Antonio! It is not possible for a parent not to love the son."

"Ah! thou consolest me, mother, and givest me courage. What art my best friend, and I will not conceal from thee that I dare not tell my father. Thou knowest that I am sometimes afraid of him."

"He is a good father, nevertheless."

"Oh, yes, but he prevents me from drawing and breaks my pencils. Three days ago did he not destroy my pretty Madonna, that I took so much pleasure in copying from the one in the church: My poor Madonna— I loved her so much!"

"Thy father is unhappy, and suffers very much, my child. Thou shouldst endeavour not to irritate him, and, above all, thou shouldst not for a moment doubt his affection for thee."

"I was very near losing it, but from henceforth I will endeavour by every means to recover the ground I have lost in his affections. Adieu, mother; very soon I shall be worthy of being called thy son."

the anguish that surrounded him and of the uncertainties of a gloomy future. The censure of his father struck continually upon his ear, and drove away all inclination for sleep. He felt he could not enjoy repose till he had effaced the last trace of the defaming souvenir. At last, wearied with thought, he fell into a sleep which was agitated by unpleasant dreams. The first light of dawn saw him up. He went and kissed the foreheads of his parents, who, sleeping soundly, were not

Maria embraced her son tenderly. She then called Stella to retire for the night. In an hour after, all was buried in repose in the house, except Antonio, who, recalling the words of his father, pondered on them, and fortified his resolution to make amends. Young as he was, he considered, in all its varied and terrible aspects, the miserable situation into which his family had fallen. For the first time throwing off the happy indifference so natural to youth, he bore his portion of awakened. He then sat down and wrote the following note—

"Do not be alarmed at my absence. I am gone only that I may merit the pardon of my father. Let Stella hope in the future. Perhaps the obstacles to her marriage with Lucio may be soon removed."

Antonio having left the note upon the table, opened the door quietly, knelt down to address a fervent prayer to Heaven; then casting a last look upon the loved roof which he had never before quitted for a stranger's, he walked on by the trembling light of dawn upon the first road he encountered.

Two hours after he arrived in Modena.

CHAPTER II.

When he had passed the gates of the city, Antonio had to call up all his courage to urge him to fulfil the mission he had in these juvenile terrors, and hope came very opportunely to dispel the fears which had well-nigh proved fatal to the object he had in view.

Antonio had never learnt any trade. His father sent him several times as an apprentice to different professions, none of which he seemed to like nor applied himself to. It was not that Antonio was slothful, in the full acceptation of the word; but he had an irresistible disgust for all manual labour, and a desire not the less irresistible forced him to the contemplation voluntarily undertaken. He had never before been surrounded with so much bustle and tumult. He knew not whither to direct his steps, the numerous streets crossing each other bewildered him, and the incessant agitation of the populace seemed like a vast sea about to engulf him. Nevertheless, by degrees he became more accustomed to this new aspect; a consciousness of the goodness of his intention sustained him and imitation of nature. With a pencil in hand, Antonio forgot the work which he was to execute, and permitted the time of his meals and the hours of his rest to pass by equally unheeded. It was this that brought upon him the reprimands of his father, and was now the cause of the poor child's secret grief, at having discovered the real cause of his father's dislike to his pursuits, which he was accustomed to consider as a brutal opposition to an occupation which he believed to be his vocation. But when he understood that misery had forced its way to the family hearth, and had destroyed the peace of mind of his parents, and that it was bad for a son to let them suffer the pangs of hunger without making some exertion to relieve them, the natural goodness of the child's disposition was awakened in all its strength. Animated by the feelings which reflection had given rise to, he left his home without thinking of the future or what steps he would take to earn a livelihood, but trusting in God not to abandon him, and believing he was pursuing the only course that would restore him the affections of his father. But whilst the imagination of the young Antonio turned completely in a circle of doubtful hopes, time fled by, and the day promised to draw to its close before he had taken any decisive steps. Nevertheless, he still trudged on his weary way through the streets, his mind filled with the bitterest thoughts! Suddenly he stopped. At one of the angles of the ducal palace, one of the most magnificent monuments of Italy, there was a small statue representing a Madonna with downcast eyes and a severely pious attitude, bearing in her hand a small branch.

The statue resembled the one of which Antonio had drawn a copy, that was so pitilessly destroyed by his father. Losing sight of the principal object of his journey, and regardless of the time which was fast flying, or of the hunger which he felt and knew not how to appease, he sat down upon one of the marble steps of the palace, pulled out his portfolio which he carried under his arm—the only baggage he brought with him—and drew out a pencil and a sheet of paper of rather an equivocal whiteness; eager then to possess himself once more of a copy of the Madonna with her pure complexion, her holy crown of glory, and her Divine Infant who smiled with so much grace and sweetness. A religious feeling came to add to the enthusiasm of the artist. He believed that he was copying, with so much care and love, the complexion of the Mother of God and her Divine Son—that both would intercede for him in heaven and carry to the Supreme Being his prayers and his vows. So, regardless of the crowds that passed him by, and the curious who observed him, he worked away with a courage and a hope he had never before experienced. He had been almost an hour engaged in his work without having once looked around him, when a man of a distinguished mien, whose dress announced him to belong to the opulent class, stepped behind him and bent down, both to observe the sketch and the countenance of the artist. Antonio paid no attention to the approach of the unknown, and continued his drawing without being disturbed.

"Are you of Modena, my child?" at last inquired the stranger, laying his hand upon the shoulder of the boy.

"No, signor, I am from Correggio," replied Antonio blushing.

"Who is your master?"

"I never had any."

"And when did you arrive?"

"To-day only."

"What are your means of existence?"

At this question, that recalled to Antonio the object of his journey to Modena, he shuddered and replied with emotion:

"Alas! signor, if I am here, it is with the hope of finding some employment; my father and mother are very unhappy."

"And what do you propose doing?"

"Anything I can," the child humbly replied. "I will carry the heaviest loads, enter into the service of the noblemen; there is nothing that I will not do to succour my father and mother."

The stranger reflected a moment, and then inquired, "Your name?"

"Antonio Allegri."

"If you accept work with me, I will give you employment which I am certain will accord with your taste. My house shall be yours. Do you consent?"

The child murmured forth his thanks, and accepted the offer with gratitude; but at the same time he cast a look full of melancholy regret upon the Madonna.

"Come," said the unknown. "In place of this rumpled paper, I will give you prepared canvas for the pencil and a brush; and as for models, I will supply you with many as beautiful as this Madonna."

Antonio followed his protector, without replying, through a labyrinth of streets in which he would have lost himself without a guide. Arriving at a handsome house the stranger knocked at the door, and said, "This is our home."

His first care upon entering was to have provided for Antonio a good repast, of which he partook largely himself.

Then, as the days were long, he proposed to Antonio to take a short promenade in the park, that he might show him the magnificent spectacle that the purplish tints of the rays of the setting sun presented. When they had returned he introduced him into a room hung with paintings; here and there strewn about upon the tables were pencils, palettes, brushes, and boxes of colours. It was, in one word, the arsenal of painting, and all the pell-mell of a workshop. Antonio felt new hope springing in his heart, which dilated with the expectation of pleasure.

"Here you shall pass your days," said the unknown. "Have I said wrong when I told you I would procure employment for you which would please you? You will commence by observing me paint, and then you shall do so yourself. Many a great artist has commenced by mixing colours and cleaning palettes. This occupation will for the present enable you to live."

Antonio employed two long hours in examining minutely the pictures of this sumptuous gallery. Signor Pescaro (which was the name of the unknown) explained to him the subject of each canvas, and did not spare his eulogies of their perfection and their beauty, which, considering that he shortly afterwards proudly declared himself their author, was not very modest.

When night interrupted this review, Pescaro led Antonio to the chamber which had been prepared for him, where, wishing him a good night, he left him alone. Antonio then recalled all that had happened to him during the day, and rejoiced that so gloomy a beginning had so bright an ending. He thought of the joy he would experience when sending his earnings each week to his family at Correggio; then he pronounced the name of his benefactor and accompanied it with all sorts of blessings. He was very happy, yet a thought which he could not smother filled his breast with remorse. At the moment he received an inappreciable benefit from the hands of his benefactor, he believed himself full of ingratitude, for he considered as detestable the paintings of Pescaro which had been styled by him as magnificent.

CHAPTER III.

In order to understand better what Antonio considered the paintings of so great a devotee of the art as Pescaro appeared to be, it will be necessary to state, that, although of a most benevolent character and the patron of the fine arts, he was himself the most execrable artist in the world. At this epoch, when the praises of Giotto, of Cimabue, of Angelo, and of Raffaele, were universally chanted, men of opulence and high birth were seized with a mania for painting, and endeavoured to gain the celebrity of triumphant artists, and to add to their crown of nobility the precious wreath of an art which was then so much esteemed in Italy.

These degenerate disciples believed that gold, study, and a species of infatuation, would compensate for the absence of genius and inspiration; and the circle of courtiers who gathered round them, like satellites around a planet, contributed in some degree to the flattering illusion. Pescaro's proper place was definitely marked out, in the centre of these innumerable martyrs to the art, who were ever to be found surrounding the vestibule of the temple they never were able to penetrate.

Antonio did not inform his benefactor of the opinion he had formed of his works, and regretted that it was not a favourable one. Neither did Pescaro afford him an opportunity, as he was perpetually descanting upon the value and great beauty of his productions. The young enthusiast was very happy that this was the case, as he could not dream of telling a falsehood, nor of hurting the feelings of a gentleman to whose generosity he owed perhaps his own life and that of his family.

About a year ran thus peaceably on. Antonio fulfilled with zeal all the duties which were imposed upon him by Pescara. After deducting a little necessary expense which he incurred weekly, he regularly sent the wages he received to his family at Correggio. These succours were as manna from heaven to his parents and sister. Emboldened by the encouragement of Pescara, he one day requested permission to paint a representation of the Virgin, of which he had drawn a copy at the corner of the Ducal Palace, when he was benevolently befriended by his benefactor. Pescara smiled at the solicitations of his pupil, and said he as yet hardly knew how to hold a brush, and that he had not worked sufficiently to enable him to even attempt a task of such difficulty. Antonio replied that he was fully capable at least of producing a work which would prove to his master that he had profited by his lessons. Pescara at last yielded to the pressing requests of Antonio, both from a desire of indulging the boy's inclination, and of seeing what species of work would emanate from so youthful an aspirant.

"We will both commence a picture upon the same subject," said Pescara; "but we will not communicate to each other any hint of the plans we are pursuing. You shall occupy this portion of the workshop, and neither of us will enter into the division of the other till both pictures are finished."

From that day forward the two rivals were engaged furthering their respective pictures. Pescara used frequently to rally his pupil upon the promised perseverance, and then with a patronising air encourage him to perseverance.

At last the day arrived when Antonio had completed his work. He ran to Pescara to inform him that it was ready for inspection. Pescara, who had his piece executed before his pupil, arose from the festoon on which he had been reclining, and prepared to accompany Antonio to the workshop. As they were going up stairs a servant overtook them, and told Antonio that a young girl awaited him in the hall. As he frequented no place and formed no associates since he had come to Modena, he could not think who it was that could possibly wait him. Pescara desired him to go down and see who it was. Three jumps brought Antonio to the bottom of the stairs, when uttering a cry of joy he ran into the arms of his sister, who warmly and tenderly embraced him.

After the first rapture consequent upon a meeting between persons so dear to each other, and who had been so long separated, Antonio perceived that the countenance of his sister was very pale, that her eyes were red and swollen with weeping, and that in her whole deportment she bore the marks of suffering under some heavy affliction.

"What has happened, my sister?" inquired Antonio, in trembling tones.

"Our father is dying," replied Stella in a broken voice. "God is taking him to Himself. It is a misfortune to us, but a blessing to him. We, alas, have not the means of purchasing a small plot of ground where he could repose in peace, and where we would often go to kneel upon his grave, and ask him to intercede for us in heaven."

"Our father dying!" repeated Antonio, in a wandering manner. "Oh, I must leave instantly, that I may see him and obtain his pardon."

"He has long since pardoned thee; and thou hast well deserved that he should do so," replied Stella.

"Thanks—but thou hast said nothing of our good mother."

"Excess of labouring at her needle has injured her sight and reduced her almost to blindness; but she supports all these afflictions with the resignation of a saint. I fear much that in this life she will never be sufficiently rewarded for the sacrifices she has made."

"And thou, good sister, thou hast had thy part in these sufferings. Thou hast seen fading away, one by one, all those sweet illusions in which thou wast wont to indulge. Thy marriage with Lucio—"

"I think no more of the future," hastily returned Stella, and with difficulty restraining her bursting tears. "It is not for poor creatures like us to hope, as misery has set her fatal seal upon our lot."

"Do not despair then," replied Antonio, seized with a sudden thought. "Remain here a moment, I will make a last effort. Do not be impatient; I will return immediately."

Signor Pescara was seated before two easels, upon which were placed two pictures representing the same subject; notwithstanding this identity, the eye of the least critical would at once perceive, from the difference of touch, and more particularly of colouring, that they were the productions of very different hands and of very different talents. Pescara resolved to give an impartial opinion upon the merits of each, advanced and recoiled from the picture to observe the different effects.

He then drew the blinds down to subdue the light, in order to perceive it under every aspect. Absorbed in the investigation, the return of Antonio was unheeded; but he approached and cried out to him.

"Signor Pescara, have pity upon me."

"What is it that you say?" said Pescara, surprised.

"I owe you much already," replied Antonio, in a fervent tone. "You have saved the life of myself and my family. Do more; I have a father who is dying, a mother who is blind, and a sister young and beautiful, who is now an orphan without support. Do a great act; give to the father a grave, to the mother an asylum, to the daughter an dowry. Do this, Monsieur, and my life shall be yours. I know not what would repay you for so enormous a debt; but it appears to me that my gratitude and my devotion will be able to pay it me with the means of discharging it. From this day I will seize every opportunity of proving to you that I am not an ingrate. I neither breathe nor work any more but for you. In pity, then, save my mother—save my sister."

"I hear all thy wishes favourably," replied Pescara, taking the hand of Antonio, "but I will not accept in return all the sacrifices which thou so disinterestedly offerest me. No, I will not accept of the abnegation which would be the destruction of thy future. I have discovered in thee the germ of a precious talent that requires only the air, sun, and liberty to bring to maturity. Return to Correggio—but before leaving I will provide you for a long time against misery or want. I will purchase thy first picture; take this purse—it contains two hundred ducats."

Antonio could scarcely contain himself with joy; renewing his promises of devotion to Pescara, he ran precipitately to join his sister. "Stella!" he cried, "Stella, we are saved!—let us go."

Taking her arm under his own, Antonio and his sister left the house of their benefactor, and walked along the road, with lightened hearts, which led from Modena to the little town of Correggio.

CHAPTER IV.

They arrived in time. Old Allegri still breathed. Maria, to whom Antonio had given the money, wished her husband to witness before expiring the nuptials of his daughter. She ran to the father of Lucio. His avaricious scruples at once vanished at the sight of the gold; he gave his approbation to the marriage. Thus, then, thanks to Antonio, Stella espoused the man she loved. The emotion of joy which her father experienced at this unexpected consummation of his dearest wishes, finished the work that grief had commenced. He died blessing his sons.

There remained no one with Antonio now but his mother, upon whom he bestowed all the fond affections of a strong and generous nature. Her spirit also promised soon to quit her earthly tenement. Deprived of her sight, her constitution broken by the fatigues of a long life, and weakened by long privations, she walked with rapid strides to the tomb of her husband. One evening Antonio, entering the room, found her stretched upon the bed as if dead, and profound sleep. He ran to her and kissed her, but her lips chilled him with their coldness; he looked again and saw he was an orphan.

Shortly after, Lucio, resolving to take up his abode at Florence, left his native town, and was of course accompanied by Stella. Antonio then found himself completely isolated, but, remembering his benefactor, he wended his way once more to Modena. Pescaro, on his first visit, received him affectionately; the second, more coldly; and on the third was not to be seen. Antonio could not fathom the cause of this strange conduct of his benefactor. His noble heart would not permit him to imagine that he was actuated by any feeling of low jealousy. Such, nevertheless, was the secret of this sad enigma. The superiority of Antonio's Madonna, forcibly recognised by Pescaro, had first weakened, and by degrees completely destroyed, all interest in the fate of his former protégé. The child, without wishing it, had humbled the pride of the painter. It is one of those things which an envious artist repays with eternal rancour.

Antonio never saw his first picture afterwards. It is said that, after the death of the Modenese amateur, amongst the several paintings of different merits with which his gallery was hung, a star was discovered which was worthy of genius. This was, it is said, Antonio's "Vierge au Rameau;" at the bottom of the picture was printed in very legible characters the name of Signor Pescaro.

The sad fatality which was so inexorably attached to the infancy of Allegri followed him to the grave. The man was as unhappy as the child. Free from pride, forgetful of injuries, and loving to do good, he never found any reward for these sweet virtues but in the purity of his conscience and the pleasures of his art. But if the glorious palm of genius did not shade his brow, posterity placed a crown of immortality upon his grave, and ranked him with Raffaele, Angelo, and Romain; and, as glory is baptism, it has given a new name to the great artist—a venerated name which sums up his beginning and his end, his struggles and his principles, his birth and his death—the name of the town which without him would have been devoted to oblivion. It is not Antonio Allegri he is called, but Correggio; and he will bear to the end of ages the name upon which he reflects so much glory. Magic power, sublime privilege of the man of genius—to ennoble all that is allied to him by the relations of blood, of country, or of religion.

MODERN ART EXHIBITIONS.

THE "year," amongst the artists, may be said to commence with the opening of the British Institution, in Pall Mall, early in the month of February; and the second event of importance, to be the opening of the Suffolk-street Gallery, which took place upon the 27th of last month. Therefore, although the Exhibition of the British Institution can no longer be regarded as a novelty, it yet becomes our duty, in chronicling art movements, to run back for some little time, and to notice the first Exhibition of 1854.

This will not be exacting too much from our readers, as the Exhibition is yet open for them to verify our criticisms.

An institution for the benefit of artists, numbering amongst its governors and directors the Earl of Aberdeen, the Marquis of Abercorn, the Earl of Ellesmere, etc., and having for its president the Duke of Sutherland, should be in the position to offer much patronage and assistance to the artists. Its frequenters are of the highest class, and, if not so numerous as those of the Royal Academy, are more select. Formerly, works which had been exhibited in the greater gallery in the previous year, were allowed to be again exhibited in this; and the names of the first picture-buyers in the kingdom being amongst those of its governors and subscribers, many very first-rate pictures adorned its walls. Lately, however, this permission has been rescinded, and now none but original works may be hung. If this has not been a benefit to the frequenters, it has yet been of very positive use to the struggling artist, who has now a chance of exhibition, instead of seeing his place occupied by pictures which were already well known to the public; but although the frequenter does not now meet the picture which he had before admired in the Royal Academy, it must be confessed that, as an exhibition, the character of the place has fallen.

This year the artists seem to have reserved their best efforts for the Royal Academy; and the walls, with very few exceptions, show "monotonous landscapes, mistaken epical strivings, and feeble fancy sketches," to quote the words of an impartial but severe critic. The exceptions are, however, brilliant, and render a visit to the gallery well worth the while of those who love art.

The picture which stands first on the catalogue is the "Kingfisher's Haunt," of Mr. Creswick, R.A., which has all the merit of that artist's usual productions, but little else besides.

"West Loch Tarbeet" (12), by J. Danby, and (22) "Coiners," by Inskipp, will arrest attention—the first by its excellence, the latter by its subject, which is treated in a novel but thoroughly vulgar manner. Men of a roué appearance and unmistakeable vulgarity are throwing upon a table a quantity of new coin, without the slightest sparkle, so that nobody would think of taking them. Of a far different order is (29) "A Scheveling shore, low water," which is a perfect triumph of purely natural painting; a picture of Dutch galiots unloading, so careful in finish, and so close to nature, that the calm rippling of the sea has a quiescent effect upon the spectator. "Mounts Bay, Cornwall" (265), by Mr. Jackson, may be bracketed with this picture.

The picture by Mr. Sant (58), which bears no name, but which has the quotation from St. John's Gospel to identify it as the "Woman taken in Adultery," is, in our opinion, the finest picture in the gallery. The figure of the woman veiling herself before the reproof from lips which spake as never man spake, has seldom been more finely conceived, and has rarely been so well executed. The terror of her situation, and the blinding conviction of sin, are fearfully realised. The colouring of the flesh is very near perfection, if it be not the thing itself.

The "Fruit" of Mr. Lance (30, 180, 218, and 497) have the usual excellences of that painter, and, it must be confessed, some of his weaknesses. The popular illustrator upon wood, Mr. Gilbert, has produced a picture of "Sancho Panza and his Wife" (509), which is unrivalled in its way. Sancho is swelling with the thought of his future government, while his wife, bearing a small tray with Spanish onions upon it, looks at him with an incredulous and almost contemptuous air. Few things can be finer than this picture; there is some marvellous painting in it, and the composition is natural and characteristic.

Mr. Glass, in "A Raid on the Scottish Border" (355), has attempted not a scene, but a whole series of tableaux, and has in our opinion failed to tell his story; though the animals and figures exhibit a very fair knowledge of drawing.

(74.) "The arrest of Cardinal Wolsey," by Sir G. Hayter, shows a great want in correctness of costume, and has figures deficient in grace.

(118.) A subject from the "Te Deum Laudamus," by the same artist, is of very high merit; the devotional feeling in the faces of the three apostles is finely expressed.

(137.) "Lytham Common," by R. Ansdell, and (158) by the same artist, are two of the gems of the Exhibition, and leave nothing to be desired.

The only bit of art gossip worth recording is curious, and involves a high compliment to "Mr. Punch." The artist of the city statue of Sir Robert Peel having applied to Mr. Gladstone, to know where he could find the best likeness of the lamented statesman, the chancellor referred him to a caricature by Leech, called "A Chip of the Old Block," wherein Sir Robert is introducing his second son, a perfect little Sir Robert, to Mr. Punch, with the words, "My son, sir." Mr. Gladstone thought that portrait could not be surpassed; the statue is therefore being modelled from it.

J. B. OUDRY.

Those painters who, like our own eminent Landseer, have devoted themselves to the study and picturing of animal life, have been almost always successful. The reason is clear. This kind of art comes home to the feelings and ideas of large bodies of the community; everybody understands a picture of a horse, an ass, dogs, deer, fox-hunts; and everybody is able to appreciate whether they are correctly or incorrectly rendered. It requires some previous education, some knowledge of the highest department of human art, but it is an agreeable and pleasing species of painting, that is in every way worthy of encouragement.

The aim and object of high art is to elevate and ennoble the mind. We recognise a mission in the great painter, and we expect that mission to be fulfilled conscientiously and well; we expect him to warm our hearts, to expand the mind, and elevate the soul above the mere chaos of daily occupations. When examining a great historical or sacred picture, representing, let it be supposed, the Crucifixion, we seek not so much exact fidelity as a grand and solemn whole, that breathes of the eternal and mighty sacrifice, that chastens and softens, that carries us far away to realms of space beyond mere actuality. It is the grandeur, the sublimity, the elevation, the genius, developed in their paintings, that have carried the names of Raffaele and Michael Angelo to the uttermost ends of the earth, far more than their rich colouring or fidelity of rendering the human face and form. A daguerreotype is a better portrait than any of Vandyck; but if we could have paintings rendered the same way, we should still prefer those efforts of the hands of man which have around them the immortal halo, the poetry and life of genius.

But if what is called high art were alone encouraged, it would certainly be much to be regretted. There is another mission of painting; and that is, to please, to gratify the senses, to be agreeable. The love of pictures, whether painted or engraved, is one which should be encouraged, especially in the young. Often from the most elaborate descriptions we gain but a very faint idea of the thing itself, while in a painting or woodcut it stands evidently before us, and we comprehend. The mere description conveys often the same idea to us that it does to the blind, who, from feeling even, can gain no conception of the reality. Few men ever carried the art of faithful and elaborate description further than Cooper, the eminent American fictionist. His landscape portraits were history, some travel through the world, to comprehend and enjoy historical scenes, foreign landscapes—even scenes of life which do not belong to our own sphere. But who has not studied the canine race, or watched a cat in its gambols, or noticed the prancing horse, or seen the deer skimming over the fields? And when we see a picture reflecting these familiar forms, we rarely are mistaken in our judgment of it. We comprehend that which is familiar. Certainly it is not faithful and true; yet when we visited the places he had thus truthfully portrayed, we had some difficulty in recognising them. But when we were familiar with a place from a drawing, the description then sank deep in our minds.

The cultivation of taste is a very essential element in education, and taste can scarcely be acquired without some conception and study of art. It is well, then, that art has not always been on stilts, that sometimes it has come down and walked on level ground, and condescended to things which appear, at first sight, not its province. Very few in this world would endure subjects not adapted to their capacity and intellect. Even, however, the profoundest students find relief in the song and the tale; so the lover of painting, in its more elevated branches, cannot but occasionally welcome those painters who please, soften, and amuse him, when he is wearied of being taught and schooled.

In this country a very large number of persons have been found to paint, and thousands have been found to admire, the canine race. The man who understands only one branch, and that the highest, of art, will sneer at the dog-painter; but in so doing he commits a great error. Do we not all know of what great value the dog has been to man, how useful he is in every way? and what more natural than that we should gaze with pleasure on the representation of our favourite animal? The history of the dog has yet to be written; authors have not yet done him justice, but art has.

The part of the dog in history began with the very existence of property. He was the first policeman; and it is a fact that races without dogs have always been savages. Let none of us complain, then, of their being made a prominent feature in animal-painting.

In the edition of "The Fables of La Fontaine," illustrated by Oudry, there is a magnificent portrait of this master-engraver by Tardieu, after Largillière. The very first glance we cast upon this admirable engraving charms us. We are struck by the benevolent, lively, and calm air of this man, who represents in his person the very best specimen of the French style. This face, rather fat, in which imagination and wit are mingled with a soft good humour, shows a mind without storms, a fertility without roughness, an easy facile genius without much depth. Such is the conclusion ordinarily drawn from surveying the portrait of this artist; and yet how little can we really judge from the outward semblance of the man.

The great judges of physiognomy in modern times inform us that the peaceful history of Oudry is written in his portrait, and that we may swear to the likeness without ever having seen the original. In truth, we may in vain seek, during his life of more than sixty years, for any of those agitations and those struggles which are the price so many men pay for their renown. There are few artists whose biography is recorded in history, who have not had to overcome either the terrible anguish of physical misery, or the silly prejudices of a family, or even the yielding and trembling of their own genius. Oudry did not know any of these sorrows or griefs. The son of a picture-dealer, he lived during his youth among pictures, always changing, always renewed; and masters who made the fortune of the father, began the education of the son.

However this may be, he experienced in early years a very precocious love of drawing. Oudry, the father, who was a member of the Academy of Drawing, had been a painter before he became a dealer. It is believed that he gave the first lessons to his son; but he soon placed him with Serre, painter of the galleries of the king, at Marseilles, who wished to take him away with him.

Oudry was not destined to have vast and great conceptions, or to devote himself to heroic pictures. He was a keen observer of nature, saw it with a sharp coup-d'œil, and drew correctly and justly. He had all the requisites for a portrait painter: we do not speak of those portraits in a lofty style, which, by grandeur of character and the nobility of the sentiments they inspire, rise to the perfection of an historical picture, like those of Velasquez, Vandyck, and Lawrence;

we speak of the familiar portrait—of that which is for the original a kind of mirror, for his friends a happy resemblance, and for amateurs a fine study. The pupil of Serre came back instinctively to Paris, with the intention of placing himself under a master of his own choice, Nicolas of Largillière. This man was a real painter, and it was in reality a piece of good fortune to be brought up in his school, especially for any one who wished to sketch a model, to learn to hang "learned draperies," to paint broadly with a light pencil, by fresh touches that please and do not weary in colour. The pupil soon rose to such a pitch of reputation that Peter the Great, who came to Paris in 1717, wished to have his portrait from the hand of Oudry; and it was so successfully executed that he wanted to take the artist and carry him off to St. Petersburg, as he had done in Holland with the carpenter of Saardam. To escape from the iron will of the great Czar, the painter, who was determined not to leave his country, was obliged to seek for a retreat where he was able to conceal himself from the search of his well-meaning friends.

Largillière, who was something better than a mere portrait painter, took great pleasure in teaching his pupil the principles he had himself drawn from nature, and the study of the painters of the Flemish school. He had also taught him the principles of perspective and chiaroscuro, and had laid a very strong foundation relative to mixing and using colours. Oudry never ceased to remember these things, and it was always pleasant in after life to hear him talking of what he had learnt from his long and learned conversations with Largillière. There is much in the way in which a thing is taught, and the young artist will often learn more from the pleasant and agreeable gossip of an able master, than from his most learned disquisitions in one of his most learned moods.

One day the master told his pupil that he must learn to paint flowers, and as Oudry went to fetch some bouquets of flowers of varied hue and colour, Largillière sent the pupil back to the garden to pick out a bunch of flowers all white. He then himself placed them on a clear background, which, on the side of the shadow, threw them up in bold relief, and on the side of the light gave them delicate demi-tints. The master having then compared the white of the pallet with the light side of the flowers, which was less dazzling, showed that in this tuft of white flowers, the lights which were to be touched with pure white were in very little quantity, in comparison with the demi-tints; this is exactly what gave roundness and vigour to the bouquet, and the learned painter thence drew the conclusion, that to give relief to the model, to round it, as it were, large demi-tints were needed, much economy in lights, and some very strong dark touches, in the centre of the shadow and in the places which are not brought up by the refraction.

The worthy Largillière thus communicated little by little the secrets of art to his pupil. Colouring was, above all, the object of his interviews and studies; and it was by bold examples that he taught now how to find local tints, now how to modify them, according to the relative value which the surrounding colour assigned to them. "Look at that silver vase," said he one day: "it is certainly true that its whole mass is white; but how will you determine the true tone which is proper to it? It is by comparing it, not to contraries, but to things like itself; because what is wanted is a shade. If you bring near this vase of silver either linen, or paper, or satin, or porcelain, you will readily perceive that the white of the vase is not at all like the white of the porcelain, nor of the satin, nor of the paper, nor of the linen; and by carefully examining the tone which it has not got, you will end by finding the tone which it has." On another occasion, speaking of those exaggerated repellants which are authorised by no rule, especially when the scene is laid in an open country—where shaded masses are only produced by the movement of clouds—he ridiculed good-humouredly that ultra-black tone in which drapery, in which lights, flesh, terraces, are lost; while the figures of the second foreground, suddenly lit up, resemble a troop of Europeans beside a company of Moors.

After five years of arduous study in the atelier of Largillière, Oudry was remarked for his portraits and some few historical pictures. He was as yet unaware of his own particular talent, and moved in the dark towards his branch of art and his peculiar fame. His first productions caused him to be elected a member and a professor of the Academy of St. Luke. But his effort to follow in the track of the great artists of history was not destined to last very long. One day he sketched off with much success a hunter and his dog, and Largillière said to him laughing, "Get along, Oudry; you will never be anything but a dog-painter." Oudry thought that in these words he saw his horoscope. He began at once to devote his whole energies to the study and portraiture of animals, and he did so with surprising good fortune. He had hit upon that particular branch of art which was suited to his genius, and thence his immediate success.

But he did not at once renounce the attempt to shine in historical paintings, and he was received into the Academy in 1717, upon the faith of a picture of "The Adoration of the Magi," painted for the chapter of St. Martin-in-the-Fields. His special painting for his reception was an allegorical design of Plenty.

It would be difficult to find these works of Oudry, and it is allowable to suppose that they were not productions of a very high order, since the reputation which their author has gained in another style has completely eclipsed them. It is as an animal painter that Oudry is a master of his art. He had a name already when he was named professor and pensioner of the king, with a lodging in the Tuileries. The talent of Oudry could not but please Louis XV., who considered hunting one of the first duties of government—one of the noblest occupations of man. It was this king's mad yielding to his impulses, that paved the way for so much that was terrible in the subsequent revolution. He took such delight in the works of this artist, that he passed whole hours in his workshop. It is said that he was wont to take the utmost pleasure in watching him paint several hunting pictures, which were afterwards to be executed in Gobelins tapestries, and which the king destined for his bed-chamber in the palace of Compiègne, and the council-chamber. The frivolous and capricious king wished the idea of pleasure to follow him to the very chamber where he was forced to undergo the ennui of governing. A very lively and amusing description of these pictures is to be found in the "Mercure de France" of 1738. The king is there represented accompanied by his courtiers, his officers, and his huntsmen—now pulling on his boots to mount on horseback—now present at a ballali near the ponds of St. Jean-aux-Bois—now running down the deer in view of Royal-Lieu. This last composition is very animated. In front the pack is seen bounding forward through fields filled by blue-bells and poppies; further off, a troop of huntsmen pass the river Oise in a ferry-boat. The boat of Beaumont, filled with passengers, ascends the river; while other boats seem to be brought in to vary the monotony of the water-lines. The king's carriage, drawn by four horses, and a view of Compiègne, complete the features of this composition.

The king, Louis XV., was so delighted with the personal figure he was made to assume in these pictures, and consequently so delighted with the artist, that he invited him down to the great hunts of Fontainebleau. On this occasion, the rapid conception of nature, caught in her happy moods, lent even a more striking character of truth to his animals, caught as it were in the fact; and seeing them reproduced so faithfully from nature, the king was delighted to be able to recognise them one after another, and to call them by their names.

From the court of France the renown of Oudry spread over all Europe. He began to find foreigners disputing for the honour and pleasure of possessing his pictures. The king of Denmark wrote to him to ask him to come to Copenhagen; the prince of Mecklenburg caused a gallery to be expressly constructed to receive the pictures of Oudry.

And it was not only by hunting scenes and pictures of animals that this painter made himself a name. In his days landscape-painting—that charming and pleasing branch of art—was very popular, and many amateurs ordered pictures of him. Lafont de Saint-Yenne speaks highly of them in his little work on the Exhibition of 1746, and he adds to the opinion of the public the expression of his own personal feelings. "There is nothing more happy," said he, "than the choice of sites in the paintings of Oudry. Nature shows herself adorned in her native and rarest beauties a thousand times more enchanting than that of the palace of kings. One sees and almost feels a genuine freshness under the deep verdure of his groups of trees, whose leaves are admirable, and of which he knows how to vary the forms, the touches, and the tones with an infinite art. This freshness is seen by the light of his water so well distributed, some tranquil, some in movement; his able pencil makes beauty out of everything; here a ruined bridge, there a mill, further on, huts and old houses, add to these familiar scenes an enchanting air."

If so many successes contribute to the glory and the future of the painter, we have reason to regret, and the French still more, when they think of the numerous and valuable pictures which have been removed from France to foreign countries. This man, whose fertility is confessed in all biographies, has only seven or eight pictures, of moderate size, in the Louvre. The largest represents a "Wolf Hunt." The beast, attacked on all sides, and still menaced by a fourth enemy which forms the rear-guard, turns round his head with an air of fear and powerless rage. The head of the wolf is a remarkably fine piece. The movements of the dogs are admirable for truth and reality. They are painted moreover with rare perfection, and by brilliant touches which show off with extreme vigour even the variety of their skins. It is to be regretted that he has not thrown a little more fire into this terribly bloody struggle. The landscape is, however, one of agreeable country beauty, and, retreating as it does, it adds to the beauty of the picture. A forest warmed by some rays of the sun, and which dies away in the summer vapour, recalls some of the aims, less nave it is true, of the greatest contemporary landscape painters. Its brown mass serves as a background to the skin of the animals, which are precisely those dogs of the Pyrenees with rough skin which Oudry had studied in the kennel of the king.

Oudry often reproduced these terrific combats of wolves surprised by dogs. Diderot tells us that in the Exhibition of 1753, he hung up a picture representing bull-dogs combatting three wolves and a jackal. "This picture," adds the celebrated writer, "has been described as too uniform; the landscapes sad and hard."

Though it is perhaps a truthful observation to make, that the pictures of Oudry are a little too cold, and that his skies want the charm and the dazzling brightness of those of Desportes, it is quite easy to see, from some of his paintings, that he could easily escape from those faults. He painted in one picture, in most admirable colours, two hounds; one is fawn-coloured, the other black. The one is brought out in bold relief upon a brown background of trunks of trees and dark green plants, while the black is brought up by the clear and pellucid light of a luminous sky. These frank and beautiful contrasts always please the eye, and this pretty picture is a worthy parallel of another canvas which represents the delicate she-hounds, white and spotted with yellow, with long narrow snouts, with speaking and intelligent eyes—delicate personages, whose names have been preserved by Oudry at the bottom of his picture—Sylva and Mignonne.

Oudry was above all an indefatigable and laborious workman. He belongs to that family of conscientious artists who were born in the first half of the eighteenth century, and whose whole life, whose existence, whose very moral and physical being, was devoted to the cultivation, the worship of art. Not satisfied with painting enough to be able to produce and show in a single Exhibition more than fifteen pictures at a time, as often happened to him, particularly in 1753, Oudry took a journey into the country almost every day, to draw nature on the spot, and spent nearly all his evenings in producing those numerous drawings of which we shall presently have occasion to speak.

The pupil of Largillière, a passionate admirer of nature, was one of the first to contend against the conventional, hard, and unreal types which spoil the French school. He liked to copy nature itself, and when he sought the real, he found it. He studied the manners, customs, habits, and peculiarities of animals in their own retreats. He frequently went down to Dieppe to be present at the exact moment when the fish were fresh from the sea. He patiently drew the inhabitants of the Jardin des Plantes; and as fast as the royal and really splendid collection was enriched by a rare bird, his portfolios were enriched by a new drawing. And so many earnest studies, from which he profited so well, were not lost to the world.

Oudry, by his pleasant manners, his wit, and his connexion with the court, was one of the influential men of the Academy; his voice was always listened to, the more because he threw accomplished literary production. It is something extremely rare from a Frenchman, an admirable example of modesty and pious veneration.

The following is the discourse alluded to: it would be spoilt by abridgment:—

“I believe I am sufficiently well known amongst you, gentlemen, not to need the assurance, that if I undertake to give the explanation of certain principles, it is not at all with a view to attack the sentiments of any of my confrères who may see things in another light from what I do, and that much less do I suppose myself capable of teaching them. You know that I have always respected the lights and the talents of our best masters. I may then say frankly, that when I wrote these simple reflections, I never thought of bringing them publicly before you; I thought only of arranging them in my own mind, and of putting them together for so much grace into all that he said. In the sitting of the 7th of June, 1749, he read to the Royal Academy of Painting and Sculpture, of which Coypel was then the director, a paper, which was entitled, “Reflections on the Mode of Studying Colour, by comparing objects one with the other.” Oudry, giving to Largillière the honour of these reflections, explains with charming and native simplicity all that his master had taught him in relation to colour, the connexion of tones, the infinite variety they derive from the subduing of the lights, and also his ideas upon drawing and chiaroscuro. In a literary point of view, this piece belongs rather to the seventeenth than to the eighteenth century, and we are inclined to believe, from the testimony of this production, in the absence of all other private details relative to the life of Oudry, that this painter no-wise resembled his contemporaries in manners or conduct. He was not of the age in which he lived. His disquisition, moreover, is something far better than an the instruction of my son; but since it has been so clearly proved that every one of us should contribute, according to his means, to the instruction of our young pupils, who are brought to this meeting for that purpose, I thought it my duty to yield to this consideration.

“You know very well, gentlemen, what kind of man M. de Largillière was, and the admirable maxims he had laid down, in connexion with the great effects and, as it were, the magic of our art. He always communicated them to me with the true love of a father; and it is, I assure you, with extreme delight, with the greatest pleasure an honest man can feel, truly loving his art and sympathising warmly with those youths who seek distinction in earnest, that I communicate them in my turn. M. de Largillière has told me many times that it was at the Flemish school where he was educated that he collected together all those fine maxims which he knew so well how to put into practice; and he often mentioned to me the great regret he felt at seeing and feeling, on so many hands, the want of attention to things which were of such essential importance to the artist. Perhaps he was a little too partial to his nurse, that nurse he always loved so well; but even if we look upon some of his opinions as prejudices, I hope that you will not consider them unworthy of your attention, and that even these errors, if you regard them as such, may appear to you as the errors of a great artist.

"Where he was so truly great, as you all know, and have repeatedly allowed, is in colour, in chiaroscuro, in effect, and in harmony. The ideas he had on these subjects were beautiful and clear, when he explained them, as he did, with so much sweetness, gentleness, and placidity.

"I shall, I warn you, often mix up my own ideas with those of my master; I could with difficulty separate them; they have been united too long; they have become incorporated in one, and to divide them now is an impossible task.

nothing else but what is natural to each object, and that the chiaroscuro is the art of distributing the lights and shadows with that intelligence which causes a picture to produce effect. But it is not sufficient to have a general idea of this. The great point is, to know how to apply the local colour properly and efficiently, and to acquire that knowledge which gives its value by contrasting it with another.

"This is in my opinion the infinite in art, and a point on which we have much fewer principles than any other. I mean principles founded on the true and the natural; for in principles founded on the works of the old masters we certainly are not deficient. We have, indeed, writers enough and to spare who have spoken thereupon. But it is a serious question whether what they have said on the point is very solid; or, if it be solid, do we do all in our power to profit by the good fruit we ought to derive from these principles? This is my first difficulty.

THE STAG HUNT,—FROM A PAINTING BY OUDRY.

Moreover, forty years of assiduous labour certainly have given me some new ideas, relative to which I do not wish to show myself miserly, any more than I wish to keep back those of others. Loving my branch of art as I do, I cannot but wish that what I know, others too may have the pleasure of knowing. I know nothing more mean, in an elevated art like ours, than to have little secrets, and not to do for those who are to succeed us that which has been done for us. As I have already said, I intend to speak, on the present occasion, only to the youth present; and to remove every suspicion, I hope you will allow me to speak out to that youth.

"Colour is one of the most important branches of our art. It is that which characterises it, which distinguishes it so clearly from sculpture. It is in the colouring that consists the charm and the brilliance of our works. You are sufficiently advanced to be perfectly aware of this. You are also aware, that in colouring there are two distinct branches:—the local colour, and the chiaroscuro; that the local colour is "What do you do? Full of that just and lofty admiration with which you have been inspired for the masters whom we look upon as colourists, you begin to copy them. But how do you copy them? Plainly and simply, and almost without any reflection, putting white where you see white, red where you see red, and so on. So that, instead of forming a just idea of the colouring of the master, you simply get hold of a sample. How must we act in order to do better? We must, when we copy a fine picture, ask our master the reason why the author of this picture coloured such and such a part in such and such a way. In this way you will learn, on the principle of induction, that which you seek by routine, and which it cannot give you. Whenever you copy a new author, you must obtain from your master that instruction, based on new reasoning and new principles, which will sink into your mind, and which will guarantee you against an acquired prejudice, which sometimes lasts a whole life, in favour of one artist and against all others, often the cause of the complete ruin and destruction of a young man who promised better things.

"By avoiding this danger, mark what will happen. While copying, we will say, a Titian, you will be enchanted beyond all doubt with the beautiful tones you will find in it, and the beautiful play of these tones upon the general effect. But your master will say, 'Take care; do not fancy that all these tones would have the same value, if they were placed elsewhere. It belongs to this composition for such and such a reason. This is the true merit of this author. If this colour were in the least out of place, it would be false and shocking.' The force of this reasoning would surely strike you, and it must even strike you now. Do you not see very clearly that painting would be a very narrow art, if we only required an assortment of tints after Titian, to colour as well as he does?"

"I should myself highly approve and recommend, in order that you might make these studies truly valuable, that you should mix up with them the study of nature. Yes, I should wish as soon as a young man begins to paint, having a good foundation of drawing, and knowing a little of colouring, that when he has copied a Titian, he should take nature, and from it paint a similar picture. This would send him to seek in nature those principles which the great master had followed so beautifully. Do you not perceive that if he could but seize the connecting link, he would be on the high road to discover the truth in art for himself? When I mention a Titian, I mean also a Paul Veronese, a Giorgione, a Rubens, a Rembrandt, a Vandyck—any master, in a word, who is celebrated as a colourist.

"You can scarcely form a conception of the rapidity with which you would advance on this road, and what prodigious advantage you would have over others, even of equal talent, by painting after nature in this spirit—that is to say, with a view to colour. Try the experiment, and I am sure you will be obliged to me for the advice.

"The first intention you should have, when you draw from nature in this point of view, is to place yourself in a position to judge of the value and influence that it must have upon the background which you mean to give to your picture. This is a very important branch, and I shall prove it, I hope, to your satisfaction.

"Every object is cast up in relief against its background; and when you paint on a background without light—that is, of a dark brown—it holds the 'mass' or object painted within itself. If the background be clear, the mass is coloured, not to say brown.

"When then you paint after nature, and gaze at the object of your study, brought up by a background without light, and introduce it in your picture on the contrary, on a light background, the consequence will be that the two will not harmonise, and the effect of your picture will be spoiled.

"The true method by which you may avoid these evils is so simple that it is surprising it should have been neglected. It consists in guiding yourself strictly on the background which you wish to represent in your picture, and in placing your copy from nature on a similar background to that you had painted from. How is this to be done? By placing behind the object you are about to transfer to your canvas a linen or canvas of the colour of your proposed background. I would even require, that you might be the more correct, that you should lay on this canvas a coat of colours identical with your background. If you have a prominent figure to oppose to a light sky, your canvas should have that tint; if the background is architecture, through orifices in which the light pours, the canvas should be stone-coloured; if on a landscape, or a ruin, let it be of a similar colour. Be careful when you are drawing a light sky in the background to turn the canvas to the light, as when you are painting dark shadows you must do the contrary. The good masters of the Flemish school have never failed to take these precautions, and they have derived from this mode of proceeding the great advantage of seeing the force of colours in opposition; of appreciating their value; which can only be done by contrast; the more because no words, no prescription, no directions can indicate to you any tint of any kind whatever. It is only the study of nature which leads from one to the other—always by comparison, and never otherwise."

It will be seen from this production that the artist, so perfect as a painter and a disciple, is everywhere overcome by his filial piety, and seeks to be forgotten himself while glorifying his master. The great principle which Oudry has endeavoured to inculcate in his treatise is, that a picture should be always strictly in keeping with the background, and that before we compose or paint groups of figures and colour them, we must know on what background we are about to place them; then study them from nature, by placing behind the model a canvas of the same tone as that in which we intend to paint the background. It is quite true, in painting, that the background is a matter of importance too often neglected by artists in their anxiety to finish the principal figures. The background is, in a painting, what the key-note is in singing. A painter who forgets this principle is exactly in the same position as a musician, who having written a piece in a major key, afterwards plays it in a minor.

M. de Largillière always complained of a practice very common in France, of always placing the model—whatever size the picture—at the same distance from the eye. The figures once transposed to the canvas, the master coloured them by guess-work, according to the tone which he intended to give to the picture. This gave rise to numerous mistakes, to defective perspective, and many other very serious errors. If figures in the distant background were too lively in colour, or too faint, they were toned down by a glacis of very light blue, or they were heightened by some touches of darker colours. But these tints, supplied by the imagination, were far inferior to those fading, gentle, broken lines, lost as it were in the air, to use a quaint expression—to those faint, indistinct colours which cannot be described. As for the touch, it could not, acquired by guess, impart that vagueness and mistiness which is found in the reality.

To this elegant speech, substantial and yet highly coloured, M. Coypel returned a brief answer full of exquisite politeness, which was taken down upon the register of the deliberations.

Some little time after, there was remarked in an exhibition a tableau, which was the strict application of the principles of Largillière, and as if given as an example to illustrate lessons so eloquently presented. Diderot speaks of it in these terms: "A picture that M. Oudry painted subsequently to his paper read at the Academy, represents upon a white background five or six white objects, all of a different tint; such as a white duck, a damask napkin, a porcelain bowl full of whipped cream, a wax candle in a silver candlestick, and above some paper. This picture is of great, of inestimable value in the eyes of connoisseurs."

The passion, for it could be called by no other name, which Jean Baptiste Oudry conceived for animals, taught him most naturally to love La Fontaine, and inspired him with a desire to illustrate those admirable apologues of this best of little story-tellers. In his studious leisure, he composed more than a hundred and fifty drawings, which were engraved under the direction of Cochin, and are the ornaments of the celebrated edition published in 1755 by Monsieur de Montevault. The imagination of Oudry, the profound knowledge which he had acquired of the structure and the physiognomy of animals, is seen in this doubly precious work. We can here, indeed, appreciate his varied backgrounds, adorned by sweet landscapes; and we gaze with pleasure, in the admirable foreground, on large plants, while we unceasingly admire the attitude of the animals whose physiognomies actually seem to convey on many occasions the profound or the witty allusions of the fabulist. Before Carle Vernet, before Grandville, by whom, however, he was in after times surpassed, Oudry discovered the secret of giving to his animals the expression of human passions, and it is not without reason that the editor of his drawings calls him in the preface the La Fontaine of painting.

All the engravings are not, however, equally fine. Some, where the subject of the fable obliges the author to produce the human figure, are far from being equal to those in which animals alone fill up the scene. We may even very readily be led to believe that some of these drawings are not from the pencil of Oudry. We give in this part the words of the preface, in which the editor of the fables confesses that the drawings of Oudry have been touched up by Cochin. "M. Cochin, of the Royal Academy of Painting and Sculpture, undertook to engrave those drawings, or to have them engraved under his eyes. To succeed in this he was obliged to make new ones from the originals of M. Oudry, in which was distinctly seen that precision of outline to which painters never will bend in their compositions, and which is yet so necessary for the perfect success of the engraving." Strange confidence. Nevertheless, it is not doubtful that the expressions we have quoted are of rather a general character, and from the way in which most of the subjects are treated, it is quite clear that those who thought to correct Oudry only succeeded in reproducing him imperfectly.

He did not wholly confine himself to drawing subjects furnished him by the fables of La Fontaine. He painted six of these fables for the apartments of the Dauphin and Dauphiness. The Louvre possesses more than one of them, and they are really and truly little master-pieces—amongst others, that of "The Two She-goats:"—

"Deux chèvres donc s'emancipant,
Toutes deux ayant patte blanche,
Quitterent les bas prés, chacune de sa part :
L'une vers l'autre allait pour quelque bon hasard,
Et ruisseau se rencontre, et pour pont une planche."

The moment when our two adventurers meet nose to nose on the bridge, is precisely that selected by the tasteful artist. The scrupulous fidelity with which the painter has served the fabulist, and the naïveté of the tableau, give it its charm. The fierce Amazons meet like two knights in a tournament; and the charm, the piquancy of their attitudes, is derived from its simple truth. The landscape represents some willows, painted broadly and with great vigour; while the faint light of the sky after the sunset is beautifully rendered. The foreground is all demi-tint. We feel that at this mysterious hour the country is deserted and abandoned: the memorable combat will have no other witness save the waves of the stream, into which are about to fall the descendants of the she-goat Amalthea, which had the immortal honour of nourishing Jupiter.

Diderot speaks of another composition which we have engraved (p. 321): "A picture which pleased everybody, and which may truly be called the best picture in the whole exhibition, because it is really and truly faultless, is 'A Dog with Puppies.' It is impossible by any effort of the pen to give any idea of the truth and vigour of expression which is here displayed by the artist. The semi-stupid languor and the menacing fear of the beast are the work of the real and undoubted genius of the painter. A ray of the sun, which falls on the head of the mother through a loophole, is something really marvellous. This ray of light seems really to stand up out of the picture. This canvas, which is four feet wide by three high, of an oval form, has been recently purchased by the Baron de Hölbach, who gave a hundred pistoles for it."

D'Argenville, in his interesting and lucid biography of this artist, has said: "The pictures of Oudry are rather the work of mind and imagination, than of sentiment and the heart. There are in Oudry none of those dashing and exciting effects, which genius grasps, divines, snatches at, when warmed by the heated imagination. His inventions are calm, real, well-ordained; his drawing correct, his lights ably disposed, his pencil clever and easy; and, nevertheless, in all his works there is wanting that sort of surprise, that spirit, that frank open style, which add so much to the charms of talent and genius."

Jean Baptiste Oudry was a worthy and excellent man. It appears that he never inspired any one with hatred, and that through his life he enjoyed the delight and satisfaction of being surrounded by many and warm friends. He loved music almost as much as he did painting. "To love music," says a French critic, "is almost to possess a virtue." When Largillière painted his portrait, he took care to remind us of this circumstance, by surrounding the medallion with appropriate ornaments. On one side is a palette, on the other a violin. The probity of the "beloved painter" of Louis XV. was beyond suspicion; and he was always above the corruptions of the court and the venality of his day. He was, in fact, an honest man in every sense of the word. The generality of French critics, from this very circumstance, doubt his claims to be considered a great painter.

If the talent of Oudry sinned somewhat on the side of liberty and fancy, on the other hand what correctness he shows in imitation, what truth in the physiognomies, what charming naïveté in the position of his personages, that is, of his favourite, his "beloved characters"—animals. In his hunting scenes that he loved so much to paint, it is not so much the wild chase, the helter-skelter scamper through woods, over hedges, stiles, and ditches that we see; it is not so much the excitement and emotion of the combat, when the wild boar turns round against the panting dogs, when the deer falls wearied under the teeth of ever renewed enemies; it is rather the peculiar physiognomy of each animal, the special character of each race, the distinctive features of each individual. One day Largillière was so pleased with two of his hunting scenes, a wild boar and a bear hunt, copied by Oudry from a Dutchman, that he opened his purse to buy them; Oudry refused the money, and made him a present of them.

We have already alluded to his having painted the portrait of every animal in the Jardin des Plantes; he further drew a series of hunting hounds, into which he introduced every distinct race. It would be endless to attempt to enumerate all the drawings with which Oudry has enriched French art. He himself has engraved several on steel. Of these, the most celebrated are five hunting pieces, drawn and engraved by himself, and amongst which the most remarkable are:—"A Wolf at Bay," "A Deer hanging to a tree, with several Birds," and "A Fox caught by Four Dogs."

"The Fox startled while devouring his prey" (p. 324) is very cleverly executed. The background is clear and definite, the animal is represented with scrupulous fidelity, the attitude is admirable, his ears intimate clearly that the deep baying of the hound has been heard; his teeth, his mouth, combine to form an expression of fierce rage which is peculiarly effective; the tail lying over the paw is exceedingly natural, while the unfortunate victim lies in an attitude so real, so exactly as we should expect to see it, that too much praise can scarcely be given to this production.

"The Roebuck run down" (p. 328) is also a very fine piece. The dogs, the hunted beast, the tree, the accessories of every kind, are effective and natural. This is a celebrated picture, of which the colouring is peculiarly successful.

"The Rat and the Elephant" (p. 329) is a representation of one of those fanciful allegories to which we have already alluded. It is exceedingly correct in its details, and holds a deservedly high place in the minds of amateurs, from the power of its lights and shadows. The ear is imaginative certainly, but what is wanting in truth is gained in picturesqueness.

"The Wolf at Bay" (p. 333) is held in high estimation. It is exceedingly effective in the engraving, and still more so as a painting. It is a subject which Oudry thoroughly comprehended. The wolf is correctly painted, and the dogs admirable in truth, vigour, and expression. A previous allusion has, however, been made to this work.

"The Heron" (p. 332) is a specimen of those still-nature productions which have carried Oudry's reputation into the private galleries of so many of the country gentlemen of the world. The trees, the old trunk, the game, the dog, are painted with expression and rare fidelity.

The most picturesque of all those represented in our pages is that of "Bertrand and Raton" (p. 336). It is difficult to say which is most successful, the monkey or the cat. They are startling from the life-like vigour with which they are painted. This is an illustration of a favourite fable of La Fontaine's.

Whatever may have been the talent of Oudry for drawing and painting animals, it must be allowed that he was not equally well acquainted with every species, and is not always successful in seizing the true character and manner. If he was perfect in dogs, foxes, wolves, even monkeys; and in general in animals which figure as principal characters in hunting scenes, and which he was so fond of dedicating to more perfect in the art of grouping in trophies, pikes, eels, tench, carp, and shell-fish; or in combining on one canvas, to please the eye, some snipe hanging by a claw, partridges, and quails, ducks of changing colour, with their beautiful emerald spots. How common it is to see artists of the present day imitating these signs over doors, by Oudry, where in chance medley we find violins, guitars, flutes, tamborines, and a hundred other different attributes of the arts. These happy and successfully "arranged disorders," to use an hyperbolic French phrase, invented with so much care, executed with so much talent, have since become mere "Messire Louis Bontemps, capitaine des chasses de la vénerie du Louvre," he was far less fortunate when he attempted to portray lions, panthers, and leopards. It seems as if it was reserved for the modern artist to comprehend, elucidate, and create the savage and poetic side of creation. Oudry humanised his tigers, softened down and civilised his panthers, and made his lions quite tame and gentlemanly beings; but he was at home and true when he had to reproduce the bounding deer or the delicate doe, and he knew so admirably how to co-ordinate and arrange the wooded scene, so full of delicate perfume and country balminess. He was also exceedingly successful in the representation of still nature. No one was fillings up—agreeable enough, but so evidently copies as to lose all zest and power.

Oudry used his talents also sometimes in providing models, sometimes in executing table ornaments. France has always been a peculiar country, and one of its greatest peculiarities has been minute attention to the philosophy of the table. In early days, before art had discovered the means of decorating tables, it employed those offered by nature. Flowers, which grow so abundantly and richly on the surface of the earth, were naturally enough the principal objects selected; they were eagerly chosen by man to adorn his table. The walls of houses in early days in France were much in want of ornament. A rare book, that of Fortunat, tells us that the walls, instead of showing the naked stone, were adorned with ivy. The floor of the festive hall was carpeted with flowers: silver lilies and purple poppies covered the ground. The table was loaded with roses, which took the place of a table-cloth. Flowers, too, were used to adorn chapels. The poets of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries often allude to this custom; while guests wore chaplets of flowers, which also hung from the bottles.

In the fourteenth century artistic contrivances were added,

Objects adorned with scenes of the chase were those chiefly selected by Oudry when he designed these ephemeral sketches, sketches which had for their sole object the amusement and gratification of a prince whom he wished to please, because he patronised him largely. Stags, dogs, wolves, as in his pictures, were the subjects selected; and though only designed for the pleasure of the hour, they were, it is said, sometimes singularly beautiful. Of course, they are not in any way preserved, and the memory only of these trifles now remains.

Oudry has condescended even to make charades and and we hear of white cloths, on which flowers were tacked by way of ornament. Louis XIV. in his banquets had his tables also thus adorned. In 1680, at the marriage of Mademoiselle of Blois with the Prince of Conti, no other decoration appeared. Later, a kind of cake was invented of clay, by Polish artists, who stuck flowers all over it; and later still, various ornaments of the highest taste, more artificial, but more permanent, were introduced. Oudry conceived many of these for such men as Louis XV. and the Regent of Orleans, who, whatever their depravity, always encouraged a spirit of beauty in all that surrounded them.

rebuses; but they want that startling effect, that amusing absurdity, that salt which now is generally found in these productions. The talent of Oudry was so nove and so decent, that he was never able successfully to illustrate the "Comic Romance" of Scarron. To enter with spirit into the very reality of this grotesque conception required a liveliness, a gaiety, a humour, which Oudry did not possess. In the seventeenth century, amidst the magnificence and splendours of the reign of Louis XIV., the poem of Scarron was one hundred years after date, and quite out of place. It may be readily imagined, that when reading the "Comic Romance,"

Louis XIV. must have been quite as much offended as at the "magots" of Teniers the younger; and he must have been profoundly humiliated to have married the widow of such a poet, to have succeeded—after having loved Athenais de Mortemart—the historian of the Cavern and of Ragotin. Oudry, who, by the dignity and decency of his manner, was a man of the seventeenth century, could not understand the spirit of a novel which reminded the reader of the jokes of Don Quixote and the indecencies of Brantome. He was, therefore, rather cold and heavy when he tried to paint the scenes of this celebrated book. It needed the pen, the wit, the ease of Pater, to paint that wandering caravan of comedians, making a triumphal entry into Mans upon a car drawn by oxen, and carrying all the baggage and materials of the dramatic company: ladder, cages, decorations, old carpets; this one with a guitar on his back, the other with a plaster on his eye; the mob, and particularly the women, scattering their jokes mercilessly after them.* A certain dose of buffoonery was required to paint the burlesque adventures of Ragotin—the rows, the riots, the adventures in the gaming-house, the showers of fisticuffs, at which are present the washerwoman and Angelica, while on the ground roll the hats of the vanquished. At all events, Oudry showed his great power over light and shade, which plays so marked a part in his compositions, whether it lights up in a picturesque way the scene on the stairs, or the chastising of the servants, or sheds its beams upon the very spot where fall the blows. But it wanted Hogarth to do justice to the subjects which were not either very decent or very refined.

Oudry, always laborious and always inexhaustible, was suddenly checked in his studies by an attack of apoplexy, which struck him in 1755. Afflicted by painful presentiments, he used to say, "If I do not work, I shall die." He had become director and manager of the factory of Beauvais, after being over the Gobelins. He wished to start for Beauvais, in the hope of recruiting his health by the balmy breath of the country air. He died on his arrival, on the 30th of April, 1755, at the age of sixty-nine.

He was widely regretted, for he was a very able artist, a clever master, a sincere friend, a good man; and this is much indeed to say in a time like that in which he lived—the age of good old-gentlemanly vices, when Louis XIV. was king; of orgies and monstrous depravity, when Louis XV. was monarch.

Oudry introduced into some of his scenes, morning breaking and craggy hills and forests with considerable effect; and once, in a scene supposed to be in Switzerland, he is exceedingly successful. The subject was good, but difficult, and the picture is now in one of the private galleries of Paris. M. Bouchard, a very well-known amateur, says that it is exceedingly fine. The following will give some idea of the difficulty of the subject. "All the world over," says one who has described in a few dashes the best of Swiss scenery, "the dawn of morning is beautiful, when the earth looks like a bride arrayed in orient pearls, and the sun spreads far and wide his canopy of crimson clouds, which his glory converts gradually into gold. But amid the Valais Alps, the loveliness of morning sets language at defiance. Imagine endless wreaths of snow, crowning piny mountains, and enveloped with a rosy flush by the magic of the young light. This glowing investiture, like the breast of the dove, every moment displays new colours, glancing off in fugitive coruscations which dazzle and intoxicate the senses. A luminous border hangs upon cliff and crag, and a whisper, soft as the breath of love, showers down upon you from the pine forests as you move. A feeling, half religion, half sense, fills your breast, and your eyes become humid with gratitude as you look upwards and around you. The reading of your childhood comes over you—you remember the earliest page in the history of man—And God saw all that he had made, and behold it was very good"—and good, you murmur to yourself, it is. If there be poetry in the soul, it comes out at such moments; and by the process which I faintly and imperfectly describe, travelling sometimes mellows the character and improves our relish of life."

Jean Baptiste Oudry engraved seventy-five pieces with his own hand.

Of these we have engraved "The Roebuck run down," and "The Wolf at Bay." The "Roebuck run down" is a very able and effective engraving in the original.

Out of thirty-eight pieces which Oudry sketched for the comic romance of Scarron, twenty-one are engraved by himself. He also sketched several designs for Don Quixote.

His best, however, are those illustrating "La Fontaine."

For the chapter of St. Martin-des-Champs, he painted "The Adoration of the Magi;" for the apartments of the king at Choisy, a monstrous wolf held by four dogs, a jackal attacked by two hull-dogs, some specimens of still nature, boars, deers, herons, pheasants, horses, hung up; for the apartments of the dauphiness at Versailles, subjects taken from the fables of La Fontaine—"The Two She-Goats," "The Fox and the Stork."

The pictures of Oudry are principally found in Paris and the departments.

In the Louvre there is "A Wolf Hunt," "A Boar Hunt," "A Dog guarding some Game."

The Museums of Dijon, Toulouse, Montpellier, Nantes, Caen, and Rouen, have some excellent specimens of this master.

In 1770, at the sale of the Cabinet of M. de la Live de Jully, two pictures of Oudry, representing "Seven Ducks lying," and "A Dog barking at a Fox," were sold for £20. "Two Hounds lying near a Hare and a Partridge," £15.

At the Prince de Conti's, there were six paintings by Oudry.

At the sale of the collection of that amateur, in 1777, two specimens of still nature, painted at Dieppe in 1724, representing "Parrots and Fish," rose to the high price of £36.

THE TOMB OF JULIUS II.

MANY persons have heard of the sufferings of artists and authors, of the struggles and difficulties which almost every man of genius has had to endure, especially in the beginning of his career. Often, too, this has lasted far beyond the time when men have acquired celebrity and fame. It is too true, that those who delight us by their pens and by their pencils are often thoughtless, to use no stronger term; though it would be unfair and unjust to accuse all of the errors of some, and to fancy that every man who suffers does so from improvidence and want of ordinary foresight. In many instances, among the men of the greatest genius, difficulties have arisen from a very different source. Jealousies, suspicions, and heartburnings, have been indulged by rivals, who have contrived, by petty and weak annoyances, to make the existence of some of the best of men a misery.

Michael Angelo, that great painter, whose name is familiar to the merest tyro in the history of art, was not exempt from the heartburnings and annoyances which so many men suffered in common with himself. At a very early age he entered with Ghirlandajo as a pupil; but instead of being taught, he began to teach. In truth, though he was but thirteen, his copies were better than the original. But the master smiled, and encouraged his bold apprentice. Not so the pupils: they were jealous of the juvenile artist. Benvenuto Cellini, himself a great man, often speaks of the blind hatred of his fellow-students. He could feel for him and sympathise with him. A quotation from the wondrous memoir of the Florentine silversmith will be well worthy of a place here.

"About this time (it was in 1518, thirty years after the event—Cellini was only eighteen), there came to Florence a sculptor named Peter Torregiani:—he came from England, where he had stayed several years. This man, seeing my designs and my labours, said to me: 'I have come to Florence to take away as many young men as I can. I have a great work to execute for the King of England; and I will have no assistants but my own countrymen; and as your mode of working and drawing is more that of a sculptor than a jeweller, I will take you away with me, and I will make you at the same time rich and able."

"He was a bold proud man, was Peter Torregiani, of manly appearance and great beauty. His air, his manners, his sonorous voice, were more like those of a soldier than an artist; he had a mode of frowning enough to startle the most resolute; and every day he told me of his strange stories about those fools of English! One day we were speaking of Michael Angelo Buonarrotti; Torregiani was holding in his hand a drawing which I had copied after the great master, and he said:

"Buonarrotti and I used to go to work when young in the church of the Carmine, in the chapel of Masaccio; and as he was accustomed to make fun of all those who drew along with him, one day, being more angry than usual, I raised my fist, and gave him so violent a blow on the face that I felt the bone and the cartilage of his nose break under my hand; so that he will bear the mark of it all his life." "These words," adds the indignant young man, "shocked me so much, as I had the works of the divine Michael Angelo constantly under my eyes, that I conceived for Torregiani an implacable hatred; and not only did I lose all desire to follow him to England, but I could no longer bear even to see him."

This noble and generous anger was worthy at the same time of him who excited and of him who felt it. It is quite true, however, that Michael Angelo, perhaps without knowing it, was every day committing some new crime, which drew upon him the vengeance of his comrades and the jealousies of his masters. The unhappy youth could not succeed in quelling his genius. One day a portrait was given him to copy, and when he had finished his work, he gave it to the man who had lent him the portrait, instead of the original. The painter, who was one of his friends, though professing to be a great connoisseur, did not perceive the change; and it may easily be imagined that he was overwhelmed with confusion when the anecdote got abroad. The lad had somewhat smoked his picture, in order to give it that antique appearance which adds so much to the price of works of art in the eyes of those who judge by date, and not by merit.

Michael Angelo had now time to commence a few works in sculpture. Already his productions were considered of so much value that they are preserved to this day as precious relics. Among these was a bas-relief, representing, according to Vasari, "The Battle of the Centaurs," with a virgin, in the style of Donatello, and a statue of Hercules, which nobody has seen except his biographers. But suddenly Lorenzo the Magnificent, seized by a mysterious and incurable disease, died at Carreggi in the midst of his rhetoricians. He finished his career as he had lived, rather as a poet than as a Christian. Arts and letters lost in him a Mæcenas. Michael Angelo lost more than a protector—he lost a friend.

Overwhelmed with grief, he now returned to his father's house. At the age of eighteen years his prospects, which were becoming so splendid, were suddenly overcast. Pietro de Medici, the heir and successor of Lorenzo, began his reign by throwing his father's physician into a well; this promised favourably for those who continued in his service. However, Michael Angelo was one morning called to the court. It was snowing hard, and the brother of Leo the Tenth had awoke with great projects. A man is not a Medici for nothing.

"Master," said he to the young sculptor, "I want you to make me a colossal figure—a giant, who will arise as if by enchantment in the court-yard, and be higher by a head than the battlements of my palace. As my father chose you for his sculptor in ordinary, your genius must be equal to such a task. Go, and set to work."

"But of what materia must this statue be?" inquired Michael Angelo, with rather a surprised look.

"The material," replied Pietro, laughing, "you will find in the court-yard. There is plenty of it. There must be at least three feet of snow."

"True," said Michael Angelo, bitterly, "I am in your employ as I was in the employ of your father. Only, when he ordered statues, he preferred marble to snow. Every one has his taste, sire."

Then he added to himself, "As is the prince so will be the monument. Go, poor soul and weak heart; your greatness will scarcely last longer than your statue."

However, he complied with the orders of Pietro with scrupulous exactness, and leaving his colossus before a single beam of sun came to melt it, he retired to one of the cells of San Spirito, where he passed days and nights, sombre, sad, isolated, weeping for his benefactor, and meditating on the darkness of his unhappy country.

It was in this austere retreat, surrounded by dead bodies, which he obtained from a hospital attached to the convent, that, by the light of a lamp, Michael Angelo gave himself up to the long and persevering study of anatomy, which was to be his governing passion.

Armed with his scalpel, he investigated the muscles, he studied the fibres, he laid bare the scaffolding of the human heart. The fruit of his vigils was a wooden crucifix, a little larger than nature, which he presented to the prior of the monastery which had afforded him an asylum, and where he had been able, at least, to rest in peace and to retire from the shame of these melancholy days.

Michael Angelo produced from a common block of marble, which had been massacred by Simon of Fiesole, a colossal statue of David. He was then twenty-four years of age, and his absolute and haughty temper would not suffer a single observation to be made. Woe to those who took the liberty to make any remark. He overwhelmed them with his anger, or pitilessly satirised them.

The too celebrated Soderini, although he was gonfalonniere, learnt this to his cost. The worthy man, who was as able a connoisseur as he was an excellent politician, ventured to express an opinion upon David. He said that the nose was too large.

"Do you think so, illustrious signor?" answered the artist, with his most hypocritical look. Then he took a little powdered marble in the hollow of his hand, and gave two or three raps with his hammer, without touching the statue.

"There now," cried the gonfalonniere with delight, "that's how a David ought to be. You have given life to him."

"'Tis to you that he owes life, signor."

After this it is not astonishing that Machiavelli, in speaking of the same Soderini, wrote four verses, in which he relates that the worthy gonfalonniere, having presented himself by mistake at the gates of the infernal regions, Pluto shut the door in his face, and said: "What do you want here, you fool? Go to the limbo of children."

However, if the poor gonfalonniere was stupid, as appears to be historically demonstrated, he was not avaricious. He gave four hundred Florence crowns to Michael Angelo, and got him to paint in fresco a part of the hall of council. Leonardi di Vinci undertook the other half.

Leonardi chose for the subject of his fresco the victory gained over Piccinino, general of the Duke of Milan. In the foreground is a battle of cavaliers and the capturing of a standard. Michael Angelo undertook an episode of the war of Pisa.

Generally a battle, above all at a time when soldiers are clothed in iron, offers few resources to an artist accustomed to the naked. The genius of Michael Angelo did not stop at a little.

An incident, which in the case of any other artist would have passed unperceived, suddenly illuminated the ideas of the great artist, and his cartoon was made.

Overcome by the stifling heat, the Florentine soldiers are bathing in the Arno, when the Pisans suddenly make a sortie. The enemy appears; the cry is to arms; a crowd spring up; some, half-naked, catch at their swords; others try, by superhuman efforts, to get their clothes upon their wet limbs. The drum beats; impatience and despair are depicted in the features of the unhappy footmen who cannot join their flag. The appearance of this masterpiece cast the first artists of the day into a profound stupor. From every part of Italy people came to admire it, to copy it, to study it. San Gallo, Ghirlandajo, Granini, Andre del Sarto, San Jovino, le Rosso, Perrin del Vaga—all of these, young men and old, masters and pupils, bowed in silence before the sovereign artist, who, with a giant's step bounding over his whole career, touched the last limits of the sublime, beyond which it is not possible for man to go.

Benvenuto Cellini speaks much of the events of this time. It was about this time that the brutal Torregiani boasted of his anecdote.

"As long as the cartoon stood," says Cellini, "it was the school of the world; though the divine Michael Angelo after-

"I had made up my mind," says Benvenuto, "to dash him to the ground wherever I found him. Having reached the Plaza Santa Doninica, I perceived Bandinelli, who was entering the same square on the opposite side. More decided than ever upon carrying out my sanguinary project, I ran towards him; but I had no sooner cast my eyes on the wretch, and seen him without arms, mounted on a wretched mule that looked like a jackass, following a little boy about ten years old, than Bandinelli saw me, turned pale as death, and trembled from head to foot. I thought it base to kill such a wretch, and said: 'Do not fear, vile coward, you are not worthy of my blows!'"

Scarcely was Julius II. on the throne when he sent for Michael Angelo. Such an artist was worthy of such a pope.

Julius reflected several months upon the work which he wards executed the great chapel of Pope Julius, he never reached half the talent displayed in this masterpiece."

A Frenchman observes: "This was the time to have pugnarded Michael Angelo."

But this was not enough. Hatred sometimes acts with atrocious calculation, and envy has diabolical inspirations. They forgave the artist, but the work suffered for him. In the year 1512, while there was an émoué in the streets, while the republic was expiring, when the Medici were coming back victorious, Baccio Bandinelli, of base and execrable memory, crept in with slow step, treacherously, a dagger in his hand, to the hall where the masterpiece was hung up, and while people were fighting in the streets, this wretch, assassin, and thief, thrust his knife into the canvas, tore it to pieces, trod it under foot, and carried away the remnants.

destined for the greatest sculptor of his age. The ambition of the pope knew no bounds. His thirst for glory was insatiable. He dreamt of immortality upon the earth, and was not long, therefore, in making his choice.

He accordingly sent for the great artist, and addressed him thus:

"If you were to erect a tomb for Julius II., what would be your design for that tomb?"

"I should wish," answered Michael Angelo, after having thought a moment, "that the grandeur of the tomb should answer to the grandeur of the pontiff who orders it. The general form of the monument should be that of a parallelogram, thirty feet in length by fifteen in breadth. The height should be at least thirty feet. Forty statues, without counting the bas-reliefs, should enrich the mausoleum, crowned by a group of figures representing the apotheosis of your Holiness. Four victories, two feminine and two masculine, should stand on each side of the monument, trampling under foot slaves or rebels. Sixteen statues should represent the conquered provinces, or the captive virtues riveted with chains to the tomb of him who, whilst he lived, reduced the pride of the first and constituted the glory of the second. Eight colossal statues, of from ten to twelve feet, should adorn the upper portion. In fine, there would be entrances to the interior by the two sides, leading to the rotunda, in the centre of which the sarcophagus should be placed."

The pope listened in silence, and looked fixedly at the artist, who was inspired by the grandeur of his subject, and talked with the greatest coolness of this mortuary palace, Nicolas V. caused the foundation to be laid. I will finish the new church according to the drawings of Horeslino, and the chapel shall be worthy of the tomb."

"And how much will this new building cost?"

"About a hundred thousand crowns."

"Two hundred thousand, if necessary," answered the pope.

"Then I may start at once for Carrara?"

"Immediately. And don't forget to come to me, without any internuncio, whenever you want to speak to me. Or rather," said the pope, after a moment's thought, "I will cause a bridge to be constructed that shall lead from my rooms to your workshop, and I will come and see you, and scold you whenever the work lags. Adieu, Michael Angelo; you have understood me."

without thinking of the sombre and lugubrious reflections which he was suggesting to the heart of the old man who was to occupy it.

Those who know the character of the inhabitants of Italy, and the instinctive aversion which is felt in that country for death and for all the ideas which relate to it, will easily understand the majestic and strange character of the conversation of these two men, one of whom was giving orders for his tomb, whilst the other was explaining in the most minute manner how it was to be constructed. When the sculptor had finished, Julius II. made only one objection.

"Where shall we place this immense monument?" said he.

"I have thought of it," replied Michael Angelo. "Your tomb, such as I have conceived it, could not be contained in the old church of St. Peter; but we have the tribune of which

The great place of St. Peter was soon encumbered with enormous blocks of marble, brought from Carrara. The last instalment had been disembarked at the quay of the Tiber, and Michael Angelo, who generally lived in the most complete isolation, did not know what had happened at court during his absence, and went up to the Vatican to ask for money to pay the sailors. He was told that his holiness was not visible. A few days afterwards he went again to the pope. As he was crossing the antechamber, a valet stopped the way, and said to him drily, that he could not enter.

"Unhappy man! Do you know to whom you are speaking?" cried a prelate who had recognised Michael Angelo.

"I know it very well," impudently answered the valet; "and I only obey my orders."

"Very well," answered the indignant artist; "when the pope sends for me, tell him that I am gone."

An hour afterwards he started for Florence. But Julius II. was not the man to allow the artist whom he considered to be in his pay to escape from his hands so easily. When he learnt the answer, and the flight of Michael Angelo, his anger was great. Five couriers, one after the other, set off at full gallop to bring back the fugitive. When they saw that entreaties were of no use, the messengers of Julius attempted to resort to force; but Michael Angelo seized his weapons, and cried with a terrible voice, "If you come on, you are dead men!"

The messengers, in alarm, allowed Michael Angelo to continue his journey. The anger of the pope knew no bounds. He threatened to reduce Florence to ashes if his sculptor was not restored to him. Soderini received three despatches within three days; the first promised amnesty and pardon to the artist; the second declared war against the republic; the third announced that if Michael Angelo did not return to Rome within twenty-four hours, all the Florentines would be excommunicated.

"Do you intend to destroy us all?" said the poor gonfalonniere, trembling with fear.

"Ha! ha!" answered Michael Angelo; "this will teach him to forbid me his door."

"But I cannot keep you here, unhappy man."

"Well, then, I will go to the Grand Turk."

"To the Grand Turk!"

"Yes; he will treat me better, I am sure. Besides, he intends to throw a bridge from Constantinople to Pera, and has made me the most magnificent proposals."

"Go where you please, but deliver us from the anger of the pope."

Meanwhile, Julius II., true to his word, was advancing at the head of an army. He had taken Bologna, and was extremely delighted with his victory, when Michael Angelo, changing his mind, presented himself before him. Julius II. was at table at the palace of the Sixteen, when the arrival of the sculptor was announced to him. He made a sign that he should be introduced, and not being able to restrain his rage at the sight of the rebel, he cried out—

"You should have come to us, and you expect us to come to you."

Michael Angelo bowed his knee; but in spite of this attitude of submission and respect, it was easy to see that his features expressed rather pride than repentance. Sombre, silent, with bent brow, he seemed to say to the pope, "Non homini sed Petro," not to the man but to Peter. All the witnesses of this scene trembled for the poor sculptor, but as the impetuosity of the pope was known, nobody dare to speak, except the cardinal Soderini, worthy brother of the gonfalonniere, who, with the best intentions, began to offer excuses for the artist.

"Holy father, pardon this man; for he did not know what he did. Artists, if you deprive them of their art, are always so. If he has sinned, it is from ignorance."

Julius II. could restrain himself no longer, and giving the maladroit cardinal a blow with his stick, he cried in a voice of thunder, "Unhappy wretch! do you dare to abuse my sculptor? Thou only art ignorant and sinful. Get out of my sight."

Every one trembled with fear; and as the poor prelate remained motionless with astonishment and terror, the exasperated pope added, "Throw that fellow out of the window."

The valets had some difficulty in removing his eminence through the door. As we have seen, the Soderini were always unfortunate.

The same evening beheld Michael Angelo and Julius II. the best friends in the world. These two men understood each other completely. For such a workman such a master was required. The pope sat for his portrait and started for Rome, begging the sculptor to follow him as soon as the statue was finished.

"Remember, Michael Angelo," said he, "that my tomb is waiting for you."

Such were the last words of his holiness. Michael Angelo spent sixteen months upon the colossal statue, that is to say, fifteen months more than was necessary for his enemies to recommence their intrigues. This time, Bramanti was at their head, and among the rivals who were opposed to Michael Angelo, was Raffaele. Happily for our artist, Julius II. was as obstinate in his friendships as in his hatreds. He continued to favour Michael Angelo; and although the courtiers, who were inimical to him, insidiously worked upon the pope by praising the efforts of the great artist in painting, at the expense of his reputation as a sculptor, they did not entirely succeed in their object. It is true, however, though Michael Angelo did not lose the good opinion of the pope, that the famous tomb was never completed.

The fact is, that the genius of Michael Angelo developed itself more and more every day, and the whole artist-world became aware of his might. Artists admired him; amateurs and connoisseurs loved him, but mere courtiers hated him. He was proud, haughty, brave, and, worse than all, he had the favour of the pope, who freely opened his purse to him. Money, which the hangers-on about the court thought might be advantageously spent on them, was lavished by Julius in painting and statuary, which was certainly grand—but was it useful?

The delight which Michael Angelo felt at the prospect of erecting such a tomb as that of Julius, can scarcely be described. Those who have the idea of beauty, of the sublime in art; those who have long been weighed down by the influence of a fixed implacable idea, the realisation of which does not depend upon themselves; those who have conceived, in the delirium of their imagination, a gigantic, immense, impossible project, and who suddenly see obstacles removed, thought take a form, and the impossible retreat—those alone can understand what then was passing in the mind of the artist, when Julius II. decided on his tomb.

While a whole crowd of workmen, under his orders, were working in the quarries digging out the marble, he, silent, pensive, overwhelmed by gigantic images, stood upon a great rock which overlooked the sea.

"Why should I not carve the rock?" he cried, while his imagination, roused and on fire, carried him away into realms of space. "Why should not my chisel cut into the flanks of this mountain? Under my hand the rock would become a colossus which would startle the passing navigator. My name would be engraved on it in ineffaceable characters—my work would be eternal as the work of God. But patience. I, too, will have my mountains of marble, and a whole creation of supernatural and mighty beings shall rise to life under my mighty hand. I shall only have to say, Live, and they shall live."

Meanwhile, by the influence of a courtier, a mere insect, whose very name is not recorded in history, the pope had cast Michael Angelo from his heart for a short time, and the event which we have recorded had happened.

The same again took place while he was carving out his statue. A knot of mean and narrow-minded courtiers attacked the pope on all sides.

"He is a great painter," said one.

"It is a pity he should try to be both sculptor and artist."

"Some men will be everything; and yet he is not equal to Raffaele."

"Silence!" the pope roared at these sycophants, and they held their tongues, to begin again next day.

At one time there was a talk of prosecuting Michael Angelo for the sum he had received on account of the tomb of Julius. The sculptor, in a furious rage, came to Rome; but the cardinal de Medici, who soon after was Clement VII., begged him to have patience, and got him to build, in the mean time, the library and sacristy of San Lorenzo, the two first architectural works executed by Michael Angelo. He was now forty years of age.

The Duke of Urbino, nephew of Julius II., finding other modes of proceeding too slow for his fancy, tried another experiment to make the sculptor hurry with the monument of his uncle. He had him menaced, in that day of summary justice, with a poniard, if he did not yield to his desires. The proud artist made no reply, and left the Duke of Urbino to his impotent rage.

Clement VII., having ascended the throne, called Michael Angelo to him.

"My dear Buonarotti," said the pope, whispering familiarly in his ear, "instead of defending yourself, attack the heirs of Julius II. It is time that you received money on account; but at the rate at which your statues are paid now-a-days, the money that you have received does not cover the labour you have had. Bring them before the tribunals; from debtor you will become creditor."

"I would rather finish the monument," said the artist, drily; and he returned immediately to Florence.

But the monument was one of those things which was not to be finished. There was always some reason or other for delaying it or putting it off.

Clement VII. kept the artist fully employed. He visited him every day. One morning a servant told him that Clement VII. would visit him no more—he was dead.

The first thing the new pope, Paul III., did, was to present himself at the atelier of Buonarotti.

"Come! come!" said the pope, "now, master Michael Angelo, your time belongs to me."

"Your holiness will excuse me," said the artist. "I have just signed an undertaking to finish the tomb of Julius II."

And yet it never was finished.

MODERN BRITISH ART—THE PRE-RAPHAELITES.

WHEN Pope Adrian I. delivered, in his infallibility, a bull, which declared that all painters should represent our Saviour as possessing every attribute of beauty which they were capable of exhibiting, he founded the Pre-Raphaelites. The reader may perhaps see no connexion with the eighth century and the nineteenth; but if he only consider that since then painters have had but one type for the heads of the Saviour and the Apostles, and have degenerated into continual smoothness and into unmeaning faces such as West or Cosway produced, he will see at once what we mean. The earlier Byzantine fathers had taken it as a fact that, since the Saviour "should not be desired of men," he was repulsive, and they continually represented him so; but a dispute happening as to the truth of this, the earlier fathers, St. Jerome, St. Augustin, St. Bernard, and others, joined in the controversy, and Pope Adrian settled it with his bull.

Art is by its nature imitative. The earliest head of the Saviour which exists has the same attributes—the oval, melancholy face, the parted hair and calm eyes—as the most recent, and to a certain extent Adrian's bull had a vast effect. Great geniuses did not alter the type, but threw their weight into the improvement of manner. Till about the time of President West, which we take it was the most inartistic period of English art, we had gone on,

"Improving and improving oft,
Till all was ripe and rotten."

Character, force, and originality were forgotten, everything was intended to be pretty and pleasing; and the grand was deserted for the profitable. The mind of the income-seeking artist became imbued with the spirit of the times. Richard Wilson, with his wondrous genius in landscape, could not make a living. Fuselli, who, with all his eccentricities, was of immense talent, declared with a wretched pun that his name should have been "Few-sell-I." Von Holst was neglected, and R. B. Haydon destroyed himself in despair. With the exception of the first, none of these artists were perfect, but they were great men who should have found appreciation where they met with neglect. They certainly should not have been driven to despair whilst Cosway, Opie, and West flourished. Their deaths, however, produced some result; yet with little improvement and much mannerism, things went on in the same course. England produced great painters individually, but, as a school, mannerism and platitudes were triumphant.

Some half-dozen years ago, a few young men, impressed with this, determined to alter it, and, like all enthusiasts, at the first overshot the mark. To prove their perfect distinctness from modern art, they called themselves Pre-Raphaelians, which, if we understand the term rightly, was about tantamount to a dramatist of the time of Colman and Reynolds calling himself, out of contempt to those playwrights, a Pre-Shakespearean.

Messrs. Millais, Collins, and Hunt, who were the Coryphæi of this school, seeing that all other painters took pretty models, employed plain if not downright ugly ones; finding that the ordinary painter neglected detail and finish, studied every point, speck, or nail in the accessories of their picture; observing that modern artists excel in air and distance in the atmosphere of the picture, they painted sharply and coldly, so that every fold of the dress and feature of the face came out as distinctly as if one was examining it with a diminishing glass. It is plain that amongst these resolves there were many of the faults of enthusiasm. When they exhibited their pictures, amongst many merits, one saw that they had as much to unlearn as to learn, and their eccentricities were so plainly the effect of determination, that they excited an antagonism which resulted in ridicule and odium.

To support their ideas, they employed the pen as well as the pencil. They published a work bearing the name of "The Germ," which was upon the whole the most verdant production we recollect. It bore all the impress of youth, florid of fluent poetry, crude prose, and undigested ideas; illustrated with an etching which might have been copied from a missal. It was unlike anything modern. It was an attempt to reach the golden age by walking backwards; it was, a thousand fold more than their pictures, an effort against nature, and it died.

With such determination and such vigour of thought, the young painters who formed the school were not likely to die too. He who thinks originally must think against a large portion of mankind, but he will soon have disciples of his own. So it was with the Pre-Raphaelites. There was so much truth with them that they soon gathered respect; yet their earliest endeavour had grave faults.

Let us take, for instance, a picture by Mr. Millais, which was exhibited some four seasons ago. We allude to the "Holy Family," a painting in which the young Saviour was pictured as an ill-looking red-headed boy; the Virgin as a woman stricken in years (which was untrue at the period) and excessively commonplace; and St. Joseph as a carpenter of low and mean appearance, the muscles of his arm raised and strained from overwork. In addition to this, the feet of the Saviour were unwashed, and the dirt of them carefully copied. Here Mr. Millais was ignorant, the Jews being particularly careful in their daily ablutions. To redeem all this practical degradation, the detail of the picture was wonderful; time and knowledge had been expended upon every accessory. The shavings and tools looked more like reflections of the things than copies.

But in our opinion the grossness of the representation was a sin, and served to degrade Divinity rather than to elevate it. No one supposes the Saviour to have been crowned and robed as the later Italians make him, or as gorgeously arrayed as the cheap lithographs sold in Roman Catholic countries represent him. But Mr. Millais, though in another way, sinned equally against the truth. If we paint "Holy Families" at all, to which we strongly object, there is no reason why we should make them repulsive. The obvious purpose of such pictures is to exalt the ideas of those who have little imagination. Their earlier use, and that to which a religious society now turns prints of sacred subjects, was and is to instruct those who could not read. With the majority in England, that use has ceased; but we have yet to learn why they should not still elevate the beholders, as certainly the works of Raphael and Michael Angelo do. The faults of this picture extended also to others. Mr. Collins, in one called "Convent Thoughts" (we believe that the young artist embraced as well as illustrated Catholicism), chose a very plain model, an awkward and stiff position, somewhat after the Byzantine school, and a most unnatural method of holding a flower, at which the young lady is pensively looking. He also showed the same wonderful exactness in rendering the very petals of the flower or grain of the oak door, and thereby secured its defence by that rara avis amongst the critics on art, an original thinker—one no less than Mr. Ruskin.

d deservedly so. He has no longer sought out repulsive models, but observing that golden mean which always leads to truth, has also disdained the doll-like face of the vacant model, and produced such feelings, such tenderness and animation, that one unconsciously recalls the phrase of Byron,

"The mind, the music breathing from her face;" and whilst doing so acknowledges that the canvas glows with an emanation from true genius. Any one who has seen the pictures of this artist—"The Huguenot" and "The Order of Release"—must have observed that the expression in the

"BERTRAND AND RATON."—FROM A PAINTING BY OUDRY.

The great critic, who, to show how extremes meet, was also an enthusiast on Turner's landscapes, did much for the Præ-Raphaelites, but their genius did more. Though still young men, practice and success has been gradually removing many foibles, and the chief amongst them had fair to be honoured with posterity. Their very eccentricities have been useful, and have read serious lessons to rising and risen artists. Carelessness is now no longer pardonable, and simpering and stupid prettiness is only reproduced upon the canvas of the mediocre and unteachable. The latter pictures of these artists—of Mr. Millais especially—have attracted the notice of every one, and faces of the female figure of each tells the whole story as plainly as a book. The deep feeling which imbued the painter was communicated by a glance to the spectator.

With such triumphs as these, with original views and a determination to think for themselves, the Præ-Raphaelites have founded an English school of worth and great merit, and by it have produced works which the world "will not willingly let die;" and we therefore hope that, whilst every year chastens their efforts and detracts from their eccentricities, we may be enabled to forge the latter in the excellencies they possess.

CLAUDE LORRAINE.

THE history of a great painter is the history, for the time being, of the nation to which he belonged. Certainly, as genius is the greatest gift of heaven, the man possessed of genius should be the hero of the hour. It has seldom been so. Some booted and spurred ruffian, with a castle as big as a dozen factories, some cunning little statesman, some petty potentate who should have been a woodcutter, only he was born a prince, generally occupies more of the world's attention—more of the vulgar world's attention—than the man of mind can obtain. In the first place this arises from the fact that in modern times we leave art to itself; we neither educate the people in taste, nor do we encourage art itself in an efficient way. In ancient times, in Greece, the connexion of the state with art was avowed and distinct. We trust it to amateurs, and the encouragement of art is greater or less according to the number of amateurs. The office of the state appears to be, in our times, to prevent the total decay of pictures when painted, or to use them for some particular object.

Such was not the case with the Greeks. The arts were with them public, and not the duty or affair of individuals. They became so in after times when they had ceased to flourish, but never to the degree which exists with us. We mean by arts, of course, architecture, painting, and sculpture. Arnold Heeren, in his "Ancient Greece," and James Augustus St. John, in his elaborate work on "The Manners and Customs of Ancient Greece," have both fully developed this theorem. Architecture was the first to be encouraged, its object being use as well as beauty. Not only the Italians, but the Romans of the later ages, tried to unite the two, and in this way private buildings became works of art. But among the Greeks, there was a tendency to the same style of things even in the heroic age. In the halls and dwellings of kings, there was a peculiar grandeur and splendour, which some have called scientific architecture, which, however, disappeared with the monarchial form. Heeren thinks that after Athens became a democracy, there were no handsome private buildings. The investigations of Mr. St. John appear to show that if ostentation did disappear with the monarchy, private dwellings in Attica were really and truly elegant even after the advent of the government of the people.

It is common to find allusions to the boast of Augustus, that he found Rome built of brick and left it of marble; whereas the truth is, that nearly all the splendid enduring monuments, whether dedicated to religion or to facilitate the operation of industry, or the social convenience of the people—temples, aqueducts, roads, etc.—belong to a date anterior to the imperial usurpation.

The plastic art and painting held to each other the opposite relation of that existing in modern times. The first was highly cultivated, and though painting was supported and encouraged, it was in a less degree. The few remains of this department of Grecian art, which existed at the time when historians began to collect evidences of the glorious civilisation that had passed away, may in some degree account for the idea, not unfrequent, that the pencil was never employed in Hellas, but that the chisel alone was wielded by the artistic hand. In Greece, however, the arts, instead of being the instruments of luxury, were the ministers to an honourable public pride. Paintings could not so easily be set up to delight and teach the people; statues might be erected in open squares; the crowds of gods and heroes who were represented upon the Acropolis, could be gazed at by the multitude, and exist uninjured after the sun of centuries in that dry atmosphere had shone upon them.

Paintings could only be placed on walls, and the ancients broke up the even surfaces in their architecture with such profusion of pilasters, cornices, and sculptures, that there were no long ranges, such as we find in the galleries of modern Europe. They do not seem either to have discovered those light and durable colours, which in Egypt retain their vividness after three thousand years. Pictures, therefore, were more designed for furniture than the works of sculpture; indeed, there was scarcely an instance of a statue being the property of a private individual. Even the beautiful Phryne, the model of a hundred Hebes, after she had by an artful stratagem persuaded her lover, Praxiteles, to make her a present of a god of Love just born from a block of marble, immediately presented it to the inhabitants of a Grecian city. Besides, since the ancient artists rarely laboured for gain, wealthy individuals, like the Medici of modern Italy, could not so easily secure the selfish gratification of vast private collections. Still, when Pericles began to corrupt Athens by the display of inordinate grandeur, landscapes and portraits and religious legends, groups of ideal beauty, painted in vivid and delicate colours, began to glow on the walls of the public porticoes and temples. Alcibiades, also, is said to have introduced the custom of adorning private chambers with a kind of fresco. Portrait-painting did not, however, flourish largely among the Greeks until the Macedonian age. Only very celebrated men, such as Miltiades, saw their likenesses produced, in the representations of their battles, which were hung—the trophies and achievements of their glory—in the Hall of Pictures in Athens; though sometimes the vain artist hung his own portrait before the people's gaze, or that of his mistress, for all citizens to admire. When, however, princes began to love flattery, and nations began to yield it to them, artists were employed to produce their likenesses, in which they were delighted at seeing an ideal beauty ascribed to themselves. Napoleon would never countenance an artist who painted him faithfully. In fact, portraits came to be, what dedications of books were, entirely unworthy of trust.

Great landscape painters are those who behold nature with emotions of delight, and impress on their representations of it the stamp of their personal idiosyncracies. Ruysdael recalls to our minds the forgotten dreams of youth. When we look on his pictures, after long familiarity with the crude and hard realities of existence, we begin to believe in the truth of what our every-day experience had induced us to resign as delusions of the fancy. We had thought that the bright and lovely landscapes, glowing under golden suns, with sparkling water, graceful trees, and many winding valleys, were simply the reflections of our own imagination. But when we see that the eye of man has seen, the hand of his genius has preserved, beauties more than ever came to our visions—his still lakes sleeping amid soft and green slopes, his groups of oxen with all the magically-tinted variety of grace in which his pencil delighted!—we no longer think it philosophical to despise the emotions of our best and early days.

Salvator Rosa, with his gloomy imagination, over which a kind of wild poetry throws indeed a light, but the light of a storm, imagines regions which appear like the haunts of monsters and brigands. Everdingen sees nothing in nature but vast pine woods, rushing torrents, and waterfalls disturbing lonely and barren wildernesses. He never paints a bower by the side of a stream; he can only imagine the den of the wolf, or the retreat of the disappointed robber. Even his sunrises have a dark and threatening aspect, and his moon appears pale and cold and spectral in the sky. Hobima imagines little more than solemn silent expanses. He seems to love to brood over the blanks of nature—the lonely desert, or the still more lonely ocean. Berghem, on the contrary, if he paints a glade in a wood, fills it immediately with groups of rusties, dancing as if they had been restored to the golden age; he makes his gardens bright with flowers, his woods alive with buds. Van der Neer spreads over the most beautiful scenes an air of desolation and melancholy. Cagliari, in depicting some of the most mournful scenes in sacred history, throws everywhere a feeble character upon the tableau. Carlo Dolce is celebrated as the best painter of tears in all that school of noble artists who made Italy, under the republics, so illustrious. The rustic assemblages of Guasprè are like groups on the stage; and even when he makes the wind bend down the forest tops, it seems to do it in a bland and accommodating manner. Rubens reproduced himself in enormous waists, broad shoulders, and Herculean arms; and when these had been ingeniously distorted, the masterpiece of his genius was completed. Nicolas Poussin seemed to give additional breadth even to the grandest landscapes of the world. His imagination seemed to have too vast a range, even for the great theatres which he selected for its display; and when he painted the “human face divine,” there was always the exhibition of power and grandeur.

Claude Lorraine, contrasting with all these, came, as if with an inspiration from the antique, to take away a reproach from his country, and to vivify and restore and renew the arts in France. With an exquisite sympathy with nature, his genius combined the dignity which prevented him from ever sinking from simplicity into frivolity. He was, like his works, noble, calm, and full of delicate fancy. He had a gentle aspect, lofty and severe, and this gave a character to all those delicious representations of nature which his pencil produced. He may be said to have been among artists what Tasso was among poets. As the eagle is the only bird which can fly gazing at the sun, Claude Lorraine is the only painter who seems ever to have looked boldly on its burning disk. It was he alone who could paint aerial tints—who could suffuse his landscapes with a luminous, ethereal element, which appeared to fall in floods from heaven, visible to the eye, yet transparent and bathing all the scene in a rich and ineffable glow. Artists too often forget that the presence and influence of the light and air are as essential, even in a picture, to the freshness and brightness of the vegetation, to the colour of the rock, to the hue of the water, of the wood, of the straw in the thatch, of every inanimate or living object, as to the existence of man himself. Claude had the genius and the courage to paint skies without a speck of cloud; but there was no one who knew better than he how to throw through the vapour which gathers round a descending sun long sloping beams of coloured light, to gild and beautify his citizens and streams. It will be seen that Oudry and his master were apt disciples of Claude Lorraine.

It has been said, with reference to Claude, that only a love of the marvellous can induce his biographers to adopt those uncouth stories, so often controverted, about his youth and the rude beginning of his art. Some persons are unable to exalt his great genius with satisfaction to themselves, unless they can prove that when a child he was an idiot, or, still worse, the son of a pastry-cook! In fact, the historian Baldinucci,* who has left us an account of the early life of this splendid artist, and wrote from memoranda supplied him by Claude's own nephew, makes no mention of these circumstances; but, on the other hand, Joachim Sandrart,* who, in his "Academy of Painting," has recorded the achievements of the artists of his day, asserts, in direct contradiction to Baldinuchi, a number of statements which concur with the favourite popular traditions. His testimony, however, if at all important, is only so when it concerns the intercourse which he held with the great landscape-painter when he resided at Rome, for he was his intimate personal friend. In all other particulars, we prefer following the authority of family papers, to which the Italian biographer had access.

Claude Gellee, commonly called Claude Lorraine, was born in the year 1600, the commencement of a great epoch in the history of science, discovery, and political changes; his family then resided in the Chateau de Chamagne, which is on the banks of the beautiful river Moselle, which runs through the Vosges hills, near Mirecourt, in the diocese of Jarl. He was the third of the five male children of Jean Gellee. His eldest brother, named Jean, as the eldest brother in that family was named for generations, carried on the profession of an engraver on wood at Frisbourg, in the province of Brisgant. Claude, having lost his parents at the age of twelve years, without friends, and without any prospect of employment among the people of the place where he had been left an orphan, had no other alternative than to go and seek his brother at Frisbourg, and to ask from him hospitality, assistance, and advice. He was besides attracted by the occupation to which Jean devoted himself; for he had already exhibited a decided taste for design; and no sooner had he received some elementary instructions from his brother, than, with an aptitude and a facility quite astonishing in so young a child, he produced some ornamental drawings and arabesques of quaint but most original and striking variety. "Therefore, it is not true," says Baldinuchi, indignantly, "that Claude Lorraine was ever placed apprentice at a pastrycook's." The good Italian, who had patrician tendencies, thought it necessary for genius not only to have a lineage, but to be respectable and work with white hands. "I detest," he adds, "all those stories related by biographers, who have taken no trouble to authenticate their statements, and who only repeat their ridiculous anecdotes to give meretricious brightness to the dramatic contrast they are about to draw."

In the same way, many historians have tried hard to show that Christopher Columbus was descended from one of the oldest families in Spain. Be this as it may, however, certain it is, that Claude had worked about a year with his brother, when one of his relatives, who was a lace merchant, had to undertake a journey to Rome. Fortune, which too often baffles the hopes of the aspiring, could not in this instance have offered a more hospitable invitation to a young artist, who already felt, but vaguely and in his day-dreams, presentiments of a mighty destiny.

Claude, hearing of the intended expedition, started off immediately to the house of his relative; was introduced to him, and immediately preferred a request that he would allow him to accompany him to the great city of Italy, to which the hopes of every artist turned, where the stores of ancient genius were gathered up, where poets were still crowned in the Capitol, and where pages had been known to rise to the high prelacy and become the masters of the world. The lace-merchant did not at first understand of what use so young a companion, entirely unaccustomed to commercial dealings, could be to him; but he was unable to resist the earnest solicitations of the boy; and so Claude Lorraine found himself in Rome. He immediately took a lodging not far from the Rotunda, and began to develop as well as he could those principles of his art which had germinated in his mind under the humble culture of his brother. A strict economy in his manner of living was rendered absolutely necessary by the scantiness of his purse; for all he had to subsist upon was a slight donation occasionally transmitted to him from his friends at Frisbourg. But cheered by life and enthusiasm, and by the courage which is a characteristic of genius, he struggled with the difficulties of his position; and if he could gaze on the Colosseum; if he could sit in the rich galleries of the Vatican; if he could look on the works of pure glory, the goddesses and heroes immortalised in marble by the ancient artists; if he could go forth from Rome and survey the soft and glowing landscapes, with all their tender tints and graceful forms, which are spread out in the neighbourhood of the noble city, it mattered little to him that he lived in a narrow town and had no luxuries to place on his table.

At the end of three years, this kind of existence, pleasant if not Sybarite, was brought to a close. War broke out between the treacherous house of Austria and the protestant powers; that war which during thirty years afflicted Italy and buried half the civilised world in blood and slaughter. Intercourse was now exceedingly rare and difficult between the communities on the different sides of the Alps. Rome especially felt the unholy commotion, and Claude Lorraine, then only eighteen years old, quitted his favourite city and travelled to Naples. It was perhaps not unfortunate for him that he was compelled to make this change. Around the shores of that beautiful bay, on which Torquati Tasso loved to gaze and which he so often remembered, and whose beauty he realised so truthfully in his songs, the young artist found landscapes with myrtle and ilex groves, gentle green hills, fields like garden lawns, and all those accessories of elegance, which, under his pencil, appear to our eyes like the unreal creations of fancy. In that happily-situated place he lived, as the pupil of Godfrey Walss, a painter of Cologne, who enjoyed no inconsiderable reputation. From him Claude acquired the principles of architecture and perspective.

He remained, however, only two years in the studio of this master; precisely the time necessary to harmonise in his mind its perceptions of two elements which impress so distinctive a character upon his wonderful landscapes—monuments, and the far-retiring horizon. He then returned to Rome, abounding more in knowledge, more rich in hopes, more audacious in ambition, but so poor that he was obliged to install himself in the household of Augustino Tassi, less in the character of a student than under the humiliating conditions of domestic servitude. This at least we must believe, if we choose to trust the version of his life which has been given by Sandrart, who impresses a character of truthfulness by the precision and minuteness of the details with which his account is filled.

Augustino Tassi was one of the most attached disciples of the celebrated landscape-painter, Paul Brill. Although afflicted by the gout, he had, like the orator Chatham, a vivacity of spirit which enabled him, in despite of physical pain, to be an interesting and even a fascinating companion. Courted, feasted, overwhelmed with commissions from the opulent citizens of Rome, Tassi surrounded himself with a pompous retinue, and inhabited a house built with these wide open doors, emblematical of hospitality, for which Italy was renowned. Here he was visited by cardinals and nobles, and by illustrious strangers of all countries. Here he was appointed by the conclave of cardinals to paint, for the public adornment of the city, architectural decorations, marine views, cartoons with deep perspective, and landscapes of every description; and with surprising energy he accomplished every task that was assigned him. Still, with a burden of sixty years and many infirmities upon his shoulders, he required an expert and agile assistant, who could superintend the affairs of his house, take care of his horses, arrange all ceremonial details, and otherwise manage his domestic concerns, while he received visitors, held the pencil, or directed the works of his disciples.

In Claude he found a young man sufficiently talented to undertake all that he desired, and sufficiently poor to accept the employment. No doubt, however, the position of the young painter, notwithstanding the degrading circumstances allotted to it, was not altogether unendurable. He enjoyed frequent intercourse with a mind of distinguished resources; he heard daily in his master's studio dissertations on art, which princes were ambitious to hear; and thus the genius of the painter of Lorraine was cultivated and his memory stored, in spite of the little education he had received in his youth. It is certain that he remained in the service of Augustino until the spring of the year 1625; but why does it happen that history is an oracle which is dumb precisely when we are most curious to interrogate her? That which is most unknown concerning illustrious men is the obscure place of their existence, when they stood in the dark valley of their youth, before they reached the luminous elevations of their greatness,—the long probation, the purgatory of genius, their groans at the threshold of the temple. We yearn to see others labouring through their hard apprenticeship, toiling at the commencement of their sublime labours. Alas! could we perceive and know how many others, perhaps with souls as great, having gazed from a distance at the enchanted landscapes of the earth, at the sweet land of promise, fell exhausted on the road, and perished under discouragement and fatigue, without a witness of their sufferings. Are there any among us who do not rejoice if we can trace the perilous and painful commencement of the journey by which the children the evening blacken the summits of these mountains. He staid a little time in the monotonous country of Bavaria, the nest of princes, where he painted two pictures of the environs of Munich. The collection of works of art in that city also attracted his attention. Thence he proceeded into Suabia, and on the road met a party of brigands, who stripped him of all he possessed; but they could not strip him of his genuine treasure—his genius—and he became richer after viewing the sublime scenes which nature spread around him, even though he had not a zuchino in his pocket.

At last, after many adventures, he once more reached the château of Chamagne and dwelt there for a considerable time. It is in vain that we search the records of his life for an account of his residence there. More easily may we penetrate to the retreat of the poet Petrarch, in the sweet valley of Valchiusia, "by Sorga's trembling waters." We can recover no idea of the impressions made on the mind of the great landscape painter by the scenery amid which he lived.

All we learn is that, having stayed sufficiently long to settle some family affairs, he proceeded to Nancy, where he was of genius in all ages and countries have travelled the dreary flats of unnoticed and unrewarded exertion, hidden, perhaps, by those clouds of calumny, of envy, and detraction, which, like vapour, always gather about the rising sun? We love to see the first pale copy of their brilliant works, their efforts full of anguish and danger, and the gateways of fame and delight. The stars which now burn in the zenith most radiantly, and astonish us with their lustre—shall we attempt to discover their origin?—shall we watch for the earliest glimmerings of the day, so like that magic Aurora, still trembling and uncertain, which Claude Lorraine saw and painted, leaving a dawn everlastingly bright, to show how he loved nature and how nature had gifted him?

In the spring of the year 1625, Claude departed from Rome in order to return to his native country. Amidst his efforts, his hopes, the changes and chances of his career, he had continually gone back in imagination to the place of his childhood—"the banks of the blue Moselle." He visited Lonetto and Venice, observing the dark green colour of the water there. He crossed the Tyrol, noticing the very tints which in introduced to Claude de Ruet, one of the most famous artists produced by that part of France. The pupil of Tempesta, the envious rival of Callot, Ruet, opulent and proud, appears at that time to have enjoyed the first rank in the society of Nancy. The ducal impostor, Henry II., had in 1621 conferred on him a patent of nobility. He moved from place to place in superb equipages; he was followed by a pompous suite of attendants; and, like Augustino Tassi at Rome, he was commissioned to execute some very important works. Among these was the decoration of the roof of the church of Carmelites, and several Italian artists were employed under his superintendence. Claude Lorraine, who had, since his journey to Naples and his residence with Godfrey Waiss, acquired great skill in painting perspective, wished to be intrusted with the conception of the design. His friend Ruet promised at least to employ him; and he was occupied for more than a year in the decorations of the roof and of the adjoining chapels. But this cold and barren employment little suited the glowing ambition of the young artist, who had not come from Italy without a memory enriched by ideas of her pure blue skies, her vineyards and gardens, her snow-white ruins, her broad and smiling fields, and heroic monuments, which added sadness to her fame and radiance to her glory. He was dreaming of returning thither, when an accident, which occurred to one of the assistants who was employed in gilding some parts of his work, had the effect of completely disgusting him with the equivocal honour to be derived from painting on a fragile and lofty scaffolding. The assistant alluded to, having made a false step, fell from the scaffolding, and was only preserved from a mortal injury by falling on a cross beam, from which he was able to hang for a moment or two. Claude had just sufficient time to descend and save him at the moment when his weight was breaking the piece of timber to which he clung. But the catastrophe, to which he was every instant exposed, had such a powerful influence on his imagination, that he resolved to abandon a task in which his genius had no free or ample scope for the development of his powers. He accordingly started on his overtopped their varied talents, and looked down upon them from the height of his own genius; he assisted them with his affectionate counsels, and taking up, with many of his fruits, the antique traditions of Raffaele, endeavoured to combat the influence of the mannerists. Dwelling at the Trinity on the Mount, on a hill whence his eye took in a magnificent and gorgeous view, he had engrafted on landscape painting a sentiment of grandeur and might, which in those days was quite new; for though Titian and Hannibal Carachi had given a very glowing foretaste of historical landscape, Poussin it was who fixed and determined the style, became its most profound model, and grafted on it the peculiar genius of the French school. Few painters have indeed been more true, more real, and more suggestive of beauty than Nicolas Poussin. Claude Lorraine soon became acquainted with his illustrious countryman, and he accordingly took up his residence near at hand, also on the Trinity on the Mount. It may with justice and truth be predicated, that way to Italy, through Lyons and Marseilles, but was detained at that port by a severe illness. He then embarked in the same vessel with another French painter, Charles Erard de Nantes. The voyage was peculiar, for a frightful storm assailed the ship off the coast of Civita-Vecchia; but Claude at length saw the dome of St. Peter's, the centre and crown of Rome, in October, 1627; and he discovered that he had entered the city precisely on the day on which the people celebrated the festival of St. Luke—the festival of painters!

There resided in these days in Italy a Frenchman who exercised over the Italians all the usual ascendancy of a superior mind. We allude to the great Nicolas Poussin, who had been established in Rome ever since 1624. Around him, basking, as it were, within the warm rays of his genius, were grouped many eminent painters, Valentin, Guasprè, Jacques Stella, Peter de Laer, called Bamboche,* Cornelius Poelemburg, Jacques Callot, and many others. Nicholas this contact acted much on the character of the artist's productions, and in some degree fixed his style. Claude had certainly, previously to meeting with his countryman, a presentiment of style; but after the lessons he derived from communion with Poussin, his thoughts were elevated, his ideas enlarged, and his education was, in a word, finished and completed in the company of one who appeared to give majesty even to the mighty productions of nature itself. We cannot but become convinced, on a little reflection, that the pupil of Godfrey Wals and Augustino Tassi derived from Poussin a capacity of elevating landscape, by breathing on it the charm of ideal beauty. Able and tasteful in his appreciation of architecture, Claude Lorraine would doubtless have embellished his landscapes by selections from ruins, and by choice bits of architecture; but the selection of his edifices would have been less happy, if the bright example of Poussin had not enabled him to see the distinguished part which monuments can play in great landscape painting.

But to speak frankly, the true master of the great painter of Lorraine was the bright, the glowing, the warm and vivifying sun. We may conceive, but not describe, all the efforts, the indomitable patience, the labour and fatigue, the thought, the care, required to cope with such a model. Claude endeavoured to fathom, deeper than any one else ever did before, the most secret mysteries of nature; he determined to catch the sun at every hour of the day, to know it by heart—not by study of the mere caprices of light, but by a careful examination of its truest harmonies. He would rise, many a time and oft, before the dawn, to wander into the country and watch the first rise and birth of day. While other men forgot, slumbering securely on their pillows, or turned away through indolence from one of the grandest spectacles that can meet the eye, Claude had ascended some lofty eminence, some green-bosomed hill, or mossy crag, and stood there like the out-posted sentinel of art; and then rosy-fingered Aurora displayed to him all the glorious beauties of her jewel-case, allowed him to play with her jewels, which are but fleecy clouds and transparent vapours; and all this he admired at a time when it was not thought ridiculous to speak of the rosy fingers of the blushing beauty, opening the gates of the East and flooding the earth with light. He wandered alone amid these luminous scenes of beauty, without pencils, without paint-boxes, for he drank in the lovely poetry of the scene, became exhilarated and inspired, and wanted no canvas to receive what he had seen. He watched in their most rapid variations every shade of colour when, in the morning of a lovely day, the sun appears at first of a silvery hue, preceded by a white aureole. This white is then tinged with yellow, some few degrees above the horizon; a little higher up the yellow turns to orange, the orange becomes vermilion, the vermilion turns to violet; and thus from tint to tint, from shade to shade, by delicate hues of marvellous riches to use the quaint words of old Ronsard, the most original of French poets in his day.

Then on the sea-shore he would gaze with rapt admiration on the glorious picture of the orb of day, bursting suddenly forth from beneath the waves, a minute before dark and gloomy, now dancing, a sheet of molten gold, beneath the sunny radiance of the morn. It is difficult to say where sunrise is most beautiful—on the mighty waste of waters, on the vast mountain chains, or when leaping forth from fertile fields, where the corn is yellow and ripe, where the vine blushes rich and rosy, where the orange-tree blooms and the myrtle shows its deep green foliage, or the rose sends up its bursting fragrance to the senses.

And when he had caught these glimpses of nature, he would return to the silent studio, and seek from memory to reproduce on canvas that which lived in his mind's eye, coloured, tinted, and complete. And as he had always noted in preference great effects, leaving small details on one side, he was sure that no unfortunate recollection of details of vegetation would come to disarrange the harmony, beauty, and ensemble of the whole. His studies, or rather his genius as a painter, thus advanced like the sun itself, which bathes every variety of nature, every tint of the earth and air, every colour of flower and skies, in the one warm flood of his own golden light.

The German artist who wrote the life of Claude, Joachim Sandrart, informs us that he sometimes met with the great artist amid the rocks and cascades of Tivoli. “Seeing me,” says he, “paint rocks after nature, rather than from imagination, Claude approved highly of my method, and took advantage of it so largely, that, by unwearied industry and invincible patience, he was soon able to paint beautiful landscapes, which amateurs bought at a very high price, and of which he could never produce sufficient to please them.”* The two painters became great friends, often met at Rome, and associated together in order to go into the fields and paint objects on the spot. While Sandrart selected rocks of wild and fanciful form, trunks of trees of strange and wrinkled shape, and the waterfalls, ruins, and buildings best suited, according to his idea, for historical landscapes, Claude Lorraine chose less complicated subjects, and studied rather the gentle sloping away of objects from the second foreground to the horizon,—that is to say, the phenomena of aerial perspective.† His object was to, as it were, pierce the canvas through and through, and represent the immeasurable distances which the eye groups in a landscape; above all, to preserve in a simple picture on an easel the grandeur of the aspects, the serenity of the whole scene, and the majestic harmony of nature, when the sun, from a blue firmament without clouds, sheds below its torrents of light and heat—a glowing and mighty deluge, as it were.

The great genius, the varied and bold talent of Claude, soon became known in Rome; and how, in fact, could it be otherwise, when he shone in the full light of the sun? His renown spreading like the rays of light, was scattered over Italy, crossed the mountains and the seas, reached France, and then flew to Spain; and there was soon a contest of no common character between princes, sovereigns, cardinals, and the pope, as to who should possess the finest Claudes. Baldinucci has left behind him some interesting details with reference to the names of the purchasers, and the high price they gave for the pictures.‡ Two landscapes, ordered by Cardinal Bentivoglio, having been shown to the pope, Urban VIII., were thought so admirable by his holiness, that, proclaiming aloud the superiority of the French artist over all other landscape-painters, he ordered of him four paintings in that style, one of which was to be a view of the port of Marinella. Claude painted this view, and another similar one, a sea-piece, with pontifical galleys; he then painted two village festival scenes—scenes which owed their existence to his imagination, which was as rustic as the mind of the poet of Mantua; luminous pastorals they are, in which the wedding of a goatherd becomes grand and magnificent from the beauty of surrounding nature and the gorgeous splendour of the horizon.

We need hardly say to our readers, who know the force of fashion in all these things, who are aware that courtiers will assume even the defects of a sovereign they wish to please, that the whole college of cardinals hastened to imitate the example of the pope; and as the pagan antique was in favour at the Vatican ever since the days of Leo X., the free and easy princes of the church, who were rather men of fashion, gallantry, and intrigue, than priests, were delighted to make the pencil of Claude, his lovely landscapes, supply an excuse for painting subjects from the metamorphoses of Ovid, the history of Cupid and Psyche, or that of the lovely nymph Egeria, who was changed into a fountain. These old men of the church were like the elders who admired Susannah; beauty was what they sought; they cared not how nude or equivocal the mode of treatment.

The king of Spain came in his turn. He ordered eight marine landscapes; four taken from the Old, and four from the New Testament. But while Claude was working with ardour at one of these compositions, he learnt that it had been sold as his by plagiarists and copyists. The high price that our great artist charged for his pictures, without any one even complaining that too great a value was set upon them, had stimulated forgers, who came and stole the ideas of Claude Lorraine, and imitated, in some degree, his effects of light, so as to deceive foreigners and ignorant amateurs. Every one will see what a great misfortune this was for the artist, who was not only injured in his purse and fortune, but calumniated by the sale and preservation of bad copies, which, shown as his to men of taste, lowered him in their estimation and detracted from his well-earned fame. Claude, on making this discovery, and on finding the extent to which the system had been carried, resolved to keep a copy of every picture which left his workshop, making a note on the back of the drawing, the name of the purchaser, its date, and, on many occasions, its price. He made himself a portfolio, in which he registered every one of his thoughts as a sketch, so that he was able to offer to amateurs the control of his originals, and confound the impudence of forgers bold enough to imitate the aerial light of his pictures. He called it "The Book of Invention, or the Book of Truth."* This was the immortal register where he collected together all the wandering fancies of his genius. These sketches, which were, so to speak, the dawn of his pictures, are washed in with bistre, with a rather heavy hand as regards the figures, and yet with all the evidence of power and genius. Some pen-and-ink dashes show us what the character of the leaves will be; we catch, too, a glimpse of the light; we guess, beneath the glimmering indications of a flat tint, the distribution of the manor, the slope of the grounds, the general set off. We can conceive nothing more exquisite or pleasing to the eye of the artist than these prefaces—these dreamy outlines of what is to be a splendid picture. It seems as if we looked at the future rich canvas through a gauze curtain, and could catch a flickering indistinct glimpse of landscapes, even more beautiful than we shall ever see. Now it is a grove, where the Muses halt, beautifully and gracefully grouped, to hearken to the song of Apollo, beside a rippling lake on which float the lazy swans; and with a country behind, the distances of which probably gave the poet the idea, when he speaks of seeing in the distance hills and mountains the summits of which are lost in the clouds, while their strange shape and vague character leave us to form an horizon where we please; now it is a mysterious bark gliding on the moving waters, and just about to fade away from our sight between two willow-clad islands; sometimes we gaze with admiration on the bulls of the Campagna Romagna, up to their knees in a marsh, and tended by a herdsman as wild and savage as the place itself.

Many days indeed may be passed in turning over the leaves, in examining the rich and original designs of this book, which is now in the possession of the Duke of Devonshire, and of which the fac-similes have been so ably and artistically engraved by Earlom. On the back of the first drawing in the "Book of Truth," we find the following inscription stuek on a piece of paper, written in the handwriting of Claude himself—still the ignorant Claude in all but painting—and which we give exactly, without correction or alteration:—

"Audi 1^o Dago-to, 1677, Ce présent livre appartient à moy que je fait durant ma vie Claudio Gilvee, dit le Lorrain, à Roma, le 23 aos, 1680." †

But the "Book of Truth" was no effective protection for Claude against the rapacity of his greedy imitators. Some, adventuring even into his studio, caught up at a glance his ideas and sketches, and did not even wait until the pictures were issued to reap the profit; so that, by a disgraceful and scandalous system, the canvas of the plagiarist was issued before the original picture. The master, as a last resource, was compelled to shut up his studio to all visitors, except a few friends on whom he could rely, like Poussin and Cardinal Bentivoglio, or disinterested admirers, like Prince Pamfili, the Cardinals Medici, Spada, Giori, and Mellino, the Constable Colonna, the Florentine Paolo Falconieri, and a few others. This decision, to which the generous artist was driven by a sense of justice to himself, excited great murmurs; but he had no other remedy against the pestilent thieves who picked his pocket and desecrated his genius. But when the painter shut himself up in his studio, excluding the vulgar crowd, he kept the bright sun with him there, and lived in that company and on the memory of real and true nature. He had grown old and had the gout, and his favourite walks near the waterfalls of Tivoli, where Sandrart had so often met him, were past for ever. He now painted wholly from the elements with which he had stored his mind in the past—those glorious and magnificent landscapes, perfumed by the ideal, warmed by beauty, and resplendent with light and the glow of Italian summer.

The French artists of that and other days always placed nature in the background, and made man occupy the first place. The fact is, that, with rare exceptions, the French never cared about nature—Florian was an anachronism—man, his passions and his actions, alone occupied their attention. They neither comprehended nor sympathised with calm and quiet loveliness. The storm and the battle engaged their thoughts, when the sweet beauty of rich and lovely landscape would have passed by unheeded. Claude Lorraine himself, who was so fond of the light and the sun, never went beyond the limits of historical landscape; he remained faithful to the lessons he had taken from his great master Nicolas Poussin. The rays with which his canvases are flooded light up some choice scene in nature, play in the classic colonnade, or peer through the cords of an antique trireme. It was not without result that Claude lived in Rome, surrounded by learned men and poets, and protected by erudite and classical cardinals. That vast sea, into which the setting sun plunges, bears the galley whence descends Cleopatra the Beautiful. One landscape of Claude exhibits "The Consecration of David," while another exhibits all the preparations for a sacrifice. Warriors in heroic costume saunter about in the foreground of his seaports; all his pictures, in fact, are at all events as much filled by historical recollections as they are by the warmth and glow of the sun. Even when his fancy induces him to delineate the dances of a pastoral festival, the land to which he takes us is that of the Eclogues, and there exhales from them a perfume of the idyls of Anacreon and of the laurels of Virgil.

With regard to putting figures in a landscape, there prevails an error—at all events we regard it as one—which should be corrected. "Intelligent painters," says a critic of the last century, "have rarely painted desert landscapes without figures. They have peopled them, they have introduced into these pictures a subject composed of several personages whose actions may touch us and attach them unto us. It is thus that Rubens, Poussin, and all the other great masters have acted—he might have included Claude Lorraine—who have never contented themselves with introducing into their pictures a man going slowly along his road, or a woman taking fruits to market. They introduce thinking beings, that they may give us subjects to think about. They introduce men moved by the ordinary passions of humanity, in order to move our passions, and to interest us by this very agitation."‡ These very sage remarks by the learned Abbé Dubos are incorrect, and in fact simply puerile. When an artist desires to create a genuine landscape, that is, to depict the beauties of the country—the evening, a morning scene, the charms of water and wood, to snatch and trace the mysteries of nature—he should avoid introducing any very interesting action, for the landscape loses naturally in interest as far as the action interests, and the real object of the painter is lost. No man who wished to depict correctly and convey to the idea the grandeur of Niagara or Mont Blanc, would think of introducing them as mere illustrations of some scene of action.

When Poussin introduces into his landscapes historical figures, or men agitated by passions, as Dubos says, it is the action of the figures, which is the chief end and aim of the picture, and the landscape is an accessory, or rather the framework of the subject. "Arcadia" is an example. Imbued with the great principle of unity, had he desired to create in our minds admiration for the splendour of the horizon, or to show us his power of portraying them, he would have been very particular not to introduce complicated figures. It would have sufficed fully for his purpose, just to recall the image and idea of man, by introducing a solitary cavalier, or a shepherd gazing at his flock as they watered. Having often violated this eternal principle of unity, Claude Lorraine has committed an error very common with French artists; that is to say, he has divided the interest of his pictures.

equally successful, equally admirable in the arrangement of their trees, according to the more or less massiveness which their foliage produces, and also in the art of painting, so that each particular species is recognised at a glance, either by the appearance of the boughs, the division of the bouquets, or the characteristic shape of the foliage. Sandrart himself has made this remark with regard to our artist. He insists very much upon this point, and says, in his German Latin,† that the leaves of the trees, painted by Claude, seem to move and shake in the wind.

Claude Lorraine had, properly speaking, no pupils, though historians have given him two: Herman Swanevelt and Le Courtois. Herman was nothing more than a very clever imitator of Claude; Courtois, if we are to believe a very distinguished amateur,‡ has executed some landscapes in the style of Lorraine; among others the "Siege of Rochelle," and the "Pas de Suze," which are found in the Louvre. It does not, however, appear that these two painters received any DANCE ON THE EDGE OF THE WATER.—FROM A PAINTING BY CLAUDE LORRAINE.

On the other hand he has never been more successful or more grand, than when he has introduced figures of sailors without a story, pastors without a name; all the while preserving the lofty, sublime, and elevated taste of those ruins full of majesty, which make us think of the absent heroes, and the strange stories of those immortal gods who by their lives, as told by their worshippers, often make us rejoice that they were false, and that we live in a time when we know the true and great God of Christianity.

Turning to trees, we find that those which Claude Lorraine was fond of introducing into his landscapes, are the horse-chestnut and the Spanish, with lofty branches, round forms, and the brown bark of which is enlivened by the clear gray of the moss attached to them. It is easy to remark, as Le Carpentier* does, when speaking of Nicolas Poussin and Claude Lorraine, that these two great landscape-painters have been direct lessons from him, though, in reality, he was their master. The only pupil whom Claude formed under his own eyes was a certain Domenico Romano, a poor young cripple, whom he took into his house and fed, and who was for a long time to him what he had been to Tassi; but Domenico Romano, having learnt to paint, the rumour was set afloat that he was the unknown artist, the true author of the pictures which were given to the world as the production of Claude Lorraine. When this news was sufficiently spread, the pupil became ungrateful, thought himself a great man, and was inflated by vanity. He left the studio of the great landscapepainter, and brought an action against him for the wages that he said were due to him.

Claude Lorraine sent for his disciple, who stood before him bold and audacious, for vanity and egotism had made him half mad.

"What is this I owe you?" said the great painter, sternly. The crippled pupil mentioned a sum.

As for the imitators of Claude, they were innumerable. All the Dutchmen, Germans, and Spaniards who went to Italy, were inspired by his paintings. In the present day, the brilliant success of our landscape-painters is mainly owing to their enthusiastic admiration and careful study of Claude Lorraine. In France, where they are justly proud of one who was truly great, he has been a constant model for imitation—

TOBIAS AND THE ANGEL.—FROM A PAINTING BY CLAUDE LORRAINE.

"Come with me," said Claude, with a scornful smile.

He took him to the bank of Spirito Santo, where all his money was deposited, and counted out to him the money he asked for.

"Go," continued he, "poor soul. Money may rejoice you, but it will not give you genius. Paint, and let the world judge whether or no I have harmed you."

No more was heard of Domenico Romano.

he has been the classic artist for two centuries. A whole Pleiad of renowned and celebrated artists, from the two Patels to Valenciennes, without omitting Bourdieu, Francisque Milet, Mauperche, Joseph Vernet, and Lantara, undoubtedly felt the influence of Claude, combined with that of his master, Nicolas Poussin. This is natural enough. Before the revolution which the nineteenth century so fortunately made in art, by infusing into it the fresh perfume of the romantic poetry of the north, the France of that indistinct period called the Renaissance knew no ideal but that of paganism, and none had ever elevated classical ideality higher, or painted the scenes of the heroic past better, than Nicolas Poussin and Claude Lorraine.

A distinction must be drawn between the two, however, and can easily be made clear. The Norman painter painted the land of heroes and philosophers, while the artist of Lorraine cast the light of his ideal beauty over the dwelling-place of herdsmen and demi-gods. The landscape of Nicolas Poussin is generally historical—that of Claude is Arcadian. Pythagoras would have been pleased to saunter with his disciples on the banks of that river that percolates the country scene of Poussin, or beneath the shadows which lead to the neighbouring villa. In the rich conceptions, the sunny bright pictures of Claude, nature is less solemn, and its varied aspects recall rather the primitive period—the fortunate golden time, when the earth of Saturn belonged to poetry, and the heart of man to love. Scarcely ever, in his marine landscapes, does he represent a tempest; for nothing that is strange, violent, or in rude motion is attractive to him. He never runs after fantastic clouds or sudden or unexpected effects of light. His favourite part of light is its peaceful and dazzling brightness; he paints the deep blue firmament when it is pure and unspckled by clouds—the country when it is happy and smiling—animals when they feed in perfect liberty, watched over by the apocryphal shepherds of Theocritus or Virgil. His landscapes are truly those of the golden age. There is one in which the old fable of Narcissus is recorded, with a scene of marvellous beauty around him. Some women, concealed behind a tuft of thick bushes, are watching young Narcissus as he gazes at himself in the fountain, while the sun and nature, and the soft breeze which waves to and fro the summits of the tall trees, and the distant ruins flooded with golden light, all tell of love. What a soft and balmy temperature—what a delicious evening! Who would not wander across that scene of such august tranquillity, lose himself, listen to the waterfall, and come back to that grove in the foreground to find again that deserted nymph dying a languishing death near her river, amid the green turf and surrounded by the narcissus flower?

Of all hours of the day, Claude Lorraine loved the evening, the setting sun; and, to give additional play to his scene, he generally chose the banks of the sea. When just about to dip into the ocean, the sun casts upon the calm sea a positive carpet of light; the waves rustle, as it were, beneath the soft evening breeze; and the gently-moved waters of the trembling ocean reflect, in myriad sparkles, the dying brightness of the luminary. No clouds are in the sky, or very few; perhaps a light vapour, like a veil of gauze, is lit up by the expiring sun. On the borders of the water rise Italian palaces—noble porticoes, whose columns give scarcely any shade, wrapped as they are in a luminous atmosphere which impregnates every place with light. Statues, which rise on the splendid terraces of these palatial halls, swim in golden vapour. Gallies are at anchor; the rays of evening light come dancing through the rigging, and show in the water the long narrow shape of the ship—a furrow, so to speak, of shade. On the shore walk people who are, it seems, dazzled by the rays of the setting sun; and it would be a pleasure for us to imitate those among them, who use their hats as a kind of parasol, to avoid being blinded with the too great effulgence. On the edge of the horizon the sun seems to penetrate into palaces of fire, and is about to disappear in the midst of a conflagration which all the waves of the sea cannot put out, but which will soon be extinguished as it passes through every gradation of vermilion, violet, and deep blue, even unto darkness.

One remarkable thing about Claude Lorraine was, that he never began to be wholly himself until he reached the second foreground, that is to say, until his lungs began to breathe the air. In the front are in general palaces and masses of trees, which serve him as side-scenes, and he might even be reproached with the monotony of the foreground; but on some occasions the "set-off" is skilfully concealed and dissimulated by the careful discrimination of the darker shades; it is valuable rather from the mass than the actual strength of each shade, so that all remains lit up, though there is a kind of demi-tint to bring it up. We must also not omit to observe that Claude Lorraine was the first painter who studied the laws of refraction, when he painted the sun mirroring itself in the waters of the sea. "If water bends a stick, my reason straightens it," says Lafontaine. But the artist prefers the navetés of nature to the correction of reason.

Drawing and engraving on steel occupied a considerable portion of the life of Claude Lorraine. In the year 1636 he had already engraved some of his best pieces, amongst others, one of his masterpieces, the "Campo Vaccino," in which we are made familiar with the grandeur of the Roman city. It is the ancient Forum, an immense space filled with thousands of people and with light, and surrounded by monuments, such as the Arch of Septimus Severus, the Temple of Antoninus, the ruins of the Temple of Concord; and in the background, the Coliseum and Arch of Titus. "However, the engravings of Claude," says an amateur, the Count Guillaume de L.—,* "have nothing brilliant in them; they produce no great effect, and the magic effect of the chiaroscuro which we admire in the engravings of Rembrandt, for example, is wholly wanting; the figures are, moreover, generally badly drawn, as they often are in his pictures; he was not very clever in the mechanical part of the affair, and had not fully acquired the art of applying the aquafortis; sometimes it produces no effect, and sometimes it does not bite at all. His engravings, therefore, have little charm for the superficial amateur; but the enlightened connoisseur admires the choice of the subjects, the beauty of the arrangement, especially that of the trees, the nobility of the architecture, and in general, the taste, style, and spirit of the man of genius."

This judgment is rather too severe, especially as far as the figures are concerned. If it be true, as is very generally believed, that those in his tableaux were chiefly from the hand of Courtois, of Philippe Lauri, Jean Miel, François Allegrini, and even of Nicolas Poussin, we must hesitate before we decide that Claude did not know how to draw the human form. When having recourse to the hands of strangers or the pencils of friends, he only followed a very universal custom. The figures which the great landscape-painter has drawn in his "Book of Truth," and in his engravings, have sometimes, it is true, an amount of awkwardness, but it is a powerful and energetic awkwardness; they are correct in their motions and correct in their pantomime. In some few dashes they express with rare vigour and truth the roughness of the men of a seaport, or the somewhat heavy and ponderous elegance of the gentlemen who wore doublets and swords. It was only out of sheer modesty that Claude was wont to say to those amateurs who came to buy his pictures, that he gave the figures in for nothing.

There is still preserved in one of the Queen's collections, a drawing by Claude, which bears the date of 1682, and which represents a scene of the Enead. The painter was then eighty-two years old, and still he worked. He died calmly in the month of December of the same year, and was buried in the church of the Trinity on the Hill. He left, as an inheritance to his nephews, amongst other works, the "Book of Truth." This marvellous book was sold to a French jeweller, Louis XIV. having charged his ambassador at Rome, the Count d'Estrees, to purchase this precious monument of the genius of the French nation, he endeavoured to fulfil the monarch's wish, but in vain. The "Livre de Vérité" passed into England, to the collection of the Duke of Devonshire, who had it engraved, in 1777, by Earlom. The heirs of Claude placed the following inscription on his tomb, which is the more worthy of being preserved here that it is utterly obliterated on the white marble tablet where it first was cut.

In the month of July, 1840, the ashes of Claude Lorraine were transferred from the Trinity on the Mount to the church of Saint Louis des Français, in a tomb elevated to the prince of landscape painters, by order of the Minister of the Interior. The inauguration of this monument, executed by M. Lemoine, professor of the academy of St. Luke, took place in presence of the chargé d'affaires of France, M. de Reyneval, and of all the artists who were then at Rome.

The following inscription is upon it:—

LA NATION FRANÇAISE N'OUBLIE PAS SES ENFANTS CÉLÈBRES MÊME LORSQU'ILS SONT MORTS À L'ÉTRANGER.

Whenever we find ourselves in presence of a great master, we are led, despite ourselves, to think of principles. With painters of the genius of Claude all becomes matter for learning, and their faults are even as instructive as their triumphs. Do we wish to know if painting is or is not a simple imitation of the outer world? Claude Lorraine is there to answer for us. What, will people say—that disc of yellow ochre and white, pretends to represent the sun—the sun itself? A little colour on a piece of canvas, that is the great luminary of the world; this is what you call the most faithful copy of the great work of the divine Creator. Yes, doubtless, between nature and art, between the sun of God and the sun of Claude Lorraine there is a wide abyss. And yet it must be said that the landscape of the artist is much above and much below nature. Combined with the individual sentiment of a great artist, it bears the imprint of a poetry which matter alone does not contain, or which at least lies latent and unknown within it. If Claude had not come upon the banks of the sea to gaze on the magnificent spectacle of evening, nobody would have ever opened his eyes to the beautiful spectacle of a hot and burning sky. Those sailors who are lying on the deck of that ship at anchor; those merchants who are counting their bales along the golden strand; in fine, those noble promenaders who may be seen coming out of that palace, the steps of which descend to the sea, probably would not experience the same emotions at the reality as would be awakened in them by the sight of a sunset by Claude Lorraine. In the picture all is elevated, if it is only by evoking the recollection of ancient history or heroic fables, and we may readily fancy that the coffers ranged along the banks contain the famous purple of Tyre, twice dyed and unalterable. In this way, by passing through the crucible of a painter's inspired soul, by being touched by the emotions of his heart, the work of God is often more eloquent in painting than in reality. When the earth is beautiful, the painter knows that it is so, and the earth knows it not.

Many criticisms on Claude Lorraine have been written. The following by J. A. St. John is new and fresh:—"It strikes me, if I were a painter, I could have discovered a hundred landscapes between Fouah and Cairo, which would not have been unworthy of the pencil of Claude.

"To be in fashion, I ought, perhaps, to have named some other artist, the current of opinion setting in just now against this delineator of the warm and genial south. But whatever happens, it is best to be honest. If my ideas offend the connoisseurs, I am sorry for it; but having myself beheld nature in her loveliest forms, both in the temperate and torrid zones, I may at least be allowed to judge whose pencil reminds me most of her serene splendour. The object of all art is pleasure, which can only be awakened in us through the instrumentality of beauty, whether in the aspect and colours of external nature, or in the symmetry of the human form.

"To me, Claude in landscape, and Raffaele in historical painting, appear to have worked most in conformity with this theory, and consequently to have produced the noblest and purest results. To derive enjoyment from looking at nature, is practically a simple process; but if we attempt to explain the laws by which the sources of delight are stirred within us, we find the whole apparatus of metaphysics scarcely equal to the task. It is the same precisely with the mimetic arts. When I stand, for example, before one of Claude's landscapes, supposing my mind to have been previously agitated by the perturbing influence of the passions, the storm begins immediately to subside, while a serenity like that of a sweet summer's day takes its place. The beauty, snatched as it were from nature, and rendered permanent by art, sinks into the soul, and through a law or force inexplicable to me, disposes it irresistibly to assume that unruffled composure necessary to its reflecting properly the external image, to the magic of whose influence it is for the time subjected.

"No other landscape-painter accomplishes this triumph so invariably and completely as Claude. Salvator Rosa appeals with singular power to our sympathy for wild and savage nature, chasms, mountain-torrents, sombre and frowning crags, dark forests, with the figures of fierce banditti looming through their obscurity. Nicolas Poussin awakens our classical or scriptural reminiscences, revives the impression of our school-boy days, or, which is still more, carries us back to those moments of unmixed delight, when on our mother's knee we first listened through the marvellous traditions of Palestine and the East.

"But they, neither of them, put us in possession of that sunshine of the breast which streams in upon us, or is kindled by the works of Claude, who felt all that is serene and lovely in the countenance of our mother earth, and has represented his conceptions in colours which we must grieve to think should ever fade. His architecture, his seas, his glassy rivers, his mountains blue and hazy with distance, his skies full of light and brilliance, his trees displaying every variety of forest beauty, his foregrounds, copses, flowers, weeds and all, fresh, dew-dripping, and almost exhaling fragrance as we look on them, so full are they of suggestions to the sense as well as to the mind,—this combination of things, I say, acts like a glorious poem on the imagination, and hushes it into a rapt feeling, not unakin to devotion. My friend, Linton, especially in his Venetian pictures, is every year giving fresh proofs that he has been drinking at the same great fountain. His sunsets are delicious, his ruins seem to crumble before the eye, and his waves, leaping, cool and translucent, transport us forcibly to the shores of the Mediterranean."

The pictures of Claude Lorraine, so much valued over all Europe, have become very rare. They are now chiefly found in national galleries, or the galleries of the English aristocracy.

The Louvre contains the best collection of pictures from the brush of Claude Lorraine. This Museum contains sixteen, several of which are masterpieces, in which the painter shows himself in all the splendour of his most brilliant qualities. More than half of these pictures are found in "The Book of Truth."

"The Consecration of David" and "The Landing of Cleopatra" (Nos. 80 and 96 in "The Book of Truth") were painted for Cardinal Giorio; in the inventory of the Louvre, made in 1816, they are estimated, the first at £2,800, the second at £1,800.

The two "Seaports" were painted for the Prince de Liancourt and an amateur of Paris. This last picture bears the signature of Claude and the date of 1616. They were both engraved by Dominique Barriere. The one is estimated at £1,000, the other at £3,200.

"The Village Festival" and "The View of a Seaport at the Setting of the Sun" were executed for Pope Urban VIII. The first of these pictures, painted in 1669, has been estimated at £4,000; the second, very well engraved by Lebas, was sold at the sale of Gaignat, in 1768, for £204; at the sale of Choiseul-Praslin, in 1793, for £600; and is now valued at £4,800.

"The Campo Vaccino" and "View of a Seaport" were painted for M. de Bethune, ambassador of France at Rome. These two pictures were sold in 1727 for £134; in 1768 for £248; in 1776 for £176; in 1780 for £440. In 1816 they were valued at £1,200 and £1,600.

The Gallery of the Hermitage of St. Petersburg almost equals the Louvre in the importance and riches of its Claude's. It possesses no less than fourteen. There is a magnificent series of four pendants of equal dimensions—three feet nine inches by five feet three inches—representing the four parts of the day, in which the ordinary assistant of Claude, Philippe Louis, has painted "The Vision of Tobias," "The Return

There are besides in the Hermitage two landscapes, representing, one, "The Judgment of Marsyas," the other a "Pastoral Scene;" and two marine landscapes, in which are seen, on one side, Apollo and the Sibyl of Cumæ, on the other, men loading a ship. These four superb specimens of this master were purchased by the Empress Catherine II. of Russia; the two first in 1776, with the Crozat collection; the two latter in 1779, with the Houghton gallery.

The Museum of Madrid, and the National Gallery of London, have each the same number of Claude's. Those of the Museum of Madrid are incontestable and very valuable. One, the least of all, is a landscape adorned with figures and animals. The nine others form three series, one of three, one of four, one of two.

The first series, which are the largest-sized Claude's known to exist—five feet nine inches by eight feet five inches—comprise "A Penitent Magdalen in the Desert," and with a rising sun, "A Hermit Praying in the Desert," with a of the Holy Family," "The Meeting of Jacob and Rachel," and "The Struggle of Jacob with the Angel."

These four pictures, Nos. 160, 154, 169, and 181 of "The Book of Truth," were painted for several amateurs of the Low Countries; they then passed into the Electoral Gallery of Cassel, where they remained until the time of the German war in 1806. They were packed up with a number of other pictures, the most precious of that gallery, which were being removed from Cassel for the purpose of concealment, until the peace enabled them to restore them to their old place. But a French general succeeded in capturing them, and presented them to the Empress Josephine, who adorned her Malmaison with them. There the Emperor Alexander of all the Russias bought them, with the "Arquebusers" of Teniers, "The Cow" of Paul Potter, the "Gerard Douw au Chien," and thirty other of the best pictures of that collection.

The four tableaux by Claude cost the emperor £1,000 out of the money he paid for the pictures bought at Malmaison. They were engraved by Schlotterbeck and Haldenwang.

setting sun, and the "Temptation of St. Anthony," a landscape with a moonlight effect.

The second series is composed of four large pictures; they represent, in the first place, "Moses saved from the Waters," secondly, "The Funeral of St. Sabine," thirdly, "The Embarkation of St. Pauline," the fourth, "Tobias and the Angel Raphael" (see p. 345). These four pictures, of which the figures are attributed to William Courtois, brother of Jacques, called the Bourguignon, were painted for the king of Spain.

The last series of two pictures represents two landscapes, smaller than those in the preceding series; one, "A Morning Effect," the other "An Evening Scene."

The ten pictures in the National Gallery of this country are, with two exceptions, as authentic and as fine Claude's as any in the world. There are two of very great dimensions; one well known under the name of "The Queen of Sheba," and the other as "Rebecca's Wedding."

The first picture is of a seaport, seen under the effect of the rising sun, while the action of the production is "The Embarking of a Princess and her Court;" the English generally call it the Bouillon Claude, says a French critic, because it was painted for the duke of that name in 1688.

The second represents a landscape adorned with figures dancing on a vast open sward. These two pictures were for a long time the pride of the Hotel Bouillon, on the Quai Malaquais in Paris, which also contained numerous other precious pictures, which still remained there in 1787, but in a furniture warehouse, where they were rotting, as the Duke of Bouillon rarely occupied his hotel in Paris.

About 1804 these two Claude's passed into the hands of

Each of the galleries lays claim to the possession of the original, which connoisseurs usually declare to be that in the Doria palace in the eternal city of Rome.

Besides "The Queen of Sheba" our National Gallery contains two other exquisite marine pieces, "The Embarking of St. Ursula," and "The View of a Seaport at Sunset." These two were painted, the first in 1646, for Cardinal Barberini, the second, in 1641, for Cardinal Giorio. They also came from the collection of Mr. Angerstein, who had them from Messrs. Desenfant and Panné about 1800. They also cost £8,000.

THE BEGGARS.—FROM A PAINTING BY REMBRANDT.

Charles Sebastian Erard, who sent them to England. A distinguished English amateur, Mr. Angerstein, bought them for £8,000, and it was at this sum that they were valued in the collection of this amateur, when it was bought by the English government in 1823, to form the basis of the present National Gallery.

The "Queen of Sheba" is regarded as the finest marine landscape ever painted by the great Claude Lorraine; as for the "Wedding of Rebecca," there is a fac-simile of it in the Doria Palace at Rome, where it is called "Il Mulino."

There are also four other Claude's, very much admired for their beauty. They bear the titles of "Reconciliation of Cephalis and Procris," "The Death of Procris," "Narcissus and the Echo," and "Agar in the Desert." The first of these four pictures also comes from the cabinet of that same princely amateur, Mr. Angerstein. The other three were left to the National Gallery by Sir George Beaumont in 1826, with another landscape, which is the fellow to "Agar in the Desert."

A sixth landscape, the most important of all, was left as a legacy to the same gallery by Mr. W. Holwell Carr, in 1831. It is "Sinon taken before Priam," a picture dated 1657. This picture, painted for the Prince Don Agustino, was for a long time at the palace of Ghigi at Rome. At the sale of the Walsh Porter collection, which took place in London in 1810, it was sold for £2,750. It is valued by Smith at £3,700.

The other museums of Europe contain very few pictures by Claude. The Pinacothec Museum of Munich has four or five pair, each representing a morning and an evening. The Gallery at Dresden contains three, of which two are of great beauty, reproduced in "The Book of Truth," Nos. 110 and 141. The Museum of Berlin and that of Naples each possesses two pictures by Claude; the Gallery of Florence has only one, but it is an admirable one, "A Seaport with a Setting Sun," No. 28 of "The Book of Truth." It was painted for Cardinal Medici. It is valued at £3,000.

English amateurs, as well as artists, have always shown great attachment for the pictures of Claude. In the years 1790 and 1800, the English who were at Rome bought from the Princes Colonna, Borghese, Doria, Corsini, and others, who were obliged to sell their pictures to pay the heavy contributions imposed upon them by the government. Among these pictures were some of Claude's very best, which before had decorated the palaces at Rome. Most of the works painted for Italy have left that country: poverty and despotism and bigotry have done their natural work.

Mr. Forster found only about a dozen in all the museums and palaces of Italy. In England, on the contrary, there are few private collections, visited by Waagen, which had not some. He found at least fifty. The collection of Mr. Thomas Coke, at Holham, alone has ten—as many as the National Gallery. Most of them are very important productions of the great artist, and are found in "The Book of Truth;" such as "Argus and Io," "The Punishment of Marsyas," "Apollo keeping the Flocks of Admetus," "Apollo and the Sibyl of Cumæ," "Perseus," "Rest of the Holy Family," Nos. 86, 95, 135, 164, 184, 187, of "The Book of Truth."

The Grosvenor Gallery, belonging to the Marquis of Westminster, in London, contains seven pictures by Claude, all choice pictures, which are taken from the collection of Mr. W. Agar. The most precious of the thirteen Claude's, altogether contained in this collection, are two landscapes, with houses, rivers, mountains, figures, and animals. They belonged to the cabinet of M. Blondel de Gagny, and at the sale of that cabinet, made in Paris in 1776, they were sold for £960. In 1805 Mr. Agar refused £8,000 for them.

The Bridgewater Gallery, belonging to Earl Ellesmere, in London, possesses four tableaux by Claude; amongst others, "Moses on Mount Horeb," and "Demosthenes on the Borders of the Sea," two admirable works, numbered 161 and 171 of "The Book of Truth," painted in 1664 and 1667 for M. de Bourlemont.

In the collection of Earl Radnor, at Longford, there are two, named "Morning in the Roman Empire," the other "Evening in the Roman Empire," Nos. 82 and 152 in "The Book of Truth." Smith attributed to them the value of £8,000, twenty-five times the price paid for them a hundred years before at the sale of the cabinet of the Countess of Verrue, in Paris, in 1737. The collection of Mr. J. P. Miles, at Leighcourt, near Bristol, contains two of the finest tableaux of Claude.

The first, called the "Temple of Apollo," bears the signature of the master and the date of 1668; the second signed also, and dated 1679. These two pictures, celebrated in this country under the name of the Allieri Claude's, came from the palace of that name in Rome, of which they were the ornament until the French invasion in 1810. They were sold to an Englishman for 9,000 Roman crowns, about £2,000. Messrs. Fayan and Grignon sent them to London, where William Beckford bought them for £10,000. At the sale of Fonthill Abbey in 1823, these pictures were sold for £12,000.

One of the finest tableaux of Claude which has been recently sold, the "Arrival of Eneas at Delos," No. 179 in the "Book of Truth," was knocked down for the sum of £1,700, at the sale of the cabinet of Mr. Jeremiah Harman in London, in 1844.

This picture, painted for M. Passy le Gout, is three feet one inch high, and four feet two inches long. It was successively sold in 1737, at the sale of the cabinet of the Countess of Verrue, for £80; in 1747, at that of the collection of Blondel de Gagny, for £396; in 1816, at the cabinet of Mr. Hope, for £1,500.

The other picture, of smaller dimensions, but also of fine quality, "A Seaport with the Rising Sun," height two feet four inches, width three feet one inch, was paid £2,000, at the sale of the cabinet of Sir Simon Clarke at London, in 1810. It was sold in 1787, at Madame Bandeville's, in Paris, for £120; in 1801, at Robit's, in Paris, for £400; at Bryant's, in London, for £1,500.

M. de Garron, grandfather of the President of Bandeville, brought this picture from Rome to Paris. He bought it from Claude himself, as well as another picture from the same master, representing the "Rape of Europa," No. 136 of the "Book of Truth." This work is now in Buckingham Palace. It was bought by George IV., at the sale of the collection of Lord Gwydyr, at London, in 1829. It went at the sale beyond £2,000, while in 1787, at the sale of the cabinet of Madame de Bandeville, at Paris, the same picture only fetched £400.

At the sale of the collection of the Count de Venice, in Paris, in 1760, "A Seaport with the Setting Sun" was sold for the insignificant sum of £33. Having reappeared in 1820 at the collection of the sale of Danoot, at Brussels, it was sold for £1,080. It is doubtful whether his sunrises or his sunsets were the most beautiful. At all events in this, as in other cases, the effects of light and shade were beautiful. The author of "Isis" describes an Egyptian dawn, which really appears taken from Claude: "As I looked, however, towards the east, over the undulating, sandy plain, and saw the faint, pearly light begin to flush the sky on the edge of the horizon, I thought I had never beheld anything more glorious. Every instant the arch of splendour expanded, and embraced a larger section of the heavens, while streaks of saffron and crimson, shot up rapidly from some fiery centre, seemed to pierce the firmament like arrows, blotting out the stars with their quivering pulsations, and imparting to the whole face of nature a profusion of gorgeous features inexpressibly magnificent. The figures of poetry could never keep pace with the chariot of Eos. Before language could supply epithets to paint one phenomenon, a series of new appearances would have succeeded and vanished. The change from saffron to crimson, from crimson to rose colour, from rose colour to purple, from purple to amethyst, and from this again to cerulean blue, chased and veined, and quivering tremulously with light, was as swift as thought. At length the sun itself arose, and the desert lay blushing before it like an eastern bride."

Two landscapes, one representing "Juno confiding Io to the care of Argus;" the other, "Mercury setting Argus to sleep to the sound of his Flute," each eighteen inches high by twenty-seven wide, were sold for nearly £1,600, at the sale of Mr. Walsh Porter, in London, in 1803. These two charming tableaux, Nos. 149 and 150 in the "Book of Truth," Nos. 110 and 111 of the cabinet Choiseul, have belonged to several celebrated collections; they were sold in Paris in 1777, at the Prince of Condé's, for £316; in 1772, at the Duke de Choiseul's, for £270; in 1762, at Gaillard de Gagny's, for £72. They have increased ten-fold in price in the space of fifty years.

Claude's drawings are numerous; they exhibit the harmony and the grandeur which characterise his paintings. They are generally drawn with a pen, with sepia or bistre, brought up with white. These drawings have been very much sought after by amateurs, and have commanded great prices, a small one never having been sold for less than £50. Claude was accustomed to engrave in aquafortis, using a very powerful instrument with a somewhat blunt point. Of productions of this description a considerable number exist. M. Robert Dumesnil, in his "Peintre-Graveur Français," has given an account of forty-two engravings in aquafortis, which form a most recherché cabinet for the amateur.

Fine proofs are very rare, and seldom to be met with at the sales, which accounts for the large sums offered for them whenever they are to be met with.

"The Dance on the Border of the Water," sold at the sale of Robert Dumesnil, in 1847, for £11, and at Debois' sale for £15. "A Group of Brigands," on the same several occasions, sold for £20 and £21. "The Campo Vaccino" sold for £16.

Claude Lorraine often put his signature to his pictures and always to his engravings. On the latter he sometimes added brief inscriptions, of one of these we present the fac-simile.

THE BEGGARS, BY REMBRANDT.

As we shall probably have an opportunity on a future occasion of discussing the life and works of Rembrandt, it will be unnecessary for us now to occupy much of the reader's attention. The education and mode of life of this great master may in some measure account for the want of charm with which certain critics have reproached his style. His father, who had gained great wealth as a miller, at first wished to make him a literary man; but Rembrandt, who had already a decided passion for painting, succeeded in gaining admission to the studio of James Van Zvaanenburgh, which he afterwards quitted for those of Peter Lastman and James Pinas. He then returned to his father's mill, where he executed a painting, which he took to the Hague and there sold for a hundred florins.

This success, which was the more welcome because it was quite unexpected, inflamed Rembrandt's ambition, or rather his avarice. Seeing in his art a means of obtaining a fortune, he henceforth devoted himself to it with persevering assiduity. He had married a woman no less avaricious than himself, and who confined his expenditure within the narrowest possible limits, compelling him to live upon dried herrings and cheese. One day he persuaded her to put on widow's mourning and spread a report of his death, that she might sell the pictures in his studio at a higher price—a stratagem which completely succeeded. Another trick, equally discreditable, was that of giving his son designs which he was to sell secretly as precious works stolen from his father.

Rembrandt's pupils made great fun of his avarice, painting imprints of coin upon pieces of card and throwing them at his feet, whereupon he never failed to snatch them up with the greatest avidity, to the no small amusement of every beholder.

It is well known that in Rembrandt's style the luminous points are distinguished by touches of great thickness, which render his canvas rough and uneven in surface. He excused himself by saying, he was a painter and not a dyer. In a general way he was much annoyed whenever his compositions were too closely examined. "A picture," he said, "is not made to be smelt; the smell of oil is not wholesome."

Rembrandt died in the year 1674, at the age of sixty-eight.

The painting which we have engraved (p. 349) represents a woman who, carrying a child at her back and leading an old man, begs alms at a citizen's door. A young boy, with uncouth head-gear and dirty ragged clothes (probably her eldest son), is looking attentively at the money which his mother is receiving. Her face indicates attention, but is vulgar; the expression of the citizen who bestows his charity is almost harsh; the figure of the old man breathes a noble and tender sadness. As for the distribution of light and shade, it is this peculiar magic which has gained him a special position in the Dutch school, and no one has carried to a higher degree of perfection the poetry which results from the opposition and play of colours. But it has often been regretted that his productions do not exhibit more taste, dignity, and especially grace of style.

MODERN BRITISH ART.—THE SOCIETY OF BRITISH ARTISTS, SUFFOLK-STREET.

THE misdeeds of the Royal Academicians, their favoritism, their injustice, and in some cases their ignorance—for against that incorporated body, as against all others, these crimes can be urged—raised against them many enemies; whilst their success, and the money they obtained by their exhibitions, made them many imitators. Of these, some have perished, but others have apparently established themselves permanently with the public. These rivals and imitators are supported chiefly by those great artists who, having established fame, are yet angry at some slight put upon them by the larger body, and by a crowd of meritorious and rising artists, who, having risen, frequently, it must be said, desert their walls.

One of these incorporated societies is that of the British Artists, the exhibitions of which take place in Suffolk-street, and the nucleus of which is formed by a body of twenty-eight members, having for its president Mr. Hurlstone, its vice-president Mr. Pyne, and its secretary Mr. Alfred Clint. All these, the reader will recognise as known and talented artists; but amongst its members, it is but fair to say, that there are those whom we do not recollect to have produced one meritorious work.

The consequence is, therefore, that a mediocrity amongst members who, we presume, form themselves into a committee of judges, induces a general mediocrity amongst the exhibitions of the society. The ill-natured, indeed, have said, that as its members number artists in every branch, so every first-rate exhibitor, be he a painter of landscape, history, or figures, becomes obnoxious to them, and his pictures are at once slighted or excluded. We cannot say that this is the fact; but the members, who themselves send many pictures, naturally claim the best places, and those exhibitors who are non-members are frequently disappointed. Certainly, with so many excellent artists of every class which England can boast, we should imagine that some cause besides an adventitious one, must give rise to the effect of exhibitions so mediocre as the present, the thirty-first of the society.

The picture which holds the first place in importance, though not numerically, is that by Mr. Hurlstone, "The Last Sigh of the Moor" (178), a fine picture of a well-known subject, treated in the artist's peculiar manner, and valuable as an ethnological study. The Moorish feature is rendered with that correctness which residence amongst the people depicted alone can give. The treatment is at once excellent and novel, although a little more feeling might certainly have been thrown into the face of King Boabdil. (300) "A Jewess of Barbary" is more pleasing in colour than the majority of Mr. Hurlstone's pictures; we cannot, however, award the same praise to the portraits of this artist, which, with the exception of (189) "Portrait of Mrs. Wilmer," appear all to possess the same dull brown complexion, totally devoid of transparency.

Very different in colouring are the portraits of Mr. Baxter, (149) "Portrait of a Lady;" and (543) "Portrait of Thomas Appach, Esq., the latter in the north-east room, which are the best in the exhibition, and glow with life and health. "La Pensée" (48), by the same artist, is but a conventional affair, and the flesh tints by no means so good as in the portraits.

(378) "He went out and wept bitterly," by E. Rolt, is finely painted; the drawing and colouring both good and forcible.

(392) "Le Souvenir," by W. D. Kennedy, is a beautiful little bit of colour, very like Etty, from whose model we should imagine it to have been painted. (333) "Gayeté," in the next room, is not so good, the drawing being exaggerated and the flesh too pink.

Mr. Woolmer exhibits some of his usual eccentricities in drawing, as in (23) "The Princess Badroul Boudour," and (401) "Susanna," in the south-west room, in which no beauty of colouring can compensate for so much carelessness. (516) "Spring," in the north-east room, on the contrary, is as well drawn as it is coloured.

(507) "Repose," by T. F. Dicksee, a very highly-finished picture, well drawn, but the flesh-tints of the sleeping infant are too brown. (497) "Girl at the Spring," a very pretty little painting, but rather too hard, by T. Smart. (489) "The Turkish Scribe," a forcibly-painted picture, agreeably coloured.

Mr. T. Clater has several pictures scattered through the gallery, which are as various in subject as they are indifferent in execution; the best, perhaps, is "The Bridal Morn" (29); but what claims the family of "William Brock, Esq." (140), in the south-west room, has to be hung on the line, or even exhibited at all, we confess puzzles us, as a worse picture we never saw; the drawing bad, the colouring disagreeable, and the family without the least pretensions to beauty. Mr. Buckner has two graceful but very weak productions—(73)

"Portrait of Master Barkley" and (119) "Portrait of Mrs. Thomas." (169) "Belinda," by J. Noble, does not equal this gentleman's usual productions, the best part of the picture being the reflection in the glass and the male figure; Belinda is too short. (83) "Corn Flowers," by J. J. Hill, a nicely-painted picture, good in colour and well finished in detail. We had almost forgotten Mr. Cowie, whose picture (406) of "Hotspur and the Letter" is not to be overlooked, although we think the lady, graceful as she is, is rather too tall. (400) "An Incident in the Slave Trade," the separation of a mother from her child, is one of the best pictures in the room; the drawing and colouring both good, and the figure of the woman graceful, but rather wanting in force; and last, though not least in merit amongst historical compositions, is one by Mr. Samuel Blackburn (65), an artist new to the London public, but who is well known, we believe, in Scotland. The specimen before us has evidently been painted some time, but is distinguished by correct drawing and a careful study of costume and detail.

Amongst the landscapes, few are particularly worthy of remark; the specimens by Boddington and Alfred Clint are ordinary achievements by practised artists. A "View of Berne in Switzerland," by Pyne, only wants a more effective foreground to render it the best landscape exhibited. In animals, Mr. Earl has attained a meritorious pre-eminence; his pictures of dogs, &c. (372, 429, 526), being all careful studies, attention to which is drawn by a somewhat quaint selection of titles. In fruit, the best picture is by Mr. Duffield, whose wife, in the water-colour portion of the exhibition, stands pre-eminent for her flower-pieces. (276), by Miss Rumley, is also a very excellent and soundly-painted picture, second only to Mr. Duffield's. This lady artist is one of the most promising in the peculiar line she has chosen.

In the water-colour, besides the "Flower-pieces" of Mrs. Duffield, we may notice "Fruit," by Mrs. Valentine Bartholomew, and a "Girl Knitting," and other pieces, by F. Cruickshank, which deserve especial attention. We may add, also, that in this department lies the strength of the exhibition. The enamel of the "Duke of Wellington," by Essex, is very fine, and the "Keepsake" (711), by Karl Hartmann, deserves also to be much praised. The sculpture is by no means remarkable either for originality or merit. "Two portraits of the Queen," the one by Hughes and the other by John Bailey, may possibly resemble her Majesty; but—if we apply the axiom of Euclid, which states, that things which are equal to the same thing are equal to each other—must certainly fail to do so, since they are utterly unlike. A "Bust of Louis Napoleon," by John Bailey, is very meritorious.

Last, and oh, not least, we must notice a picture, which we have reserved to a place by itself, since we can scarcely class it as landscape or historical. We allude to that bearing the name of "The Golden Image" (227), which occupies so unworthily so large a space on the walls. An attempt to portray Nineveh, partly from Mr. Layard's book, partly from Mr. Charles Kean's scenery, arranged after the architectural vagaries of the late John Martin, could not but signally fail. An image as high as our cathedral of St. Paul appears surrounded by miles of palaces, thousands of priests, millions of votive fires, and billions of an Assyrian population. Winged bulls and sphinxes, the outermost one drawn and the others apparently outlined from it, in a straight line, and in an interminable vista, and Assyrian soldiers multiplied on the same plan, and clothed in every variety of gorgeousness, the whole overlooked by a perfectly scarlet king, and surmounted by a blazing Assyrian sky, present a tout ensemble which would delight the lessee of a low theatre on boxing-night, if he could but achieve such a blaze of triumph. But as a picture, it is beneath criticism, the canvas, after being covered with paint, being even worthless as an oilcloth, a Turkey-carpet pattern of which it somewhat resembles. It is a mere eccentricity, which is as worthless and about as far from the truth, as the pedigree from Adam, which we have seen lately advertised in the papers.

CHRISTIAN WILLIAM ERNEST DIETRICH.

DIETRICH was truly, to a certain and definable extent, a great painter. He was one of those whose peculiar genius his mind took in with an energetic and general grasp almost every phase and part of the subject to which he devoted his existence. And yet he was not an original, and therefore not a great artist in the highest sense.

If we examine that canvas over which the sun spreads all the vigour of its noontide heat chasing away the light vapour from the ground, and which loses itself in the far-off distance, we shall certainly fancy it a Claude Lorraine. That obscure chamber, with an open window which allows a ray of warm light to fall on the figures of three men sitting round a table, appears to be some work of Rembrandt. That tranquil landscape, where the cows, the goats, and the sheep, are led by a fat and buxom maid, who is about to cross a limpid stream, would readily be taken for a Berghem. It must be Wouvermans who is the author of that picture, in which a horse, with clean and wiry limbs and mounted by a gallant horseman, plays the principal part. One is led to think that it is Salvator Rosa who is the author of this landscape overhung by rugged rocks, in which we catch sight of narrow and dark glens, where hide the robbers of the Abruzzi. Those cascades falling from abrupt summits, where grows the gloomy pine, belong to the style of Everdingen; in the same way that those nymphs leaving the bath, to take refuge in the grove near at hand, must belong to the graceful easel of Poelenberg.

We are mistaken. All these pictures, so varied in composition, so different in style, in manner, are the work of the same painter—of an extraordinary man, who was able to combine all departments of art, and who in each was masterly; guessing at every process, seizing the art of colour, penetrating the character of each style of painting, and imitating them all with wonderful success. The man of whom such rare remarks are true was Christian William Ernest Dietrich.

He was born at Weimar, on the 30th October, 1712, and was of a very universal character. He stood apart and aloof from the many mere mannerists and copyists of his day. He did not bind himself down to any particular branch of art; his first master was his own father. This hereditary talent was common enough in the last century, and belonged to the Dutch and Flemish schools more especially. At the age of fifteen he entered the studio of Alexander Thiele, an eminent landscape-painter, who resided at Dresden, with the title of painter to the king of Poland, elector of Saxony. He remained with him only three years, and he left the place very much advanced in the only style which he ever successfully followed without being an imitator—that is to say, in landscape. At eighteen a certain great lord of the court* of Dresden took him into his service, and gave him a pension of fifteen hundred livres. Thus enjoying protection and ease, he lived four years at Dresden, free from all care, and wholly devoted to his art. But, in 1734, the great admiration he felt for the paintings of Rembrandt, Jean Both, Berghem, Karel Dujardin, and Elzheimer, impelled him to start on a journey to Holland. Artists are in general restless beings, and few have ever been able to sit down calmly and enjoy any good fortune which might fall to their lot.

During the time that he worked under Alexander Thiele, we may guess, from the way in which he imitated the landscapes of his master, what kind of talent nature had given him. "He did not copy," says Hagedorn, "but he entered on a kind of contest with the original." The fact is that Diétrich was never a mere imitator, because his ambition was too elevated for that. He sought to do better than what lay before him, which prevented him from ever being servile. As soon as he reached Holland he began to rouse himself to a contest with the great models he had so much admired. Elzheimer, Van Ostade, Karel Dujardin, and, above all, Rembrandt, furnished the subject, the style, the composition of numerous paintings. He devoted much labour and time to the study of the great Rembrandt. He undertook to copy from him the art of combining lights and shade—an art which that artist used with such marvellous and wondrous effect. He endeavoured to imitate the warm and transparent tones of his colouring,—his execution, now soft, now hard,—and the bold reliefs of his touch and harmonious arrangement. Diétrich is not the only artist who has endeavoured to walk in the footsteps of this inimitable model; and it must be at once allowed that he did not do so with the same success which attended Govaert Flink, Arnold de Gelder, Leonard Bramer, and Van Eeckout. If, however, his shades have not the depth which we admire in those of Rembrandt, if he be far inferior in his chiaroscuro effects, if his colouring be heavy and wanting in those brilliant and sharp tones that belong to the painter of the "Night Watch," if his impastings upon the light are heavy without being thick—it is because to imitate and rival Rembrandt was a thing all but above the power of any man. We do not believe that what one man has done, another may not do; but when an artist has, as it were, created something new to equal or excel, it is then extremely difficult and doubtful. But with these reservations, and looking at the canvases painted by Diétrich, after Rembrandt, only as excellent pasticcios, it is impossible not to own the great and deserving talent of the man who executed the painting known as the Piscina, engraved by Flipart, and the "Return of the Prodigal Son," with a great many other etchings, of which we shall presently have occasion to speak.

It must be at once frankly allowed that had Diétrich confined himself wholly and solely to the study of Rembrandt, and never done anything but remind us occasionally of the pencil of that great painter, he would scarcely have deserved his very extensive reputation. In art, as in literature, a mere imitator of one man will never make a name. How many imitators have there been in our own day of Dickens, and Jerrold, and Scott, and Cooper, and Bulwer; not one of whom has acquired any reputation of value. But how many living men are there, who, from a careful study of these and other models, have, without possessing much creative genius, written and produced many works well worthy of being read. It is too much to ask that all those who amuse and instruct shall be original—it is enough that they do not slavishly adopt the style of one man, and seek to make a reputation of it.

The great talent of Diétrich, and that to which he in a great degree owes his extensive reputation, is, the universal power of his imitation. He caught, with rare aptitude, almost every style. When Rembrandt was the object of his study, he was dreamy, meditative, expressive in design, rapid and capricious in execution. But suddenly he found himself in presence of the vulgar and comic physiognomies of Adrian Van Ostade—heavy peasants smoking under a trellis-work of hops beside a pot of beer, great fat dowdies, with enormous heads and short legs. He was at once transformed; he gave up in an instant his Old and New Testament subjects; he drew grotesque heads, covered by coarse woollen caps or shapeless hats. His pencil became soft and unctuous; his colour, just now warm and golden, became cold, and was clothed in that beautiful blue tint which Ostade spread over most of his pictures, and which gives so much harmony and suavity to his compositions. "The Strolling Musicians" of Adrian Van Ostade † is well known—a picture which becomes, so to speak, one of his masterpieces in the hands of the engraver Cornelius Visscher. Diétrich had the courage and boldness to re-paint this great work of the Dutch master. He has changed very little in the composition (p. 360). As in the picture of Ostade, the father, armed with his violin, towers above the troop of children who press around him. They cross a kind of door, or arcade, through which we distinguish the open sky and the country. Diétrich has taken some liberties with the details. We find in his picture a child blowing a bagpipe, which is not in that of Van Ostade. The physiognomies of the modern painter are also finer and more sarcastic, which proves that he did not thoroughly understand the sentiment and idea of his master. It was both philosophical and correct in Van Ostade to represent a sad and wearied sickness on the faces of that poor family dragged from village to village by misery. However, when correcting or travestying the thought of Adrian Van Ostade, Diétrich has, to a certain degree, been influenced by the painting of Van Ostade himself. Thus we easily recognise in the features of the father another of Van Ostade's personages, who also plays on the fiddle, and tells indelicate stories to some peasants sitting before the door of a rustic house.

The picture of Diétrich has been engraved by the celebrated Wille, a friend of the German painter. Wille possessed many of his pictures, and did much to make them known. Several compositions of Diétrich, indeed, were engraved by Wille. His engraving of the "Musicians" is a masterpiece of that art. Besides the picture of which we speak, Diétrich made an etching of one on the same subject. Smaller than his painting, it is also different from it in some of the minor details.

Diétrich often ventured to mix up the style and manner of several painters whom he had carefully studied, in one single picture. This is the case with the "Rat-killer." In this picture, the general effect of which is original and very creditable to Diétrich, several of the physiognomies are copied from Van Ostade, while some belong to others; and indeed the general idea of the whole, and some of the faces, are very much in the style of Karel Dujardin. ‡

In landscape-painting, he gives with a few touches, and as if playing with work, new and rare proofs of that extraordinary penetration which made him guess all these secrets that the great masters appeared to have carried away with them to the tomb. He revels with Berghem in the still depth of smiling valleys; he can tell the secrets of those skies of gold, and more transparent horizons, of Jean Both and his brother André; he is fully capable, when he likes, of following Everdingen to the very summit of his solitary rocks, where the wind moans through his lofty pines; or he will sit down with Ruysdael beside the noisy and foaming cascade, "That waterfall," says Hagedorn, "which he painted for his friend Wille, would have excited the enthusiasm of Ruysdael and Everdingen, and the troubled surface of the water below would have warmed a Backhuysen or a Parcellis."

* Hagedorn supplies us with this fact in his "Letter to an Amateur," but does not give us the name of the nobleman; but it appears that it was the very person to whom this letter was addressed.

He excited considerable admiration in his own day, amongst contemporary artists and amateurs, by the way in which he discovered the mode of proceeding of certain masters. The grace, the suavity, the harmony of Poelenberg were familiar to him, as well as that of all others. Following the traces of Elzheimer, he painted a "Flight into Egypt" (p. 357), which is regarded as one of his masterpieces, and which excels in exactly opposite qualities to those he exhibited in his imitation of Rembrandt. We even find productions of the Chevalier Van der Werff, the most insipid of painters, imitated, on some occasions, by the pencil of Diétrich.

Burtin,* a great admirer of Diétrich, says: "A precise, learned, soft, and rich touch, combined with judicious glazing, always causes us to recognise the rare talent of Diétrich, though he has been so varied in style, and has chosen such subjects as the 'Village Quack,' the sublime 'Communion of St. Jerome,' the picturesque Calisto, and then risen to the admirable finish of his precious and valuable 'Flight into Egypt.' The composition, the design, the expression, all equally perfect, the learned attitudes, the graceful nobility, the striking truthfulness of the stuffs, the charms of the soft colouring, the chiaroscuro of a most piquant character, the admirable toning down of the lights, combined with the most soft and delicate pencilling, which surpasses even the finish of Van der Werff, place this masterpiece of Diétrich amid the pearls of art." We may, perhaps, have occasion to correct the enthusiasm of a man speaking of a picture which was his own property.

It was ten years and more since Diétrich had returned from Holland † Since this journey he had not left the city of Dresden, where he lived, with the title of painter to the king of Poland, except to go to Brunswick. In 1743, however, he started on an expedition to Italy. The earnest desire he had always felt to see this classic land of painting, this soil of art and fancy, was not his only motive for undertaking the journey. Though he laboured without ceasing, and though his facility was something really surprising, he could not keep up with the tremendous demand that existed at the court of Dresden for his pictures. Already he had been obliged to fly to the Duke of Brunswick, and could not find with that prince the rest and repose he so much desired. He determined to place the broad expanse of several kingdoms between himself and his thoughtless admirers. But he did not remain absent more than two or three years. He came back to Dresden, where he remained until the hour of his death, which took place in 1774.

A Dutchman with the Dutch, Diétrich in Italy became quite an Italian. He there painted pictures in the style of Claude Lorraine and Salvator Rosa, as he had formerly painted in the styles of Berghem and Everdingen. "The easy drawing of this artist," says a biographer, "is quite in the modern Roman style; the energy and lightness of his pencil appeared to unite the taste of the schools of Flanders and Italy, and his landscapes have often the freshness of Lucatelli, and the firmness of Salvator Rosa." We cannot indeed perceive, without considerable astonishment and surprise, in the same gallery, landscapes in the style of Guaspere, smiling country scenes in the style of Lucatelli, wild sights and romantic scenes such as Salvator Rosa would paint, and all of them signed by the name of Diétrich. But it is to the city of Dresden we must go to understand and appreciate Diétrich.

† According to Hagedorn, Diétrich appears to have gone to Holland only once in 1721. He returned to Dresden in 1735; but Papillon de la Ferté assures us that he returned in 1743, when coming back from Italy, and remained a long time.

‡ P. de la Ferté, Extract from different works published on the Lives of Painters. Paris, 1776, ii. p. 55.

The gallery of that city, where he lived so many years, and which was his true country, contains numerous paintings from his hand, and in every conceivable style. There you can, in less than one hour, judge of the incredible subtlety of Diétrich's talent; and it appears as if, to show off this peculiarity of our artist, they have united purposely all the most opposite masters, those whom he successfully imitated with his hands. Here we have a pasticcio of Vandermeulen; there an imitation of Watteau; further on, a copy of the "Hundred Florin" piece of Rembrandt; but it is proper to observe, that these several trials do not give a very lofty idea of the master. In the gallery where we find such splendid Rembrandts, such charming Watteaus, we are more than anywhere else struck with the insufficiency of copies which are neither original nor correct imitations.

Thus the "Christ healing the Sick," so admirable, so lofty, so expansive in the original by Rembrandt, becomes a very cold production in the hands of Diétrich. The disposition of the figures is nearly the same. The chiaroscuro represents the same proportions of light and shade; but somehow, all this leaves the spectator indifferent. The sick people around our Saviour are not interesting, though their faces bear all the marks and signs of suffering and grief. The "Christ" of Diétrich is delicate and poetical, but there is not a trace of divinity in its composition any more than if it had been painted by David. There is no sign of any miraculous power in that figure or in that face. None can feel that sickening of the heart, none can feel tempted to weep, as men have been known to do when gazing at the sublime painting of Rembrandt. They are fictitious sighs, of which painting has caught but the show; it is a light without warmth, a shadow without mystery.

The same may, with considerable truth, be said of "The Presentation to the Temple," another copy of Rembrandt, which is equally cold and awkward, the artist having merely imitated the vulgarity and coarseness of the master, without one iota of his poetry. But if we examine carefully the whole Dresden gallery, we find here and there more happy and successful imitations. Whenever he had only to deal with artists whose merit was wholly exterior, if we may so express ourselves, Diétrich, clever to seize appearances, and incredible in his subtilty when the secrets of any mode of painting were to be discovered, was invariably more successful, and often triumphant. If he undertakes to paint a sketch by Vandermeulen, he succeeds in painting a picture which recalls that master, but in such a way that the pasticcio in the freedom and liberty of its style resembles some painter near at hand—say like Parrocel. He makes attempts upon the most opposite artists, in their turn—the precious Micris, the easy Sullyras—and reproduces what may be described as the costume of their thought, if not the thought itself.

One day, when painting one of those little canvases where he delighted in representing over again the favourite subjects of Cornelius Poelenberg, he painted a very pretty picture, which few, who have visited the Dresden gallery, can have failed to observe, in which he has been exceedingly successful in the expression. It is, indeed, only from the chaste and delicate tone of the style and the painting that the subject can be looked at with pleasure. It is a little more nude than any of the works of the gentle Poelenberg himself. Diétrich has, in this instance, represented an episode in the constantly recurring subject of "Diana's Bath." The chaste goddess surprises two of her nymphs under circumstances which, according to the mythological view of her character, are objectionable. They have allowed men to violate the sanctity of her grove. The power of the painter is here indeed very great, whether we examine the faces of the goddess, the nymphs, or the men. Nothing could be more difficult than to represent the astonishment and anger of the goddess, the guilty fear of the nymphs, and the curiosity and pretended alarm of the men. Diétrich here, without copying any one, has manifested great power and originality. The figures, too, are gracefully and elegantly modelled. The nymphs are in the water, up to their waists, save only one, who has been seeking to escape the angry glances of Diana, and whose feet only are in the water. This figure is admirably painted, while the outline and form are graceful and beautiful.

The French school, which then exercised such a decisive influence in Germany, could not but excite the curiosity and to the antique, while Winkelmann laid his erudition and his fanatical enthusiasm at the service of that reform, Watteau was more admired at Weimar than he ever was at Paris. Diétrich, naturally enough, then adopted Watteau as one of his masters, and began to plagiarise his "Conversation on the Grass," his charming and fascinating masquerades, in which the whole world appears to us with its joys, its dreams, its loves, draw the attention of Diétrich. The one most admired in the little courts, which made up so large a part of Germany, was the admirable Watteau, the delight of the fair sex. A celebrated connoisseur of that time informs us that there were courts where the paintings of Watteau were more popular than any of the Italian masters, not even excepting Raffaele himself. Thus, while Vien, Drouais, and David were meditating the reform of the French school, and a solemn return and its sadness, under the aspect and dress and fanciful appearance of the Italian stage. But to interpret and render Watteau, it is not sufficient to have seductive colouring, and a power of using rose, vermillion, and blue; it is necessary to have his mind, his vast and prolific imagination, his adorable caprices, his insatiable love of reverie and pleasure; it is necessary to have an intuitive belief in the passion of love, as Watteau had. Diétrich confined himself wholly to the outward surface, and copied Watteau without understanding him; he only saw the sheath of the beautiful and brilliant blade. It is therefore very visible that in his pastorals his grace is borrowed, his delirium pretended, and his passion feigned. As for Diétrich's lovers, they are by no means the lively triflers of Watteau; they are sad, and dull, and monotonous.

who did not care a fig for Diétrich, who studied these Bourguignons, and declared that their touch was inimitable."

All that we have previously remarked and quoted sufficiently demonstrates to the mind of the reader that Diétrich spent the greater part of his life, and expended nearly the whole of his energies, in the somewhat sterile and thankless task of painting an innumerable quantity of pastecios. While per-

THE FLIGHT INTO EGYPT.—FROM A PAINTING BY DIETRICH.

He was once more successful and pleasing, when the handling of the pencil, the fire of the touch, and practice and experience had to play the principal part. "In his youth," says Hagedorn, "he amused himself by imitating Bourguignon. He was so eminently successful that, having re-painted two battle scenes by this great master, which had been brought from Italy, and had been spoiled by the way, connoisseurs took them for Bourguignons. We knew a stranger sovereign in this spirit of imitation, which led him to wander through the galleries and museums of Europe in preference to studying nature. Diétrich enjoyed an impulse which then was purely natural. During the whole of the first half of the eighteenth century, science, literature, art, politics, industry, in Germany, were but timid and unfortunate imitations. All the originality and genius of Germany seemed to have been exhausted in the first years of the sixteenth century. "The political and religious wars," says Madame de Staël, in her able work on Germany, "when the Germans were unfortunate enough to fight one against the other, turned away all persons' attention from literature; and when they began to think of it again, it was under the auspices of the age of Louis XIV., at the time when the desire to imitate the French had obtained possession of most of the courts and writers of Europe. The works of Hagedorn,* of Gellert, of Weiss, are but heavy French. Nothing original, nothing which was in conformity with the genius of the nation, was produced."

What Madame de Staël very properly and correctly observes of the literature of Germany at that time, may be equally justly applied to the pictures of the two artists who flourished in that country towards the same epoch. The works of Mengs, his portraits alone excepted, are but heavy and disfigured Raffaelles. Diétrich, despite his prodigious ability, has to endure the reproach of having laid a heavy hand on Rembrandt, diminished Salvator, obscured Claude Lorraine, and vulgarised Poelenberg, except in one instance, where he improved him.

In general, works on the divine art of painting have been rather recklessly prodigal of praise to Diétrich. This is very easily explained. Most persons, until of late years, who have written books on painting and the works of painters, were what are called amateurs of tableaux. More alive to the material qualities of the execution than to the general character of a work, or to the mighty inspiration of genius, these superficial connoisseurs, these men who live at sales, think every composition admirable, the arrangement of which is able, the chiaroscuro well developed, and the pencil managed with ability. As all these varied merits are to be found in the works of Diétrich, they have praised him beyond all reason, and little is wanting for these writers to have placed him on a level with the masters he has copied.

It is the province of the sincere and impartial critic to be more severe. Imitation, even when it is perfect, is proof of want of power. What characterises genius is the fact that it is true and new, as creative in its mode of proceeding as in its inspirations. If Rembrandt has a manner, which is not that of Titian or Corregio, it is because this great painter manifested in his works his thought, his soul, his very life. To a certain extent one can reproduce the system of composition, of style, of touch, and tone of the great masters; but how can we hope to grasp the fire of that genius which gives principal value to their inventions? Besides, of what use would it be? To imitate is to weaken. Every imitator has been fatally condemned to remain below his model. If he were but nearly the equal of the great men he copies, would he think of imitating them? In art none can walk on the road marked out by genius; it is effaced and leaves no mark, like the wake of the sea. Diétrich—called by himself and by some of his contemporaries Diétricy; so little original was he as to deny his own name—is a striking proof of the truth of this axiom. There is not one of his innumerable pasticcios which can be advantageously compared to the original works which have inspired them; and we must ascribe to courtesy, or to natural self-love, the judgment of a contemporary who says:—"He is with these masters all that he wishes to be; he feels himself the beauty of their productions. Always full of his subject, a master with an easy pencil, he renders with warmth the sentiment he feels, and adds original beauties to those which strike him in the inventions of others."

We are perfectly well aware that painters of the very first order of merit have delighted in manifesting the flexibility of their pencils, and have painted in the manner and in imitation of all masters, with such success that they have placed the judgment of connoisseurs at fault. We are perfectly well aware that this peculiar talent gained for Teniers the name of the Proteus of painting. But if Teniers had not combined with this one style of merit that of excelling in the style peculiar to him, he would not have become immortal. It is not because he copied in one picture the whole gallery of Philippe IV., that he is placed in the front rank of the masters of the Flemish school. He owes his most solid glory to those grotesque fantasies in which the spirit of the author is seen revelling in the free outline, and in the rapid and light touches, of his magic pencil.

We must not, however, for one moment suppose that Diétrich never did anything from his own inspiration—from his own genius, and that his individuality is never brought out. Even in his pasticcios he has not been able so to disguise himself as that it is impossible to recognise him. In vain has he abdicated his nature. In him is always found the German master: the pieces which are called his masterpieces, like the "Flight into Egypt," and the "Communion of St. Jerome," belong rather to the precise and pointed style of Van der Werff, of Elzheimer, of Poelenberg, than to the school of bold colourists, such as Rembrandt, Rubens, and Salvator. His design is often wanting in grace; we can find fault with certain stiffness in his draperies; his touch is dry and thin; his colouring is wanting in brightness and sharpness.

These defects, easily noted by an experienced eye, in divers degrees, in all the works of Diétrich, are especially to be remarked in his original works. The picture which is to be seen in the Louvre, and the subject of which is taken from the Scriptures, representing "Christ and the Woman taken in Adultery," gives a very good idea of the qualities of this painter, and of the imperfections of his talent. By his elaborate study of Rembrandt he had acquired a most incontestable power of disposing of light and shade. Thus, on the canvas we allude to, the woman, who is the principal personage of the picture, is lighted up brilliantly. She forms, so to speak, a luminous circle, of which the rays glide somewhat weakened upon the figure of the Saviour, and are lost by a series of learned effects—are melted away, in fact, in the two corners of the picture where stand the groups of old men.

The colouring of this canvas is harmonious, the touch warm and rich, though in some places thin; but the opposition of lights and shadows wants frankness, and thence it arises that the effect of the whole is weak. The drawing is poor in expression; the physiognomies, especially that of Christ, are wanting in elevation and life. The features of the young woman are charming in grace and Germanic candour; but this face, faithful mirror of a soul scarce woke to sensation, belongs rather to an innocent virgin than to her whose sins were forgiven her, and unto whom He said, "Neither do I condemn thee; go and sin no more."

This form of a woman was to Diétrich one of those types of beauty which the artist prefers to all others, and the image of which is renewed on all occasions by his pencil. It is found in another work by the same artist, engraved by Schmidt in 1775, where we see "Sarah leading her servant Hagar to the aged Abraham;" it is also seen again in the Virgin represented in "The Flight into Egypt." Though the form and conception of "The Woman taken in Adultery" belong properly to Diétrich, he could not help yielding here, as elsewhere, to his intense love for imitation: the personages who surround Christ are quite in the style and after the manner of Rembrandt; and we might apply to it the rather bold words of Michael Angelo, who said to a young painter, after admiring his work: "This is a very clever work, will please everybody, and make the reputation of the artist; unless, indeed, the varied authors of limbs and arms, and hands and legs, were each to claim their own. A pretty state of things indeed would then ensue!"

Diétrich, as laborious as any of the masters whom he took for a model, has left a great number of etchings. He has perhaps shown more ability in wielding his point than his brush. Unfortunately, his engravings, like his pictures, are copies. The great library of Paris, in its wonderful collection of engravings, possesses two proofs of the two first pieces engraved by Diétrich. One represents a strand on the borders of the sea, the other a scene in country life. In these first attempts it appears that Diétrich intended to follow in the track of Van der Velde, when that great master himself was yet scratching the copper with an inexperienced hand. The timid point glides over the plate, the lines are as fine as hairs, and the whole is a confused mass. Later, in 1731, a "Christ Preaching" is executed in quite another taste; the point is heavy, the dashes stiff and symmetrical, a little in the ancient German style. But we must not be unjust enough to judge our artist from the works of his youth. The true Diétrich, considered as an engraver, exists in those plates where he has imitated the portraits and the religious compositions of Rembrandt, the landscapes of Everdingen, the rocks of Salvator. If some of these productions are beautiful enough to make us sometimes doubt the name of the author, it must be owned that the etchings of Diétrich, now fine and light, now energetic, are presently too black and too overloaded with shadows, falling in the magic and wonderful effects of the painter of Leyden. And then how could he succeed—he, a German artist, cold in imagination and patient by nature—in discovering the audacious fancy of the point of Rembrandt? But his landscapes, in the style of Everdingen, of Ruysdael, and of Salvator, his imitations of Ostade and of Berghem, are admirable. It is much and always to be regretted, that he did not finish his "Christ Healing the Sick." The composition of this engraving is combined with great art. If Diétrich could have completed it, there is no doubt that it would have been remembered as his best work, as his masterpiece.

When we consider with what attention the portrait of Diétrich, painted by himself, is executed, we are very much struck by the gentle and placid beauty of his countenance. A calm intelligence beams upon his lofty forehead; but in his eyes, large and pure, one is easily able to detect rather a sagacious and frank mind and character, than a profound soul. The inward flame of genius is not seen, but a delicate sensibility, accessible to every impression from without. Nature seems to have written his destiny in his face. In the history of the arts, as in literature, celebrity is the lot of only those men who are gifted with a rare and positive original inspiration. Really great painters have been distinguished from each other by such marked characteristics, that none could fail to recognise them. It was upon condition of being unique, to speak in his own style, that each obtained his brevet of celebrity. Their names even cannot be pronounced without recalling to the mind the idea of perfection in one of the essential branches of art. Diétrich was not one of these. By very opposite qualities, he has saved his name from oblivion. Gifted with the surprising faculty of taking, like old Proteus, every form, and every appearance, he is like everybody, and he is never like himself. But he often carries pasticcio to such perfection, that he astonishes even those whose severe taste rejects these imitations as plagiarisms unworthy of his genius.

To compare and paint in the style of others, is properly to make what is called a pasticcio, a kind of art which we must not confound with a mere copy. Good copies of a master are often precious objects, because they multiply and spread abroad the noble pleasure one has in gazing upon a masterpiece. Clever and faithful, the copyist gives us the facsimile of a picture much better even than the engraver, because he gives character to the design, to the composition, to the justice of the chiaroscuro—that is to say, of the effect, the qualities of tone and touch so agreeable for us to survey. The pasticcio, on the other hand, never gives anything but a false idea of the original master to those who knew him not, and only inspires regrets in those who know him. Unless you rise to the ranks of those sublime painters who take their property, as Molière says, where they find it, or who, as Voltaire says, kill their men, it is rare that you do not weaken the ideas of others when you steal them. As for the painter Diétrich, we may quote the words of the poet:—

"Coloriste aujourd'hui, demain dessinateur,
Et, même en inventant, toujours imitateur,
Diétrich fut tour-à-tour Van Ostade, Corréio;
De Protée, en son art, il eut le privilège,

Et eut, dans ses tableaux, fleuri, suave et grand, Recommencer Watteau, Pöelenberg et Rembrandt."*

Diétrich has engraved about two hundred subjects, of which copies are very rare. He has treated subjects from Bible history, and profane story; he has engraved half figures and head studies, pastoral scenes, views, and landscapes.

In Bible history he has engraved nineteen subjects; amongst which the most remarkable are "Lot and his Daughters," "Abraham Sacrificing Isaac," "Isaac on his knees before the Pile," "Abraham Sacrificing the Ram—these four plates no longer exist—"Christ surrounded by the Doctors," twenty-six figures; "Christ healing the Sick," also with twenty-six figures; "The Descent from the Cross," with nineteen figures; "St. James Preaching in a Village," with seven figures; "The Nativity," and "The Flight into Egypt," in the style of Rembrandt.

In profane story he has many. "Venus on the Rocks," imitated from Pöelenberg; "The Combats of the Tritons," in the style of Salvator Rosa; "The Satyr and the Passerby," from Jordans; "The Spectacle Dealer," six figures, in the style of Van Ostade; "The Knife grinder and the Cobbler" (p. 361), "The Dealer in Poison for Rats" (p. 353), "The Dentist," "The Quack," all in the style of the same master; "Bellisarius Begging," a very rare and beautiful engraving; and "The Dinner," a piece equally rare and equally admirable.

Subjects in half figures and heads are "The Strolling Musicians" (p. 360), engraved in the style of Rembrandt, and imitated from Van Ostade; "The Tea Party," "The Dutch Priest," "The Monk with the Beard," "The Man with Moustaches," "An Old Man standing erect;" and heads of women and children.

Pastoral scenes, views, and landscapes are "Young Girls at the Entrance of a Cavern," "Herdsman leaning on a Cow"—these two compositions are imitated from Pöelenberg—"A Shepherd tending his Flock," from Berghem; "Landscape with Ruins;" six landscapes; "The Chapel," "The Wooden Bridge" (p. 356), "The Flock," "The Lake," in the style of Salvator; "A Cowherd, with a stick in his hand," "Two Hermits," "Two Peasants;" "Studies of Animals: He-Goats, She-Goats, Rams, Sheep, Lambs, the Goatherd, and three Goats."

The nineteen pieces from Holy History were sold at the Royal sale for £11 in 1817.

Most public galleries in Europe possess pictures by Diétrich. The Louvre has "The Woman taken in Adultery," which was only valued at £21 in 1816.

Belgium has the portrait of the artist, engraved, in 1765, by Schmuizer. It is given at page 353.

The Museum of Vienna has "The Shepherds," a night-piece, signed and dated 1769; and "The Adoration of the Shepherds," another night-piece, executed the same year.

The Royal Pinacothek Museum of Munich is richer. It has five pictures by Diétrich: "Lazarus in the Bosom of Abraham," "The Avaricious Man in Hell," "A Landscape on the Sea Shore," "A Landscape, with Fishermen's Huts," "Two Blind Men leading one another."

At Dresden there are fifty pictures by this master, of which the principal ones are: "A Man, a Woman, and a Boy Feeding some Sheep," in the style of Bassan; "The Portrait of the Mother of Diétrich," "The Adoration of the Magi," "The Presentation to the Temple," "The Prodigal Son," "The Marriage Feast of Cana," "A Pastoral Scene," in the style of Watteau; "A Flock of Sheep and Goats, guarded by the Shepherd and Shepherdess," "A Holy Family, by the light of a Lantern," "Christ Curing the Sick," "Christ on the Cross," "Mercury and Argus," and "Nymphs Bathing."

* To day a colourist, to-morrow a sketcher, and even when inventing always an imitator, Diétrich was in turns Van Ostade and Corregio. In the arts he had the privilege of Proteus, and was able, in his flowery, sweet, and grand pictures, to reproduce Watteau, Pöelenberg, and Rembrandt.

able picture. The cobbler in his stall, the cat above, and the queer old knife-grinder, are all faithfully given. The colouring of this is very rich, and the play of lights and shades very forcible.

"The Halt of the Holy Family" (p. 361), though ably painted, is defective in costume. The Virgin in her dress is too like an Italian peasant girl, while the infant Jesus is perfectly Dutch. It is also, however, an able painting in the colouring.

"The Strolling Musicians" (p. 360) is witty in conception and ably carried out. The players are vigorously rendered, and the chiaroscuro is admirable.

"The Flight into Egypt" (p. 357) is to a certain extent powerful; but, though not wanting in chiaroscuro and general tone, is defective in the figures.

"The Wooden Bridge" (p. 356) is pretty, tasteful, and original.

Smith, in his Catalogue, gives the following observations on Diétrich: "Many very clever pictures, from the pencil of this painter in the style of Rembrandt, partly merit him a place in the present list. He was born at Weimar, in Saxony, the court of Dresden to send him to Italy. How long he studied in that far-famed school, or what were the important advantages he derived from it, does not readily appear in his works, for these reflect the style and peculiarities of other masters' pictures, as Rembrandt, Poelenberg, Ostade, and Salvator Rosa; but those of the former artist appear to have made the greatest impression on him, for he imitated them so servilely, that even his original compositions have the appearance of being, in many instances, copies from his favourite painter's picture. ANECDOTES OF THE LIFE OF MICHAEL ANGELO.

THE accession of Leo X. marked the commencement of a period wasted in fruitless labour, in bitter regrets, and more bitter sufferings, by the great Michael Angelo. It seemed to have been ordained that, from time to time, the career of this man should be like that of a torrent chafing in its channel of rocks, but afterwards bursting out more free and bright than ever. During nine years, however, the eclipse of his fortunes was unbroken, and only one incident is recorded of him; but this was one alike honourable to his spirit as an artist and to his feelings as a citizen.

The Academy of Florence had sent deputies to Leo X., petitioning him to restore to their country the ashes of Dante Alighieri, the noble and unhappy exile, who, after reviving the language and restoring the literature of Italy, had, two centuries previous, breathed his last sigh at Ravenna.

Michael Angelo relieved his long days of compulsory indolence, of sad monotony, by reading the songs of the Florentine poet, marking with his pen on the margin all the passages which struck his imagination. What an inestimable relic this volume would have been, if it had not, like Ovid's last song, been lost in the waters; for who, better than Michael Angelo, could have illustrated and interpreted Dante?

At the first intelligence which came concerning the embassy, then on its way to Rome, the artist became excited. With a generous enthusiasm, a vivid and ardent sympathy with genius, he joined at once in the work of reparation and justice. We may still read at the bottom of the original petition, preserved in the Florentine archives, these words:—"I, Michael Angelo, sculptor, address to your holiness the same prayer, and I offer to execute for the divine poet a sepulchre worthy of his memory."

And Leo X., the ostentatious Mæcenas, the vain patron of letters, refused this magnificent offer, and deprived the world of the monument which such an artist's memorial of the great poet would have been! But the whole Medici family, though servile historians have endeavoured to exalt them, were sordid, treacherous, and contemptible. We fully agree with the author of a brilliant article in "The Eclectic Review," who has assailed the betrayers of Florence upon that pedestal to which they have been raised by the worshippers of success:—"History," he says, "has agreed to reprobate the treason of Sforza and of the Visconti, but, with a traditional perverseness, continues to applaud the Medici as benefactors of Italy. They the benefactors of Italy! Florence alone, humiliated and enslaved, is a suffering memorial of their crimes. But turn from her to the pestilent Maremma of Sienna. That was a beautiful salubrious tract, until Cosmo wasted it and transformed it into a deadly marsh. Fever-breeding swamps exist in the places where the republics cultivated fertile and healthy plains. The Roman territories, from Ferrara to the Pontine Marshes, have become Lare and putrid since the stagnation of industry ensuing on the decline of freedom. Cosmo dried up the fertilising springs and streams of his country, by hewing down the forests on the Tuscan Apennines. Rocky deserts now exist where the pastures in ancient times were rich with fleece, and a population of banditti derives its descent from shepherds and cultivators of the soil. If, therefore, they are benefactors who make men happy, the Medici have nothing to claim from the gratitude of mankind."

It was about this period, according to all the testimonies we can collect, that the unhappy quarrel took place between Raffaele and Michael Angelo, the most eminent painters of their age. Angelo met his rival on the steps of the Vatican, surrounded by a crowd of scholars, and ironically exclaimed, "You march like a general at the head of his army." "And you," said the other, with fierce contempt, "go skulking alone, like an executioner." Perhaps, however, we may absolve the memory of the two great artists from much of the stain cast by this quarrel; for the fault is to be attributed to that crowd of parasites who only sought their intimacy in order to inflame their passions and flatter their pride.

Meanwhile, Leo the Tenth died suddenly, carried off by poison. If the arts in general lost a patron, Michael Angelo at least had nothing to regret. The Florentine pope had never bestowed friendship or aid upon his countryman. However, no change for the better took place. Adrian the Sixth, of Flemish origin, succeeded to the papal throne; and this was a misfortune for the painter. The new pontiff conceived the strange and barbarous resolution of pulling down the roof of the Sistine Chapel, because, he said, it looked more like the roof of a bath than of a place of worship.

It was not, therefore, with sorrow that the painter saw this pope and the next pass away—feeble princes, who never held the sacerdotal sceptre until their hands began to tremble with the weakness of approaching death. But the succession of despots was unbroken. Florence again and again threw off the yoke of those proficent traitors, the Medici; and the seventh Clement, born from that hateful stock, when his native city had once more become free, hired a host of barbarians to assail her. Their savage standards were soon perceived flying on the summits of those sun-touched hills, whence the beautiful city of Florence may be seen—a picture of delightful houses and gardens, in the glowing Italian light. Forty-four thousand men laid siege to the Tuscan capital. Less than thirteen thousand defended her walls, during eleven months, with heroic fortitude. Eight thousand patriots died in the breaches, and fourteen thousand of their enemies were buried in the plains around. Now was Michael Angelo called on to decide whether he should act as a painter or a man—whether he should offend a family of benefactors, or deny his country. He hesitated not a moment. Being named a member of the famous Council of Nine, and director of the fortifications, he proceeded round the city ramparts, and declared, that unless vast preparations were made, the usurping Medici would enter at their will. But the nobles of Florence, like true oligarchs, were already conspiring to betray the commonwealth. They complained of the sculptor's vigilance; they said he was cowardly and extravagant, because they knew he was faithful and sagacious. Their poisonous tongues prevailed. Florence was already sufficiently corrupted by her nobles to listen to their slanders. Michael Angelo, therefore, indignant and ashamed, himself opened a gate, returned to Florence, and remained in angry solitude, like Achilles in his tent. When he was gone, the Florentines repented. They sent messengers after him, by whom he was found, lonely, sad, stern, and immersed in dreams, in one of the most obscure little streets of the sea-built city. They approached him with humble deference; they prayed him to forget the slight which the provisional government had put upon him; they conjured him, in the name of liberty and of his country, to return. He at first resisted and refused, but in vain; for they pressed him again, and at length he consented. Once more, therefore, we see the artist in Florence, a general, a strategist, at the head of the defenders of his beloved city. It was too late. The last hour of Italian independence had sounded. Charles the Fifth, another of the hateful tyrants whom history flatters, had thrown his sword into the scale. The artillery, by night and by day, poured a storm upon Florence; the bravest of the citizens had already fallen. The old men and the women, pale with hunger, decimated by famine, clothed in black, and smeared with ashes, came together into the squares, or knelt in the churches, and swore they would all die rather than surrender. Michael Angelo had stationed himself on the steeple of Santo Miniato. Two guns, pointed at the besiegers and discharged incessantly, made his post conspicuous. They fired furiously at the spot. He smiled with contempt, and hung down immense draperies of cloth, which were more effectual than stone in resisting the light balls which alone could reach that elevated eyrie. Certainly, if Florence could have been saved, Angelo would have been her deliverer. Already his courage, his firmness, the resources of his mighty genius, stirred and multiplied by the heat of patriotism and the excitement of battle, had carried wonder and terror into the enemy's ranks; but Florence was even now lost. Suddenly a cry of sorrow arose from the streets below; women were heard shrieking; the imprecations of the soldiers were terrible. In a few moments all was explained. Malatesta had been corrupted by the Medici; the infamous Valori had sold his country. It is hard to say which was worse, the men who paid, or the man who received the nefarious price of treason? But the moral of the story would not have been complete without its sequel. A capitulation had been signed, opening the gates on condition of a general amnesty to be granted by the conquerors. Let us see how the magnificent Medici, the benefactors of Italy, kept their faith. Six of the noblest citizens were immediately beheaded; many others were condemned to exile or to the galleys. And these friends of art hunted Michael Angelo about, searched his house from the cellar to the roof, drove him from one concealment to another, until the glorious artist was compelled to hide in the lofty clock-tower of the church of San Nicholo del Arno.

At last, the Seventh Clement was artful enough to abandon the pursuit. He knew that, if he laid hands on the artist, supposing this to be possible, he would only be troubled by a new prisoner; while, if he granted him life and liberty, he would have one enemy the less, and be able to claim the praise of clemency, magnanimity, and so forth. So he pardoned Michael Angelo. And not this only. He humbled himself before him; he made him all kinds of offers and promises, on condition that he would resume his sculptor's chisel, and occupy himself without delay with the monuments to Julius the Second, and Lorenzo de Medici, that other impostor whom it was, until lately, the fashion to eulogise and admire.

On his return to Rome, a new trial awaited Michael Angelo. The representatives of the Duke of Urbino, with that tenacity which has characterised the followers of the law in all ages and countries, revived the affair of the tomb of Julius II., of which we have already in a former article given the particulars. The artist had no inclination to fall into the hands of his enemies, and so came to terms with them, by engaging to perfect the monument without further delay. He, therefore, set himself seriously to his task. The design of the mausoleum, which was originally intended to be the grandest work of the kind ever executed, had been reduced to that of a simple façade of marble upon one of the walls of "the church of St. Peter of the Bonds." The vain Julius himself had chosen the spot in which his tomb should be placed. He loved the name of the church, which had been bestowed by Sextus IV., one of the first founders of the greatness of his family. He himself had been its cardinal during thirty-two years—and, as being elected pope, had transmitted the dearly-cherished honour to his nephew. Some fatality, however, seemed to forbid the completion of the work, frequently interrupted as it had already been. Numerous influences conspired, and of the whole abortive plan, nothing but a figure of Moses was executed in a style worthy of its artist's name. And this statue, beautiful and grand as it is, has been taken from its original position, displaced from the point of view in which it appeared in its proper character, and isolated from the groups of which it was intended to form a porch; and, therefore, produces little of the impression it was intended to create. Had it been seated beside a gigantic tomb, and a throng of prophets and sibyls, as the artist desired, it would have been an example of the solemn and grand in sculpture. Even as it is, if you enter the church at nightfall, and contemplate by the uncertain and lingering radiance of the evening that superhuman apparition, your mind cannot rest calm when the eye falls on the figure of Moses. He is seated like a demigod of the ancients in Olympian majesty. One of his arms is extended over the table of the law; the other reposes across his breast, with the superb nonchalance of one who knows he has but to frown, to command obedience from the multitude. A thick and ponderous beard hangs down upon his enormous chest, like a torrent arrested in its course. The simple and primitive character of this great shepherd of a nation is typified in every development of his form in every fold of his vesture. The double intelligence given to him, since the divine vision on the Mount, beams from the high, broad, massive brow; and power and benevolence combined seem to speak in every lineament of the countenance.

While Michael Angelo was employed upon his "Moses," Clement VII., like Julius whom he was honouring, troubled him incessantly.

One day a messenger came to the artist, telling him that he need not expect his customary visit. Clement VII. was dead. He had leisure, just while the conclave was sitting, to elect a new pope.

Paul III. was announced. He came, with a pompous retinue of ten cardinals, to the studio of Buonarroti.

"Now," said the new pontiff, "I shall expect, Master Buonarroti, that all your time will be given up to me."

"Will your holiness pardon me?" replied the sculptor; "I have signed an engagement with the Duke of Urbino, by which I have pledged myself to complete the monumental tomb of Julius II."

"What!" cried Paul; "it is thirty years since I formed a wish, and now that I am pope I am not to gratify myself."

"But my contract, holy father—my contract."

"Come, come; I will take the responsibility of that affair upon myself. You shall execute three figures with your own hand, and other artists shall do the rest. I will answer for the Duke of Urbino's consent. And now, my master, to the Sistine Chapel; there is a great vacuum there awaiting us."

What could Michael Angelo urge against a will so positive, and so imperiously expressed? He completed, as best he could, his two statues of "Active Life" and "Contemplative Life," the symbolical Rachel and Leah of Dante; and, not daring to make any profit from an engagement he was forced to break, gave a large proportion of the sum he received himself to pay liberally the artists employed by him to execute the rest of the work. Having thus brought to a conclusion an affair which had cost him so much labour, vexation, and perplexity, he threw himself, with all his enthusiasm and his genius, into the execution of his vast design, "The Last Judgment," the painting of which occupied him during little less than nine years.

This picture, enormous and unique, represents the human figure in every conceivable attitude; it depicts every sentiment, every passion, all the infinitely-varied reflections of fancy and thought, all the impulses and workings of the soul; with an inestimable profusion of forms, tints, and tones, such as are found nowhere else within the domain of art.

In this work, Michael Angelo seems to have challenged with his courage an infinite difficulty, which his genius overcame. The object of this vast composition, the manner in which it is conceived and developed, the admirable variety and skilful distribution of the groups, the unsurpassable boldness and force of the outline, the contrasts of light and shade, the obstacles, almost insuperable, in the very nature of the design, which he appears to have assailed as if in sport, the happy power with which this prodigal variety and these innumerable details are wrought and combined into one harmonious whole—all these render "The Last Judgment" of Michael Angelo a prodigy of painting. Immense as the surface is, each part of the picture gains in effect by close study; for no cabinet-piece for the most fastidious amateur was ever more lovingly retouched, or finished to more exquisite perfection.

This magnificent work, after nearly nine years of labour, was exhibited to the public on Christmas-day, 1511. Michael Angelo was then sixty-seven years old. Several anecdotes are related in reference to his "Last Judgment."

The pope, it is said, objected to the style of representing some of the figures, and sent to tell the painter that they must be altered.

"You will tell Pope Paul," he replied, "to trouble himself less with erecting my picture, which it is easy for him to do, and to try and reform public manners, which he will find more difficult."

The master of the ceremonies of the Vatican accompanied the pope one day on a visit which his holiness paid to the studio of Michael Angelo, when "The Last Judgment" was about half finished. This creature also would express his opinion on the work.

"Holy father," he said, "if I might utter my thoughts, I would say that this painting is more fit for a tavern-room than for the chapel of a pope."

Unhappily for the master of the ceremonies, Michael Angelo was behind him when he uttered these words, and lost not a syllable of the compliment paid him by Signor Biagio. The moment, therefore, that his visitors were gone, the artist sat down and drew a portrait of his critic, and placed him among the "Lost Souls," under the flattering character of Midas. This was a revenge suggested, perhaps, by the practice of Dante, who punished those who offended him by consigning them to his Inferno.

We may imagine the misery of the poor master of the ceremonies, when he saw himself condemned in this way. He threw himself at the pope's feet, begging for deliverance, and for the punishment of the offender. But Paul professed that he had no jurisdiction. And so Michael Angelo gratified his malicious whim, and went on painting his great picture.

HALT OF THE HOLY FAMILY.—FROM A PAINTING BY DIETRICH.

GABRIEL METZU.

To have seen a few pictures of Metzu, of Terburg, or of Gaspar Netscher, is to have acquired fresh knowledge of the manners of the Dutch citizen of the time of the Stadtholder, of his costume, of his physiognomy, of his courtesies, of his mode of life, and even of his style of thinking; and this knowledge is to be gained from such a study, as well as from history and description. To be sure, the painting would be unintelligible without the book; for the pencil would create mysteries without the pen, though it is the fashion among the critics of art to say that their craft is superior to that of the writer. But what would a whole gallery, as vast as the Vatican, of historical portraits be worth, if the biographies of the individuals did not exist? What would all the Sculptures in Nineveh tell us, if the sacred and the classic records did not interpret their mystical tongue? What frescos could have told us Roman history, if Livy had not written? or what painter could have left such a familiarity with old Spanish manners as we have derived from the literary pictures of Cervantes? We cannot, therefore, agree with the few artists who are able to write at all, that whole libraries of information are rendered superfluous by the paintings of one master. No one will suspect us of a wish to depreciate a branch of art, but it is just to that art itself to remember its office, and not to claim the dominion in a realm which belongs to another genius. From a picture we may learn the fashion of a mantle or a boot, the style of ornamenting a chimney-piece or a chair, the mode of wearing a beard or a wig; but the spirit and moral of all valuable history is still reserved exclusively for the pen; and the painter in this department must be for ever subordinate, and illustrate what the superior artist—of words and thoughts—describes and explains.

Nevertheless, as we have admitted, such a painter as Gabriel spicer was first collected for them, and when their exchanges began to grow opulent by the trade with Borneo and Sumatra. In the pride of his freedom, after the yoke of Spain has been broken, he appears before us, a liberal citizen, methodical in

THE UNEXPECTED VISIT,—FROM A PAINTING BY METZ.

Metzu is, in some respects, an historian. He exhibits, in dramatic groups, the national manners of his time. In his pictures we see the Hollander of the age when the United Netherlands were first reaping the riches of the Indian isles; when his life, and very systematic in the conduct of his affairs. His house is to him a world; he gathers into this one place, around this pleasant centre, as many delights as were heaped up in the ancient palaces of the kings of Eebatana and Susa.

The ships of his country—perhaps his own ships—have for him traversed the ocean from one zone to another,—have searched for porcelain and amber in Japan, for ginger in Malabar, for pepper in Java, for precious canes and drugs in Malacca. From the farthest parts of the world, the famous islands of the Malays, they have brought him all that could enrich his home, benefit his family, and charm away the dreariness of mind naturally inspired by the cold sky and long winters of the north. Asia sends him its muslins, its spices, its diamonds, its feathers of the bird of Paradise, its ivory and camphor. The ices of the Pole have furnished him with those splendid furs, to border the velvet mantle which his wife or his eldest daughter is proud to wear, even in the warmest apartment of the house. The birds, the insects, the shells, and minerals of the remotest lands, fill his cabinets, exquisitely arranged under covers of glass; and, protected in the same way, the rarest plants, the most delicate Persian lilies, the sumptuous tulips, flourish and are cultivated under his inspection. His furniture, wrought with extreme taste, and preserved with the utmost care, suffers no changes from the caprices of fashion, but is transmitted from father to son, one generation after another. The canopy of his bed is supported on pillars of carved ebony, and hung round with drapery of green damask. Hanging from the roof a mirror of gilded copper is twined round with wreaths of elegant workmanship. The floors of the rooms are waxed into beautiful lustre; the glass is finely cut; the lintel of the door is richly carved; the furniture shines with polish; and the light, at morning or evening, falls across bright variegated tapestries, which moderate and harmonise it with the tone of the whole interior. The manners of the Dutch at that period, as well as the material physiognomy of their citizen life, their interiors, their furniture, the luxury and decoration of their apartments, are delineated in the pictures of Metzú with a charming freedom, which is the more attractive since it appears to be entirely without effort on the part of the painter. His walls, after a lapse of two hundred years, would afford materials for the complete restoration of a Dutch interior, just as architectural fragments enable us to build up a perfect temple of antique proportions. And the representation would be an interesting study, harmonising so faithfully as it would with the spirit of the seventeenth century, with the climate and natural characteristics of the country the manners of the inhabitants, and the historical circumstances associated with the fortunes of the merchant classes of Holland, then the masters and leaders of the trade of the world. And they to whom nothing is insignificant which relates to the intimate life, the familiar habits of a people that once filled the globe with the fame of their achievements, will discover nothing puerile in such remarks or such details. It is indeed delightful to enter, favoured by the painter Metzú's introduction, one of those warm Dutch interiors, which were, unlike the Italian houses of the same period, so inaccessible to strangers. It is most frequently by a glimpse through a window, opening in the centre of the piece, that he admits us into the comfortable privacy of a fashionable lady's boudoir, in which he allows us to surprise her in her graceful morning attire, writing some important letter, or completing her toilette, in expectation of a wished-for visitor; or reclining on a couch and touching the strings of her lute into the expression of the thoughts and desires of her heart.

Metzú possessed a power of interesting, not only the eye, but the mind, by the representation of the most simple acts of domestic life. A lady engaged in sealing a letter, which a servant is waiting to carry to the post, is a subject sufficiently humble, yet, thanks to the finish and excellence of the work—to the attentive care bestowed on the delineation of this occurrence, so common in "every-day life"—the picture attracts and rivets our attention. If the painter's touch were less precious, if the details were not so well chosen and so discreetly managed, no one would pause a moment to examine them. But it is impossible not to notice with care that which the artist evidently conceived to be of such importance, and in which the composition is so admirable, that the general effect surpasses that of many ambitious pictures, possessing no little merit. It is impossible not to feel curious; not to ask, "To whom is that fair lady, in her elegant negligée, writing so careful a letter this morning, and so delicately pointing a seal on the wax? and what means that light but significant smile on the lips of the waiting-maid who attends to carry away the letter, standing with her apron rolled up, and her sleeves turned above the elbows?" And in the background, the closed curtains hint that the bed is still unmade; and the lady, in her half-completed toilet, tells us that she has passed the night more in dreaming than in sleeping.

The expression, so to speak, of Metzú's pictures is often so subtle that it is not caught at the first glance of the eye. Dutchmen's faces, in general, appear imperturbably tranquil, immoveably phlegmatic. It is no easy matter to discover in them the latent smile or the reserved sentiment. But, upon a closer observation, it will be found, that there is not one in which, under an exterior perfectly calm, there is no play of thought or feeling. Of course, this remark must refer solely to the originals themselves; for, in the engravings from them, however faithful the engraver may have been, there is unavoidably a loss of some volatile and fleeting essence, as it were, which the painter diffused over his picture,—some airy and spiritual tene, impossible to fix or copy, which was not created by the use of any particular colour or form, but the absence of which, intangible and indescribable as it is, denaturalises the work. The solemn citizens of Metzú bear, in their placid countenances, not the expression of indifference or ennui, but of serene souls, in which enjoyment is produced by repose, confidence, and content. We perceive at once that on this surface, apparently so impassive, the least emotion would leave its trace, and that the lightest thought could be interpreted to the sight by the almost imperceptible motion of the lips and eyes. There is a young girl receiving a declaration, in a charming picture called "A Lady tuning her Guitar." Her eyes are raised to look on the countenance of her embarrassed lover; a half-secret gladness beams through her face; something like self-love heightens the carnation on her beautiful cheeks, more glossy than satin; and a change seems visibly coming over all her features. A Spanish lady would not display this, so general would be the vivacity of her countenance and the play of expression in her eyes. But a fair Hollander is seldom disturbed from what Tasso would call "the beautiful serene of her face;" the angers or disappointments of her soul only betray her into the expression of a moderate melancholy, and the gratifications of a flattered heart, which in others would produce a brilliancy of smiles, mark her cheeks with a very gentle dimple. If we criticise the valuable painting, in the collection of the Duc de Choiseul, which is known as "The Hunter's Return," the same delicacy is noticeable in the expression of the lady, and the same quietness in her attitude. Attired in a rose-coloured bodice and a skirt of white satin embroidered with gold, she is looking at a miniature and chatting with her maid, of whom we know not; but at the very moment her husband, coming home from the chase, enters abruptly the apartment of his lady. The conversation in an instant is cut short; the maid puts her fingers on her lips, and her mistress, pretending to play with the spaniel whom she strokes with her hand, awaits with downcast eyes and unmoved countenance the first words her husband is about to address to her.

There are masters of the Dutch school who accumulate innumerable details in their pieces, but animate them with no spirit whatever. They make the representation of manners a pretext for a ridiculous assemblage of furniture, glass, lustres, china vases, and all sorts of curiosities; their interiors are inconveniently crowded bazaars. Metzú, on the contrary, being a man of intelligence and taste, only brings into juxtaposition with his personages such things as are essential to the meaning of his composition, to illustrate the adventure, or explain the conversation. His skill in painting inanimate objects was marvellous; but he never allowed it, like the Præ-Raphaelites of our own day, to draw him into a vulgar deference to a vulgar taste; and yet, how perfect was the finish he bestowed on such simplicities! He could weave over one of his floors a Turkey carpet, or elaborate the decorations of a gold or silver cup, or paint the transparency of Bohemian glass, or of the wine that glowed and sparkled half-way up to the brim of his crystal goblet! Glasses, be it remembered, were of great importance in his pictures, for the life of a retired Dutch citizen was chiefly passed in smoking and drinking, to dull his intellect, and to degrade him into premature and unnatural imbecility. But we do not see in Metzu's pieces the heavy horn cups perpetually passed from hand to hand by the peasants of Van Ostade; his are fine and elegant glasses, tall or shallow, such as were worthy to be filled with Haarlem beer, glasses cut into octagons, with prismatic edges, which seem richly to stain the light. In some the chalice forms a cone reversed on the foot of a heron or the neck of a swan, or ends in a trumpet shape.

One feature, particularly remarkable in most of the pictures of Metzu, is the shape of the chimneys of that period. In general, the mantel-piece belongs to the Corinthian or Composite order; the entablature rests on columns of fine marble, sea-green, gold-veined, or jasper-coloured. Sometimes it is black and white. Frequently, instead of pillars, there are Caryatides, representing creatures as beautiful women down to the waist, but terminating in the form of fishes. Others are carved in satyrs, such as we see in our gardens; and a specimen of this kind may be found in the collection of Sir Robert Peel—a woman tuning her voice to her master's viol. Occasionally the comic is enriched with a bas-relief after the antique. The Italian Renaissance had imported into the north those noble models of architecture which produced in France the palace of Fontainebleau, the chateaux of Anet and of Blois, and in Spain the palace of Madrid. Gradually this renewed taste for the antique spread into Holland, where it flourished during the age of that Louis XIV. whom stupid historians have denominated "great," a hundred years after it had influenced the style of France. But such chimney-pieces peculiarly suited a people like the Dutch, who lived so much in the midst of their families; and it is not surprising that such great care was bestowed on the delineations of them by a painter so intimate with their private life as Gabriel Metzu.

In the love-scenes painted by Metzu, the artist's intention becomes at once apparent, from the care he has taken to make his "Conversations" à-la-tête. If there are three persons in the piece, the third is insignificant; it is some waiting-maid or page, who brings in a letter on a tray, and looks askance while retiring from the room. Generally music serves as the pretext, or more strictly the preface, to the timid declaration of the cavalier who leans on the end of the chair on which the fair young Hollander sits tinkling her guitar, listening to his protestations, and considering what their value may be. Sometimes he holds a glass in his hand to aid his nervousness, as we may observe in two charming compositions in the collection of the late Sir Robert Peel—one of them entitled the "Music-Master;" or else he pretends to be trying the strings of a violin; but with all his thought intent on one end, he seizes every occasion to interpose a word between the notes. "Chamber-music was a new revelation to me," says the affected French author of a recent extravagance;

"it explains to me the secret and the ideal of Northern life."

There is something delicate in the compositions of Metzu, and something more than delicate in the touch of his pencil. But there is one singular characteristic of his pictures, which critics have not often remarked upon. There are scarcely any in which we do not perceive a personage figuring, who, apparently, was then considered essential to a "Conversation Piece"—we mean the lady's dog, her spaniel with silky flanks, who by his attitude and expression adds much to our comprehension of the group. He tells us, in fact, what the human figures leave unexplained. Let us, for example, notice the piece called "A Charitable Lady." We are at the door of a Dutch house, in a narrow street, and there are two steps to mount to the entrance. A seat of iron-work is on the right, and the mistress of the house is seated there, enjoying the fresh air. A little beggar, passing along, has been asking for charity, and the lady is giving alms with grace and good humour. But Metzu, to show the temper of the household, represents the dog standing on the steps. He, accustomed to see poor persons come thither, regards the young mendicant, not with vicious anxiety and restlessness, but with an air of benevolence, so that the hospitality of that place is there doubly illustrated. The whole composition is simple but charming; a masterpiece of nature and sentiment exquisitely coloured. The house is embowered with foliage; a little stream, another of the numerous canals of Amsterdam, runs beside it by two shady rows of trees; between we discern at a distance one of the tall, quaint clock-towers of the city. A copper-plate glistens on the door, with the name of the merchant who lives within engraven on it; and there is also a bright metal bell. And the name of the merchant dwelling there is set forth as Gabriel Metzu, as if the artist would tell us that he himself was the owner of this hospitable house.

In order not to pass over the details, which are so many charms in the compositions of Metzu, we must notice the ornamental varieties he has introduced into many of his conversation pictures. It is not in useful articles or in objects of art that fashion has undergone most changes. In the seventeenth century the Dutch framers affected different kinds of decorations, according to the importance of the painting and the subject. "The Young Man writing a Letter," a beautiful piece, in the possession of Mr. Hope, represents, suspended from a wall, a picture with a frame most elaborately designed. It contains large flutings, shells, marine plants, and leaves, so intertwined and so rich, that our attention is fixed even on this slight accessory. Whether the design was the painter's or a copy of something he had seen, it is certainly a fine suggestion.

Little is known of Metzu's life. Picture-histories give us only the true date of his birth, which was in 1615, and a false date of his death, which they, one and all, fix in 1658. This error was excusable, because it had the authority of Arnold Houbraken, who might have been supposed to be well-informed. Metzu, he says, died at Amsterdam from the effects of a surgical operation performed on him in his forty-third year; but it is clear that he survived the trial, since several of his paintings bear a subsequent date. Many circumstances render it probable that 1669 was the real year of his decease.

WATTEAU.

WATTEAU was the painter of revels, dances, masquerades. His frivolous pencil sought for such subjects as were described in court pastorals, programmes, and books of ceremony. But his delicacy of colouring, the graceful quiet of the scenes he represented, the ease and freedom of his joyous groups, gained him admission into the Academy, with the title of Painter of Gallant Feasts to the King.

The genius of this skillful colourist, developed very early by an attentive study of Rubens' works, was immediately turned to the class of subjects in which he always principally delighted. His reading was almost confined to pastorals, interludes, operas, and ballads. He had a strong taste, also, for diversions and spectacles of every kind, and thus fostered a natural inclination, which perhaps owed part of its strength to the influence of one of his masters, Claude Gillot, painter to the opera, who excelled greatly in compositions of a grotesque character. All that is serious or thoughtful in the productions of Watteau appears to have been the inspiration of a later master, Claude Audran, the engraver.

Watteau often drew outlines in red and black chalk, and these studies, whenever they are to be found at the sale of collections, universally excite great emulation among the amateurs. These designs for the most part represent figures in easy and careless attitudes, and were probably intended as studies of groups to be introduced into larger pictures. Sometimes they are merely sketches of popular subjects, types of character or costume, or every-day scenes. For this last species of composition Watteau possessed no inconsiderable aptitude, since he had the qualifications so essential to it—great power of observation, freedom in drawing, and a fine but bold touch. He bequeathed nearly all of these designs to four of his dearest friends—Henin, Harangin, Julienne, and Gersaint. Julienne was his protector, and one of those who,

In the museum of the Louvre, we discover a few of the quaint but ever-fresh and pleasant productions of Watteau. There are always gazers admiring them, for his works are pre-eminently popular, and have at different times been engraved by some of the highest French masters in that art, by Audran, Chereau, Boucher, and various others. The "Knife-Grinder," which we give in this page, is a fac-simile from a fine plate engraved by Chereau, but of a much larger size, for a collection of the works of Watteau, published in two volumes by Audran. The sketch is in the most simple style. The subject is unpretending. There is only one figure—that of a with Crozat and the Abbé Laroque, originally brought him into notice. Gersaint was a picture-dealer on the Bridge of Notre-Dame—that famous spot in Paris, whence, in the age of Watteau, the artist could see an assemblage of buildings, every one of which was picturesque enough to be the subject of a painting. It was for him that Watteau painted the famous "Roof Sign," which, as soon as it was set in its place, created such astonishment by its beauty, that the whole population of Paris crowded to see it. It was ultimately purchased for a very large sum by M. de Julienne, who hung it in his own private gallery, but had a fine engraving of it executed by Cochin.

poor grinder; the only other objects are his rude implements. Yet, in the natural ease of the attitude, the careful finish of the countenance and costume, and the true expression, so to speak, of the whole, there is something to fix our attention.

Of all French artists Watteau is the one who has most imitators and really good copyists. Pater and Lancret succeeded in attaining distinction even by following the footsteps of this master. In the gallery at Nancy there is a very beautiful picture by one of Watteau's pupils, named Constance, who may have been the painter of a piece in the Standish gallery, which is attributed, in the synopsis of the Louvre, to Watteau.

ALEXANDER FRANCOIS DESPORTES.

Dogs and horses have always been the favourite animals selected by artists for delineation. This is natural, especially in the case of the dog, which has been a kind of friend to man. The attachment and fidelity, the clever and surprising instinct of this creature, and its usefulness in so many ways, create a sympathy for the canine race that can scarcely be experienced for any other. It would be a wondrous book which should tell all the tales of affection, of fidelity, of cunning, of instinct, which are true of this beast. Whether we look at the brute as a shepherd's companion, as the guard of the house, as the guide of the blind, or the saviour of the perishing traveller in the snow-drift; whether we admire the fleet hound, the beautiful Newfoundland, the magnificent Mont St. Bernard, or the faithful cur, there is always something to interest and captivate the attention. The quickness of comprehension, the patience under fatigue, the acute senses of the dog, are, on many occasions, wonderful. Is it a matter of surprise, then, that painters have been found to devote almost their whole energies, their entire capabilities as artists, to the history of the dog? This has been more the case in England than elsewhere.

François Desportes was the first French artist who painted animals and hunting scenes. The French school of painting, which had flourished about a hundred and fifty years, had never thought of descending to animals—at all events, as the principal personages of a composition; and after the Renaissance there was not, properly speaking, one painter of domestic subjects in the whole French school previous to the days of Desportes. It is true, that Sebastian Bourdon had dashed off in his leisure moments

some masterpieces, but it was simply to rest himself from his great historical works. The Lennais, though really fond of country scenes, had only obtained indulgence for such departure from high artistic notions by painting religious subjects. As for Baptiste, who was a flower-painter, he treated his subject in a showy style, and with so much nobility, that the gentlemen of the Academy did not think him unworthy of being one of their venerable body, which, as elsewhere, was generally made up of the second and third rates of art and literature; just as, in the Academy of Paris, Lamartine is not a member, Victor Hugo is not a member, and Alfred de Musset is not a member; while the Duke de Noailles and, with two or three exceptions, thirty and odd non-entities fill the academic chairs.

It is a fact worth noticing, that the public and posterity almost always give fame to men whom the learned cliques of the hour never would condescend to notice. Every one can tell of some genius of his own acquaintance, utterly neglected by the world, recognised only by a limited number of discerning friends. Learned associations and bodies never introduced to the world either a Milton, a Shakspeare, or a Byron. Even the literary fund of our own days does not fulfil its mission, since those relieved are generally but the outsiders of literature; while many of those doing battle, and desperately too, who might be saved from much pain and misery by timely-offered aid, never receive anything from its overflowing and bursting coffers.

But genius and talent have a much better means of appreciation than the favour of cliques. The man wholly neglected by the literary world, has but to appeal to the public, and if there be anything in him, he will be supported and appreciated. To return, however, to the particular subject of this article.

François Desportes was the first who imported into France the style which had been made illustrious and famous by the Sneyders in Flanders and the Benedettos in Italy. To form a painter of hunting scenes in France, it was necessary that he should live in the days of Louis XIV., that vain and proud monarch, and that he should have witnessed all the pompous importance which, induced by the cunning calculations of his intolerable pride, he gave to his own acts, his slightest gesture, his fancies, and his pleasures. It really did not appear too much in that day of courtly servility, that, because the king honoured the art of venery so far as to force a boar or hunt a stag, an eminent artist should come expressly to the hunt, follow with his eye the movements of the pack, watch the bounding leaps of the hounds, and paint the greyhounds and curs of his majesty.

"We lost in 1743," says D'Argenville, "an excellent painter in the person of François Desportes, born in 1661, at the village of Champigneulle, in Champagne. His father, who was a rich farmer, sent him at twelve years of age to Paris, to one of his uncles, who was established in business in that city. Poets and painters owe their extraction, not to any particular name or family, but to the beauty and fame of their works: that is their patent of nobility. During an interval of sickness, immediately on his arrival in town, his uncle gave him a drawing, which he copied in his bed. This trial and attempt, though crude and unfinished, demonstrated his taste for drawing, and he was put with Nicasius, a Flemish painter. This master was reputed to be a very good animal-painter." *

Nicasius was in reality a pupil of Sneyders, from whom he had learnt the secret of that bold and unerring touch, that art of distinguishing each animal by a dash of his paint-brush, that talent of displaying by contrasts the colours and variety of action, those terrible combats of wild beasts, and those hunts with roaring lions, with bounding and furious tigers, with wild boars defending themselves against a pick of panting and torn dogs, which characterised his master. What Nicasius learnt from Sneyders, he transmitted to François

Desportes; but the lessons of the Flemish painter, taking root in the Frenchman's mind, became less wild and far more temperate in their effects. What was the wild fire of genius in Sneyders was graceful motion in Desportes; the fury which the proud comrade of Rubens infused into his animal-paintings was easily varied and changed into a composition quite as true, perhaps, but less warm and striking. The impulsive fire of the master became, on the canvas of the facile French artist, mere vivacity and quiet nature. Sneyders and Nicasius had painted the hunts of heroes and demi-gods; Desportes produced the hunting scenes of noblemen and country gentlemen.

Unfortunately, death removed Nicasius from the world ere he had quite formed his able and interesting pupil. Still it is easy to distinguish, in the freshness of colour of Desportes, in his free touch, in his decided tones, that he took immediate advantage of the advice and example of Nicasius. What is certain is, that Desportes, though very young, would never have another master. All that he did, when Nicasius died, was to devote himself with redoubled energy to his art. Resolved in his own mind to be a painter of hunting scenes, he devoted his whole attention to all that could serve to embellish his compositions; it was with this view that he drew the bas-reliefs from the antique which so often ornamented his pictures. He also studied figures from the model extensively; and when, at a later time, he painted portraits, he felt the impression of his severe early studies, in which he introduced, moreover, most of the objects which are furnished to the painter by the observation of real nature: plants, fruits, vegetables, animals of every kind, elephants, tortoises, serpents, living and dead, landscape, and even grotesque effects. He had not reached the age of thirty when his reputation was made. "He gave himself up first," says D'Argenville, "to all kinds of work undertaken by builders, whether roofs or stage scenery, ornaments, animals, etc.; and then he worked, in concert with Claude Audran, a clever ornamental painter, at the embellishment of the Chateau d'Anet and the Menagerie of Versailles. Everywhere we find a fertile and lively genius, full of truth and expression, a light touch, with an admirable tone."

His first appearance in the world—that is, in the world of fashion of the day—was not as a painter of hunting scenes. Some Polish noblemen, whose acquaintance he had made in Paris, and the Abbé de Polignac, ambassador of France at the court of king John Sobieski, persuaded Desportes to go to Poland. Presented to the king and queen, he painted their portraits, and from that moment became a great favourite at court. To be the king's painter, in the eyes of a courtier, is to be the king of painters. Men of the most distinguished character, and, amongst others, the Cardinal of Arqnen wished to have their portraits painted by the hand of François Desportes. He was loaded with presents, above all, with flatteries—it is so easy to respond to them when one is a portrait-painter. This popularity lasted about two years, at the end of which time Desportes, who was a true Frenchman in character, was carried away by an irresistible desire to revisit Paris, which city, like all his countrymen, he believed to be the capital of civilisation and art—an opinion not merely entertained in his time, but still widely prevalent at the present day.

Hunting, in the time of Louis XIV., was an expensive pleasure, more expensive, indeed, than at any subsequent period, the subjects of that king seeking always to imitate the gorgeous luxury of their master. Many a chronicler of the time has alluded to the huge preparations made to kill a poor deer. The king's venery formed a perfect army, which cost millions per annum. The woods and forests in the neighbourhood of Paris were carefully preserved and stocked with deer, hucks, wolves, wild boars, and other animals. The customs of the middle ages were revived, and Louis XIV., in hunting, as in everything else, played the part of a heartless and haughty tyrant. In summer the court went to Versailles, to Meudon, to Compiègne; in winter to Rambouillet and to Fontainebleau. These last woods, silent, gloomy, and solitary during nine months of the year, became suddenly full of life, activity, and noise. From every part of the forest came to the rendezvous, the outriders seeking the wild beasts, detachments of gens d'armes, of servants in many-coloured liveries, of elegant lords mounted upon foaming steeds, king's messengers, chairs for the officers of hunting, carriages for the fair ladies invited to witness the scene, pages on horseback, cross-bow men, and the van containing the unfortunate deer. Behind this came the pack of two or three hundred dogs, held in leash by the king's outriders. The king always appeared last, his presence being theatrically announced by some lord-in-waiting.

Desportes, having again given way to his taste for painting animals and hunting scenes, was created by Louis XIV. historiographer of the chase to the king, and with that magnificence which was so familiar to him, because it cost him nothing, Louis generously presented him with a pension and a free lodging in the Louvre. If any animals were sent from India to the menagerie of Versailles, if any rare birds were presented to the king, Desportes was immediately requested to paint them. Attending all the royal hunts in his official capacity, he followed every act of the drama on horseback. He caught at the most interesting moment the attitudes of the dogs, their motions, their bounds, the deer at bay, the harkaway, and the death scene. When he had thoroughly seized the whole combination of lines and figures necessary to the complete realisation of his picture, he went to the kennel, and drew from nature the handsomest dogs of the pack, and when he had sketched four or five upon a sheet of paper, showed them to the king, who, recognising them, instantly took great delight in pointing them out by name. When he was satisfied with merely studying the structure of animals, their physiognomy, and the model of their forms, he contented himself with a charcoal drawing upon tinted paper without many shadows, the whole relieved with white chalk. Sometimes he caught them successfully with a pen and a little wash of India ink. But as most of his studies contained the elements of his picture, he took care to colour them, because he was thus able to prepare the exact tone as well as the outline. He then transferred his drawings to a coarse thick paper in oil—very excellent practice, if it is executed at one sitting. We have seen some very beautiful studies of dogs by Desportes in varied crayons of exquisite beauty; all amateurs have admired in these brilliancy, warmth, a careful and, at the same time, fanciful touch, as well as a close imitation of nature.*

When a painter is protected by a king, even should he be clever, he is always received into the Royal Academy of Painting. François Desportes was admitted as a member of this institution on the 1st of August, 1699; he was then thirty-two years of age. His reception-picture is a celebrated piece. It represents him standing nobly in the attitude and costume of a hunter; and he has availed himself of this opportunity to display in union all his versatile talents. We see a magnificent dog, of the pointer breed, with elastic and muscular limbs, who, looking up at his master, as if to examine his countenance, charms us like a creation in some far more interesting department of life. At the feet of the hunter lie quantities of game, hares, pheasants, foxes, drawn with wonderful truth, in fine outline and clear relief, but all properly subordinated to the main figure of the composition, the hunter himself, a noble full-length portrait. He is leaning on his gun, which he holds in one hand, while with the other he impartially caresses a group of beautiful dogs. In the record of the Academy's proceedings we find a memorandum of Desportes' election, in 1704, as a member of the council—no inconsiderable honour, as it gave him a share in the power of distributing publicly the honours and rewards of the national art. His son, Claude François, also, at a later period, enjoyed a similar distinction.

That simplicity, that perfect interpretation of nature, which was the great virtue of Desportes' art, was not only characteristic of his small and more finished cabinet pieces; it is observable also in the large, elaborate, and more poetical productions. Yet there is never any conventionality in his works; never any trace of artistic dogmatism, by which we mean the pedantic insisting upon a set of stereotyped rules or canons, which form the technicalities by which inferior minds are trammelled. Intending to represent all the various incidents connected with the chase, from the figure of a sleeping dog to the animated tableau of the pack closing at full cry upon the victim, he allowed Nature, as it were, to preside over the design of his picture. He observed, and what he observed he reproduced on canvas, adding nothing from fancy, yet softening the crudities of the real scene by touches more truthful than imitation itself. In the beautiful specimens contained in the Louvre collection—"A Dog pointing at a Partridge," and "A Dog pointing at Pheasants"—we recognise details which tell at once that the artist was himself a sportsman. He paints dogs as Audubon painted birds—under the arches of the forest, in the natural studios where genuine art is most familiar and most at home. He seizes the sudden fixed expression of the creature's eye as it discovers the object of search, and as it is caught he paints it. A nervous contraction is visible in the animal's limbs, an eager anxiety expresses itself in its attitude; and to this menacing steadiness of the dog, with what subtle ingenuity does the painter oppose the trembling humility of its prey, crouching, and expecting vainly to escape its enemy by hiding low and quietly in the grass. Oudry, another painter of hunting scenes, was the successor, we may almost say the contemporary, of Desportes. It is not easy, at the first glance, to distinguish their works; for the peculiarities consist, not in deeply toned shades, or strongly marked outlines, but in those less perceptible tones, which mark the paintings of the two artists. Nor is it astonishing to find this general similarity, when we remember that the incidents of a chase are not in themselves very varied; the subjects of such a painter's representations are, indeed, nearly always the same. In addition to this, they had both derived their instructions and their inspiration from the same sources; they were pupils in the same school. Oudry derived from Largillière the principles of the Flemish masters, and Desportes, as we have already stated, was a disciple in the second degree of the celebrated Sneyders. Nevertheless, a closer examination reveals the difference between the works of these two painters. Desportes has an easy, free, abounding genius; he attentively remarked the aspects of nature, and he painted them as if by instinct; in fact, he diffuses over his pictures more of native grace and beauty than of scientific touches or reflection. Oudry, on the other hand, has an able pencil; he is a connoisseur who knows all the resources and varieties of his art; he is expert in the distribution of shadow and light; he combines his personages and objects into striking groups, and there is a unity, according to academical rules, in his productions for which we vainly seek in the works of Desportes, who was, as Montaigne would have said, an off-hand painter. He belonged to that generation of exuberant and glowing spirits, who, with a true spontaneous genius, appeared in the seventeenth century to invest its formal models with all the bright and rich drapery of the sixteenth. As a colourist he preserved, in a greater degree than Oudry, the traces of his Flemish teaching. The latter is often cold, gray, and monotonous; the former almost invariably fresh, vivid, and cheering, bringing out his tints most effectively through a transparent medium; and it is owing to this fact that his works, at first sight, seem to have more finish than they actually possess.

No doubt it is true, that Oudry, as an artist, possessed talents which did not belong to Desportes; he understood better the arrangement of a grand scene; he elevated into a more poetical creation the object he was painting. But how charming is Desportes in his naïve way! His very dogs are graceful, lively, and elegant; his birds fly lightly and buoyantly through the air. There are in the Louvre two pieces, each representing a cock-fight; the one by Desportes, the other by Oudry; for they were barbarians enough to think these exhibitions, disgraceful to any but savages, worthy of the efforts of their pencils. Oudry has placed his belligerent birds with somewhat more skill than his rival; one of them lies on its back, endeavouring to strike with its powerful claws at the other, which has thrown it down. Its plumage is brilliant and dazzling; the motion of its wings, of which one is thrown upwards so as to assume a pyramidal shape, is full of grandeur and power. These striking qualities are not observable in the composition of Desportes. He was unable to give to his bellicose scene so fiery an aspect, such a fierce mimicry of passionate human war. But the introduc-

Since he succeeded in carrying to such marvellous perfection the humble branch of art to which he dedicated all his energies, there is no reason to dispute the probability of his having attained high excellence had he selected another branch. We are ourselves of opinion, however, that he understood his own talents perfectly, and went the length of his genius in delineating the hunting-scenes peculiarly adapted to the disposition of his mind.

The number of Desportes' productions was immense. From the day on which the celebrity of his name had opened to him a fortunate career, in the decoration, in high art, of panels, sideboards, and designs for doors and walls, he continued to labour without ceasing until he attained the age of sixty years. He, with Claude Audran, ornamented the Chateau of Anet, the menagerie of Versailles, and the palaces of Marly, Meudon, Ninette, and Fontainebleau. This last is one of the tion of a crowd of fowls, witnesses of the affray, terrified by the shocking combat which is taking place "in their honour," adds to the scene a piquancy, and a tone of delicate irony, similar to that which we discover in the exquisite fables of Lafontaine, and we cannot but give our preference to this, deficient as it is in the high science which marks the rival composition.

It has frequently been remarked, and not, we think, without some justice, that had not Desportes confined his efforts to the lowest department of art—such as dog and fowl-painting confessedly is—he might have ascended with success to the superior, devoted to the painting of fruits or flowers, and still nature. He did not find it difficult to mix upon his palette that rich vermilion, soft as velvet, required by fish, by the feathers of some birds, or the pale though glowing tints of gold, such as would have been needed had he taken the fruitage or the flowers of the East as objects for imitation.

most charming retreats in France; itself a picture, with the splendid forests sweeping round, the artificial lakes, the parks, the green and pleasant hills, the rocks heaped up in enchanting confusion, affording landscapes, from the midst of which we pass into the long quaint galleries in which Napoleon delighted, to find the most radiant spots in Italy, the palace-crowned isle of Isola Bella, the banks of the Arno and the Rhone, and the lakes of Como and Maggiore, interspersed amid snug Dutch interiors and hunting pieces, by Sneyder, Oudry, and Desportes. In 1735, this painter received a commission to execute eight large designs intended for the restoration of some of the Gobelins tapestries. Amid these we find one of his best productions, "A Stag at Bay." But it was not only in France that his pictures were appreciated and admired. He came to this country with the Duke d'Aumont, ambassador of Louis XIV., and left behind him many very agreeable and talented compositions, amongst others "The Seasons," besides a name which was soon familiar and popular all over Europe. His pictures were, indeed, to be seen everywhere—in London, in Poland, at Munich, at Vienna, at Turin; and not long ago, M. Viardot discovered some in the museum of the Hermitage at St. Petersburg.* This great and wonderful fertility is the less surprising when we reflect that Desportes lived eighty-two years, dying in 1713; and that he worked until an extreme old age with perfectly juvenile ardour; for never in any one of his productions does he show any falling off. The Abbé de Fontaine calls him the Nestor of painting.

The able and talented painter was also a worthy and good man. He married at thirty, was a good husband, and retained, in a profligate time and under the influence of a vicious court, in France. They are no longer venerated or respected by the nation. They have vanished from popularity with the monarchy and the hunts. There is nothing of the old attachment to royalty now left in France. Men may call themselves monarchs, but they will never occupy the same place in the feeling of the nation as before the memorable year of 1789. Call a man emperor, king, president, he is still in reality only the ruler by the choice of the nation. The old solemn divine-right feeling has gone out with powder and paint, drawing-room abbés, and the Bastille. It cannot be revived. The admiration for Desportes, then, will be always in part simulated. But if we carry ourselves back to the days of Louis XIV., of royal pleasure and pomp, we can comprehend the vast importance of pictures which, till and the character of a man of honest and irreproachable life. He was extremely amiable, always lively, and perfectly simple in character. His physiognomy as seen in his portrait is that of an accomplished man, who was easy and pleasant in his manners. Delicate and proud, he had a great objection to the impertinent familiarity of fools. One day a moneyed man was boasting of his riches before many people, in an extremely offensive way. Desportes listened to him quietly for some time; but at last, irritated by his impertinence, cried out, "Sir, I could any day be what you are; but you can never be what I am."

The time, however, for the pictures of Desportes is past on the entrance hall of the Muette, on the grand staircase of Meudon, in the vestibule of the Castle of Compiègne, recalled every act of the hunting drama to old hunters, to the lively ladies who joined the chase, and to their gentlemen and pages.

It requires a considerable exercise of imagination to look on the wild boars, deers, and dogs of Desportes with the same eyes they were looked upon by Louis XIV. and the lords of his court, before old age in the King made it fashionable to despise mundane pleasures. We are actually compelled, when gazing at his pictures, to carry ourselves back a century, or to condemn them, especially in France, as out of place. It is a fact which artists would do well to ponder on, that many pictures lose much when they are seen in a time and at a place which are not suitable to their being properly comprehended. They want the "local colour," the inspiration of the time. Who but a turf-man admires the portrait of a race-horse? But these pictures, arranged in vast galleries, where they are preserved because of their origin and for the love of art, the works of many masters resemble some of the heathen gods, for whom the Roman Pantheon was opened, and which, when once they were within the temple, lost the same day their private altars, their worship, their followers, and were but a multitude of random divinities, no longer recognised, or, at all events, worshipped without being understood.

But if Desportes is no longer understood or appreciated in France, where great but hardly successful efforts have been made to revive the gorgeous hunts of the days of Louis XIV., it will be a long time before his dogs and scenes of venery will be without value in England, where all such sports and pastimes form a part of the existence of a large portion of the community. The chase, against which much may reasonably be said, has, at all events, preserved for us much of that stalwart character which is our boast; and though justly denounced as barbarous in its character and tendency, is not without some advantages to counterbalance the grave objections to which it is liable.

But though the French people do not and cannot appreciate Desportes, the Museum of the Louvre is rich in his pictures. In the catalogue of 1847 there were but five of his pictures; but the active and admirable director, Teanson, is believed to have hunted up the rest in the garrets of the Museum, for now we have three-and-twenty.

The first of these is a full-length portrait of Desportes, in his costume of a hunter, resting at the foot of a tree, with a pointer, a hound, and several pieces of game.

After this we have:—

"A Duck, a Partridge, a Hare, a Snipe, a Cabbage, some Pomegranates, Thistles, Onions, and Beetroot."

"Two sporting Dogs guarding some Game."

"A fine white Pointer, beside a vase of white porcelain."

"A Dog lying down, a Powder-horn, a Game-bag, a Jay, some gray Partridges, a Melon, some Apricots, some Peaches, some Grapes," with a background of scenery.

"A Dog pointing at some gray Partridges."

"Shooting Pheasants."

"Dogs and Partridges" (p. 373).

"A Dog watching some aquatic Birds."

"A Dog pointing with Partridges."

"A Boar-hunt," imitated from Sneyders.

"A couple of Dogs pointing at Pheasants, of which one is flying away."

"Some Prunes, Peaches, a Hare, a Parrot, and a Cat."

"Two Cocks fighting, a Fowl, and some Chickens."

"A Fox-hunt."

"Two English Dogs"—that is to say, of the King Charles breed—"hunting a Hare in a Park."

"Dogs and Pheasants."

"Dogs and Partridges."

"Guns, Game-bags, and Powder-horns."

All these paintings are admirable, both in conception and design.

There are many of the compositions of Desportes to be found in the museums of the provinces; in that of Grenoble there is a "Stag at Bay, surrounded by a pack of Hounds." In that of Lyons, eight pictures, "A Bear-hunt," and some still-nature pieces. The catalogue of the Rouen museum mentions "A Stag-hunt."

In the royal palaces of Fontainebleau, Versailles, Trianon, Meudon, Marly, La Muette, La Menagerie, a vast number of paintings by Desportes are to be found.

The Print department of the Royal Library is less rich than usual. There is a full-length "Portrait of Desportes," engraved by Ferrarois; "A Boar-hunt," engraved by the same, and a series of ten dogs in different attitudes, engraved by Le Bas.

The productions of Desportes in France are rarely met with in sales, and their price is generally from £12 to £30.

JOHN BOTH.

If the reader would imagine a rough, savage and somewhat theatrical Claude Lorraine, he would at once understand without further description what was the peculiar style of Both of Italy, as he was wont to be called by his contemporaries. Between the rural style of Ruysdael and the historic conception of Poussin and of Claude there was a style to be created, and John Both filled up the gap. The question has often been asked, Why do men born within the cold and foggy regions of the North feel much more deeply the beauty and grandeur of nature than the children of the South? Whenever a northern painter—a Fleming, like Paul Brill; a Dutchman, like Berghem or Poelenburg; a Norman, like Guaspre; a Lorrainese, like Claude—is introduced to Italian scenery, he appreciates and enjoys it quite as much as—French critics think more than—an Italian himself. Certainly, there are peculiarities and details of scenery which are more apt to strike the stranger than the man who has seen them from his birth. Warmed by novelty, the foreign painter feels and endeavours to convey all that poetry of landscape with which his mind is imbued.

A Dutch historian, whom we have often quoted, Arnold Houbraken, relates an anecdote of John Both, which is characteristic of this excellent painter. Van Der Hulk, burgo-master of the town of Dordrecht, proposed a prize, for which

* "Le Grand Théâtre des Peintres, et des Femmes Peintres du Pays Bas." The French translation of this work exists only in manuscript.

Berghem and John Both were alone to compete. The worthy citizen wished to try the talent of these two friends. Both competitors were to receive the sum of 800 florins; but the victor was to receive in addition a magnificent present. Berghem painted on this occasion his masterpiece. It was a mountainous landscape, with numerous oxen, sheep, and goats. The trees, the terraces, and the sky, were painted with so much richness of tone and finish, that none doubted his carrying away the prize. But the landscape of John Both was not less admirable. There was so much light, and so much of the lofty and heroic style mingling with the rural, that none could decide between Berghem and Both. A generous and just connoisseur, the burgo-master of Dordrecht, put an end to the difficulty in a way that is worthy of being recorded in any history of art. "Gentlemen," said he, "you have not given me an opportunity of choosing between you. Both of you have merited the prize, and both of you must have it." †

In the country scenes of John Both, the principal objects are not silent shepherds keeping their flocks, nor the peasant driving his ass before him—but great trees with their lofty summits and their verdant boughs. He does not paint them cut by the trim gardener, nor does he represent them wearing their leafy boughs with effeminate grace, as in the pictures of Herman of Italy. Nor does he make them too wavy in their outlines. On the contrary, he loves to represent them wild, with boughs blasted by lightning or broken by the storm. When we examine the magnificent oaks which are to be found in the pictures of John Both, relieved with so much boldness, now against the warm light of the setting sun, and now against the dazzling and fresh brightness of an Italian morning, we seem to feel as if there were a life in these ever-moving objects, and we can scarcely separate the conception of the tree from something with more than vegetable existence. "To the pantheist painter of the North every tree is a hero," says a French critic; "the forest giant is wrapt in his cuirass, his ligneous muscles swell, his arms are contorted, sometimes he lies down in an attitude of sadness, and then his torn bark, his broken branches give him all the appearance of a dying gladiator; but oftener in the landscapes of John Both the oak stands up triumphant, shakes his shaggy head, in which the vulture cradles its young, while larks play in the lower branches." The French critic was doubtless strongly imbued with the metamorphoses of Ovid, and dreamt of Hamadryads and Fauns when he indulged in this hyperbolical picture of Both. We quote it simply because, amongst our French brethren, it has been considered to convey a correct idea of the artist.

It is, however, by means of his trees, in the form, taste, and truth of his rocky scenery, by the imposing aspect of his mountains, and by the richness of his luminous back-grounds, that we always recognise a true Both. While seeking to be great, and when awakening in our minds a sentiment of poetry and light, he does not ask us to gaze on the gods in the woods, nor does he show us the beautiful forms of women bathing in rivers, like Poelemburg. He does not introduce us to demigods, as did Poussin. He is satisfied when he has given an imposing aspect to the oaks of his foreground; and nature, which he studied with such patience and devotion beyond the Alps, appeared poetical enough to him, without the assistance of gods and goddesses of more than doubtful morality. The plants, the lakes, the foaming waterfalls, and the rural scent of the bushes and flowers of Italy, their capricious profiles relieved against a fleecy sky, were enough for him. With the great Poussin, history, mythological and real—man in his more elevated actions—is all. With Both nature is everything; but it is a wild and savage nature, so picturesque, and at the same time so real, that it seems to awaken in our bosoms the wish to wander through such scenes, and to gaze upon such trees, mountains, and hills. The enthusiastic lover of art could scarcely gaze upon the warm southern landscapes of the Netherlands artist, without being seized with an irresistible desire—in far distant places, at all events—to whistle some tune familiar to the shepherd; and he is even tempted to believe that he hears the tinkling sound of the bells on the mules' necks, as they slowly ascend the mountain. There is nothing mean, nothing low, nothing common, nothing dirty, in Both. He views still nature in the same way that Albert Cuyp has studied the cow.* His vegetation is vigorous, sombre, and real. The air is pure and pellucid; the sun shines upon every detail of the picture; and not one shadow of the agitated and active life of great cities ever troubles the calm and reflective beauty of the scenes which seem made for mute contemplation. He never introduces a sign of civilisation, except in the form of ruins. We see a broken column, a huge piece of a wall, nothing else to remind us of the mighty nation which once dwelt upon that historic soil, trodden once beneath the hoof of Scipio's cavalry, crushed beneath the weight of the chariots of Hannibal. And these signs of a life that is past are cast into the distant background, beneath the shadows of the trees. He speaks to us in his pictures only of youth—of the eternal youth of nature. What he seeks to interest us in, is a ray of light falling through a long vista of trees, or in a garden dotted with beautiful flowers. It is sufficient to remark that John Both was born in Munich, to enable the student of art to comprehend why, even when beneath the rich Italian sky, he remained faithful to the purely rustic style; why he loved nature more than men, or, at all events, than demigods; and why he asked for no sweeter scent than the honeysuckle.

John Both and his brother Andrew, who painted him his figures in his pictures, studied together at Munich, under the learned guidance of Abraham Bloemaert. They started together for Italy, and resided some time in Rome. They attached themselves to two masters: John became the pupil of Claude Lorraine, and Andrew attached himself to the style of Bambocche. The former became necessarily a landscape-painter, the latter painted the human figure; but they divided their styles, the better to unite their talent; for Andrew studied rather to paint in the figures in his brother John's pictures, than to create for himself a distinct reputation. He succeeded at last in introducing them with so much ability, in working them up with so much finish, that if he had not compelled himself to sacrifice them to the general effect of the picture, he would have spoilt its unity; but, moved by a double feeling—great and tender affection for his brother, and by the good taste of an excellent artist—Andrew Both took care to make his figures subordinate to the general design, leaving the real and great triumph to the landscape. It was rare and beautiful to see how John Both, on the other hand, often sacrificed his landscape to bring up with more effect the figures painted by Andrew. The result was, that, by means of this friendship and by the full development of the two talents, pictures were produced so harmonious and so full of beauty, that it has been impossible for even the best judges to separate the work of one brother from the other.

The landscapes of John Both usually represent a mountainous country, great accidents of land, convulsed nature, a winding rocky path carried away by rains, or cut in the rock. Along this road, between two precipices, on the flanks of some mountain, itself a spur of the Apennine chain, we notice travellers, peasants, and mules, with steady foot, covered with bells, carrying little barrels of precious and rare wine. These mules have the shoe made especially for this traffic, and on they go without guide, their driver, perhaps, drinking afar off at a spring. In the distance we remark a rich plain, a pasturage, with islands of trees waving in a flood of evening sunlight; or the scene, rough and full of startling effects, sinks away at last into the quiet hues of some still bay, such as Sorrento. All breathe soft gentle Italy. As the eye of the amateur, abandoning the background, lingers on the foreground, he feels all is freshness, while the warmth of day illumines and burns the distant scene. The shadow of the trees, deep and mysterious, allows but faint rays of the sun to reach the foreground of the picture. The spectator thus fancies himself more at ease, protected here by huge masses of rock, and there by the rich vegetation of that gifted country. He may even refresh his eyes with the spectacle of a pond, sleeping silently on the front of the picture, the transparency of which is shown by tufts of reeds and water lilies.

It appears from a passage in Sandrart, that even during their lifetime, the brothers Both were ranked among the first of living landscape-painters;† and it was even said by very eminent judges, speaking of the great Claude Lorraine, that he was less happy in his figures than in those marvellous creations of light, those rich landscapes, which we have already described;‡ while the brothers Both, uniting their brushes, excelled in both styles.§ It is perfectly certain that their style of art was exceedingly popular, and that their workshop was full of buyers, caporibus ambans, though John Both always kept his pictures at a very high price. Joachim Sandrart is, therefore, exceedingly proud that the excellent painter of Utrecht was good enough to make him a present of two landscapes, representing "Night" and "Morning," when so many amateurs were glad to obtain possession of such pictures almost for their weight in gold.

The great and crowning merit which has been noted in the landscapes of John Both, and indeed of both brothers, is the nicety, the care, the truth, with which they have always finish—those boughs of trees, illumined and warmed by the sun. He was excellent in the contrast of his grounds, in dashing off on a mass of sombre verdure a projecting root, or some such accident of vegetation by means of those able touches, or, if we may so speak, those theatrical effects of succeeded in marking the different hours of the day. In fact, the play of the sun through the forest trees, of its silvery light in the morning, and its golden light in the evening;—these were things which the great landscape-painter studied and noted with as much love and artistic devotion as his master Claude Lorraine, and which he rendered with almost light and shade, so familiar to Adam Pynaker. His ground is too rough, too rude; his foregrounds are covered by too many thorny plants; his roads are too rude and steep, for us to suppose such a landscape inhabited by divinities of fable or by the soft pastors of Arcadia. The nymph of Poelenberg would prick her beautiful legs amid those bushes, nor could her tender and soft feet run along those paths so rude and steep. And it is in this that John Both distinguishes himself in such a marked manner from Claude Lorraine. If there is in nature, as represented by John Both, an heroic point of view, certainly his personages are not aware of it; they tread with light and thoughtless step that soil sacred to the memory of great deeds, and every inch of which has had its tragedy or story. The sentiment which bubbles up from the artist's soul is felt only in the heart of the spectator. That is to say, the landscape is sublime, grand, sad, and wild; but that man in a red cap, who is urging his mules with many a cry and shriek, would never have noticed the fact.

Joachim Sandrart speaks of the brothers Both as having sometimes painted night-scenes:—"Nec non nocturnum lune splendorem et similia proferebant." These night effects are not familiar to continental amateurs. None of them are found in any of the Dutch galleries, so rich in artistic productions. These moonlight and evening scenes are rather to be met with in England than elsewhere, as we have always been great admirers of John Both, from his resemblance to Claude Lorraine, the prince of landscape-painters, especially in English eyes. A very fine engraving, published in 1791, represents a picture in the possession of Sir Thomas Dundee, Bart.—a picture called "The Bandit Prisoners." In no other painting have the figures of Andrew assumed so much importance, and yet the beauty of the picture and of the landscape is by no means sacrificed to the human form. The prisoners are brought out upon the edge of the forest where as much success. We must not, however, pretend that he succeeded in rendering aerial perspective as his master did; nor do we find in his pictures that solemn tranquillity which appears to suit the gods of Virgil; but he expressed admirably, as we may see in "An Italian Sunset," which adorns the museum of the Louvre—he painted with truth and exquisite

But one day Andrew Both, having supped with some friends, was coming home along the silent highway of Venice in a gondola, when he fell overboard into the canal, and, for want of assistance, was drowned. • From that fatal and contorted, and the lofty mass of underwood that skirts the forest and dies away on the borders of the streams.

During the life of the brothers Both, most of their pictures were owned in Venice; and though their appearance in Rome was exceedingly successful, though their life was ennobled, ennoble, and honoured by the acquaintance and friendship of Bamboche, of Herman Swanevelt, of Cluik, of the two Poussins, and Elzheimer, the two artists were doubtless and unhappy hour, a residence in Venice became impossible to the surviving brother, who had lost his best friend. He accordingly returned to his native country, and established himself at Utrecht. There he again found his countryman Pelenberg, who had also been, like Both, the pupil of Abraham Bloemaert. On many occasions the painter of sylvan beings and ancient dryads embellished with his little figures the rustic scenes of Both; but the softness of Corneille's pencil did not suit the spiky bushes, the rough plants and rocks of Jean Both, as did the muleteers of his unfortunate brother. Berghem, in his turn, who was very much attached to this painter, whom he could neither compete with nor envy, was delighted to put out to grass, in the landscapes of Both of Italy, some of those black-streaked bulls which he painted under the walls of the castle of Bentheim.

But John Both did not, could not, long survive his brother. He resisted the feeling; but he never painted anything great after his fatal loss. Houbraken does not fix the date of the death of John; but he informs us that Andrew died in 1650; and as he adds that the landscape-painter died soon after, we are able pretty well to fix the date from this expression. Sandrart also affirms, that John Both died in 1650.

We may truly say with the celebrated amateur Le Brun, that John Both is one of the greatest landscape-painters in the world, though his reputation is less vast and world-wide than that of Claude Lorraine. We may add, that he engraved several landscapes with a fine free point, in exquisite taste. Upon copper, as upon canvas, the great talent of John Both was to enable the eye at once to catch the truthfulness of every species, to notice not only the character of the leaves, but whether they are attached to their branches in bunches, or in regular order. He was so minute, so careful, and so true, that we cannot say of him what Laress has said of so many others, that he placed the leaf of an elm on a willow, an ash or an oak. What also distinctly marks this luminous landscape-painter is, that he seems to have selected, to make his task the more difficult, trees which have no heavy and solid

This landscape, so tranquil, so full of light, is also remarkable for strict observation of the rules of art in all their nicety.

Henri Verschuur and Guillaume de Heuss were the only pupils of John Both. The first devoted himself to battle scenes, and those robber subjects so familiar to Bamboche; but the second imitated the manner of his master so perfectly—his touch, his light foliage, his warm and luminous skies—that an unaccustomed eye would easily confound his works with those of Both of Italy. Though free and easy, the touch of this admirable painter—we are speaking of the master and not of the pupil—is apt to catch its tone in a most marked manner from the object rendered. It is rough when he paints the ragged trunk of the huge oak; it is terse when representing bushes; it becomes soft over the sleeping pool; it is lively when he has to convey, without servile minuteness, thorny little bushes, small grounds, reeds, roots, fine and light plants. "John Both has been reproached," says Descamps, "with tanning his colour, by touching the leaves of his trees with a somewhat saffron yellow." This reproach is well founded sometimes; but from the testimony of Descamps—rather than that of our own observation—we must add that the fault of which this historian, and after him the amateur Le Brun, speak is not general. John Both cured himself of it, and many of his pictures are wholly exempt from it. We may truly say of these, that they are masterpieces, worthy of being placed alongside the greatest works of the greatest masters.

For picturesqueness, for the variety and richness of his compositions, for the exactness of the foreground, and its vigour and form, Both of Italy is a perfect model. The profound and strong sentiment of rural beauty, in a nature of heroic character—this is what, above all, marks the originality mass, those whose branches let in the light, and allow the sky to sparkle between the smallest intervals of their boughs, and even the smallest bunches of leaves.† If he wishes to vary his compositions, he throws in some great wooden bridges flanked with towers and fortified. He likes the country where a chain of rocks ends in a precipitous cliff, where cascades bound off and fall in froth and rain upon a cluster of bushes below. At the foot of these rocks start up some stiff pines. A tuft of chestnut trees have fixed their roots below upon a hillside which springs from the mountain, and a little spout of water comes bounding along amid the rocks in front of the picture, while some peasants with two mules cross a wooden bridge.

The most picture by John Both, and undoubtedly his masterpiece in his own estimation, as he has made so many copies of it, is his "Italian View at Sunset" (p. 381). A boatman is passing some oxen over in his ferry-boat which already touches the shore. A gentleman appears to be waiting for the oxen to land to take his turn. We are at the foot of a steep rock, which rises to the left and dies away at the edge of the water. Two fine masses of trees rise in the fore and background; between the two passes a ray of the sun, which paints on the ground the long shadow of the legs of two horses which are about to cross the river. An old unfinished bridge, or one half carried away by the tempest, stops in the middle of the water. To the left is a large demi-tint, created by the shadow of the mountain, and which is softened by the reflected light of the sun; a peasant leads his ass along by its halter. Two or three fleecy clouds fill the right of the picture.

of Both of Italy—this is what distinguishes him from all his rivals. Sometimes, it is true, his buildings are in a style so noble that they appear to elevate the thought of the painter above a purely Dutch intention—that is to say, above the rustic style which De Piles has so well defined. A temple, with a façade and columns, or an Italian abbey, adorned with pilasters and surmounted by a campanile, sometimes gives to the compositions of Both a purely historical character, quite alla Zoussa. We feel a kind of inexpressible charm in gazing on this shelter, which a community of Italian monks has raised at the foot of the mountains, but ten steps off from a river, which flows silently across a scene of mingled majesty, solemnity, and silence.

But nevertheless, on all occasions, the artist shows his love for the rural and the beauties of nature, even in his moss-clad ruins.

Good Boths are dear and rare. In 1792, when the pictures of this school were not valued at anything like their present prices, Le Brun paid 500 Louis (about £175) for a fine picture by this admirable artist.

The merit of Both was recognized by all his great contemporary artists, countrymen and others; while Berghem, Padenberg, Wouvermans, and Karel Dujardin were always eager, after the death of his brother, to paint in his figures for him.

If we may judge from the engravings of Daudet, De la Barche, Davinet, Niquet, Dattenofer, Dequevauvilliers, Fortier, etc. from Both, without counting his own ten admirable copper-plates, he must have painted numerous works, though he died at an age when many men have only just begun to gather renown.

There were originally a great many pictures by Both in liant prettiness is sure to attract. It may not attract judges. Unfortunately the great majority, even of picture-buyers, and much more so of gallery or exhibition visitors, are not judges, and the picture attracts them, excites an undue attention, and effectually prevents its more modest neighbour from being seen and appreciated. True worth, the public may urge, is sure to find its place some day; and the saying is to a great extent true; but in addition to the evils with which genius has to struggle, and we have Johnson's authority for the line—

“Slow rises worth by poverty oppress'd,” we need not load it with unfairness, and by that unfairness vitiate the taste of the public. Pictures of a very high tone, and of great brilliancy, should be hung in a room by themselves. Then the artists who sought, by meretricious ways, or by eccentricity, to jump into notice, would have the battle all to themselves; but it is obviously unfair, when a small historical picture of the time of the Puritans, whose chief of being the nursing mothers of art, become but cruel step-mothers, who oppress it. Their true province is “To foster talent young and shy,

To tender those, which else unfriended die.”

And so far from doing it, most of these societies seem to exist for the purpose of affording excellent opportunities of display to those who are lucky enough to be members or associates of them.

The other causes of complaint against exhibitions, and things to be observed by those who frequent them, are of minor importance; but the complaints against the Hanging Committee are loud, long, and unceasing, and in every instance with which we are acquainted, most perfectly founded. The effect of their ignorance, or unfairness, is to negative the value of an exhibition both to the public and to the artist, and the sooner they take the advice which is solemnly written over the gates of the Dublin House of Correction, and “cease to do evil and learn to do well,” the better for art in England.

merit lies in its sombre and sober hue, is hung by the side of a brilliant sunset, set off by a red cloak, as bright as the robes of a cardinal. The one is no more to be seen than is a violet hid behind a peony. The eye is attracted by the brighter colour, which has a greater effect on the retina; the sombre picture is passed over; and the artist, who might deservedly have sold his performance, and have been cheered on his way by success, finds that he has nothing left but to paint so brilliantly as to outblaze his rival. It is certain that the hangers have as much to learn as the public on this subject. There is little doubt but that the numbers of pictures and the various sizes of the frames, must to a certain extent determine them, and they have also to reserve, which is most unfair both to the rising artist and to the public, all the best places on the line of sight for the pictures of the members of the academy, or the associates of the other exhibitions. Under these circumstances, meritorious artists rise but slowly. The exceptions to the rule, and Mr. Millais is the most brilliant of these, owe their happy fortune rather to an extravagant eccentricity or to some lucky chance, than to anything else. The Royal Academy, also, and the other bodies, chartered or not, instead

THE ROYAL ACADEMY EXHIBITION.

THE successes of the Pre-Raphaelites and the strictures of the higher class of critics, and also, let us add, the very great prices now given, not to picture-dealers, but to the painters themselves, have given an impulse to artists which presses on one as a thing “not to be put by.” There is now no doubt about the success of the English school; each year marks its course by some triumphant work; and not an exhibition opens, but has within it some picture of talent, sufficient, thirty years ago, to have made a reputation. That of the Royal Academy of this year, with which we have at present to do, is so much superior to those of the few years lately passed, that in academic history it is decidedly worthy to be marked with a white stone. It was heralded with a note of praise both long and loud; for somehow the performances of artists creep out into artistic circles, and are known and criticised before they are exhibited. Long ago we had heard of the great picture by Maclise, of the wonderful and quaint scene by Frith, and of the hiatus to be made by the absence of Millais. Long ago we had been told that the exhibition of this year was to exceed its predecessors; but certainly we did not expect that in this case rumour would lag so far behind the truth.

Notwithstanding the brilliancy of the exhibition, some of the most brilliant exhibitors—to use a term of expression nearly amounting to a Hibernicism—are absent. There is no Mulready, no Dyce, no Herbert, no Millais, who may all be termed brilliant exceptions; and besides these absentees, there is also an absence of familiar names which cannot be regretted—we allude to the fact of the wholesale desertion of those books which “Mr. Punch” declared to constitute the painter’s library. “The History of England” is sparingly quoted from, “The Vicar of Wakefield” is laid by, and even “Gil Blas” and “The Percy Reliques” seem to have been passed over. From this arises a freshness of subject which is quite delightful. But we will no longer perform the office of button-holder, and keep the reader waiting; but, after having indulged in a private view, we will enter with him amongst the crowd of fashionables, artists, literati, and nobodies, who throng the rooms on the first day.

yard,” by Mr. Uwins, are two very indifferent pictures, which would never have made a reputation. Royal academicians sometimes exhibit very indifferent pictures. If Mr. Uwins had paid more attention to the painting and drawing of the mother in the latter picture, and had not given us the verbose and unnecessary quotation in the catalogue, it would have been more satisfactory, the subject being quite capable of telling its own tale. The dog is well painted, and the children very fairly executed; the flesh in the “Cottage Toilette” has a very disagreeable hue. There are several good portraits in this room. (No. 33) “My two Boys,” by Knight; “Martha, daughter of E. H. Baily” (No. 41), by Mogford; a picture which would be better in effect if the background had been cooler. Mr. Grant has some beautiful portraits, of which we think (No. 69) “The Right Hon. T. B. Macaulay,” and (No. 74) “Viscount Gough,” the best of the male, and (No. 333) “Mrs. Percival Heywood,” of the female portraits; the latter is very life-like and forcible, and the black silk dress is carefully finished. Sir J. Watson Gordon and J. P. Knight also do credit to their previously earned reputations;

In criticising so vast an array of pictures—and, by the way, we may mention that between four and five hundred were, after being accepted, not hung for want of room; therefore let young artists take courage—we may as well begin numerically, noticing those pictures which are most interesting, premising that we do not intend, like Mr. Ruskin, to abuse any of the public into an intense admiration of any pictures which they neither like nor understand.

In the East room we find (No. 9) “Cinderella,” a very clever and fanciful little picture, by George Cruikshank; the figure of Cinderella is not so good as the other parts of the picture. (No. 20) “Death of Francesco Foscari, Doge of Venice,” by Pickersgill, is in some respects a fine picture, but we imagine we have seen it before, there is such a sameness in the figures; the yellow-haired lady and the white dress we are sure are old acquaintances; besides this, the lady’s head is much too small. These are grave faults of carelessness in an artist of such evident talent as Mr. F. Pickersgill. (No. 25) “The Cottage Toilette,” and (No. 79) “A Cabin in a Vineyard,” by Mr. Dicksee’s portrait of “A Lady and her Child” (No. 96) is decidedly the best female portrait in the room; the lady dances her child naturally and gracefully, and the silk dress is perfection. This is certainly the best picture Mr. Dicksee has as yet exhibited.

“The Swing” (No. 50), by F. Goodall, cannot be too highly praised; for grace, action, and beauty of colouring, it is almost unequalled. The boy whispering to the little girl at the foot of the tree is quite a miniature cavalier. The park and distant country seen through the trees, prove Mr. Goodall to be a first-class landscape painter, and renders his picture one of the gems of the exhibition. The productions of Mr. Gale deserve honourable mention for their care, brilliancy, and finish, although their general effect is somewhat injured by an adhesion to the mesal-like style of the Pre-Raphaelites. Thus in the “Wounded Knight” (No. 55), the ferns and wild flowers, amongst which he is lying, are of equal importance with the figure, and render the general effect glaring and confused; besides this, such minute finish is untrue to nature, small objects being toned down, and the mind exercised upon the larger objects, prevents the retina from attending to the minutiae before it. No. 492, by the same artist, though in another room, represents a scene from "Cymbeline." This is equal in execution to No. 55, while more prominence being given to the figures, the picture is thereby the better of the two. The face of Imogen is refined, natural, and beautiful. "The Last of the Crew" (No. 57), C. Stanfield, R.A., is painted with this artist's usual brilliancy, and is the most touching and poetical sea-piece we ever saw. (No. 63), "Royal Sports on Loch and Hill;" the Queen, Prince Consort, and the Prince of Wales, the Viscountess Jocelyn, etc. —Sir Edwin Landseer, R.A. Of this picture it is difficult to speak, as it is unfinished, with the exception of the game, which is finely painted. In our opinion it ought not to have been exhibited in such a state. The Queen's face has a most extraordinary flush on it. Prince Albert's figure is most effeminate, while the Viscountess Jocelyn's large unnatural eyes have the appearance of blindness. (No. 360), "Dandiac Dinmont," the Queen's favourite Skye terrier, is certainly not equal to Sir Edwin's earlier efforts. Mr. Webster has an approaching rival in a young artist of the happy name of Smith, who has two excellently-painted works of children (No. 70) "Blackberrying," and (No. 142) "Bob-cherry." In these, colour, execution, and drawing, are all excellent. War, about which every head in the nation is either turned at the present moment, or violently affected, has two illustrations, termed "Fuentes d'Onor, May, 1810, and August, 1811" (Nos. 71 and 210). Both of these are well painted, and tell a very common but sad tale; the hanging committee having, unfortunately, spoil the narrative by hanging the pictures, which are evidently pendants to each other, in different rooms. No. 85 a "Villager's Offering," and No. 104 a "Breakfast Party," are two highly finished pictures by Webster. We may mention, in passant, that only the other day, a picture by this artist, which had cost a connoisseur only forty pounds some four years ago, sold at his sale for three hundred!

Mr. Leslie has three pictures, none of which can be classed as more than sketches, the execution being altogether slovenly, the drawing careless, and the colour crude. The principal of these is from Pope's polished court pastoral of "The Rape of the Lock," of which it cannot be called an illustration. Poets have, indeed, to complain of such pictures being foisted on their works. Who, for instance, would dream of the coquetish Belinda, surrounded by gnomes and fairies to do her bidding, when looking at the awkward and somewhat melancholy sketch in the picture of Mr. Leslie? The last picture which we shall notice at present, leaving for our next number a still greater treat, is a curious and beautiful illustration of modern "Life at the Sea-side," by Frith. A multitude of figures are seen upon the sea-shore, following all sorts of methods to kill time, which people at the sea-side generally indulge in. All classes are here represented, from children who use their toy-shop spades to dig in the sand, to the vagabond Ethiopian serenader who kicks and flourishes in the background of the picture. There is a great deal of the treatment of Hogarth about this painting—the same life, hustle, and vivacity; and if there is less force and knowledge, there is yet more prettiness. Few will easily tire of the present work of art. Amongst the crowd may be recognised the artist, his wife, and child. It has, we hear, been already twice sold, the last price given for it being one thousand pounds.

SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS.

WE have already alluded to this great artist, one of those who has done so much credit to this country, and whose productions are of such value to the connoisseur.* It is as much for what he did to elevate and spur on others to the noble emulation of fame and success, that we admire and love the great English painter. Before his time art was at a low ebb in England. We had taste to admire the productions of the Italian, Spanish, and Flemish schools, but we were not productive in art. It is a fallacy very deeply rooted in the minds of continental nations, that we are a very fine race of shopkeepers, very excellent sailors, very good at constitutional government, first-rate merchants, and deeply cunning diplomatists, but that of fancy and imagination we have nothing. It is in vain that an Englishman, indignant at such an aspersion, points to the greatest poets and dramatists in the world, English born, whose works show fancy at its very highest point—it is in vain that we explain that romance writing, as an art, owes its very existence to this island. Though Frenchmen have sometimes heard of Shakspeare, possess a vague notion that one John Milton did exist, and are familiar with Byron—whom they claim as a Frenchman, Biron!—and Scott, yet still they stick to their old text, and deny us any taste, any fancy, any imagination.

Slowly and vaguely the idea is working itself into continental minds, that England is great in everything. Sir Joshua Reynolds is but one instance of the universality of our genius. It is difficult to explain the slow growth of art in this country, unless we seek for the cause in those religious and political troubles which absorbed every mind in the days of the first Charles and the great Cromwell, while under Charles II. the universal depravity of morals, the degeneration of king and people, and the narrow escape of moral extinction which we had at that time, must have prevented anything great or noble from making way above the surface of disorganised society.

The study of Vandyck, and the appearance in England of Lely and Kneller, two foreign artists, paved the way for the higher art, which soon was to be developed in Sir Joshua. Great indeed were the deficiencies of the British school when he arose. Its members seem to have been groping in the dark, conscious of power, of vigour, of energy; but, from want of artistic education, ignorant how to use it. Sir Joshua went the right way to work. He studied hard, gained a thorough knowledge of the elements of his art, and then went to the classic soil of Italy to complete his studies, and drink inspiration at the true fount of art. It was beneath the eye, as it were, of Michael Angelo and Raphael—at all events breathing the atmosphere in which they once lived, and gazing on their matchless works—that he gained such perfect mastery over his pencil.

High art is a phrase which is often used, never very accurately defined. Everything appears entitled to that epithet which elevates the standard of nature to sublimity. Reynolds did this with portrait-painting. He made it something superior, something greater than it had ever been before. It is probable, that had Sir Joshua enjoyed the advantages of a sound early education, he would have been as great in historical as in portrait painting. Here lies the weakness of most British artists. Generally speaking, they study nothing but the elements of their own art. While the foreign artist, especially the French painter, imbues his mind with general knowledge, studies history, anatomy, the intricate history of costume, too many of our own countrymen either cram for the occasion or fall into strange and painful errors.

This is notoriously the case with many living men, who, did they not wholly confine themselves to outline and colour, who, did they but elevate their minds by grasping that which expands and ennobles the intellect, might rise to original conception, instead of being eternal mannerists and copyists. A man will never paint well that which he does not understand. If he seeks to produce a Scripture subject, he must be familiar with all that learning and research has laid bare in reference to the age gone by. He must comprehend the climate, natural productions, costume, and colour locale of his subject, or he never will be great. How admirable, how perfect, are many of our English artists, when they paint English scenery. It is because they paint what they thoroughly understand. As in speaking and writing, so in art, a thorough conception of the subject is half the battle. The artist attacks his canvas with a boldness and courage which he can never feel, when he is in doubt as to details. Imagine a novelist, who knew nothing of the reign of Charles II. but a few leading facts, writing a novel laid in that day. His production would be something ludicrous. Paintings, meant to be sublime, are often ridiculous from this great error. The tragedians, representing Brutus in a bag-wig and red heels, were not more absurd than an artist who, painting a scene in British India, dressed his natives like Syrians; nor at all more out of character than the painter who, representing an event in Virginia, painted Peruvian Indians instead of Sioux or Choctaws. Such errors strike not the vulgar, but they utterly destroy the effect of a picture in the eyes of a man of taste and education.

The severe taste generated by the change from Romanism to Protestantism checked for a time the progress of art, which, owing its birth to lands imbued with popery, could not fit itself at once to the more chaste and pure ideas of a purified religion.

It was not until the days of Reynolds, when Hogarth and Gainsborough also flourished, that British art took an impetus, and became a firm plant in a rich soil. They were men worthy any age and time, and as long as the English language endures—and what mind is there vast enough to grasp the fact of what the English language has yet to do?—will these men be admired and venerated as the leaders and masters of a school, that will yet in all probability rival any that has existed. Reynolds matured what the less cultivated genius of the others prepared.

Devonshire has been peculiarly rich in painters. It produced Reynolds; it has since given us Hudson, Hayman, Cosway, Humphry, Haydon, Northcote, Prout, and many others. Reynolds was originally intended for the church; but fortunately for posterity he changed his vocation. Many a good tailor and shoemaker has been spoiled in the effort to create a painter; but many a man of genius has been kept from his proper sphere in the effort to make him a clergyman. The ministry is a vocation to which a man should rather turn from choice than be brought up to it. It would have been well for Reynolds, perhaps, had he acquired the knowledge which a university education would have given him. But his father, good easy man, taught him little, and he began the world with a very small stock of knowledge.

It was in the society of literary men, from frequent intercourse with the wits and poets and historians and divines, who assembled round his table, rather than from any early habits, that Reynolds acquired a taste for literary composition. Johnson and Goldsmith were his friends. The following from Farrington is high praise. He is speaking of his intellectual evenings:—"Such an example at the head of the arts, had the happiest effect upon the members of the profession. At this time, a change in the habits and manners of the people of this country was beginning to take place. Public taste was improving. The coarse familiarity, so common in personal intercourse, was laid aside, and respectful attention and civility in address gradually gave a new and better aspect to society. The profane habit of using oaths in conversation no longer offended the ear; and Bacchanalian intemperance at the dinner-table was succeeded by rational cheerfulness and sober forbearance. No class of society manifested more speedy improvement than the body of artists. In the example set by Sir Joshua Reynolds, he was supported by some of his contemporaries, who were highly respected for the propriety of their conduct and gentlemanly deportment. So striking was the change, that a much-esteemed artist, far advanced in life, being a few years since at a dinner-table surrounded by men of his own profession, recollecting those of former times, remarked the great difference in their manners, adding, 'I now see only gentlemen before me. Such is the influence of good example.'"

But it is in his pictures that Sir Joshua will live. It is by them that the world knows him; and that which we represent in this number (p. 381) is not one of the least deserving.

Here is the young street-wanderer, holding out one hand to solicit a gift, but offering in the other a few old-fashioned matches for sale. This is his last compromise with shame, the last prudent act of the mendicant-boy. By this he half-conceals from himself the idea that he is a beggar, and eludes the letter of the law, which declares it criminal for the hungry to ask for bread of the passer-by.

But the painter's touch imprints on the figure and countenance of this boy the unmistakable characteristics of mendicancy. The humble and patient attitude, the sorrowful expression of face, the extended hand, all claim our pity; a compassionate tenderness must be roused by the sight of this poor suppliant. In nothing has the painter exaggerated his subject. Even in the beggar's clothing there is a decent propriety observed; he is not a vagrant in uncouth tatters, a creature repulsive in his dirt and rags, but one who, though possessing nothing of value, still keeps himself above abject and degrading destitution. On the other hand, however, he is no softly-clad beggar, picturesquely ragged. In his countenance there is nobility and feeling; we think, when looking at him, that he is the best object of sympathy, as one who, in other circumstances, would have been sympathising himself. Thus it is not by the externals of misery, or by tears, or by distorted features that Reynolds moves our pity for this poor boy; his appeal is not to our senses; it speaks directly to the soul. The moral sympathies of our nature are touched and awakened far more completely by this sad, quiet, manly countenance, than by an aggregate of terrible details of suffering, of want, wretchedness, and privation.

It is in this, if our theory be not altogether erroneous, that we find the true solution of that problem, so long disputed—What is art? Art idealises form and colour, so as to clothe a sentiment or an idea in truth and beauty. The artist who describes an object in painting or sculpture, as a poet would depict it in an epic or an ode, possesses the real genius to which chisel and pencil should belong. The most skilful imitator of nature is not the true painter; he stands to him in the same relation that a mason holds to an architect. Otherwise an exact copyist would be equal to the original painter.

The artists who have adopted this as their principle, have usually selected, for the subject of their compositions, the high and noble emotions of human nature—sorrow, enthusiasm, devotion, and meditation; while those of the more material school delight chiefly in scenes of earthly joy, in dances such as made Boccaccio's gardens happy, in festivals such as Cagliari painted, in fêtes like those of Velasquez, in flowery and radiant landscapes, or laughing, blooming groups of beauty. The Flemish school is made up almost entirely of such painters. Why is this? Is it because joy has less power over the deepest emotions of man? Is it more accidental and external to him? Is it less bound to him by roots striking far into his innermost nature? It seems difficult not to believe at least something like this. The appearance of felicity, no doubt, is pleasing to us; it inclines us to agreeable thoughts, and, perhaps, communicates such thoughts to our minds; but it does not assume that control of all our emotions which belongs to the sight of moral suffering. We are fascinated by the smiling Hebe; but we are riveted by the Niobe, with upturned eyes, speechless and stricken, without even a prayer or a cry upon her lips. That seems to command all the feelings which live in us; it pierces through our human materialism; it troubles, it softens us, and makes us yearn for power to assuage those pains of the soul which we witness; and it is by this invisible bond, linking all humanity into one, that, unless evil passions completely sway our hearts, we are made to weep with those who weep; so that it is among the gracious dispensations of Providence, that to console others is consolation to ourselves.

It results from this, that every work which awakens, by the representation of sorrow, such a remembrance of our better nature, tends to elevate the sentiments and to dignify the moral sympathies. It teaches what is noblest in humanity; for it inspires the heart with a desire to accomplish those duties which the divine precepts and the laws of society have established as relations between man and man.

The spectacle of a bright image of a joyous scene awakens particular class of painters. There are two things to be considered in a question of art—the perfection of the work, and its influence on men—and the latter is by no means invariably proportionate to the former. A work may be a finished masterpiece without exercising any appreciable influence on the beholder's mind, or its influence may be far from good;

by no means with great emotions. It pleases, it diverts, but it does not improve us; it is addressed to the inclinations, but it does not penetrate to the heart. Even if its influence be powerful, the effect stops with us, and is of no value to others.

This is not said in order to create a prejudice against any school, or to stamp with inferiority the productions of any while a statue or a picture of considerably less excellence may attract or excite a crowd. It is rarely, indeed, that the art of one painter is so perfect as to combine the highest purpose with the highest power of execution, to make the work admirable in spirit, taste, and beauty. When the artist does this, he is indeed a poet.

PAUL REMBRANDT.

REMBRANDT was the son of a miller named Herman Gerretsz, surnamed Van Ryn, or of the Rhine; because his mill was situated on a branch of that river, near Leyden, between the villages of Leyerdorp and Koukerck. His mother, Cornelia Van Zuitbroek, brought him into the world on the 15th of June, 1606, and he was baptized by the name of Rembrandt, which he rendered so famous. Being intended for the profession of letters, he was sent when very young to the university of Leyden; but the demon of painting was already exciting him, and, soon finding fewer charms in the Latin authors than in engravings, he quitted the study of Suetonius for that of chiaroscuro. If we may believe Sandrart, his contemporary, Paul Rembrandt at first attended the studio of Van Swaneburg, who gave him his first lessons. Houbraken, on the contrary, informs us that his first master was Peter Lastman, a painter who enjoyed a considerable reputation at Amsterdam; and that at the end of six months he quitted Lastman and worked with Jacques Pinas. This assertion of Houbraken's seems not improbable, since we find in the works of Pinas and of Lastman the elements of the style that was to immortalise their pupil. Whatever may be the originality of a man's genius, his works will always display some indications of obscure affinity with earlier productions; his manner has been dimly foreshadowed by some peculiarity of his predecessors; thus it might be said that there was a germ of Rembrandt's style in that of Correggio, and its development might be traced by almost imperceptible steps through the works of Elzheimer and Lastman. It is very natural that many painters should contest the honour of having guided the youth of an artist who, on quitting their studios, became at once their master. Thus it is that Leewen, in his description of the city of Leyden, assigns him a fourth master in the person of George Schooten.

Rembrandt has taken good care to transmit to us paintings of his person, or at least of his countenance, from the period of the freshness of youth up to that of shrunken old age. When he returned from Amsterdam to his father's mill he numbered some twenty years. He was a man at once robust and delicate. His broad and slightly-rounded forehead presented a development that indicates a powerful imagination. His eyes were small, deepset, quick, intelligent, and full of fire. His flowing hair, of a warm colour, bordering on red, and curling naturally, may possibly indicate a Jewish extraction. His head had a great deal of character, in spite of the plainness of his features; a large, flat nose, high cheekbones, and a copper-coloured complexion, imparted a vulgarity to his face, which was however relieved by the form of his mouth, the haughty outline of his eyebrows, and the brilliancy of his eyes. Such was Rembrandt; and the character of the figures he painted partakes of that of his own person,—that is to say, they have a great deal of expression, but are not noble, and possess much pathos, but are deficient in what is termed style.

An artist thus constituted could not but be exceedingly original and independent, though selfish, and entirely swayed by his caprice. Therefore when he began to study nature, he entered on his task, not with that simple good-nature which is the distinctive characteristic of so many of the Dutch painters, but with an innate desire to stamp every object with his own peculiarity, and joining his own imagination with an attentive observation of real life. Of all the phenomena of nature, that which gave him most trouble was light; and of all the difficulties of painting, that which he most desired to conquer was the power of expression. Traces of these two prevailing desires may be found even in his early engravings.

How frequently has the tragic scene of Calvary been represented by the painter's pencil! From Daniel di Volterra down to Rubens, how many painters have especially chosen the moment when the dead body of Christ is being lowered from the cross! But when Rembrandt approaches the same subject, he presents it to us with an unforeseen sublimity. Considered with reference to these proprieties which we call style, costume, tradition, "The Descent from the Cross" by this master would doubtless be an indefensible picture: the head and body of the crucified Redeemer are frightfully ugly. The men who have drawn the nails, and those who hold the winding-sheet, or who support the descending body in their arms, as well as the three Marys and the spectators of the scene, belong, judging by their odd and dilapidated raiment, their head-dresses, and their figures altogether, to the least elevated, or even to the very lowest classes. In the foreground a sort of burgo-master is standing in an attitude of indifference, with a turban and a braided mantle lined with fur. He is leaning on an official-looking cane, and has quite the appearance of an officer sent by the magistrates to witness the removal of the body. But Rembrandt with one master-stroke has imparted an astonishing poetry to this scene of mourning, by introducing a ray of light falling from above, a glance, as it were, from the Almighty, upon the body of the victim. A stream of light pierces the obscurity of the heavens and inundates the picture with light; while, in the valley, Jerusalem is only seen through the misty half-tint, a glorious splendour illumines and gives brilliancy to the scene of death. Those servants in tatters no longer have a vulgar aspect; and we only notice their expressive gestures, their careful and zealous precautions, and their heartfelt grief.

Retired within the obscurity of his father's mill, the miller's son had long been an admirer of nature before he had ever thought of admiring himself—some amateurs, however, had noticed him. Holland was at that time full of connoisseurs and patrons of the arts, which were held in great honour there; and it was hardly possible that some picture, engraving, or drawing of Rembrandt's should not cause a sensation among a nation who were then running mad after painting. A people whose life is not merely one of external enjoyment, as is the case with the Italians and other nations of the South, but one of a domestic, retired, patient, and profound character, must have readily comprehended the works of Rembrandt. One of the first pictures of the young painter having attracted notice, he was advised to take it to the Hague; and he was recommended to a rich amateur by whom he would be well received. In fact, the artist, to his great astonishment, met with a reception and a reward far beyond his expectations or hopes; his picture was bought for one hundred florins. But here we prefer borrowing the language of the historian Descamps, without altering the simple style of his narrative. "This sum of one hundred florins nearly turned the head of the young artist: he had undertaken his journey on foot; but in order to reach his home the sooner, and to acquaint his father with his great good fortune, he travelled back by the diligence, and thus escaped the fate of Correggio.* All the passengers descended when the carriage stopped for dinner, but Rembrandt remained. He was anxious about his treasure, and would not run the risk of losing it. The stable-boy, on removing the trough in which he had given the horses their corn, not having unharnessed or tied them up, they continued their journey, without waiting for their driver or the other passengers, and arrived safe with Rembrandt at Leyden, where they stopped at the customary hotel. Our painter quickly jumped out of the carriage, and hurried off with his money to his father's mill."

This success would not, perhaps, have been sufficient to tempt Rembrandt from the solitude in which he had grown upon the banks of the Rhine, if a new passion had not at that time found its way into his heart. The day upon which he was able to count down a hundred florins, gained by a few strokes of his pencil, he felt himself a miser; whether it was that he had been born with this vice, or whether in the ringing of so many pieces of money he only heard the echo of the admiration his work inspired, it is certain that, seeing fame so readily translate itself into florins, he went to seek it at Amsterdam, and in 1630, at the age of twenty-four, he had already established his residence in that city. The feeling of self was very largely developed in Rembrandt. In the very year of his settling at Amsterdam, he painted and engraved his own portrait in a hundred different positions, and in all sorts of costumes, † sometimes covered with a rich cloak and a velvet cap, ‡ sometimes with a hawk on his fist or a gleaming sabre in his hand; at others with a ruff of plaited lace; or again bareheaded, his hair standing on end and flying out from his forehead in all directions, like the waving rays usually given to the sun. When he had once made himself known, he opened a school, and divided the establishment into small cells or compartments, where each scholar might study from the life-model. He was doubtless afraid that studying in one common room might cause his pupils to lose their originality of manner; it might be said that as he was jealous of his own originality, so he equally guarded that of others. How many painters were destined to issue from these cells, without resembling each other it is true, but not without bearing with them some fragments of the genius of their master! Fictor, Gerard Douw, Lievens, Van Beekhout, Van Hoogstraten, Govaert Flink, Leonard Bramer, Ferdinand Bol, and many others.‡

As to the head of this convent-like studio, he was a fantastic dreamer, a man wrapt up in himself, full of originality, contradictions, and uncouthness. He had a large press full of turbans, fringed scarfs, old spangled stuffs, armour, rusty swords, and halberds; and he used to exclaim, when showing these to visitors, "These are my antiquities." He did not fail, however, to buy the engravings of Mark Anthony after Raphael; indeed, his biographer states that he possessed an ample collection of fine Italian engravings; but, different from those who affect to despise the things by which they profit, Rembrandt admired all, but imitated none. By a contradiction still more surprising for one so avaricious, he married a wife without fortune, a pretty country girl of the village of Ransdorp in Waterland; and he forthwith represented her by his side in one of his engravings, holding a glass in her hand, with smiling looks, smart with the finery of her dress and her blooming complexion. However, it is but just to say that if Rembrandt allowed the unworthy passion for money to find a place in his heart, he at least did not exclude from it the sentiment of gratitude. From the very commencement of his career he had enjoyed the patronage of a physician named Tulp, professor of anatomy at Amsterdam; and two years after his establishment in that city, he painted this professor surrounded by his pupils, and thus immortalised him, in the picture well known by the name of "The Anatomical Lecture." This picture appears to us somewhat cold, and wanting in that general relief in which Rembrandt always excels. The painter has only succeeded in this in relieving the separate parts; each head taken by itself is full of life and expression, finely and vigorously modelled; but each attracts the attention separately, and thus injures the general effect; there is no sufficient decision in any part so as to concentrate the interest; the dead body laid out upon the table forms, from its diagonal position and the monotony of its greenish tint, the only point of the picture; the countenances, however, are good, spirited, and full of thought; the professor, with his hat on, in the presence of his pupils who are uncovered, holds at the end of his forceps the flexor muscles of the hand, and explains to his class the simple mechanism of them; he operates with the indifference of the anatomist, and like a man hardened against the scenes of the dissecting-room.

To copy nature even to the minutest details of the model, and to lend an extraordinary power to the representation with great effect and bold relief, is, doubtless, the perfection of art; but this was not the secret, or we may say, the practice, of Rembrandt. It is true, that in his early manner he finished highly; each head in "The Anatomical Lecture," for example, when closely examined, offers an infinity of extremely fine tones, even in a single eye; yet, seen at a proper distance, the object presents only the three elements of the model—the high light, the shade, and the half tint. Although this manner of the painter was not deficient in force, and had an immense success at Amsterdam, owing to the passion of the Dutch for high finish, Rembrandt became bolder by practice, and created for himself a new style, sharp, striking, even coarse in appearance, but dazzlingly brilliant, and of a truth to nature which almost amounted to magic. However delicate the subject might be, he gave the appearance of finish by spirited touches; without altering the forms or disturbing the masses, he rendered them striking in luminous places by vigorous and even rough touches, the passionate expression of which was all calculated by the consummate artist; for such a dashing style of execution is only to be attained by profound study, and when the painter has become the perfect master of his palette. A stroke of the brush, which may seem to have been dashed at random upon the canvas, like cement upon a wall, is nevertheless so correctly placed as to express character, action, and life, to make the nostrils expand, or soften the look; and if it be true, as Descamps asserts, that the originals of Rembrandt's portraits were obliged to submit patiently to the long indecision of the painter on the choice of the pose, and on the nature and style of the accessories, it is certain that they were amply rewarded by the speaking likeness that resulted, the truth of the colouring, and the fine play of light in which they saw themselves depicted; they were fortunate if they did not suffer from some strange fancy of this most whimsical of painters, for whoever sat for Rembrandt was compelled to submit to his caprices, or to renounce the gratification of being the original of a chef-d'œuvre. It is related of him that one day, as he was just completing a picture of a family group, the death of his monkey was announced to him, whereupon he immediately painted the portrait of the animal, from memory, in the corner of the very canvas upon which he was working. The persons whose portraits composed the picture, and who were to pay him for it, were naturally offended at the introduction of a new member into their family; but Rembrandt chose rather to keep the picture than to efface the memorial of his favourite.

The mere imitation of nature, however, was so much beneath the genius of Rembrandt, that he made it a sort of pastime. In the intervals between his poetical compositions, to which his whole soul was devoted, illusive paintings of various objects formed a sort of amusement. Although it may be easy to deceive the senses by representing inanimate objects, such as fruit, flowers, shells, butterflies, and all that is comprehended in the term still life, it is not so easy to imitate life with such degree of truth as to deceive the eye. Rembrandt tried this more than once with startling success; it struck his fancy one day to paint his servant-girl opening the window, as if to look into the street; he cut his canvas of exactly the same dimensions as the window, so that by taking out the sashes he might fill up the opening with his picture. The position of the figure was so natural, the relief of the hand so good, and the head so full of animation, that every one was deceived by the trick. This feat, so like those which are related of the Greek artists, though far superior since it was not a bunch of grapes, or a curtain, but living nature, that was imitated), might, perhaps, seem an idle story, but that it is mentioned by Roger Piles, who adds, "This picture now forms part of my collection."

Dietrich, who was one of Rembrandt's imitators, said to the ingenious amateur Hagedorn, "When we wish to compose and light a picture in the style of Rembrandt, we must also adopt his manner of draping and adjusting the figures, without which the work would be deprived of that spirit which constitutes its charm." This observation is perfectly just; but it is most remarkable that so distinguished an amateur as M. de Hagedorn did not feel the value of the remark, but accompanies it in his book with the following lines: "I believe, however, that if Rembrandt, that successful colourist, had studied the other branches of painting like Poussin, he would have been only the more admired, and that the combination of two perfections, force of colour and a strict adherence to the story of the picture, could not but have added to his celebrity."

We think there cannot be a greater mistake than this; for if Rembrandt had drawn in the style of Poussin, it would no longer be that of Rembrandt. How could a painter who addressed himself to the imagination of others, and drew entirely from his own, always respect the proprieties of his story or of costume, the beautiful of form, or conventionality and tradition? His pencil could not be guided at the same moment by the rules of reason and by flights of the imagination. If an artist places before our eyes the classical imagery of processions of young girls walking gracefully at the Panathenæic festivals, he may allow us to admire the purity of their profiles, and to trace the beauty of their forms under the thin covering which betrays them. Let plastic art have its triumph then, for the caprices of light and shade are useless; the antique school took its rise in sunny climes, and it would be unreasonable to shut up its works in the cavern of the alchemist. The heroes of Rome and Athens, clothed with the buskin and enveloped in the toga, would have been strangely out of place at the bottom of those caverns where Doctor Faustus believes that he sees the sparkling of cabalistic letters!

It is often said that Rembrandt was very defective in his drawing, and that he failed in this branch of the art; this is a heresy on the part of the orthodox critics. Certainly, Rembrandt did not draw with the correct elegance taught in the classical school; he was not acquainted with the chaste forms of the antique; he did not study the nude, at least that which the antique school has decided to comprise the most exquisite proportions and the purest outlines. His Bathshebas are Dutch matrons, whose homely charms would not seduce King David, unless by the warm and life-like flesh-tints; his chaste Susannahs are servant-wenchs, whom no one would be eager to surprise on coming out of their bath, did not a fanciful shadow conceal the poverty of their half-exposed charms, and throw a poetical mystery over the prose of their beauty: but there are some essential qualities of drawing, which Rembrandt possesses in the highest degree—expression and perspective. "Perhaps even," says the learned and classical author of the "Traité complet de la Peinture,"† when on this subject, "he was superior in his appreciation of these qualities to Giulio Romano himself, or I even venture to say to Annibal Caracci." For the expression which results from the play of the features, and the attitude of attention, it would be difficult to meet with more simple, more energetic, or more striking examples than may be found in the works of Rembrandt. Was astonishment, for instance, ever better expressed than in the "Raising of Lazarus?"

Some authors have thought that Rembrandt visited Venice; De Piles has asserted it on the authority of certain etchings, on which the words, Rembrandt, Venetiis, 1635, appear to have been engraved. These words, in fact, can be made out upon three plates of oriental heads, turbaned and furred; but even if this be not a trick of the miser, and if Rembrandt did make a journey to Venice, of which there now only remains the evidence of these three prints, the illustrious painter did not 1628—the peculiarities of his style can be traced. He appears even then to have felt that the most important agent in his pictures was the light.

Rembrandt's principal and peculiar means of expression, especially in his paintings, is the chiaroscuro. Despairing of imitating the brightness of sunlight, he shuts his door against it, and closes up his window, only allowing it to penetrate through a small loophole. Having thus, as it were, imprisoned the daylight, he disposes of it at his own will, and makes the captive ray travel round his darkened apartment, sojourn long in the land of the great masters of colour, since, according to the Chevalier de Claussin, who was well acquainted with the works in question, the word Venetiis is found upon all the three plates with the same date of 1635. However this may be, it is certain that Rembrandt could not have borrowed his peculiar style from the Venetians, it is so strongly marked with the impress of a great original genius, and so easily recognised, even in the smallest of his etchings previous to the year 1635. Even at the age of twenty-two, in his earliest known works—his first engravings being dated causing it to fall, according to his fancy, now upon the skull of a hermit wrapt in meditation, now into an alcove with a woman in bed, perhaps the wife of Potiphar. There is no sentiment or idea which this painter does not express by light and shade only. When Jesus says to the buried Lazarus, "Come forth," Rembrandt represents the miracle of the "Raising of Lazarus" (p. 392) by a miracle of light and shade. The scene was pictured in his imagination as having taken place in a sombre cavern suddenly illuminated with a blaze of light. Rembrandt expresses life by light, and death by darkness.

Sometimes he seems to have desired to represent silence, and then a sweet harmony of tones, gently graduated, produces upon the eye the same effect as silence would produce upon the organ of hearing. We have often arrested our steps in the gallery of the Louvre to contemplate the two "Philosophers" of Rembrandt. A faint ray shines through the bleared glass in the leaded casement of the hermit's quiet abode. Before him are some open books; but the dreamer no longer regards them; he is wrapt in meditation. The light seems to glide along the wall, and creeps along the floor, scarcely revealing the steps of a winding staircase, then loses itself almost insensibly in the apartment, and dies away into the darkness. In this vaulted retreat there reigns such per-executed four etchings. In no other instance has he exhibited such consummate skill in toning down the light, and in lowering it to the point at which it seems actually to have disappeared, even while it is still present; for in Rembrandt's works there never is any actual black, but a mysterious half-tint, where the light and the darkness seem to be equally mixed. "Jacob's Dream" is the subject of the first of these mystic compositions. The angels gently ascend and descend a ladder, which is only illumined at its upper extremity. The dreamer, whom we suppose to be at the bottom of the ladder, is in the most profound darkness. This is the first state of the etching; but in a second proof, his figure may just be distinguished through the bars of the ladder as he is fect peace, that the mere contemplation of the picture awakes a desire for the solitude. On a closer examination of this picture, we perceive on the staircase the figures of two women, whose colour differs so slightly from the mass of shade, that they do not in the slightest degree interfere with the subdued effect, or, to make use of the metaphor we alluded to above, they do not break the silence of the composition.

There exists a Spanish book* of great obscurity, written by the Jew Manassé-ben-Israel, for which book Rembrandt stretched at the foot. The celestial ray has descended the steps, and with its dying gleam indicates the vague outline of the sleeping traveller. The mystery is profound, the effect grand. The angels who brush against Jacob with their wings are, it is true, neither light nor aerial, but their very weight seems to render them more powerful and formidable. The lighting of the picture supplies the poetry of the subject, or rather of itself constitutes the poetry, for by means of it the effect is elevated to unequalled grandeur. This engraving,

* This book is entitled, "Piedra gloriosa, ó de la Estatua de Nebuchadnezzar, con muchas y diversas autoridades de la S. S. y antiguos sabios" (Glorious Stone, or of the Statue of Nebuchadnezzar, with many and divers authorities taken from the Holy Scriptures, and from the learned men of old). The four etchings of Rembrandt having been executed expressly for an edition of this book, it is not astonishing that they should be very scarce. This curious little book has fetched the price of £16 destined for a small book, is not so large as the hand of the engraver; but the genius of Rembrandt, in spite of the narrow limits within which it is confined, gives the effect of gigantic proportions to the subject. In the same book he has represented the "Vision of Ezekiel," and he seems to have taken delight in making it pass through all the variations of his magic lantern. A glory is shining above, in the midst of which the Almighty appears surrounded by adoring angels. Below are seen the four animals of which the prophet speaks, loathsome beasts, as frightful as the gnomes lately discovered by Goya, and which, in the twilight where they are seen spreading out their hideous wings, serve as contrasts to the glories of heaven. This engraving measures only three inches; yet it comprises both worlds, hell below and heaven above, the brightness of paradise and the horrors of the infernal regions; it commences like the dream of a perfectly happy man, and finishes like the nightmare of a condemned felon.

Painting was not, perhaps, the principal source of the extraordinary fame of Rembrandt. It was particularly by his immortal etchings that he made himself known in the world of art, from Holland even to Rome. Merchants came from the remotest parts of Italy to offer him some of Mark Anthony's engravings in exchange for his corrected proofs. Shut up in his sombre studio, he silently pursued his occupation without witnesses, his door being closed against visitors. He wished it to be believed that he was in possession of some wonderful secrets, and he hoped that even the smallest print issuing from a laboratory into which nobody was permitted to penetrate, would be the more highly prized by amateurs; and he knew them well. According to his biographers, he would endeavour to enhance the value of his works by first striking off a few impressions of an unfinished engraving; he then continued to work at it by means of a second transparent varnish, making a few slight alterations, either with aquafortis or with the dry point; and thus succeeded in selling as different engravings a number of proofs from the same plate. It is certain that his engravings were the more in demand throughout Europe, because he required very high prices for them; and yet he still further raised their value by tricks which were worthy of a patriarch of the Synagogue. Sometimes he put them up for public sale, in order to raise the price by bidding for them himself; at other, he even sent his son to sell them clandestinely as stolen prints. Taking advantage of the infatuation with which he had inspired his countrymen, he would occasionally threaten to go to England; so that, being uncertain of the time he was to remain with them, the amateurs hastened to buy his prints at any price. He one day caused a report of his death to be spread, in order to enjoy the malicious gratification of coming to life again, in the midst of the astonished bidders, after his portfolios had been knocked down at auction. Amongst his numerous works there were etchings which he would not sell at first, even at the price of a hundred florins. "It was necessary," says Descamps, "to coax him in order to obtain them. It was the fashion—it was the rage. People were actually ridiculed who did not possess a proof of the little Juno with a crown, and another without the crown, or of the Joseph with a white face, and the same with a black face, or of the woman with a white bonnet, and with a little foal, and the same without a bonnet."

Rembrandt had already amassed a considerable fortune. His studio, full of pupils, who were sent to him by the principal citizens of Amsterdam, brought him in enormous sums. Sandrart, his contemporary, informs us that each of the pupils of this great but avaricious painter paid him no less than a hundred florins annually;* to which must be added the produce of a great number of copies of his works by his pupils, retouched by the master, and sold by him as originals of his own: these were paintings by Fictoor, Govaert Flink, and Van Eeckhout; this lucrative business brought Rembrandt as much as 2,500 florins, without reckoning the sums which he acquired by his own labour with the pencil, the graver, or the pen; for his designs, which exhibited great spirit and talent, were also valued at very high prices. In the midst of so much wealth, the painter of "The Night Patrol" lived in the same primitive simplicity as when he was only the son of the miller Gerretsz. Chary of his gold, he was only lavish of it in his pictures, where his warm lights resembled the colour and richness of his coin. But, in fact, even his engravings were coloured with that harmonious tint, the colour of the India paper, which Rembrandt liked to have them printed on, and which almost resembled thin sheets of gold. His pupils were so well acquainted with his weakness, that they often amused themselves by painting pieces of gold upon scraps of paper, and placing them on the floor in some corner, where the painter never failed to pick them up, though his good-nature would never allow him to punish those who had so cleverly deceived an eye like his. But, if Rembrandt loved gold, it was only for the sake of the enjoyment which the thought of it afforded him. His mode of living was parsimonious; his meals consisted, says Houbraken, of a salt herring or a piece of cheese. His manners and tastes kept him amongst the lower classes; and when he was one day reproached with this, he replied, "When I wish to amuse myself after my labours, I do not seek grandeur, which is only troublesome to me, but liberty."

The stern humourist,† however, had some friends among the superior classes. Professor Tulp, Renier Amloot, an anabaptist minister,‡ Haaring the elder, the great amateur of engravings, Abraham France, the famous goldsmith Janus Lutema, and lastly, Rembrandt's most intimate friend, the burgomaster Six, would all have been glad to introduce into their society an artist whose person would have excited at least as much interest as his engravings; but he declined it. His eccentricity, however, never lost him a friend: he knew how to attach them by his good-humour, and to immortalise them with his graver. John Six, when he was only secretary of the city of Amsterdam, composed a tragedy of Medea. In honour of his friend, and as if to illustrate this tragedy, Rembrandt engraved the admirable print of "The Marriage of Jason," which seems as if created by the wand of an enchanter.

The portrait of burgomaster Six (p. 388) is well known to all amateurs, artists, or patrons of the arts. He is represented standing, leaning against a window, by which the scene is lighted; he is occupied in reading a book, the reflection from which lights up his countenance. This portrait is so finely engraved, that the work of the graver resembles more a vigorous drawing in Indian ink than an etching on copper.

It was on the excursions which Rembrandt made from the city of Amsterdam to the country-house of burgomaster Six, that this great painter acquired a taste for landscape. He brought to the study of nature that sombre poetical feeling from which he never was free, and he often chose for his subject the strife between sunshine and tempest. The landscapes of Rembrandt are generally of a gloomy cast: a boat upon a stagnant canal, a lost road, a bull tied by a cord to the trunk of an old tree, are quite sufficient in his hands to supply subjects for contemplation, and to give us a dreamy view of nature. Broad shadows sometimes envelop the landscape, and the painter-engraver converts a scene in the open air into an interior dramatic composition; he treats his landscape like a vast chamber, with the heavenly vault for a ceiling, and he only allows the sunlight to appear in gleams, to which he opposes some dark trees in the foreground. The landscape of "The Three Trees," which is among our illustrations (p. 397), is composed in this manner. It is valued, and with reason, as one of his finest productions, and it may also be considered as

† It is thus Robert Graham speaks of him in his "Lives of Painters" appended to the edition of the poem of Dufresnoy, translated into English by Dryden. London, 1716.

‡ According to the historian Baldinucci, Rembrandt belonged to a sect of anabaptists, then very numerous in Holland.

* Sandrart, edit. in folio, 1683: "Qui singuli annuatim centenos ipsi numerabant florenos præter emolumentum aliud, quod è venditis tyronum suorum, picturis et figuris calcographicis obtinebat." — "Academia Artis Pictorie," lib. iii. cap. xxii.

most characteristic of his style. That which is known as "The Pont de Six," now extremely rare, is worth mentioning, from the anecdote connected with it, related by Gersaint in his catalogue. On one occasion, when Rembrandt was staying at the country-house of burgomaster Six, the servant announced that dinner was ready; but, as they were sitting down to table, they observed that there was no mustard. The burgomaster ordered the servant to go immediately to the village and get some. Rembrandt, who knew the habitual tardiness of this servant, and who was himself of an active disposition, offered his friend Six a wager that he would engrave a print before the domestic returned. The challenge was accepted, and as Rembrandt always had some plates ready prepared, he took one immediately and engraved upon it the landscape that he saw from the windows of the room in which they were seated. The plate was completed before the return of the valet, and Rembrandt gained his wager.

The attempts at copying and imitating, or producing facsimiles of the works of Rembrandt have been very numerous; the merest scrawls by his hand have been counterfeited and imitated with more or less skill. Besides the very deceptive copies by Basan, Folkema, Watelet, Vivarès, Richard Wilson, Jacques Hazard, and Monsieur Denon (who was the Director of Museums of France), or the admirable retouching executed by an English officer, Captain Baillie, upon the plate called "The Hundred Florins," a vast number of painters and of young engravers, since the time of Bernard Picart, have tried the success of these innocent impostures. The author of this history, when studying engraving some years ago under Messrs. Calamatta and Mercuri, made himself a copy of the "Janus Lutma," not so much for the purpose of attempting the difficult task of making a perfect copy, as with a view to discover the pretended secrets of Rembrandt. Our readers, whether amateurs or artists, will perhaps be indebted to us if we enter here into some explanations on the subject.

When a great painter occupies himself with engraving, he looks only to the result, without reference to the modus operandi. All his attention is directed to the proper disposition of the light and shade, and he endeavours to draw with the graver upon the copper just as he would do with his pencil upon paper. It is useless to talk to him of academic rules, of lines arranged with military precision; or to tell him that the well-known lozenge style of hatching must be rigorously adhered to. Of what importance to him are all these established rules and patent methods, if he can embody his ideas or render the effect of his picture without them? All the traditions of the craft, he will say, are insufficient for a man who has not a true feeling for his art, and are unnecessary to one who is endowed with it. Thus we observe how vigorously Rembrandt handles the great masses of his compositions, whether the material be fur, silk, or velvet; he attacks all with the same freedom of manner; he allows great scope to his hand, though it is always guided, even unconsciously, by an instinctive knowledge of form, by a delicate feeling for perspective, as to what parts should advance and what be kept back; of the texture of objects, whether dull, hard, polished, sparkling, woody, or friable. In the portrait of Lutma, the stone of the wall, the oak of the table, the iron of the hammer, the box full of tools, and the silver salver, which shines in a place where every other substance would be dull,—all these things are rendered by more regular and more equal hatching, and consequently appear colder than those which express the furred lining of the mantle and the rough plastering of the wall. But still it is as if playfully, and amidst the picturesque disorder of his numerous hatchings, that the engraver has intentionally altered the movement, graduated the touch, and varied the expression of the etching-needle. If Rembrandt's prints, however, have taught us that tradition can be dispensed with, and replaced by feeling, they have also added to the number of methods previously known, by showing us how to efface in certain cases the transparency of the paper. We may now naturally pass on to the explanation of the engraver's secrets, if he really had any other than that of his genius.

ferent methods which Rembrandt made use of. The enthusiasm of an amateur, who had devoted thirty-six years of his life to the study of Rembrandt's works, makes it sufficiently clear that he was desirous of discovering in his favourite master more secrets than had been known to his predecessors Bartsch, Pierre Yver, Helle, Glomy, and Gersaint. But even according to his own explanation of these various secrets, it is evident that the seven pretended methods of Rembrandt resolved themselves into three. Thus, the habit of employing etching-needles of various sizes in order to finish both the delicate and powerful parts at the first working, without requiring any retouching upon a second varnish, was not peculiar to Rembrandt. In doing this the engraver only followed the ordinary process of etching, and there is no secret in it any more than in the method of retouching by passing a clear varnish over the first work, which remains visible through the transparent covering, and can thus be strengthened by further crossing the lines. The real improvement made by Rembrandt—and it is a very great one—was the introduction into etching of stains resembling delicate washes of Indian ink, and also dull parts of a velvet-like texture, like mezzo-tint; it may indeed be called the invention of the art of painting on copper. How he accomplished it is a question; but it is a great mistake to suppose that, after the lapse of two centuries, it still remains a profound mystery; for there are at least three methods of obtaining this tint, which may be compared to the glazing colours in painting. By either touching the naked copper with a brush dipped in aquafortis, or by roughening with pumice-stone the parts of the plate which are required to be deadened; or, lastly, by passing over it with fine rollers, the grain of which is invisible, we are enabled without difficulty to imitate the peculiar texture of Rembrandt. But as these operations only affect the surface of the metal, and do not penetrate it, they cannot long resist the process of printing, which soon effaces them. Rembrandt, in order to give durability to his work, most frequently made use of the dry point, which, by light hatching with very fine and very close lines, produces the required tint; afterwards, according as he wished to obtain a vigorous or delicate tone, a flat or velvet-like effect, he removed more or less of the roughness from the surface, which thus retained the printing-ink in the same proportion, and produced gray half-tints, or shadows resembling mezzo-tint.

The two methods most commonly employed by Rembrandt were those of roughening the copper with pumice-stone, of which we have an example in the "Pêcheur à la Barque," and of scratching the plate delicately with the dry point, without afterwards entirely removing the roughness, as the artist has treated the portrait of "Burgomaster Six," and of which the print of the "Hundred Florins" is particularly an example; this may be considered as the whole history of the great master's secrets. There remained, however, one other resource, which was for the artist to keep in his own hands the printing of his engravings; the genius of art being by a sad misalliance associated in his case with the genius of avarice, our artist retired into his mysterious studio, and there using the printer's ink ball artistically, he was able to vary the proofs according to his fancy. Sometimes he contented himself with partially wiping the plate, at others he used the black very thickly, and occasionally his aim was to obtain transparency. In fact, he continued his experiments even to the very last impression the plate would yield, thus subjecting the work to every turn of his capricious humour.

According to de Piles, Rembrandt died at Amsterdam in 1688; according to Houbraken, in 1674. He left only one son, named Titus, who inherited the immense fortune, but not the genius of his father.

While Rembrandt was inimitable as an engraver, in painting none have surpassed him in three essential elements of the art; chiaroscuro, touch, and expression. If his subjects are vulgar, his treatment of them is grand; if his drawing is wanting in purity, or incorrect in proportion, it is redeemed by the superior quality of pathos; he goes at once to the sentiment of his subject. Moreover, his very defects are of a nature which it would be a pity to remove. A thorough genius, Rembrandt admits of no corrections, and this constitutes his greatness.

of the sentiment of the art. His treatment of the lights is so powerful, and his shadows are so transparent, that he yields neither to Giorgione or Correggio for force or delicacy of painting. His style, though often rude and coarse, became, when he pleased, sweet, blended, and finished. This latter manner was worked out by his scholar, Gerard Douw.

THE RAISING OF LAZARUS.—FROM A PAINTING BY REMBRANDT.

In the department of light and shade this master has no rival, being able to produce at the same time the relief of individual parts and of the whole of his picture. As to the practical part of his profession, he united a perfect knowledge of the art of manipulation with a refined appreciation

Rembrandt occasionally softens his tints, and moderates his shadows, and thus gives repose to the eye by a calm and harmonious ensemble; at other times he is rough, his execution is unfinished, and he affects an absurdly thick style of painting; but his touches are so certain that they produce at a distance the effect of harmonious colouring. He sometimes finished the hair and beard with the handle of the

any other painter, they often throw those of the greatest masters into the background."

Considered individually, Rembrandt seems to have detached himself from the traditions of his art, and to have broken through all trammels; but if he be compared with other painters of the first order, as Raphael, Correggio, Poussin, or Rubens, it will be acknowledged that he is a member of that great family, and that his absence would create a void in the history of the art. Rembrandt seems to be indented with ourselves, while Raphael, by the purely beautiful, appeals to the soul; and Poussin, by his knowledge, speaks to the mind, while Correggio awakens our sensibility by his graceful drawing, and Rubens dazzles the eye with his colouring.—Rembrandt, by his treatment of the light and shade, excites the imagination, and transports us into the land of dreams.

During the life of this great artist, as well as since his death, so high a value has been placed upon the least of his productions, that our readers will no doubt excuse us if we multiply on this occasion the detailed information specially destined for amateurs. This task being one of such extent, we will divide it, for greater convenience, into three parts. The first will contain the subjects and prices of the principal etchings; the second will indicate the place and subject of the principal pictures; and the third will give the prices of the small number of the latter which have been put up for sale at public auctions.

ETCHINGS.

In the etching style of engraving, Rembrandt is unrivalled. Of all masters who have laboured in this branch of art, there is not one whose prints have met with such continued favour; the numerous volumes that have been published on the works of Rembrandt are a sufficient proof of this. Gersaint devoted a part of his life to making deep researches on the engraved works of Rembrandt, but death overtook this amateur before the publication of his labours. Helle and Glomy having obtained possession of his MS., corrected it, augmented it with their own materials, enriched it with the information which they had derived from the examination of the most celebrated works, and published in 1751 an octavo volume. Pierre Yver, a broker of Amsterdam, celebrated for his critical knowledge, published in 1756 another volume, to serve as a supplement to the works of Gersaint, Helle, and Glomy. Subsequently, in 1797, Adam Bartsch, a learned Austrian, himself an engraver of great merit, published a "Catalogue raisonné" of all the prints that are the work of Rembrandt. Lastly, Chevalier de Claussin published in 1824 a new catalogue, which, though the third, is not the least curious.

The catalogues which we have cited, inform us that Rembrandt engraved 376 plates, of which only 173 bear the date of their execution. The earliest of them are of the year 1628, and the latest of 1661. According to these dates, Rembrandt could only have begun to engrave at the age of twenty-two, and did not relinquish the etching needle until thirteen years before his death.

To facilitate the researches of amateurs, we shall adopt here the general arrangement of Bartsch.

NOTE.—From an inventory of the prints in the Royal Library of Paris, drawn up on the 1st January, 1840, it appears that this establishment contains the enormous number of 900,516 different plates. Rembrandt's works amount to 1,805 out of that number: 1,038 originals and 767 copies, the duplicates included. It is interesting to know that, when limited to original pieces, this work is composed of only 687 prints, and at this number the collection of the library is considered as the most complete in Europe.

PICTURES.

The catalogue of the Museo del Rey, at Madrid, only mentions as the work of Rembrandt the portrait of a lady very richly dressed, and three-quarter length; it is signed, and dated 1634.

The Gallery degli Uffizi, at Florence, so complete in most things, contains but two of Rembrandt's portraits.

The National Gallery in London contains the following works of this master:—

1. "Christ taken down from the Cross;" a study in black and white. The finished picture of the same subject is said to be in the gallery of Count Schonborn, at Vienna; the original drawing is in the British Museum.

2. "The Woman taken in Adultery." This picture was painted by Rembrandt in 1644, for Johan Six, Sieur de Yromade, in Holland. It ultimately came into the possession of the well-known Burgomaster Six, in whose family it was preserved with an almost religious care, in a cabinet of which the owner kept the key, until the revolution. When it was bought by Monsieur la Fontaine, a picture-dealer; who, not finding a purchaser in Paris, brought it to London, and sold it to Mr. Angerstein for £5,000. As it is a chef-d'œuvre of the master, it would now be difficult to estimate its value.

3. "The Adoration of the Shepherds." This beautiful production was painted by Rembrandt in 1646, and was purchased by Mr. Angerstein for £100.

4. "Portrait of a Jew Merchant." Presented to the nation by Sir George Beaumont.

5. "A Landscape," in which the figures represent Tobias and the Angel.

6. "Portrait of a Capuchin Friar." Presented to the National Gallery by the Duke of Northumberland.

7. "A Woman Washing." Painted by Rembrandt in 1644, and bequeathed by Mr. Holwell Carr to the National Gallery.

The Gallery of Windsor Castle contains two Rembrandts:—

1. "Head of a young Man in a Turban."

2. "Head of an old Woman in a black Coif," absurdly called the Countess of Desmond, at the age of 120; it is, perhaps, a portrait of Rembrandt's mother.

At Hampton Court there are only two pictures by Rembrandt:

1. "Head of a Jewish Rabbi," very fine.

2. "Portrait of a Woman," half-length.

There are five Rembrandts in the Dulwich Gallery:—

1. "Jacob's Dream." Jacob, whose figure is that of a common peasant, and scarce distinguishable amid the thick darkness, lies asleep on the left beneath some bushes. From the opening heavens above, a strange winged shape, "not human or angelic, but bird-like, dream-like," comes floating downwards, and beyond it another figure just emerging from the abyss of light, in which its ethereal essence was confounded, seems about to take some definite form, and glide after its companion.

2. "Portrait of a Man," very highly finished.

3. "A Girl leaning out of Window."

4. "Jacob stealing his Father's Blessing."

5. "A Portrait." Head only; said to be that of the painter, Philip Wouwermans.

But it is in private collections, and especially in that of her Majesty at Buckingham Palace, that the finest pictures of this master are to be found. Sir Robert Peel's collection contains—

1. "A Portrait of a Man" in an oval, one of the remarkable pictures of this master.

2. "A Landscape and some Cattle by the side of a piece of Water."

The Bridgewater Gallery contains four:—

1. "Portrait of Rembrandt himself, at the age of fifty."

2. "A Female Portrait in a rich dress."

3. "A Study." The head of a man, painted in a masterly style.

4. "An Old Woman in a bright red dress, before whom a boy is kneeling," intended, probably, for the prophetess Hannah with her son Samuel.

Mr. Rogers possesses three:—

1. "An Allegory," in brown and white, on the deliverance of the United Provinces from the yoke of Spain and Austria.

2. The artist's own portrait, at an advanced age.

3. "A Landscape, with a few trees upon a hill in the foreground."

In Sir Abraham Hume's collection there is one, the portrait of a stately man, whose right hand rests upon a bust of Homer.

In Blenheim Palace there is a duplicate of "The Woman taken in Adultery," by Rembrandt.

There are five Rembrandts in Lord Ashburton's collection.

1. Portrait of a middle-aged man; 2. Portrait of the artist, at an advanced age; 3. The celebrated writing-master, Lieven Von Coppenel; 4 and 5. Portraits of a man and his wife.

In the Grosvenor collection, formed by the Marquis of Westminster, there are six of Rembrandt's pictures. 1. "The Visitation," dated 1649; 2 and 3. Portraits of a young man and young woman; 4 and 5. Portraits of N. Berghem and his wife, bearing date 1644; and 6. "A Landscape with Figures," in the manner of Teniers.

In Mr. Hope's collection there are three Rembrandts. 1. "Christ asleep on board the Ship, being awakened by his terrified Disciples;" 2. One of the rare family portraits of this master, in whole-length figures; 3. "A Plain traversed by a River, with Buildings on both its Banks."

There are two Rembrandts in Lord Cowper's collection. 1. Portrait of Marshal Turenne on horseback; and 2. Portrait of a young man.

Rembrandt's celebrated "Mill," once the ornament of the Orleans Gallery, is in the Marquis of Lansdowne's collection at Bowood.

At Corsham House there is "An Old Rabbi in a Turban," by Rembrandt.

At Burleigh House there is a small portrait, by Rembrandt, called "William Tell."

The Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge, possesses the portrait of an officer in a steel cuirass, marked with the name and the date 1635.

Earl Spencer's collection at Althorp contains "The Circumcision," by Rembrandt, a small picture of remarkable finish, and a portrait of a woman, which is believed to be that of his mother, in spite of the richness of her attire.

In the Duke of Devonshire's collection at Chiswick there are two Rembrandts, portraits of men.

In the Duke of Bedford's collection at Woburn Abbey, a portrait of Rembrandt by himself, when young, and an old Rabbi, with a gold chain round his neck.

Amidst the splendid pictures of Rubens and Vandyck which adorn the Museum at Brussels, a fine portrait of a man by Rembrandt attracts all eyes; it is dated and signed.

In the rich gallery at Munich, it is impossible to forget the all of them portraits, one of his mother, two of himself, and one of a Jew in Asiatic costume.

The Gallery of Prince Lichtenstein, at Vienna, contains two portraits of Rembrandt, young and old, by himself; a sea-piece, a rare subject of this master, and a meeting of "Diana and Endymion," exceedingly grotesque, but with the most beautiful effect of light.

The collection of Prince Esterhazy, in the same capital, contains the "Ecce Homo" of Rembrandt, which engrosses all the admiration of visitors.

The Museum at Dresden contains no less than sixteen pictures by Rembrandt; "The Sacrifice of Manoë and his Wife," "The Abduction of Ganymede," and several por-chef-d'œuvre that Rembrandt has left there in the celebrated "Taking down from the Cross;" this picture is not more than from two to three feet square.

Around this chef-d'œuvre are grouped a "Crucifixion" in sombre and stormy weather, a "Deposition" in the obscurity of a deep vault, a "Resurrection" illumined by a fitful ray of light in the midst of the deep gloom, a "Nativity" by the light of a lamp, and an "Ascension," in which the figure of Christ lights up the whole scene by its brilliancy. The Pinakothek also contains several portraits; one of a Turk very richly habited, another of Rembrandt in his old age, another of Govaert Flak, his pupil, and his wife, and some other very valuable ones.

The Belvidere at Vienna contains ten works of Rembrandt, amongst others that of the painter himself, represented with a glass in his hand and a smile on his lips, embracing his wife, who is sitting on his knee, and accompanied by his grown-up daughter.

In the Gallery at Berlin, out of eight of Rembrandt's pictures two are portraits of himself; also a "Blind Tobias," and the "Angel speaking to Joseph in his Dream," small companion pictures, signed, and dated 1615. "Duke Adolphus de Gueldre threatening his aged Father," painted in 1637, a celebrated picture, the colouring of which is excellent, and in which the play of light is wonderful.

No city, not even Munich, says M. Viardot, can boast of having so numerous a collection of the works of Rembrandt as St. Petersburg; the Hermitage contains forty-three, and of the greatest variety of style,—landscapes, sea-pieces, portraits, &c. The finest, perhaps, amongst the portraits, bears the great name of Jean Sobieski.

Among the subjects from Scripture history, are:—"The Sacrifice of Abraham;" "The Return of the Prodigal Son"

"Corporation of Merchant Drapers," a capital picture, and of astonishing power of execution; "The Beheading of St. John the Baptist;" and the "Portrait of a Man."

The Museum of the Hague may be proud of being able to show "The Anatomical Lecture of Professor Tulp," a serious

The Gallery of the Louvre contains no less than seventeen pictures by Rembrandt; amongst others, four portraits of himself, admirable for touch and colour, especially that in which he is represented with a chain round his neck, the head bare, and the hair curled; two "Philosophers in Meditation;" "The Household of the Carpenter," a perfect gem; and above all, that expressive sketch of "Tobias and his Family."

PRICES OF THE PICTURES.

The fine pictures of Rembrandt are, with the exception of a very small number, preserved in public galleries, or in the private collections of the rich, from which they never issue. It is therefore very rarely, especially at the present day, that important works by this master are met with at public sales. It is, however, interesting to know the prices of those which have been put up at such sales, as they have varied as much with the works of Rembrandt as with those of other masters.

At the sale of the Chevalier de la Roque, in 1745, directed by an excellent valuer (Gersaint), a very fine and picturesque landscape by Rembrandt, painted on wood, in a frame of carved wood (according to the catalogue), was sold for the small sum of £3 5s.

At the sale of the Duke de Tallard, in 1756, by Remy and Glomy, "A married Jewess, with dishevelled Hair, and a Crown of Flowers upon her Head," size of life, "and painted in that tone of vigorous colour which is so much admired in the works of Rembrandt," was sold for £25.

At the Julienne sale, in 1767, by Julliot, the portrait of Rembrandt's mother, seated, holding a closed book in her lap, dated 1613, fetched £141 10s.

"St. Anne seated in an Arm-chair, the Holy Virgin kneeling, her Hands joined in the Attitude of Prayer," fetched only £75. "The Good Samaritan," the same composition as the print No. 77, of the Gersaint catalogue, was sold for £64 10s. Two busts of women, one full face, and the other three-quarter face; on one of them may be read Rembrandt Van Ryn, 1632, sold at £52.

Sale of La Live de Jully, in 1770, by P. Remy. "A Portrait of a Woman;" size of life, half-length, £77.

At that of Blondel de Gagny, in 1776, by Remy, a picture representing "Mertumnus and Pomona," half-length, size of life, was carried up to £571. Rembrandt's servant-girl, known by the name of the "Sluttish Servant," only fetched £166 10s.

At that of Randon de Boisset (1777), by Julliot, the two pictures which are seen in the Louvre numbered respectively 661 and 662, and described in the catalogue under the title of "The Philosophers in Meditation," were knocked down at £454. The same, at the sale of the Duke de Choiseul, rose to £720.

The "Jesus at Emmaus," which is also in the Louvre, numbered 658, was sold for £420. "The Arquebusiers," a reduction of the "Night Patrol," rose to £293.

At the sale of M. de Calonne, in 1788, two portraits, oval form, one of a man three-quarter length, with a long beard, a black cap, and dressed in a cloak with gold clasps; the other, that of a young woman, also a three-quarter length, her hair dressed with two feathers, were sold at £136.

At the sale of the Duke de Choiseul-Praslin (Paris, 1792), a portrait of a man nearly half-length, the head three-quarters turned, and wearing a moustache, chestnut hair, and large slouched hat, was sold at the price of £208. "The Portrait of a handsome Jewess," nearly full-face, the breast bare, and adorned with a necklace of pearls, £125.

A "Holy Family," the same that may be seen in the Gallery of the Louvre, and which has been placed in the catalogue with the number 663, and the title of "The Carpenter's Household," sold for £885.

"The Adoration of the Kings," a rich composition containing twenty-two figures, was bought at the sale of M. Vincent Donjeux for £268.

At Citizen Robit's sale, 1802, the "Caesar's Penny"—a composition of sixteen figures, the principal twelve of which form a group in the centre of the picture; a richly-dressed figure is seen presenting to Christ the piece of money—fetched £351. Portrait of Rembrandt, in a military costume, called "The Standard-bearer," £124.

At the Chevalier Erard's sale, 1832, the "Portrait of a Man and his Wife," No. 118 of the catalogue, was sold for £184.

The "Portrait of Martin Kappertz Tromp," the Dutch admiral; a three-quarters length, the countenance in half shade, and the left hand resting on a staff; his body is shown to the hips, and is dressed in a doublet with slashed sleeves; a scarf is slung over his shoulders: sold at £684. The portrait of Rembrandt's mother, half-length, almost full-face, wearing a cap of fine cambric, £160.

Heri's sale, 1841: "Bathsheba in the Bath." This picture formed part of Sir Thomas Lawrence's collection. Bathsheba, partly enveloped in linen, accompanied by her two attendants, has just issued from the bath; a magnificent Eastern carpet is at her feet; at her side a silver ewer and a golden vase are placed on a blue cloth; to the left there is another ewer in chased silver; and to the right a peacock is sitting: £315.

Two portraits of Rembrandt were sold in November, 1842, at Amsterdam, to M. Nieuwenhuys, a picture-dealer at Brussels, for upwards of 35,000 florins, with expenses (about £3,000).

At the Paul Perrier sale, 1843, portrait of Rembrandt's mother, £280. "Susannah in the Bath," £254.

The sale of Cardinal Fesch, Rome, 1844. "The Preaching of St. John the Baptist" was sold to the Prince Canino for the sum of £3,175 (14,700 Roman scudi, including sale fees). The prince has relinquished this picture to Lord Ward. "A Portrait of a Man," by the painter in his youth, rose to the sum of £682 10s., and was then knocked down to M. Artaria. A chef-d'œuvre of Rembrandt, "The Portrait of the Widow Lipsius," rose to the sum of £773. M. George, the learned director of the sale of this celebrated collection, purchased it himself. The other pictures of Rembrandt remained at the ordinary prices, owing to No. 193 being worn out and repainted; and two others, Nos. 194 and 195, portraits of Rembrandt and his wife, being executed by his pupils.

At the Durand Ducloux sale, 1847, "Portrait of an Old Man with a white Beard," £288.

Rembrandt painted both upon wood and upon canvas; and his paintings as well as his engravings are usually signed either with his name in full or his initials, of which specimens are subjoined.

ROYAL ACADEMY EXHIBITION.—II.

On a further examination into the Exhibition of the present year, we are still more struck with its general excellence. Seldom has it been our fortune to witness a more sterling year, or one more pregnant with actual accomplishment, as well as of promise for the future. The number of pictures is so large, and those capable of being well studied, from their position, in comparison so few, that the sooner the rooms are altered, or a new gallery raised, the better. The artists surely are now rich enough to do this themselves, the exhibition in a monetary point—if we judge from the crowds who flock thither—paying well.

We now, however, proceed with our notice, reserving what we have to say on this head till a future opportunity.

(No. 180), "Columbus, when a boy, instructed in geography," by T. A. Hart, R. A. Mr. Hart appears to have thought it necessary to give Columbus a most unnaturally-shaped head—probably to prove his claims to genius. There is no composition in this picture, which is as uninteresting as it could well be, and we think Mr. Hart has great cause to complain of the want of judgment of the hanging committee in putting this picture on the line, since there is nothing more disagreeable than to be stared in the face by heads as large as life, in which you can see little else but defects. Another act of flagrant injustice on the part of the committee is to be seen in the Octagon Room, in which they have placed one of the most promising productions in the exhibition; we allude to Mr. D. W. Deane's picture—

(No. 1304), "Van Dyck and Frank Hals." Here is life, expression, colour; certainly, three of the greatest requisites in the production of a fine picture. The surprise of Hals at seeing the effect of his sitter's attempt at portrait-painting, is well expressed, and the enjoyment of the joke expressed in the handsome countenance of Van Dyck is so genuine and natural, that it quite leads the spectator to laugh with him; moreover, the rich brown tone of the whole picture reminds us of one of the old masters, and leads us to expect in future great things of Mr. Deane.

(No. 200), "The Church of Santa Maria della Salute, Venice," D. Roberts, R. A. In saying that this picture is equal to any the artist has produced, we are passing the highest possible encomium on it, in merely stating the truth.

(No. 212), "An Old English Homestead," R. Redgrave, R. A. This is a thoroughly English scene, in which the greenness of the trees and the dewy freshness of the greenward are skilfully rendered; the trees appear to be of a gigantic order as compared with the farm buildings. Mr. Redgrave has most judiciously changed his style, as his landscapes far surpass his figure scenes.

"The Disobedient Prophet," J. Linnell (No. 234), is the grandest landscape in the Exhibition; the conception of the solitary road is poetical, and the foliage of the cedars executed with Mr. Linnell's accustomed skill. There is also—we grieve to say—his usual defect in the heavy lurid sky, which threatens the spectator no less than the prophet.

Mr. F. Stone has retrieved himself this year. His picture (No. 244), "The Mussel-gatherer," has a healthy rustic face of great beauty, glowing with life and innocence. (No. 258), "The Old, Old Story," by the same artist, represents a French peasant girl and boy leaning against the door of a cottage; the girl is listening with a bashful pleasure to the youth, who urges his suit with pertinacity and earnestness. The defect in the piece is that the figures are rather large for the canvas, and the colour, though very agreeable, might have been less florid with advantage.

(No. 314), "First Class—the Meeting," and (No. 361), "Second Class—the Parting," by A. Solomon. Here the Hanging Committee are to blame again in separating so far pictures painted as pendants, neither of which are in fact perfectly complete without the other. The same judicious treatment has been awarded to (Nos. 71 and 210), "Fuentes d'Onor," as we have before noticed. Those we are now criticising tell two simple tales. In the first class there is the meeting for the first time of a young lady and gentleman in a railway carriage. All goes merry as a marriage bell. The stuffed seats and easy motion of the carriage have inclined the guardian of the lady, her old father, to fall asleep, leaving the young lover, who is so smitten with the beauty of the lady, to gaze his fill, "and sigh and wish and gaze again." The story is plain enough. In the "Second Class" it is as plain, but more painful. A widow of a gentleman—it might be the same lady who sits so happily in the other picture—young and beautiful, but full of sorrow, is conveying her son, a midshipman, to Portsmouth, there for the first time to enter the Queen's service. The sad face of the mother gazing on her boy will not soon be forgotten; whilst the bluff honest face of a sailor and his wife, inured to parting, add to the interest of the pictures. The faults, since we must mention them, of these paintings are that they are too literal. Mr. Meson's advertisements and the shirts (six for forty shillings) of European notoriety appearing in one picture, and the varied lights and colours in the other necessarily subtracting from its unity of purpose.

(No. 377), "The Awakening Conscience" is one of, if not the most, extraordinary picture in the academy. A girl, who sits with her seducer, wearing the livery and eating the bread of guilt—one, in fact, who bears the anomalous but expressive title of "mistress"—has, whilst turning over her music-book, fallen upon one of her old home songs. Starting almost from his very embraces, for his arm is round her, she starts out of the canvas right full upon the spectator, with a blank horror which is appalling. The trembling of the lips, the setting of the teeth, and the rising tears, all betoken an internal struggle, rendered the more bitter from the sneering laugh which proceeds from the lolling and vulgar debauchee who has ensnared her. Two mystical passages from the Bible, introduced on the frame of the picture, alone give the reader of this sad tale a hope that the victim will yet break through her toils. Nothing can be greater than the mad displayed in this picture. Some of the details are very finely painted; some, it appears to us, as badly as can be.

The other picture, by Mr. Hunt (No. 508), "The Light of the World," has been so prominently brought before the public by a somewhat egotistical letter in the Times, by the great high-priest of the Pre-Raphaelite brethren, Mr. Ruskin, that we could not, even were we inclined, pass over it. It is a fine but peculiar and excessively symbolical picture. Our Saviour, represented by a tall and emaciated figure, with a most expressive and sorrowful countenance, in which pity is predominant, stands at a door typical of the human heart, and knocks for admission. In his hand he holds a lantern of antique shape; and in the strange twilight, and beneath the trees of an orchard bared by the autumnal blast, he waits for admission. Again he knocks, listens, and again knocks. The heart may revel within whilst the steady light falls upon the pure dew, the ripe fallen fruit, and the orchard grass, and the steady glow of the glow-worm burns without a twinkle, mystical and pure. Years of patient thought and quiet, yearning love—love not less intense because aware of the sinfulness of the beloved object—are painted in the look of the Saviour. Those who see beyond the surface will see all this; those who look only at a picture as a picture will think it a painful and dull affair. It is not by any means a Protestant composition, unless we class the Puritans and Oratorians with us; it is pre-eminently Catholic, and somewhat Byzantine in execution, fit only to be hung in some of those little chapels which are to be found in the side aisles of continental cathedrals, where conscience-stricken devotees might find a solace in the patient face, and burn their tapers whilst they prayed beneath it. Mr. Ruskin's exposition of the picture was clever and certainly full of mind; but we must say that his stricture, if applied to the ordinary mass of those who flock to the Academy merely as sight-seers, was ill-judged, since it is useless to and if to those who look at pictures as pictures should be looked at, it was unjust. "The Light of the World" must, in our opinion, be looked at as another instance of great excellence amongst the Præ-Raphaelites.

(No. 379), "The Marriage of Strongbow and the Princess Eva," by Maclise, attracts perhaps as many earnest admirers as any. It is the largest and most populous picture we have seen for some time upon the walls. It is carefully painted, full of excellent drawing, finely finished accessories, and brilliant costume. It represents Strongbow claiming the hand of his youthful bride upon a battle-field, the foreground of the picture being filled with the wounded, mourners, and searchers for the dead. Yet, notwithstanding all its merit—shall we not rather say, because of its meritorious carefulness us. With Hamlet, or with a scene from the life of Cromwell, or even Louis XVI., the event would have been different.

The last pictures which we shall notice in this room are (No. 403), "The Last Sleep of Argyle before his Execution, A.D. 1685," by E. M. Ward, forming the second of a series of eight pictures painted for the House of Commons, by order of the Royal Commission, and (No. 400), "Cupid Captive," by G. Patten, A. The first is already familiar, most probably, even to our country readers, from the engraving of it in the Illustrated London News. It represents the old Puritan lord calmly sleeping his last mortal sleep in this world, with his hand resting on a Bible, and with fetters upon his limbs. An enemy, one of the recreant lords of the council, has come

THE RETURN OF THE PRODIGAL SON.—FROM A PAINTING BY REMBRANDT.

—it is, to use the language of a contemporary, "loud." The amount of labour expended, the canvas, the expense gone to by the artist for costumes and models, must be all enormous, and the production is a fine one. The question therefore remains, Does the painting before us repay the labour, anxiety, expense, and genius expended on it? does it call up any grand emotions, or realise anything but a theatrical scene? Our answer must be in the negative. As a work of art it is meritorious; as a work of taste, or an historical composition, it is a failure. The scene is too remote, the personages too unknown, to give interest to the contorted or quiescent groups before us, nor has the painter been enabled to vivify them. The picture fails to interest, it only disturbs to look upon him, and starts back awed at the calm majesty of Argyle. Mr. Ward last year exhibited the companion picture to this scene, "The Execution of Montrose;" and now, with a wide philosophy, to show that on both sides, in civil and religious struggles, good men fall, he gives us "The Last Sleep of Argyle." Let us hope that the lesson will not be lost upon those of her Majesty's subjects for whose corridor the picture is painted, and that they will seek to imitate the fiery earnestness of Montrose and the deep religious fervour of Argyle. The colouring of the picture is perhaps too deeply sombre, and wants relief. "Cupid Captive," by Patten, is a graceful picture from the pencil of one who once promised highly, but who has not yet redeemed that promise.

PAUL POTTER.

THE celebrated Abbé de Lammenais, recently dead, and whose death exhibits the bigotry of the irreligious classes of France in a strong light—they having prevented him even from seeing a minister of religion—sometimes wrote shrewd things on art, as he did on most other topics. He was a man of reflective and expressive mind, and grasped all such subjects with a vigour which is ever the characteristic of genius. "Certain Dutch painters," he says, "have given to nature an undefinable language, a language which touches, which moves the heart; which leads it to reverie, and draws it gently on into infinite space. Can you tell me by what mysterious magic they keep us for ever in wrapt contemplation in presence of what is most common and ordinary in nature? There is a prairie, with a stream and some old willows; a valley, crossed by a torrent swollen by the storm, the remains of which may be seen in the heated glow of the western sky, along the edge of which it vanishes and flies; upon a desert shore, a hut at the foot of a naked rock, the sea beyond, a tossing sea, and in the distance a sail, which falls down almost on the wave by the effect of the storm. If we reflect, however, we may see that it is the thought of the artist, his intimate and private life which is communicated to us, which absorbs us. It is art that carries us away on its mighty wings to regions loftier than the senses can reach. Do you not discern beneath the exterior form in the animals of Paul Potter, a kind of life which belongs to each of them, a manifestation of their nature, essential and typical? The manner, the position, the look, all speak in them."*

"A hundred years ago," observes a recent French critic, "such an appreciation would scarcely have been comprehended, and such ideas would have presented themselves to no man. Amateurs only saw in Paul Potter a faithful copyist of nature, a painter truthful unto naveté—to use a charming French word—and skilful in rendering that which he had carefully observed. It was reserved for our age, imbued so strongly with pantheism, to discover in the paintings of the Dutch masters that delicacy of sentiment which may be discovered in the smallest of their productions, and to find in the landscapes of Ruysdael, as in the animals of Paul Potter, something of a vague enchantment, which we may denominate by the name of poetry. All that has received the great gift of life, and is warmed in our sun, and breathes our air, has a right to interest us. But between interior natures and our own there must be an interpreter, a simple man, who approaches secondary beings by his naveté, and rises above his equals by his genius. A poet, a painter, living in the midst of this obscure world, must penetrate its unknown idioms, to translate them into the noble language of the mind, or better, into the language of the heart, to render them clear to us by colouring and pencil. Bernardin de St. Pierre must reveal unto us the secret harmonies of nature, Ruysdael must move us by the spectacle of a stormy sky and the shivering of great trees shaken by the wind, and Paul Potter must make us hear the complaint of the lamb and the lowing of the cattle. And the strange and surprising thing is, that this nature, which has spoken to us, which has been manifested by the representations of certain chosen men, teaches us to know their genius. It has become the expression of their sentiment, and by this means reaches our souls."

It appears to us, that Lammenais and his commentator, like very many critics on art, make a great deal more of the intentions of artists than ever the artists intended themselves. A cattle painter, certainly, never ought to introduce any other poetry into his humble landscape than that real poetry which exists in every representation of the verdant fields, the leafy forest, and the animals which give them life. Much astonished would some of the great artists be, if they were favoured with an opportunity of perusing the criticism of modern times.

That there is poetry in a cow, by Paul Potter, we readily agree; but it is the poetry that is found in every representation of fine animals in the open fields, quietly and calmly feeding beneath the balmy warm light of the sun, and not that far-fetched and fanciful poetry, "the inner life of the painter," who, when limning a cow, expounds his own character, just as Shakspeare, in his plays, is said by some to reveal himself and his individuality to us—Shakspeare, who is at times an Iago, an Othello, a Hamlet, a Richard III., and a Jack Falstaff.

Paul Potter, Descamps informs us, descended from the house of Egmond on his grandmother's side. His grandfather was receiver of Upper and Lower Swaluwe. His ancestors had filled with honour most of the high offices in the city of Enkuisen, where he was born in 1625, the son of Peter Potter, a mediocre artist, who soon after went to Amsterdam to acquire there the right of citizenship. Young Potter had never any other master than his father, whom he immediately surpassed as soon as he had learnt the first rudiments of his art. "He was," says Descamps, "a prodigy, of which there is, perhaps, no preceding example; he was at fourteen a skilful master. His works at that age figure amongst those of the greatest men."

After executing numerous studies at Amsterdam from the fine pictures which adorned that town even in that day, Paul Potter left his father, probably with a view to be more free to form himself; and he went and settled at the Hague, where chance made him a lodger near Nicolas Balkenende, who had a great reputation in that town.

Paul Potter was very young, and, it is said, that at that age he was very handsome. Be this as it may, he was very studious—but not so studious as to neglect remarking that in the same house with himself lived a young lady of great beauty. She was a young, merry, laughing creature, whom Paul sometimes met upon the stairs, and who, blushing, made way for him. Paul was so struck by her charms that he even painted her face and made it a continual study, without, however, neglecting his favourite animals. At first, Paul Potter was ignorant of the young lady's name, and remained so for some time. He at last, however, inquired, and found that she was the daughter of the comparatively wealthy architect, Nicolas Balkenende.

This startled him at first; and he accordingly determined to make himself as agreeable as possible to the young lady herself. He had not much difficulty in doing this, and found her as pleasant as she was handsome. Having for some time continued his addresses to her, he boldly ventured on a visit to the father.

"And pray, sir," said Nicolas Balkenende, "what may you be?"

"I am an animal painter," replied Paul Potter, proudly.

"I shall not allow my daughter to marry an animal painter," continued the purse-proud architect.

Paul Potter protested, but his neighbour would not listen to him, and the young man retired considerably damped in his hopes. The young girl, however, secretly gave him every encouragement. The Dutch Vitruvius, as Descamps calls him, endeavoured to check their intimacy, but in vain. The loving artist would not be kept down. He persevered in his art, and was soon encouraged by rich amateurs and connoisseurs, who appreciated his merit and began to buy his modest animals. The Dutch Vitruvius soon began to find that an architect, even of his rank, ought to be very glad to have such a son-in-law. He, accordingly, frankly owned his error, and repaired it with a good grace, by giving his daughter, Adrienne Balkenende, to Paul Potter. Paul was then twenty-five years old. He had scarcely married, when he established himself with his wife in a fine house, which soon became, as it were, the Academy of the Hague. The principal personages of Holland, foreign ministers, Maurice, Prince of Orange, the learned men and wits of the time, made it a rendezvous. Paul Potter attracted them to his workshop by his mind, his amiable character, and the charms of his conversation. Thus surrounded and well received in the world, the painter contributed at the same time to the reputation and fortune of his father-in-law, and thus nobly avenged the affronts he had put upon his love.

For an earnest lover of animal painting, there can be no country more favourable to the true study of this subject than Holland. It is fertile in rich models—to use an artistic expression—in picturesque models. The humidity and dampness of the soil makes it an immense prairie of a soft green, where numerous flocks wander about, with their gaudy colours, the robes spotted in contrasted and harmonious tones. Nowhere else are the colours of bulls and cows more varied and brilliant. If it be true, as Bernardin de St. Pierre says, that nature everywhere makes the animals which fill the background in strong contrast to surrounding nature, it is above all true in Holland. A monotonous country, crowned by a sky almost always gray and sad, the country of Paul Potter, charms and delights the eye by the vivacity and richness of tones remarked in the hair of the flocks. It seems that nature has kindly granted this compensation to the inhabitants of a country without light, without change, and without relief. What is certain is, that we have been much struck, during our journeys in Holland, with the spots which are found on the horned animals of that country. Now upon a gray ground are to be seen clear open-work mixed with red spots; sometimes light spots, which serve as a transition between the spots of fire, which are drawn upon a white ground, brought up here and there by some milk-white stains, that look like torn fragments of cloud. Often an animal, whose tones are discordant in themselves, plays its part in the harmony of a group; and while a black bull stands out the chief object in bold relief, the whole flock of varied hue creates the picture.

There are but two countries where, properly speaking, cattle painters could arise and take a commanding position, as we have had several occasions to remark; and these are Holland and England.

Paul Potter had nothing to do but to stroll about the neighbourhood of the Hague to find models; and the first he met with were sure to appear the finest, so that he could copy them in all their native simplicity, in the natural attitude of repose, or even in their sleep. Every phase of their existence created a group for the artist. Ardent in study, he never went out without taking with him a note-book with numerous spare leaves, on which he drew sketches of all that struck his imagination—a tree, a plant, a wooden fence, a quickset hedge, or a shepherd. As for animals, he always drew them with the most scrupulous care, in every imaginable attitude, from the most simple profile to the most difficult specimen of foreshortening. Though not so fond of motion as Berghem, he loved to draw cows three-fourths of their length, to diversify their lines by the projection of the bones; and he was always delighted to place in contrast the most tranquil outlines of an ox lying down to those square forms, infinitely picturesque in their variety, which are furnished by the concavity of the flanks and the bony construction of the hind quarters. He was also very clever in mingling sheep and goats with ruminating animals, so as to obtain a whole of agreeable lines, always allowing some cow with black stripes to take up the prominent place, or some motionless bull that raised its huge horns over the flock, like the solemn but somewhat stupid king of the pasture. He was indeed remarkable for the intelligent attention, the patience, and the love, he brought to bear upon the least details of his picture. He loved to show the contrast between the rough parts and the even parts of the skin; not a shade or tint, however fine, ever escaped him; he studied in every animal the bending of the horns, that peculiar motion of the eyebrows on which depends the air of hardness or softness, the character of the ears, the movement of the hair which stands on end in tufts, and, in fine, the muddled clumps of hair, without forgetting the extremities, which were never drawn and painted with more precision or more correctness than by Paul Potter.

These admirable studies of which we speak, these outlines—or, to speak more correctly, these finished drawings, both in outline and filling up—were taken home by the artist, as the materials for his compositions; and in general his conceptions of these were so simple, that it was sufficient to add to them a background to change a study into a picture. Having returned home, he continued his work without ceasing. He placed upon the marked foreground of his composition large plants, which he had studied from nature; he finished his production with an old trunk of a willow, knotted, gnarled, and jagged, which he copied from his portfolio on to his canvas; and he gave as a background to his group a little house, faithfully copied, with its wild lizards and the smoke of its roof. It was thus that were finished in the studio, full of visitors and quite noisy with conversation, so many charming works, which for two hundred years have been the honour of the most illustrious galleries, the joy of amateurs who have possessed them or who have seen them, the reputation of the engravers who have engraved them, and the fortune of the picture-dealers who have bought them, to re-sell them to the noblemen of England, who have placed them beside the Ostades, the Metzus, the Cuyps, and the Rembrandts, to wander no more.

Perhaps nowhere else can be found such rich specimens of the art of the world as are to be found in the galleries of this country, where private individuals make up for the parsimony and niggardliness of the government.

It has often been a matter of surprise that an artist, whose works show us the character of a calm, thoughtful, homely man, could have worked amid men of the world, learned men, ambassadors, and princes, and this without ever departing from his precision, without ever giving up that tranquillity of soul which is breathed in all his pastorals. But when one has carefully studied the nature of true artists, one understands this seeming contradiction, and one can reconcile the fact that a being, melancholy in solitude, should be the gayest of men as soon as he is surrounded by sympathetic friends, and thus stimulated to expansion of his soul. Paul Potter was one of those mobile temperaments. His speech was fluent, and kept on a par and a level with any of those around him. He was even known to join with considerable energy in those somewhat rough jokes which are regarded as the jokes of the studio. If it must be allowed that he was not always in good taste in his jokes, it must be remembered that light wit and a keen epigrammatic style are not exactly the characteristics of the country where he lived. An anecdote is told of him, which we must relate with caution, but which is too much a part of his history to be forgotten wholly.

The Princess Dowager Emilia, Countess of Zolms, ordered of him a picture, to go over a chimney in the apartments of the old court.* Paul Potter wished to surpass himself. He painted a smiling landscape with cattle, but with one very objectionable feature in it. A courtier, who was indeed a model courtier for those days, very properly objected, that it was neither decent nor proper that this picture should be admitted into a lady's chamber. The criticism was accepted as decisive. The picture was quietly and politely got rid of.

This criticism and this decision was but a convincing proof, that art is not the imitation of nature taken at random and in the fact. The work of the painter should indeed be the mirror of creation, but an intelligent mirror, which should be ever pleasing and unobjectionable in its ugliness, and never ugly in its beauty. The nauf Paul Potter took away his picture, but the anecdote made a noise, and amateurs disputed for the picture for its weight in gold. The "Cow" was celebrated, and it passed into the finest cabinets of the Low Countries. It was long preserved by the family of Mussart, alderman of the city of Amsterdam, and fell at last into the hands of Van Biesum, who sold it for two thousand florins, or £120, to the Sieur Van Hock. This curious collector, Houbraken informs us, placed the "Cow" in his cabinet, opposite a celebrated picture of Gerard Douw, which had somewhat of a similar reputation. It may be amusing to follow its history. The masterpiece, rejected, and very properly rejected, by the princess Emilia, is now in the Hermitage at St. Petersburg, after having passed through the collection of Josephine at Malmaison, where it was bought by the Emperor Alexander in 1815. The picture is valued at £10,000, in the collection of this gallery, composed of about thirty of the most remarkable masterpieces in the world.

In the neighbourhood of the Hague is a pretty wood, which almost touches the town by the northern gate. The Prince of Orange had a little palace there, called the Wooden House. In 1574, Philippe II. was so struck by the beauty of this wood, that he commanded his officers not to destroy it; and among the things which did not give him mere personal enjoyment, this is, perhaps, the only one of which this fanatical destroyer of the human race and his own family ever ordered the preservation. Louis XIV., who was a great and ponderous imitator of other men's actions, having somewhere read a high eulogium on this act of clemency, desired also to leave behind him a monument of his tenderness of soul; and during an invasion, which cost him the lives of 10,000 men, he spared the Mall of Utrecht. The wood of the Hague was one of the favourite walks of Paul Potter. He made it the subject-matter of many of his pictures, and especially of one of his most celebrated ones, which was sold for 27,000 livres, a little more than a thousand pounds, at the sale of the Duc de Choiseul. At the entrance you see a great pack of dogs led by huntsmen, and ready for the chase; behind the trees four horsemen, and some cows, which a herdsman drives before him.

The "View of the Wood of the Hague" is a perfect landscape, that is, the figures are not of such importance as they are elsewhere, if we compare them with the great trees beneath which they pass. Certain men of his day said very freely, that landscape was the weak point of Paul Potter, that his background was monotonous, and those who envied his talents and his genius tried thus to depreciate him. This reproach, however, addressed to an animal painter, was wanting in correctness. Doubtless, Paul Potter had not the fire, the wit, the imagination of Berghem. He knew not how, as that painter did, to throw capriciously over a landscape, where lay rustic ruins, little flakes of light; but he is more nauf, more true and really Dutch. Brought up in the humid and flat country, which he never left, Paul Potter has not borrowed from the sky of Italy the warm rays which often animate the noble country scenes of Berghem. He never saw anything but the gray and heavy sky of Holland, the horizon of flat plains extending far out of sight, and the line of which is only broken here and there by the summits of steeples; and that low horizon, that pale sky, he has reproduced faithfully, without any addition of his own, without any endeavour to make them striking by embellishment or addition. And nothing suited him better than such scenery. His heavy sky is a background every way suited to show the fleeces and the spotted skins of the animals which occupy a front place in his composition, as in his artistic love. With the tact of a master who fears to divide the interest, and who perfectly understands the power of unity, Paul Potter takes care not to add to the value of the landscape; he makes it, in fact, as tranquil as possible; he lulls one to rest beneath a fleecy vapour, and is satisfied for the foreground of his picture with a thistle, a dead branch, or some common plants of the fields. With Berghem, the landscape has motion, it shines, it moves parallel with the animals which fill it; with Paul Potter the country is a secondary consideration, and the general appearance of nature is sacrificed to the grace of the flock. See the "Bull" in the Museum of the Hague (p. 106).

We must not, however, be understood to imply that the sun is always absent from the pictures of Paul Potter, nor that he utterly annuls the background to give all the relief desirable to his principal subject of attraction—the sheep and oxen. We mean only to convey the idea that he, in general, selects bulls, or the curly wool of his sheep, and lustrous hair of his bounding goats.

Who does not feel that Paul Potter must have been an amiable and gentle man? "When one knew him thoroughly," says Argenville, "it was difficult to leave him." And yet, this painter of the quiet of the fields could not obtain domestic peace. "His wife, who had an unfortunate penchant for gallantry, was quite delighted with the crowd of visitors who frequented the studio of Paul Potter. She found among these visitors many an admirer. The artist, deeply occupied with his art, saw them with a tranquil eye, and she did not even attempt to save appearances. But one day, coming suddenly upon her, when listening with eager ear to the protestations of a tender lover, he grew furious, and taking them by surprise, cast round them a net-work which served to keep the flies off his horse, and tied them in with a strong cord. Then wishing to imitate the husband of Venus fully, a certain hour of the day, not an arbitrary hour, for Paul Potter never gave way to mere fancy, but precisely the hour when the sun is to be seen in his country. In Holland the sun, in general, remains covered with clouds the whole day; it seems, as it were, only to rise about four o'clock in the afternoon, and then it enlivens the fields and meadows until the setting of the sun. At that hour, the light coming from the horizon gives a rosy tint to the country, enlivening all it meets, showing up all the rich colours of the animals, and detaching all objects by their lengthened shadows. But the upper part of the sky is at this time quiet and gray, and unless there is some cloud which catches the light, the background remains sufficiently tranquil to bring out the foreground plans. This is the hour of the day which Paul Potter has chosen to paint. But for fear the sky should spoil the effect and draw off attention from the animals, he paints it softly and even in the cottony style, rather than at all diminish the importance of the coloured robe of his

he called all his friends in—now quite satisfied that among them were many other rivals for his wife's affection—and showed the blushing and furious couple thus tied; thus avenging himself for his wife's and his pretended friend's treachery. The rivals of the unfortunate individual thus captured, went away. The house of the painter became less noisy; his wife, confused and sorrowful, begged his pardon. Potter thought: her sufficiently punished, and forgave her."

Still, after a misadventure of this kind, it was difficult to remain in a town where it had made much noise, and had formed the general topic of conversation for some time. It was in 1652. Paul Potter then quitted the Hague, and went back to Amsterdam, where his family resided. He had been, moreover, invited there by the burgomaster, Tulp, who was one of his friends, and who gave a high price for his pictures. The greater number of the works of Paul Potter became the property of this rich amateur.

The town of Amsterdam was then inhabited by severa eminent artists. There can be little doubt that the examination of their great works filled our painter with the spirit of emulation. It is certain that from this moment Paul Potter endeavoured to enlarge his tone, to increase his proportions, and to elevate his charming pastorals to the dignity of historic pages. It was an error—a very great error. Animals the size of life in a picture fail to interest us; they cannot do so, because then they actually enter into competition with nature, which will not bear this kind of comparison. To render such colossal proportions tolerable with the subject, the charm of which consists in the truth of the character, of which the poetry is domestic and naïve, nothing less than the genius of Rembrandt would be required. There would be need of a kind of fantastic audacity, a strange light, and the interest of some unexpected drama. Unless with such additional arts as these, what illusion can there be about cows as large as life, with horns which touch the framework? In the presence of this enormous reality, the mind refuses to give way to the feeling of imagination, and cannot recall the idea of the country, and feed contemplatively on the beauties and glories of nature. Taste has laws which may be disputed, despite proverbs to the contrary; and yet, though they are unwritten, they are not less rigorous. Reason tells us that we must apportion the means to the end. If we cannot charm the spectator by showing him a little corner of sky about three inches square, three square yards will not enable us to take a hold of his mind.

Moreover, while forgetting these imperious rules, Paul Potter has not succeeded in making himself an excuse by the general success of his attempt; and here is the principal error. The great picture which is shown at the Hague as a marvel, and which represents a bull, with a cow lying down, a lamb, and a herdsman, all the size of life, does not come up to the immense celebrity which has been given to it by books of art, guide-books, and the hurried criticisms of picture-dealers and enthusiastic amateurs. The touch is fine, no doubt; the animals are truthful in the extreme; but the whole wants warmth, interest, and charm. The eye is shocked by the unexpected dimensions, and the precise manner of Paul Potter, so admirable in his smaller productions, is here unsatisfactory and cold. We want a broader brush, with more energy and fire, and some of the great chiaroscuro effects, by means of which Cuypp and Rembrandt would have saved the reputation of such a picture. These remarks apply still more to the great "Bear Hunt" of the Museum of Amsterdam, which is certainly the weakest of all the pictures by this master. Ruysdael knew how to express, within the limits of a small picture, the profundity of the infinite.

"These animals, of gigantic proportions," says Thoré, "were made by Albert Cuypp much more gigantic within the space of a foot square. Mathematical proportion does not necessarily decide size. The smallest figure of Michael Angelo is grander than the huge figures of certain artists. Benvenuto Cellini carved on the pommel of a sword, combats which were worth six miles of battle scenes to be found at Versailles, while the elephant of the Bastille was petty alongside the elephants carved on a ring in the time of the conquests of Alexander."

If, however, Paul Potter failed to elevate his talent to a level with the huge canvas on which he painted his humble models; on the other hand, what energy, what sentiment, what perfection is there in his smaller pictures, the dimensions of which, better suited to the simplicity of the subject, allowed him to display to advantage the perfection of his pencil, and even the softness and poetry of his heart. There is no one who has examined these productions of Paul Potter, during the two hundred years which have elapsed since he painted the portraits of the animals that serve man, without, at the very first glance of the eye, admiring the startling truth, the good humour, the happy light of his pictures, so softened and so gentle.

The soul of the painter was, as it were, presented in these peaceful compositions quite as much as have been the minds of others who have painted heroes. "I recollect, when I was at college," says an eminent French critic, "I spent a whole day in visiting the portfolio of a rich amateur of engravings, who amongst other ancient productions, showed me some superb works by Paul Potter. I knew not even the name of this celebrated artist, and certainly I had no idea of what was meant by copper-plate, just proof, proof before letters, and so on. But glancing over the horses, I was much struck by the beautiful engraving known as the 'Friesland Horse.' It represents a powerful horse during a storm, on a vast prairie. In the distance, under the horse's feet, may be seen a village, and some trees bent by the wind, their black outline relieved on a dark sky. I know not why, but the sight of this horse, abandoned and alone, caused me profound emotion. I thought I then felt that nature had within it a hidden poetry, a mysterious essence, which at certain moments reveals itself to elevated minds, to predestined artists; that for them this moral essence is infused even into the breath of the air, and that there is the secret of that inexpressible charm which they knew how to give to the painting of the herbs of the field, as well as to the mute and sad attitude of the resigned animal."

A modern writer has said of the animals of Paul Potter: "Others have painted cows, oxen, well-drawn sheep, all well-coloured and painted. He, alone, has seized their expression, the physiognomy of their in er existence, of their instinct. We admire the flocks and herds of Berghem, of Van der Velde, of Karel Dujardin; we are touched by those of Paul Potter."

Even if we were to regard the paintings of the Dutch painter purely from a picturesque point of view, he would nevertheless take rank amongst the first artists of his country. And, placing him within the limits of his special subject, we may say that Paul Potter is truly and unaffectedly the master. Truly, no one has succeeded more than he has—scarcely as much. Not only does he thoroughly know his animals, their anatomy, their habits, their character; but no one has so carefully observed the gait which this character gives them, the movement or the posture which betrays either agitation or calmness in them. Never was there seen a more robust and simple way of showing the construction of his great oxen, or of his draught horses. And in no case is the triumph of the whole, of the mass, obtained at the expense of delicacy of detail. With the exception of the sky, which flies away gently to the horizon, dim and somewhat gloomy, nothing is sacrificed which may keep the flagging attention alive. The hair is collected and divided on the forehead of the cow, it is rounded where the horns arise, it is smooth on the ribs and ends in unequal tufts. It stands up on the shoulder, it is crisp as horsehair on the back-bone; it stands up again wherever the animal has licked it, or where he has rubbed himself against a tree.

The smallest accidents of the skin are expressed with scrupulous and unerring fidelity. The sheep's wool, the golden fleece of the lamb, are rendered with minute exactness. His pencil forgets not the scum which has stuck to them from crossing a pond, nor the mud which has bespattered them, nor the manure mixed with bits of straw attached to the haunches of the sheep which has been rolling in the yard. The painter is careful to observe the peculiar characteristics which belong to each race, the details of expression and the habits which characterise the individual. It is in this way that Paul Potter was above all the real and genuine animal painter.

If we seek to find out what are the distinctive marks of this master, we must compare him with his rivals—with Berghem, with Van der Velde, Albert Cuypp, and Karel Dujardin. Berghem has more wit and ingenuity, and less nature. Van der Velde has not so much precision as Paul Potter, nor so much energy ; but he has occasionally more grace, and, as an instance, we may mention that his "Sheep with her young nestling in search of food" is inimitable. Albert Cuyp is gifted with superior genius ; he grasps nature in the varied phases of its history ; he is elegant in his luminous portraits and powerful in his landscapes ; he draws elegant horses coming out of the stables of gentlemen, as well as he does the horse that works at the plough ; he colours beautiful skies, paints the rolling of the sea and the ships which move upon it, passes from the hunting rendezvous to the rustic farm, and is, in fact, superior to Paul Potter in the universality of his genius ; but the latter, in his special subject of animals, surpasses his rival in the extraordinary truth and perfection with which he renders his models. Karel Dujardin is so amiable, and so charming, that it is impossible to place him anywhere but in the first line ; and yet, setting aside the rural savour of his golden landscapes, and only studying his successful animals, Karel must also yield the palm to Paul Potter as senting the roughness of the skin of his animals, or when he is painting the minute details of uneven ground. In every other part it is, as it were, embroidered and minute. His skies are flaccid and cottony ; they have none of that rich tone which in Karel Dujardin makes the clouds so real and successful ; none of those open lurid places showing the storm, which Joseph Vernet so admirably rendered. Setting aside these defects, the landscape, considering the distance of the grounds, is dashed off correctly, and the manner of the painting is perfectly appropriate to the subject and the effect desired to be produced.

* Adam Bartsch thus describes this engraving: "A Friesland horse, of a mottled bay colour, seen from the profile, and turning towards the right of the engraving. His mane is divided into three parts and tied together by a knot of ribbon. He is standing in a large field, before a town, which is seen in the distance, and which crosses the whole back of the picture. The sky is gloomy and black. On the right may be read,—Paulus Potter, 1692."

The love of nature is often found in men of delicate temperament, whose bodies are destined to die away before their time. Like Van der Velde, who loved the country so much and who painted animals so well, Paul Potter had within him the germs of premature death. The gradual weakening of his bodily health is attributed to excess of work. He laboured, says his chief historian, night and day. The lamp at mid-his master, because he is more profound, more true, more complete.

There are in nature many objects which can be successfully rendered by mere colour without the assistance of touch—that is to say, without the touch appearing. Great historical subjects, above all, when they are treated in the fresco style, show no trace of the touch. The elevation of the idea here diminishes the importance of the material part of art, and the coquetries and niceties of the profession. But it is not the same in fancy subjects, in which are presented animals, vegetables, terraces. These cannot do without visible touches, any more than metals or other shining bodies, on the clear parts. Not only is the touch necessary to express the character of these different objects, as well as to convey the sentiment of pride, of delicacy, or love, which animates painting, but because it is required to interest the eye more in proportion as the mind is less appealed to. It is for this reason that in Holland touch has always been held in such high esteem. That of Paul Potter is firm and decided, when he is representing the roughness of the skin of his animals, or when he is painting the minute details of uneven ground. In every other part it is, as it were, embroidered and minute. His skies are flaccid and cottony ; they have none of that rich tone which in Karel Dujardin makes the clouds so real and successful ; none of those open lurid places showing the storm, which Joseph Vernet so admirably rendered. Setting aside these defects, the landscape, considering the distance of the grounds, is dashed off correctly, and the manner of the painting is perfectly appropriate to the subject and the effect desired to be produced.

The love of nature is often found in men of delicate temperament, whose bodies are destined to die away before their time. Like Van der Velde, who loved the country so much and who painted animals so well, Paul Potter had within him the germs of premature death. The gradual weakening of his bodily health is attributed to excess of work. He laboured, says his chief historian, night and day. The lamp at midnight found him still painting. In the long winter evenings he would employ himself in engraving the studies which he had made for his painting, and he never went out without his pencil and his note-book. But this continual application, for which he was gently scolded, and which is looked upon as the cause of his death, was but an imperious requirement of his nature. It appears a kind of destiny of some, condemned to a short life. They devour hours to consume the life of several men in one ; and, as if they bore about them the presentiment of their fate, we see them hastening to live, to accomplish their task, and thus make their flame burn to the last. It was so with this great painter, the humble friend of the flocks and herds and fields. Paul Potter died of decline in 1654, not having completed his twenty-ninth year. He was buried in the great chapel of Amsterdam. He left behind him a little girl, three years old, and the wife he had so much loved that he even pardoned her levity.

Two centuries this very year have passed since his death, and the pictures of Paul Potter increase in price day by day.

Amateurs and connoisseurs also seek for his beautiful engravings, which have become very rare; indeed, so rare are they, that many are glad even to obtain the copies from them by the Chevalier de Claussin. But when speaking on this subject, we cannot do better than quote the most learned of critics. Adam Bartsch says: "Paul Potter engraved eighteen subjects, which are the delight of connoisseurs. When we recollect that he was only eighteen when he engraved 'The Cow-keeper,' and nineteen when he engraved and his horses with little short dashes which he seldom lengthened, except when he wished to make large deep shadows, and he rendered the streaks of the hair in a most admirable manner. The work of his engraver's point is neat and close, so that we can scarcely recognise the burin with which he went over it in some places. The little backgrounds in his collections of animals are executed with lightness and delicacy, and the plants in front of the engraving No. 11, as well as the 'Zubacain,' No. 18, show a practice in the

PASTURAGE.—FROM A PAINTING BY POTTER.

'The Shepherd,' we are astonished at the extraordinary genius of this master, and we can scarcely comprehend how at this age he could have produced works which would be the glory of the most ingenious artist, of the most consummate master in the practice of his art. Perfect correctness in the drawing, striking truth in the character of the animals, remarkable intelligence in the composition, happy effect in the chiaroscuro, combined with a sure and soft point, all unite in his productions to raise him to a level with the authors of the greatest masterpieces. Potter engraved the skin of his art of engraving such as is rarely met with in engravings by painters."

Though he has only engraved oxen, cows, horses, and some few sheep, Paul Potter studied and drew almost every kind of quadruped; those, at all events, which belong to the domain of art, and which do not interest the naturalist alone. The work of his contemporary, Marc de Bye, who was a pupil of Jacques van der Does, contains no less than sixty-one pieces engraved after Paul Potter. There are scenes of lions, of wolves, followed by packs of hounds, pigs, she-goats, and he-goats. From the eighteen engravings from the hand of our excellent painter, one of the handsomest and one of the rarest is that which bears the name of "Zubacina." It is a great tree which fills the forests of Brazil. We see a superb branch of it covered with leaves and fruits projecting from the lower part of the trunk, and reaching to the very summit of the picture. At the foot of this tree, engraved with the finest and most intelligent of points, is a monkey sitting on the ground, holding in his fore paws a fruit of the same tree, like a nut. This monkey was the subject of a serious discussion among certain celebrated naturalists in France, during the last century. Marggrave gave a woodcut of it from the engraving of Potter, and called it the equina of Congo; but Buffon combatted this opinion and that of Linnæus, who called it Diana, and decided that the monkey of Paul Potter was the common Brazilian sapajo.

It may be readily imagined, familiar as most persons are with the impulses which generally guide fervent amateurs—these impulses being not always purely artistic—how severe have occasionally been the struggles to possess an engraving which had the honour of such a dispute.

It is when examining such works as the eighteen precious engravings of Paul Potter, that we recognise in the engraving all the merits of the artist: his profound knowledge, his love for truth and exactness, his search for truth of outline, his naïf character, his sentiment, and his tenderness of soul. How clearly is every shade distinguished! How admirably he renders all the differences of construction which exist in animals of the same race, as, for example, between the bull and the cow! The latter has in general a long face, an open forehead, and soft brows over the eyes; the bull, on the other hand, has a fierce and savage look, a short head, the neck tremendous in its thickness and convexity, thickset, heavy, the shoulders falling away, and the hind-quarters rather light. A treatise on anatomy would scarcely give you more information on these subjects than do the engravings of this master. As for horses, no one ever painted them better than he did. We do not here allude to those prancing steeds introduced by Wouvermans into his hunting halts, nor to the fierce Andalusian steeds which carry the heroes of Vandyck, nor to the heavy coursers which are found on the canvases of Lebrun and Van der Meulen, as in the carousals and festivities of Louis XIV., nor to that light, lean, and bounding horse of which Carlé Vernet was the excellent painter. The model which Paul Potter adopted was the working horse—the useful, patient, and robust horse—which has been so admirably understood by Géricault, to say nothing of living familiar artists.

There is a difference, however, between these two artists. One painted the horse of the town, vigorously drawing the heavy cart, or the loaded diligence. Paul Potter preferred to study the horse of the fields, the peaceful companion of rustic families, the animal that draws loads of hay to the grange, which takes the farmer's son to the haulet, which in the evening, harnessed with fatigue, fraternises with his comrade at the trough, and is satisfied with the bundle of straw and the pail of water which a serving-man brings him.

We have given an admirable and delicious specimen of this in the "Horses at the Trough" (p. 104). A man must have never felt the pleasure of country places, have never breathed the odour of the country, not to feel the charm of so simple a picture, so Dutch, with its humid sky, and not to guess every detail of it, and the feelings of the painter who produced it.

The latest of his engravings date from 1652. He was approaching his end, and he seemed almost conscious of what was coming, for his last works appear to bear the evidence of a sad and melancholy inspiration. There was even a dramatic reality about some of his productions. "I know nothing more touching," says Duménil Michelet, "than the dying horse, which is about to fall near the one that is already dead, and which the dogs are devouring."

The animals of the pen-ant, and the horse of the people, have given to Paul Potter an immortal fame. He has, on the other hand, taken these animals under the protection of his genius. It was never before the good fortune of animals to play the principal part in creations of the painter, and to form of themselves a picture. Since the Renaissance, no one had dared to depart from rule, and give such importance to domestic animals. No one had ever introduced them so holdly into the domain of art. To the Dutch is due the honour of having first given to the inferior race of the world their share of light and human interest. The East had nursed the belief, that animals contained within them sleeping souls, perhaps souls humiliated and for a time captive. Antiquity had given to them the good sense of Æsop, and had ennobled them in the greatest works of sculpture. Virgil sang of the labouring ox, and of the sheep of Gallus. The middle age of Romanism proscribed animals as impure, and in connivance with the evil one. But popular tenderness restored them to a better position, until La Fontaine made them speak and Paul Potter painted them. Recently, an historian,†—a French historian of course—cried out in those phrenzied accents which belong only to his country: "The tree which has seen all time, the bird which has seen every place, have they nothing to teach us? Does not the eagle read the sun, and the owl the darkness. And did those great oxen, so solemn under that tree, never think while they were ruminating?"

Paul Potter engraved, we have said, eighteen engravings.

There are eight of cows and oxen:—

1. "The Bull," signed Paul Potter, 1650.
2. "The Cow standing, near one that is lying down."
3. "The Cow lying down by the Four-barred Gate."
4. "The Cow at Pasture."
5. "The Cow with the Crumpled Horn."
6. "A Cow."
7. "Two Oxen in a Field fighting."
8. "Two Cows," with their backs turned to the foreground.

At the Rigal sale, in 1817, these eight first proofs sold for £9. There are three different proofs of these eight engravings. The first are before the letters, and "Clement de Jonghe" is not on them; you simply read—"P. Potter inv. et excud." The second have the name of Clement de Jonghe, and the words "et excud." after "Potter," are taken out. The last proofs have the name of F. de Wit marked in the corner to the right.

There are several engravings of horses:—

1. (9) "The Horse of Friesland," signed Paul Potter, 1652.
2. (10) "The Horse neighing," same name and date.
3. (11) "The Horse-dealer," same name and date.
4. (12) "The Plough-horses," same name and date.
5. (13) "The Mazette," same name and date.

At the Rigal sale, above alluded to, these five pieces, fine proofs, fetched £14.

14. "The Cowherd." The author engraved this at eighteen. To the left you read—"Paulus Potter in. et fecit a° 1643." There are two proofs of this work. A first proof of this engraving, very rare, fetched at the Rigal sale, £16.

15. "The Shepherd," which Paul Potter engraved at seventeen, is marked 1616.

16. "The Head of a Cow," very beautifully executed.

17. "A Cow lying down near a Tree." A good specimen is worth £8 to £10.

18. "Zubacina." To the left of this engraving the word "Zubacina" may be read, and towards the right, "Paulus Potter fecit, 1650." This piece is very rare, and one of the best of Potter's works. At the Rigal sale it produced £6 10s.

Every museum, every cabinet, has vied one with another to obtain the productions of this great painter, who died at twenty nine.

The Louvre contains two: "Oxen and Sheep in a Prairie," from the Choiseul Gallery; "Two Horses at the Trough."

The Royal and Imperial Gallery of the Belvedere at Vienna only possesses two copies.

The Pinacothek Museum of Munich possesses one: "A Landscape with figures and animals."

Dresden has three: "A Forest," with figures painted by A. Van der Velde.

THE COLOURS OF LANDSCAPES.

MODERN artists are too home-bred to be true painters of beauty. Their Italian scenes are dimmed by the cold clouds of the North; their architecture is not the gleaming marble of Corinth, but the gray old ruin of the northern border. They mix their colours as though nature had no pure tints. Landscape-painters especially should visit the bright places of the world, if they would reflect the rich loveliness of the earth.

and all admirers of art, to consider how much would be gained if less cloud, less shadow, less dun heaviness of tone, were employed as the elements of landscape. Turner excelled most of his contemporaries, not only because his outlines were flowing, his touches graceful, his harmonies complete; but because his blue was real blue, his purple the very purple of kings, his green the tender tint of the untrod den earth. The desert scenes of David Roberts were successful, when he painted the red-yellow of the sand and the rosy blue of the

THE COW BY THE STREAM.—FROM A PAINTING BY POTTER.

But the untravelled public is perhaps to blame in this matter. It scarcely believes that in Tuscany and Egypt skies are so blue that not a speck of vapour is to be seen from zenith to horizon; that the Lybian sunset is a hemisphere of violet, gold, and vermilion; that the grass in Spain is not only as green as emerald, but as vivid. All this knowledge would enrich artists' pictures; for by such experience did Claude gain the power to paint that scenery which is irradiated with an unfading beauty.

It is worth the attention not only of painters, but of critics heavens without shading them down into imitations of the beach and sky at Brighton. When he brings in a cloud, it seems permeated by fire; when he hangs a mist upon the horizon, it is luminous and rich; and if he ever neglected this rule, his composition was less grand and truthful.

It is not enough that the artist should determine to use bright colours. He must not be only brilliant, but brilliant as nature herself is brilliant. A sunset in the desert is not like a sunset on the sea, where the water gives as well as takes tints and hues as transitory as the changes in the sky.

The first light is of a pearly gray, very difficult to represent in painting, from the danger of its appearing cold. Then streaks of saffron and crimson shoot up, which become more delicate as the dawn breaks and faints into rose, into gold, into blue. The verdure of such scenes need not, however, be parched; for the mimosa spreads over the well which feeds its roots a foliage as green as the acacias among our villas, and the young palm is as fresh as the vine, though the leaves turn when the precious golden bunches are hanging under them. The turf, too, is often like our forest-moss, the rice-field like our sprouting corn.

Artists are becoming travellers, and a good many of them are learning these lessons for themselves on the banks of the Nile. They have discovered that it is not enough to study a few months at Florence, or pace up and down the frescoed galleries of Rome. Very much, however, would be gained for their art, if they were to extend their researches further, and visit the rich regions of the East, not to paint Asiatic scenery, but to impress upon their imagination the reality of the brightness and splendour which add such beauty to the creations of art. Perhaps no one has ever visited the Indian Islands with this object, yet no part of the world would afford better studies to the colourist. The moist climate keeps the verdure perpetually of a fresh, vivid green. The water is intensely blue, and bright as light itself; a rose-red glow inflames the mountain-peaks, and wreaths of golden vapour curl up from the summits of volcanic hills. The vegetation is like that of South America, brilliant, gaudy, and with an infinite variety of tints. The birds are in harmony with all this gorgeous ornament, gold, red, azure, with an intense metallic lustre, peculiarly dazzling to the eye. From the boughs hang snakes, green and velvety, or like rolls of coral. The very insects are of superb hues, bronze, green, or silver-winged beetles being abundant in the woods. But the birds are more brilliant than all the rest of the animal creation: the cream-coloured pigeons, the sunbirds, called "atoms of the rainbow," contrasting with the royally-plumaged birds of paradise. The tiger-lily, the scarlet lake-flower, with the bloom of immense trees, add touches to the scenery, as well as to the richly-tinted shells—some, like beautiful tulips, strewing the sea-shore. The rose is of a deeper crimson in the East than it is found in the North or South; and the jessamine is more white, for colours of all kinds are more perfect in Asia than in any other quarter of the world. Even the atmosphere has a peculiar tone. A fine purple haze is often perceived on the water; but on land, in spite of the prevailing moisture, the air is so transparent that objects appear more distinct than they would through a less rarefied medium. These peculiar effects, if they were added to the repertory of the artist's experience, would aid him considerably in giving to his landscapes a colouring at once natural and rich.

Still, the artist need go no further than the warm and glowing South for the true colours of poetical landscape. In the paintings of the best Italian masters an attention to truth, in this respect, is one of the principal qualities commanding our admiration; and in the works of Claude, who, in spirit, was quite a Tuscan, the reflex of nature is found in every tint, from the chilly green water rippling against the pier of a broken bridge, to the burning, rosy gleams of such a sunset as that with which Boccaccio brightens his meadows. And, in moonlight scenes, how do the southern artists excel, with the foam-like scatterings of pearl glistening on the sea; the pale, pure, soft light hallowing the trees and gardens and towers; the clouds with silver edges, or the sky unspotted, but still a dark, deep, hollow dome of purple blue. It is a mistake to mark the stars as points of intense, colourless light, for in warm regions they come into the sky like clusters of gold.

In historical groups how much of character and purpose is displayed in the choice of colours. Rubens, with his coarse conceptions and exaggerated outlines, still surprises us into admiration by his bold and truthful colouring. And Raffaello, who was the poet of painters, used only a few pure hues to express his ideal of beauty. He would not sacrifice fidelity to variety, or taste to meretricious effect. If he put a robe on his Madonnas, it was of vermilion or bright blue; if he draped his virgins, it was in violet or scarlet, not in a fantastic assemblage of contrasting colours. It is true, that in landscapes another rule is observable, and that an infinity of tints may be found in a single spot. But this applies principally to the vegetation. The sky is not generally dark blue in the east, and pale blue in the west; cloudy in the north, and unstained in the south. Grass is usually of one colour, though different fields may vary, but to dissect a picture into plots, sown with wheat, barley, and clover, in their several tints, is to give an agricultural lesson, and not to idealise the living beauty of the earth. In all these matters an eclectic taste will choose, and combine, and harmonise the infinite varieties of nature; and thus the masters of great genius have invariably attended to it. It will be seen, from our observations on the principles of the chief painters of modern times, that they set the highest value on adequate colouring. Rembrandt valued himself on his lights and shades, which are, in fact, mere effects of colour; Correggio cared nothing for a perfect outline unless filled up with true natural tints. It was, he said, the human body without the divine soul. And Michael Angelo, when painting his masterpiece, "The Last Judgment," used simple colours, but colours like those of the earth and the heavens, declaring that there was no grace in a "painted form" unless it was "faithful in complexion." Of course, that noble artist, as well as the other great masters of the South, understood that it was possible to conceive beauty of form without beauty of colour. Did the Italian or the Greek ever think it necessary to paint his statues? Did he ever gild his architecture, or employ on it the pigments which the Egyptian, more gross and material, valued so highly? But in landscape, the form—that is, the outline—is intended to be a deception. It is the secondary object; for the ideas of roundness, dimensions, and distance, can only be conveyed through the means of delusion. But the colouring is real, and ought to be natural. The oak-leaf ought to be like the leaf of the oak in the meadow; the broken arch ought to shine in moonlight, as Tintern really shines; the sky over Naples ought to be as blue as the sky under which the genuine gondoliers are singing. Landscapes, therefore, since they must, if very poetical and rich, be taken in idea from the East or South, should be coloured in a southern or eastern tone; and when artists are bold, they will paint such scenes as the old masters of Italy conceived, and all the world has since admired.

ROYAL ACADEMY EXHIBITION.

THE connexion between poetry and painting is so delicate and yet so strong, that our readers will, we are sure, thank us for introducing to their notice an exquisite sonnet from the Spanish of Lope de Vega, which illustrates, and at the same time is illustrated by, the fine picture of "The Light of the World," by Mr. Holman Hunt, noticed in our last critique. We return to our subject the more readily from the knowledge that the attentive study of one fine work of art will more abundantly instruct the art-student than the casual supervision of a thousand. The reader will also perceive that the religious feeling which we noticed in Mr. Hunt's picture is reflected very strongly in the devotional lines of the Spanish dramatist, wherein is embalmed, as in amber, the image of the patient Saviour, so pictured that we are almost persuaded that Mr. Hunt consulted them before he drew his picture.

TO-MORROW.

Lord, what am I, that with unceasing care,
Thou didst seek after me, that Thou didst wait
Wet with unhealthy dews before my gate,
And pass the gloomy nights of winter there?
Oh, strange delusion! that I did not greet
Thy blest approach, and oh, to heaven how lost,
How oft my guardian angel gently cried,
"Soul, from thy easement look, and thou shalt see How he persists to knock and wait for thee!"

And, oh, how often to that voice of sorrow,

"To-morrow we will open," I replied,

And when the morrow came, I answered still, "To-morrow."

We now proceed with our notice.

(No. 40), "Bragela," by C. Landseer, R.A., represents a scene from "Ossian," painted with great care and finish, without loss of effect; the face of the female is very beautiful, but her feet are too large, the colouring is harmonious and the drawing forcible.

(No. 176) is a clever picture by Mr. H. Wallis, called, "Dr. Johnson at Cave's, the Publisher's." Johnson is seated behind a screen, near a window; a smart impertinent servant girl, who has not long left the parish school, is bringing him a plate of meat. Behind the screen we get a glimpse of the company with whom Johnson is too shabby to associate. The artist has made a mistake in representing Johnson so old; and the picture, though carefully painted, is not quite so harmonious in tone as it might have been.

(No. 216), "The Pet of the Common," J. C. Horsley, is deserving of notice for its truthfulness to nature and its careful finish.

(No. 227), "A Study," A. Egg, R.A.; a very clever bit of costume, but nothing more. (No. 461), "Dame Ursula and Margaret," from "The Fortunes of Nigel," in the West Room, is of more importance. The figure of Margaret is graceful, and the air of weariness with which she turns from the old woman is well expressed; but surely there is time in twelve months for an artist like Mr. Egg to produce something more worthy of his former reputation.

(No. 330), "Chastity," by Mr. Frost, is a picture somewhat departing from his usual style; all the figures are draped. It professes to be a commentary on, rather than an illustration of, the passage of Milton.

"So dear to heaven is saintly Chastity,

That when a soul is found sincerely so,

A thousand liveried angels lackey her."

The figure of Chastity is weak, ill-drawn, and ungraceful, and it is of course the principal figure; the accessories, and especially the groups of angels, are well drawn. The colouring is less exceptional than Mr. Frost usually gives us, but as a whole the picture is far from that which we might expect from this artist's reputation.

(No. 344), "The Children of the Wood," by Sant, is a beautifully painted illustration of a story that never tires. The background is an example of the good effected by the Pre-Raphaelites; it is both beautifully and carefully painted. As a whole this is charming.

(No. 352), "The Song of the Troubadours," by Poole, is a very excellent composition, treated in the very original style of the artist of "Solomon Eagle," which is so well remembered. We cannot award any artist higher praise than we do to Mr. Poole, when we advise every visitor to mark his forcible drawing, his delicate touch, and the perfect originality of his treatment.

(No. 362), "The Chequered Shade," by Messrs. Lee and Sydney Cooper, is another triumph of these two artists, who have for so long a period achieved the foremost position in their art.

The West Room, at which we have arrived, contains many admirable pictures; of these, (No. 420) "Nature's Mirror," by Antony, is one which will attract notice, although the composition is by no means a pleasant one.

"The solitary pool fringed round with reeds" is so adjusted as to be very objectionably placed as regards the line of sight. Otherwise the painting is true and forcible, and not unaccompanied with the quaint rendering of the artist.

(No. 426), "The Countess of Nithsdale petitioning George I. on behalf of her Husband," who was under sentence of death for rebellion, R. Hannah; a very carefully-painted picture, but which almost verges on caricature in the representation of the king. The screwed-up, wrinkled countenance, the awkward, stooping stride, and the manner in which he grasps his sword, remind one more of a frightened clown in a pantomime, than an angry king repulsing a suppliant. Ugly and ungraceful though he might have been, and violently as he treated the countess, dragging her across the ante-chamber on her knees, the artist has evidently mistaken extravagance of gesture for appropriate action. Besides this, there is a total want of relief in the picture. It is impossible to tell where one of the "blue ribbons" (of which the countess speaks, and who are disengaging the king from her grasp) ends, and where the other begins: all is confusion. And it would puzzle any one but this artist to discover in any human countenance the green tints of which he is so fond; otherwise, the picture has many meritorious points. The draperies are all carefully represented, especially the Moire-antique of the countess.

(No. 435), "Fruits," G. Lance. Mr. Lance is not equal to his previous reputation in this specimen of his pencil. The fruit may be as fine as usual, but it is completely overbalanced by a flaring blue sky, and an equally intense parrot. Indeed, Mr. Lance has not only extinguished his fruit by these violent accessories, but also by an unfortunate specimen of humanity in the background, whose pale, sentimental countenance, and costume à la Robens, appear quite out of character with the rest of the picture.

(No. 439), "Scene from Faust," H. O'Neil, finely finished, but by no means a good conception of the characters. Faust is here represented as a middle-aged dandy, whose silken and pointed beard destroys all expression. The flowers and turf borders of the garden are admirably represented. Margaret is hardly young enough, and her position is somewhat fantastical.

(No. 443), "The Entanglement," T. H. Maguire; a specimen of want of taste which is much to be deplored; the more so, as the draperies are represented and finished with a truthfulness we never saw surpassed. The colouring is too florid, harmony in colour not being produced by such violent contrasts, but by a judicious admixture of warm and cold tints.

(No. 447), "Fruit," Miss E. Rumley, is finely and forcibly painted, and true to nature, and may be pronounced the best production of the artist that has yet been exhibited, being more free from the faults of colour than those hitherto before the public.

(No. 455), "The Governess," by Miss Solomon, declines itself by the title. When will people have done bestowing their lackadaisical pity on a class of persons usefully and honourably employed, and as fairly dealt with as any other class? This production is as weak and sentimental as the quotation from "Tupper's Philosophy" which accompanies it.

(No. 490), "The Entrance to the Laguna of Venice," by Cooke, is, in every way, excellent. We have no hesitation in pronouncing this fully equal, if not superior, to any of the works of Stanfield.

(No. 470), "A Letter-writer, Seville," by Mr. Phillip, is one of the attractions of the Exhibition, and confirms the promise put forth in the artist's former pictures. A well-known letter-writer exercises his trade in an open but quiet street in Seville. A gaily-dressed lady whispers an invitation, which she wishes him to write; and a peasant mother waits patiently for him to read a letter received from her husband. The group is full of interest, and is excellently painted. Her Majesty has been fortunate enough to secure this admirable painting.

(No. 485), "The Poison Cup," by Frith, a scene from Kenilworth, will be sure to arrest the visitor.

(No. 499), "Peggy," from Ramsay's admirable poem of "The Gentle Shepherd," is an excellent study of a figure by Mr. East, which should make the reputation of the artist.

No. 492, "Guidrius and Avizagus," scene from Cymbeline, introducing the dead Imogen, by W. Galt, is an admirably-painted scene; but, unfortunately, the taste of the artist is not nearly so good as his execution. The positions are formal, theatrical, and unnatural.

(No. 506), "Christopher Sly," by H. S. Marks, a name with which we have not met before, is a fine study of Shakespeare's drunken impersonation. We look forward to some great things from this artist.

(No. 520), "The Charity of Dorcas," by W. C. T. Dobson, is a very promising picture; and, as promise achieved, we may class pictures by those excellent artists, Sydney Cooper (No. 556), "Common Fare;" F. R. Lee and J. Hollins (No. 572), "Salmon Fishing on the River Aire;" (No. 581), "View of the Frith of Forth," by Roberts; (No. 586), "Traveller attacked by Wolves," by Ansdale; and many others. The object of our criticism being, generally, for the encouragement of the younger and less-known artists, and also for the elucidation of very great works, by men foremost in their art, our readers will forgive our doing anything further than calling attention to these pictures. Of the South Room drawings and miniatures we shall not speak; except to say, that there is general finish and excellence exhibited in this branch of the art. Two instances of bad taste are too glaring 1853;" where he has exhibited a sensual-looking widower in the newest black, stretched upon a sofa contemplating the bust of his departed wife, in a sprawling attitude of grief. His daughters, of all ages, surround him, dressed in the newest fashions from the mourning warehouse in Regent-street, and, with upturned eyes, assuming looks intended to be as deep as their crape. Nay, as Edmund, in "Lear," complains that even domestic animals shun him:—

"——— The little dogs all.

Tray, Blanche, and Sweetheart, they do bark at me." so Mr. Chalon, or the gentleman (?), has lugged in the pet dog, who, in a mourning suit of white, gazes with reverent wonder in his master's face. Grief more indecently exhibited we never saw—grief evidently, from the bereaved person's face, as constrained as his attitude, and a thousand times more transient than the water-colours of the fashionable artist. The effect of such a picture may be guessed; scarcely a single person passes it, but "cheu tremet secur" as he or she turns away in laughter or visible disgust.

THE MEADOW.—FROM A PAINTING BY REMBRANDT.

to be passed over. Mr. Essex, to his excellent enamel portraits of "Byron, Scott, and Moore," has thought fit to append the following senseless and halting parody on Dryden's epigram—"Three poets in three distant ages born:—

"The Poets in one age were born, England, Scotland, Ireland, did adorn:"

by which he disgusts more than he can charm by his painting; and Mr. Chalon has perpetrated a worse than senseless parody on the sacred character of grief, in his "In Memoriam,

Of the Octagon Room we have little to say; its one brilliant picture we have before noticed. An historical composition by S. Blackburn (No. 1,295) has much merit, and would be vastly improved by an addition of a few forcible touches. The Sculpture Room contains many repetitions of figures, some busts of merit, and two groups (Nos. 1,411 and 1,514) from Ovid's Metamorphoses, "The Lamentations of Phaeton's Sisters," which exhibit grace, knowledge of anatomy, and merit.

THE WORKS OF EMINENT MASTERS.

SEBASTIEN BOURDON.

We turn from the picturesque and cattle-loving Dutchman—the painter of animal life and scenery—to one of very different characteristics, whose subjects were, indeed, quite of another order, and owed their being to a very different taste and inspiration. The one was fitted, indeed, to represent the hour when “Day dwindles to a span,

And silence spreads her meditative wing
Before the glimmering light—no straggling sound Breaks o’er the deep uninterrupted gloom,
Save in the distant fold where cattle graze,
The sheep-bell breathes a moment through the calm;
Then all is hush’d in slumber soft again.
The evening zephyrs glide along the air,
Spreading their gauzy wings in playful sport,
And catch against these lofty elms below
Which tremble at the touch, so soft and pure.”

But the poetic and versatile, and, we must say it, rather feeble mind we have now to deal with was of another order. The above suggests calm home-scenery, the scenery of England or Holland; but now we are about to enter on

VOL. II.

“Thy sweets, oh, Palestine,” where “The rose that bloom’d on Sharon’s plain
Has withered and is gone again;
Tho’ gardens of the loveliest flowers
That ever bloom’d in Eden’s towers, Glad the warm heart where’er we turn.”

We have to speak, we say, of that land

“Where the citron-trees are growing, ——— and the sunlight glowing
O’er a land of balm discloses
Its gardens and its beds of roses;
Where the palm-tree’s solemn shade
Spreads along the sultry plain,
Ere the clouds of evening fade,
Which shall never come again.”*

The author of these picturesque lines could scarcely have indicated better the subjects chosen by the two men of such different schools—Paul Potter and Sebastien Bourdon.

* “Hours of Recreation,” by Charles S. Middleton.

A man of easy and universal talent, Bourdon had his day of glory and fame, and, more fortunate than many equally clever men, he has preserved the reputation of the past, and descended with approbation and smiles to posterity. His southern impetuosity, the vivacity of his mind—which, however, penetrated no deeper than the surface of art—the suppleness, the liveliness, and the unprecedented good fortune of his pencil—all these characteristics are, in him, curious, eccentric, and as erratic as his wandering life; for this painter, who was to emulate so many masters, and reflect so many styles in his productions, was educated on the highway, and remained all his life a picker-up of trifles—a filcher from other men's brains. Like the celebrated Gil Blas of our early reading, he wandered much in search of truth, and did not appear ever to approach it very nearly. He, too, had to contend against many difficulties, like most men of genius, who only win fame and distinction at the price at which man has been destined to earn his bread. This, though inconvenient for the individual, has been useful to the world, which has owed its literary masterpieces to the humble in position, if not in spirit.

The career of many a poet and painter should well stir up the earnest spirit of youth to fight the battle of life, whatever their position, with energy and vigour. Milton was a schoolmaster, Shakspeare a player; Goldsmith wrote for bread at a guinea a letter—his "Cræzus" was thus published; and if we come down to the present day, which is not our province, we might tell of the humble walks from which rose almost every noted man of the hour, save only the leading statesmen, who have an hereditary fitness for legislation, which has never been satisfactorily explained, and therefore is not understood and appreciated.

Indeed, genius is seldom hereditary. Few instances are known of talent descending—except, be it marked, in aristocratic circles. There have been few sons of artists great painters; and, with rare exceptions indeed, no family has been distinguished for literary attainments, if we except the Roscoes, sons of the Roscoe, and one or two more such instances. But generally we have seen an Oliver Cromwell give us a Richard, a Milton but unknown children, and find imitators unknown to fame. Let, then, those who restly feel the sacred fire, have courage; the road is all before them, where to choose.

Bourdon had not much encouragement in early life to continue the profession of an artist. He was born at Montpellier in 1616,* in the house of an artist. His father was one of those painters on glass, that were still found in those days in the remote provinces of France; patient and laborious defenders of the Renaissance, that is, the style of the sixteenth century. The honest glazier and painter was himself his son's first master, until the day when he was taken away to Paris by one of his uncles. He worked in the capital under the guidance of an obscure artist, whose name has not descended to posterity, though he is very generally supposed to be an imitator of Simon Vouet. Soon, however, led away by the extreme fickleness and versatility of his nature, Sebastien Bourdon left Paris to run after dome Fortune in the southern provinces of France.

His biographers inform us that he was at Bordeaux in 1636, in the employment of a new master, and painting in fresco—it is the Abbé Lambert who gives us this minute detail—the roof of a great salon in a chateau in the neighbourhood of that town. Then we find him strolling for Toulouse, where, not finding it so easy to succeed as to doubt, he became thoroughly disgusted with his profession, and threw up painting. Led away by the impetuosity of his character to adopt the profession of all others least suited to his equivoque, volatile, and feeble nature, he became a soldier. The king's army gained by this freak but a poor, ill-disciplined soldier; while art lost an ardent mind, an impatient but clever hand; and Bourdon lost what he loved above everything—his personal liberty. Regrets soon began to assail him; and the young painter shouldered his musket with such a very ill grace, that his captain took pity on him, and granted him some hours of relaxation and leisure. Powerful friends now interposed, and, after some difficulties and delays, they succeeded in liberating the soldier who had enlisted so imprudently.

Once free, Sebastien Bourdon never stopped until he found himself in Rome. At this moment he was but eighteen years of age. The sentiment of art, which for a moment had been dealened, but not killed within him, revived with fresh ardour and renewed energy. He was, indeed, destined to finish at Rome an education which had commenced under such strange auspices and in so turbulent a manner. It was in this city of art, where are piled up the monuments of gigantic men, men of old, men of renown, that the genius of the young disciple of painting was to make itself known to himself and to the world. At this early period, it may be said, Bourdon was guided by ill-regulated instincts, by inexplicable and somewhat foolish and inexcusable bursts of enthusiasm for some particular style. All kinds of paintings attracted him, every style pleased him alike. We may at once, however, remark, that the hesitation and fickleness of his early days continued all his life, it being, in fact, based on his character and instincts. It was, indeed, from this inconsistency, which sometimes descended to weakness, that Sebastien Bourdon, instead of becoming a grave and original painter, condemned himself always to be the brilliant reflection of contemporary styles.

Sebastien Bourdon was poor. His first duty was to find the means of existence, and, led away by the success then obtained in Italy, and soon to be obtained in France, by military scenes, by picturesque groups of Bohemians and beggars, by the interiors of guard-rooms and tap-rooms, which Pierre de Laer had made the fashion, he executed some of those pictures called Bambochades, and though his pencil was as yet inexperienced, and had not the true humour and coarse wit required by these somewhat eccentric scenes, still Bourdon had begun to succeed, and in the place of poverty saw a more golden and promising future before him, when an unfortunate adventure compelled him to leave Rome in all haste.

Sebastien Bourdon, as we should have intimated before, was a Protestant. This was quite sufficient for him to be viewed with an unfavourable eye in the land of intolerance. After a somewhat fierce quarrel with a French painter named Rioux, whose name but for this anecdote would be utterly unknown, the latter menaced him with his vengeance, and threatened to denounce him to the Holy Inquisition as a heretic. Very likely the danger was not so great as he apprehended; but Bourdon, who was seriously alarmed, thought proper to escape from the tortures of the castle of St. Angelo, and he took flight. Having escaped from the Papal territory, he took refuge in a more hospitable land, at Venice. He visited also several other Italian towns, and at length returned to France, after an absence of about three years.

It was a profitable voyage to the young artist in an artistic point of view. Bourdon had at all events learnt in Italy the rapid process of fashionable painting. He had watched the magic results of the labours of the great improvisatori, Andre Sacchi, and he returned to his native land with an ardent desire to do much, and that quickly, if even not well. The French school of painting, at the time when Bourdon once more saw his home, was ruled by the powerful and brilliant influence of Simon Vouet. The young painter was, therefore, without being quite prepared for it, perfectly in the fashion, and his successful productions soon proved this to be a fact. He halted first at Montpellier, where the chapter of the cathedral confided to him the execution of a vast picture, "The Fall of Simon the Magician." Bourdon painted on this canvas more than thirty figures, and only took three months to carry out his somewhat stupendous design. It was scarcely finished ere it was publicly exhibited in the church of St. Peter, and gave occasion to a very violent and somewhat disgraceful scene. Being severely criticised by a painter of Montpellier, whose name was Samuel Boissiere, Bourdon flew into a passion and boxed the critic's ears. The affair having assumed a very serious aspect, Bourdon, faithful to his habits of prudence, suddenly, and without warning, left the city of Montpellier.

He now came to Paris, where a more fortunate career was opened to him. He was scarcely twenty-seven years of age when the corporation of goldsmiths, who had adopted the custom of offering a picture to Notre Dame every year, employed our artist to execute for them a painting of "The Martyrdom of St. Peter." The opportunity thus offered was grasped manfully by Sebastien Bourdon, who now executed a masterpiece, or to speak more correctly, his masterpiece. This picture, which is now to be seen in the inimitable gallery of the Louvre—a place of itself worthy of a visit to Paris—is painted, as is generally allowed by all critics, with great care, freedom, and facility of pencil. The touch is broad, fully developed, and full of spirit; but the drawing is somewhat more loose than is allowable in a serious subject, while the colouring is, unfortunately, made up of warm and fiery tones, the excessive vulgarity of which surprises everybody. We are compelled to add that the scene is ill-lighted up, and while the secondary actors in the drama enmesh too much on the foreground, the chief actor is kept back in undue obscurity. The furie, or dash, and boldness of the brush caused this work to succeed immediately.

* Bryan says: "The French writers differ in their account of this artist. They place his birth in 1605, 1606, and 1619; and his death in 1662, 1671, and 1673."

We are told of a strange specimen of painting where Bourdon represented "Mercury killing Argos," in relation to which a writer, who was seldom in the habit of adverting anything serious, wrote these lines:

"O, Bourdon! sur la peinture,
Dont tu charmes l'univers,
On voit autant d'yeux ouverts
Comme en a fermé Mercure."

What proves, however, more than the four verses of M. Soudry, the rapid and universal success of Sebastien Bourdon, is that, in the month of February, 1648, when the Royal Academy of Painting was instituted, he was admitted to the highly honourable position of one of the twelve academics, under whose patronage the learned society of artists was formed. Without recapitulating all the illustrious masters, who were the companions of Bourdon, in the list of founders of the world-renowned Academy, we may mention the Sieur Duguernier, an able miniature painter of that time, whose sister he afterwards married. Duguernier, who "was known at court and had many friends," says Felibien,† "became a powerful and influential supporter of his brother-in-law.

Strange caprice and freak of the fickle artist! At the very moment when fortune was at his door, in a rare and friendly humour, Bourdon, instead of opening it wide, closed it and thought of seeking it elsewhere. It was currently rumoured that the disturbances and civil tumults caused by the Fronde had deprived artists of the means of subsistence. But the truth is, that Queen Christina of Sweden, to civilise a little her more than semi-barbarous court, had already collected around her a group of learned men and poets, and sent for Bourdon to join them. This was in 1652. The adventurous Bourdon started for Stockholm, that beautiful northern Venice, and one of the most picturesque sites in the world, just as he would have set out for Versailles. The queen, who affected to protect the arts, and who really was possessed of talent and taste, received Bourdon with open arms, made him her first painter, and confided to him, it is said, the keepership of all the pictures she then possessed, and which with a view, it has been suggested, to their more perfect security, she allowed to sleep in the chests in which they had been packed to be sent to Sweden.

But as the office of keeper of the pictures of others was rather a dull one for an artist who had but one desire in life, and that to create, Bourdon was selected to paint the queen; and then it was that he executed that admirable portrait which Nanteuil and Michel Lasne have engraved, and which has ever since been the official, historical, and ever-interesting portrait of the famous queen of Sweden.

D'Arzenville relates a very creditable anecdote of Sebastien Bourdon, in connexion with the keepership of the pictures. While he was still engaged in painting the queen's portrait, Christina spoke to him of some of the pictures which her father, the king, had captured at the siege of Prague. We have already said that they were in the original packing-cases, and a fancy striking her, the queen requested the French artist to open the boxes and make a report as to their contents. Bourdon came back to her majesty with a very warm report of the pictures, particularly of one of Correggio. The good-natured princess requested him at once to accept this as a present from her. But the artist, more generous even than the queen, represented to her the fact that they were some of the finest paintings in Europe, and that she should not part with one of them. The queen, accordingly, acting on his advice, kept the pictures, and when she abdicated the throne took them with her to Rome, where she increased the value of the collection by judicious purchases. After her death, the heirs of Don Livio Odescalchi, who had bought them, sold them again to the Duke of Orleans, the prodigal regent of France, in whose house they remained until the Revolution. Most of them are now in London, in the Bridgewater Gallery, in the possession of the Earl of Ellesmere.

* "Oh, Bourdon, we see as many eyes fixed on the painting with which you delight the world, as Mercury himself has closed." Le Cabinet, de M. Soudry, Gouverneur de Notre Dame de la Garde. Paris, in 1to, 1646, p. 199.

Felibien, already quoted, who was the intimate friend of Sebastien Bourdon, assures us that at Stockholm the worthy painter confined himself chiefly to the painting of portraits; and he mentions, among his most successful works, that of the Count Palatine, Charles Gustavus, cousin-german of the queen, the very prince, in whose favour she afterwards abdicated. The mag and scribe author of "Entretiens sur la Vie et les Ouvrages des plus excellents Peintres" informs us also, that the queen of Sweden, wishing to erect a mausoleum to the memory of her father, Gustavus Adolphus, who was killed at Lutzen in 1633, requested designs of the monument from Bourdon; and Felibien explains to us the strange and endless project which he, the learned and ingenious author, had devised—a project which the painter declined to present to the ill Queen Christina for good and sufficient reasons.

In truth, our artist was doomed to be the Wandering Jew of painting. The queen of Sweden, not satisfied with having her bust taken, had cherished the ambition to leave an equestrian portrait of herself, which she then requested Bourdon to take and present from her to the King of Spain. The French painter packed up the picture and put it on board a vessel which was about to set sail for the Peninsula, and personally disliking a long voyage, he merely crossed the Sound and made the best of his way to Paris. He could not have been more fortunate, had he been guided by some guardian angel; for, on his arrival in Paris, the prudent traveller learnt that the vessel laden with the equestrian statue of the queen had perished in a shipwreck. This was a singular coincidence, which made Bourdon all the more prudent and thoughtful of his personal safety. He learnt very soon afterwards that his protectress had abjured the Protestant religion and abdicated the throne. He at once gave up all idea of returning to Sweden, and resumed at Paris his functions of professor at the Academy of Painting, which named him rector on the 6th of July, 1655, in company with Surrain, Lebrun, and Enard.

Now began for our artist the epoch of extensive labours. Not to mention landscapes and bambocchios, which poured with extraordinary rapidity from his easy and inexhaustible pencil, he painted for the master-altar of the Collegiate Church of St. Benedict a "Christ dead at the Virgin's Feet," which was greatly admired; "The Woman taken in Adultery," for the Church of the Equites; a "Christ with Mary Magdalen," for the Church of the Comptes; "The Sacrifice of Solomon," at the Hotel of Toulouse; and a number of other paintings, the enumeration of which in this place would occupy too much space.

When speaking of the first "Christ" alluded to, that painted by Bourdon for the Collegiate Church of St. Benedict, M. de Witte praises it highly in his manuscript notes on the "Abbecharia" of P. Orlandi. "It is," he says, "this masterpiece he has caught with animation and power much of the style of Louis Caracci, who would not have been ashamed to have owned it." The opinion of so connoisseur and respectable an artist as Jean Pierre Mariette is here of great weight, and his opinion is also generally quoted as an authority of considerable importance, with regard to "The Crucifixion of St. Peter," which Bourdon painted for the May month of 1643.

Bourdon possessed two designs of this composition. They were both extremely rich, and were executed in the style of Paul Ver-nese. They abounded in figures, but the painter was wise enough to simplify them. It appears to be a recognised fact in art, that while drawings admit of the introduction of a great many personages, the painter is wiser to lessen their number, as not in keeping with the sublimity and unity of high art. In a painting, too many figures create confusion, and destroy that repose so necessary to a historical picture. We may see from the information afforded us by Mariette, in relation to Bourdon, that instead of ripening and correcting his first thoughts as Poussin did, Sebastien threw his various projects on paper, and was quite satisfied, instead of any correction or search into lodging-houses or factories. A Parisian of any note, even a clerk on £80 a year, would as soon live in the Marais, or the rocky fissure-looking lanes of the city, as the quondam fashionable island.

But in the days of Sebastien Bourdon, the island of St. Louis was in its glory. Its hotels were magnificent, and its inhabitants men of mark and likelihood. In the one mentioned above, he painted on a roof of nine compartments of unequal size, the fable of "Phœbus and Phaeton?" on the wainscot he ordered his pupils to execute, in fourteen little octagon squares, the allegorical figures of "Virtue and the Arts." The ornamenting and painting of this gallery, one after improvement, to follow up his first effort of improvisation by a new improvisation.

His most important work was the decoration of the Hotel de Bretonvilliers, in the island of Saint Louis. This locality in the good city of Paris, so little known in the present day to tourists and explorers, is one of the most curious corners of that curious city. It is as yet quite sacred from any invasion of improvers. It was once a region of fashionable hotels, a perfect Belgravia on an island, all large houses, with courts and yards, and lofty arched entrances. It is now reduced to a very nucleated position. Many of its finest buildings have been pulled down, while the rest have been turned of the richest monuments of the showy and fanciful elegance of the seventeenth century, was completed by architectural scrolls, garlands of flowers and fruits, painted by Charmeton and Mounoyer, the able fleuriste, as he was called in his day. Unfortunately, all those beautiful paintings have perished, and nothing could be said about them, beyond the mere record of their having existed, if we had not written descriptions, and better still, engravings of them by Friquet de Vaurose, the favourite pupil of Bourdon. When d'Argenville printed his "Voyage Pittoresque," the gallery of the Hotel Bretonvilliers was already spoilt. Now the hotel itself has utterly disappeared.

Those who instructed Sebastien Bourdon to paint and decorate the wainscoting of a sumptuous dwelling, were fully alive to the peculiarity and grandeur of his genius. No one, perhaps, in the whole French school, if we except Charles Lebrun, was better gifted by nature and by study for undertaking this very brilliant part of the painter's art. His inexhaustible imagination, his boldness, his independent humour, and with all this, a constant reflexion of the old style, combined to make him the decorator par excellence: that is, one of those prolific, proud artists, as prompt in execution as in conception, who are fully qualified to interest and amuse us without profundity of painting, but not without brilliancy, in productions which, although not wholly addressed to the mind, still take their impression from it. The decoration of the interior of a palace can, and ought to be only the means of striking the attention, of astonishing and flattering the looks. The painter, for, to a certain extent, they are indeed his best productions. In these are displayed his most brilliant qualities, a surprising and wonderful fertility of invention, much movement and dramatic effect, a perfectly novel and curious art of arranging his drapery; in fine, a vivacity of execution and a warmth of pencil, which are to be seen even in the rendering of the ever. What can we imagine, for example, more odd than the subjects treated by Sebastien Bourdon in the octagonal, round, or oval compartments he had to paint? The Virtues and the Arts, with their usual attributes and their accustomed costume, or the somewhat dull subjects undertaken by this impetuous artist. And yet he has shown his vigour and his power by almost everywhere replacing a symbol by an action. He has represented "Music." He tells the charming fable of Arion, who, at the moment of being cast into the raging waves by a ship's crew, obtained leave to touch his artist who should attempt to elevate the mind to profound meditations would fail in his object, because the very existence of this elevated train of thought in the spectator, would draw his attention from the general magnificence of the whole. A painter, who is able, in a simple group of three figures, to concentrate the expression of the most elevated thoughts, the most secret impulses of the heart, and epitomise the human mind in a picture, is not the man to execute those paintings which are destined to dazzle the imagination and the eyes. Nicolas Poussin was gifted with too serious a genius to employ his time in decorating roofs and walls. Sebastien Bourdon, on the other hand, was sure to excel in it. The one only glided over the soul, the other dug to its very deepest foundations.

It is extremely fortunate for the glory and fame of the painter of Montpellier that his paintings in the Hotel de Bretonvilliers have been handed down to us in the admirable engravings of some of his lyre, and thus attracted a dolphin, which took him on his back, and escaped with him to Cape Taurus. This is the way that Sebastien Bourdon celebrates the magic power of harmony, by means of an anecdote familiar to every student of that apocryphal lore of gods and goddesses which the ancients have handed down to us, in such very beautiful forms, that we forgive the absurdity which is the outward blemish. A French critic says, "Always occupied with the idea that he must make a picture, and being able to do everything as a painter, he substitutes for the monotony of traditional emblems in a drama full of life, of love, and poetry. Borne upon the back of the wondering dolphin, as upon a living bark, the musician of Lesbos, amidst all this, which has been overcome by his songs, and seems to listen to the sound of the murmuring waves more harmonious than his lyre. Again, if we see the ship, whence the poet has been cast into the waves, and we cannot help admiring how ably the artist has managed to give an antique and noble character to the imaginary construction of the distant ship, which, without this heroic physiognomy, would at once have vulgarised the picture."

Again, he has to paint "Geometry." Instead of remaining chained to conventional tradition, he recollects the history of Archimedes, and seizes the occasion to represent a town on fire, and soldiers, whose unbridled ferocity and wild intoxication contrast in a most effective manner with the sublime tranquillity of the philosopher. All the heroes of classical antiquity are called upon to figure in person, in place of their wearisome attributes and emblematical nonentities, which were so repugnant to the boiling southern genius of our artist. We are indeed led to observe, that the more metaphysical his subject is, the more does he show his ingenuity in giving a striking and energetic form to his ideas. "Astronomy" serves as a pretext to Bourdon to tell us the story of the emperor Hadrian, who, preparing a sacrifice, is astounded to see the lightning strike the altar and cast to the ground the priest and the victim. It would have been hardly possible to invent better materials, to have found more happy and successful outlines, or to unite in a composition of such small size more life and a grander character. The proud, quick, and noble gesture of the emperor, the ball struck by the lightning, the foreshortened figure of the sacrificer—all this is in a savage style, and executed with a vigour which is not far short of genius.

The triumph of Pompey, drawn by Olympian horses, the liberalities of Augustus, casting heaps of sestercies to the Roman people, the celebrated act of Scævola burning the hand that had killed the guard of Porcena instead of Porcena himself, represent "Magnanimity," "Liberality," and "Constancy." All the active and familiar figures in fable and history are presented to us in the place of insipid abstractions, and most amateurs will allow, with considerable success. The allegorical subject of "Painting" is celebrated in a picture which reminds us of the story of Alexander presenting his favourite Campaspa to the great painter Apelles, who, while painting her for the king, has fallen in love with her. It will readily be allowed that the king, the artist, and the lovely heroine of the tale, whose beauty enhances the generosity of Alexander, satisfactorily replace the usual dry mementos (p. 13). In everything we find the subject speaking, animated, alive. Even the cold subject of "Grammar" is clothed in the form of a young woman watering plants, according to an ancient tradition of the imaginative Greeks.

The learned collectors of anecdotes pretend that the authorities of the Church of St. Gervais ordered from Bourdon six pictures destined for the ornament of the nave, which were to recount the history of the "blessed patron of the church and of its friend St. Protais." Bourdon accordingly set to work. But unfortunately for him, as regards the execution of this order, he could not get rid of his Calvinistic feelings; and not being able to abjure his religion, like the accommodating queen of Sweden, he was led, with regard to the pious martyrs whose apotheosis he was painting, to perpetrate certain jokes on their history, which were very offensive to the churchwardens. Bourdon was thanked, and dismissed, the more that his first picture, the "Beheading of St. Protais," did not receive the approbation of the chapter. This picture, which is to be found in the Louvre, is generally considered by Roman Catholics to be worthy of the blame which it received from the worshipful chapter of St. Gervais. The labours of Bourdon were continued by Philippe de Champagne, Lesueur, and Goulay; and on a candid examination of "St. Gervais refusing to sacrifice to False Gods," we are not led to regret the change from Bourdon to Lesueur, however much we may sympathise with, and comprehend, the very natural feelings of the Calvinist.

The landscapes of Bourdon are not the least important parts of his works. Everybody is familiar with them; everybody has seen a hundred times, in old books and albums, in shop windows and collections, his favourite subject, "The Flight into Egypt" (see p. 12), a landscape in which the grandeur of nature is almost on a par with the elevation of the subject. When we say nature, in the strict and philosophical sense of the word, we are wrong; nature certainly does not hold a very high place in these strange and savage compositions, which awaken in us neither the sentiment of reality nor the image of the ideal. Sebastien Bourdon unfortunately lived at a time when the sentiment of nature had not developed itself in France, at all events in the arts, though it was soon to become the rage in painting, poetry, and prose—on the canvas of the fashionable artist, and in the pages of Florian and others, who, in the end, made nature appear ridiculous. The country, in the eyes of the artists of those days, was but accessory to the figures, the mere amusement of man, the frame in which their thoughts were developed. In those artificial times, certainly no member of the Academy, Lenoir excepted, would have ever thought it possible that a painter's landscape could be anything else but a scene wholly invented, composed to serve as the theatre of one of those fabulous or vulgar dramas which fill up the history of humanity. Less than any one else, could Bourdon escape the universal tendency of a school he, whose fancy always overpowered every other feeling. His landscapes are, therefore, wholly drawn from his extravagant and sombre imagination. There is none of that warmth which the subject demands, none of that golden eastern glow, to which we alluded in our last number.* We find violent and savage horses galloping along a vast plain; brigands dragging along the body of a man whom they have just slaughtered; warriors on the watch; travellers alarmed; or cavaliers galloping away from some startling danger. Sometimes we have Spanish muleteers making their way along difficult roads; but his favourite subject is the "Holy Family," Joseph and Mary flying with their precious burden from the wild rage of His enemies to the land distantly seen beyond the flowing waters. Moreover, despite the introduction of these figures, the landscapes of Sebastien Bourdon always represent uninhabited or uninhabitable countries, dotted here and there with ruins whose presence would be difficult to explain, did we not know what exists in European Turkey, where vast plains, deserted, uncultivated, and abandoned, yet teem with the ruined habitations, oftener with the crumbling tombs of the millions who once dwelt there. 'Twas such scenes Bourdon loved to paint—scenes which might once have been beautiful,

"Till, when the ruthless conqueror came With vengeance sword and eyes of flame,
'Twas from its stately basis hurled,
Where the bulbul all day long
Charms the valley with her song;
And at evening's silent gloom
Sighs above Saadi's tomb.
Now he wanders wide and far,
Along the plains of Istakar,
Whose ruined temples and whose shrines
No longer give the voice of prayer,
But while the Day God brightly shines
His altars lie in ruins there!
Where palaces and tombs are spread,
Sad relics of the mighty dead!
And while he gazes on each scene,
Where pomp and power and wealth have been;
Where costly pearls and rubies shone
Upon the steps of Jemsheed's throne;
The owl within her lonely cell
Sits brooding o'er the pride of kings,
And watches like a sentinel

He paints solitary scenes, it is true; but not the melancholy and silent and solemn solitudes of the tender Lesueur, but, on the contrary, savage, broken, terrible solitudes, rearing with all the noises of creation, the fall of heavy waters, the roaring of the bleak wind, the shuddering of the trees, as in the tempests of Guaspere, and now and then the unexpected rolling of chariot wheels over stony roads. And even when agricultural occupations, the labour of the fields, the harvest, and hay-making, became the subject-matter of his landscapes, the rustic figures introduced have a quaint gait, which carries us back to the rudeness of the middle ages, and reminds us neither of what we have seen in real nature, nor even what was painted in this style by the Venetian, Jacques Bassan.

Another remark, which it is essential to make with regard to the somewhat disorderly flights of Sebastien Bourdon's fancy is, that he often forgets the geographical fitness of the scenery, the costume locale—as our friends over the water say, as well as that strict fidelity to costume to which an artist should adhere when painting historical personages. He was not at all particular or careful in these things, would collect in the same country trees of widely different orders, introduce genuine Egyptian palm-trees amid Italian constructions, and even paint and engrave impossible trees, imaginary bushes, and absurd dwellings.

There are individuals to whom this eccentricity is a charm: it pleases certain artists, too, affording them novel and picturesque ideas; but it will only seriously seduce and captivate those who prefer the scenery of the stage to unadorned and real nature, the poetry of the reign of Charles II. to that of Milton and Shakspeare; the Minerva press to the healthy writings of Scott, Cooper, and Dickens; the ravings of a Reynolds to the truth and satire of a Ferrard; the false, untrue, and theatrical, to the beauty and loveliness of eternal truth.

Supple and varied in the style of his painting, seeking to imitate, now the colours of Lombard artists, now the grave rules of Poussin, now the pomp of Paul Veronese, or the easy elegance of Simon Vouet—doing over again, in fact, for a crowd of masters what, in the beginning, he had done for Claude Lorraine and Benedetto—Sebastien Bourdon naturally applied to various subjects the great diversity of his aptitudes and his characteristics. We find him descending with satisfaction to the interiors of guard houses in the style of Michael Angelo des Batailles or of John Miel, and to wild gipsy scenes in the style of the brothers Leinain and de Callot. It is quite useless to disguise a fact which any picture-dealer will be able to prove. These little pictures are much more sought after than many of his more ambitious works. The real fact is, that in these pretty and agreeable trifles—delicious little treasures at times—Bourdon is marvellously successful, without, however, having any of that style which, in the Dutch, is naïveté. He introduced an agreeable mode of colouring into them, a piquancy of style, the general base of which was that fine gray tone which colourists are so fond of—Velasquez, for instance, Simon Chardin, and Dandré Bardon, whose manner no one, according to a critic of the eighteenth century, understood better than Bourdon.

Upon this neutral and soft ground is admirably relieved the brilliant and gaudy rags of his Bohemians, the bright adjustments of his cavaliers, the yellow vests of his old soldiers, or the red feather of a beaver cast carelessly on the ground. The wide topped boots, the chamois leather gloves, and the buff jerkins also play their part, with drums which serve the soldiers to gamble on with dice. He is also very fond of introducing an old lean horse with outstretched neck, his dirty white crupper brought up by a warm ray of the sun. After carefully studying for so long a time, in antique bas-reliefs, that type of race-horses with swan-like necks that drew the triumphal chariots in ancient Rome, Bourdon suddenly catches a glimpse of a caravan of razzamuffins, and, forgetting all the subtleties of style, caught for a moment by a genuine bit of nature, he paints with energy the lean Rozinante mounted by a knight of sad and rueful countenance, or the injured steed of the company of comedians in the “Comte Romance” of Scarron.

Much is said in the books of art-critics of the engravings of Sebastien Bourdon; and some even go so far as to assert, that they are fit to rank alongside the productions of the best masters in the cabinets of amateurs. Thus carelessly is history written, above all, the history of art, which being on a subject with regard to which few understand much, every attempt at guiding men's minds in the right direction should be strictly correct and impartial. The error arises from the critics of one era copying word for word the ideas and thoughts of those who have preceded them, without ever taking the trouble to think or reflect for themselves in anything like an independent manner. The truth is, that the engravings of the artist of Montpellier are only worthy of being collected and preserved by artists, because they are able to draw from them happy ideas, inspirations, and thoughts; but as works of art to be kept in the portfolios of amateurs, they are very inferior. They are executed with extreme negligence, and could never please men whose taste had been formed by a study of beautiful Italian line engravings, particularly those of the Barocci, the Carracci, and the Benedetto. The coarseness of execution which is particularly remarked in the numerous compositions called “The Flight into Egypt,” is not admissible in pieces of such dimensions. Scratchy lines, when they are done with proper spirit, are preferable, and are even charming, in little pieces; but plates of the size of a large quarto become dull and heavy when they appear to be scratched with a scribe, crudely, roughly, and tactlessly. The roughness, too, is not in keeping with the intention of the style which is visible in the figures. In a picture where the artist takes the trouble to select elegant form, a graceful gait and mien, it is not reasonable for the execution to be so much behind the thought. This is exactly the error of Bourdon. His heads are graceful and pleasing; his Madonnas are extremely pretty, a little in the taste of Parmesan; but their costume and other details display un pardonnable negligence. His draperies seem to convey the idea of his having studied them on a stiff by figure. They never clothed a human form. Let it be here remembered that we are speaking of his engravings—and it must be apparent that, without falling into the exaggerated cooking after effect which gives to drapery the appearance of wet linen, sticking here and there on the body, it is well that the form of the human figure be seen, and that the folds should have some object in view. With Bourdon the drapery is in general greatly of that metallic look, that stiff unalike conception so often found in the engravings of Albert Durer, without possessing at the same time any of his learned perfection. His Virgins are clothed in stiff rags, or in angular draks which are exceedingly displeasing to the eye, and which mar the effect of his general picture. His best effects in this line are his trees and his backgrounds, which at times are touched off with considerable delicacy and brightness.

The fine works of Bourdon are not, therefore, these hasty engravings, but rather those which he has touched up with the burin, or some few which he has devoted himself to with more attention, earnestness, and determination to do justice to his subject. His “Holt of the Holy Family” (p. 16) is one of the richest and noblest compositions of the French school. We find in it some of the sublimity of Nicolas Poussin. How admirably the verdure agrees with the buildings, and what an august character does the scene assume from the very solemnity of the landscape! We remark also the ineffable sadness of the Virgin, surrounded by the childish games over which she presides with so much grace; and we take the more notice of this, as it is not common in the work of the painter. The action of the washerwoman, so ardent at work, forms a great contrast with the tranquillity of the maternal group. Even the details of the donkey engaged in eating his thistles, and the ducks playing in the water, add languidly and harmoniously to the beauty of the picture, which is a mingling of sacred history with ordinary nature.

One characteristic feature in Bourdon, another of those things in which he resembles Poussin, is his taste for architecture. With him, as with the Norman painter, the buildings introduced into his compositions hold a very important place. But while, on the one hand, Poussin uses them soberly, and when it is for they should be used, Bourdon, on the other, abuses his love, and goes so far as to make it an habitual source of composition. Tailloussot has said, with considerable truth, “that one of the things which chiefly characterise the pictures of this master is—the same may be said of his engravings—the habit he has of placing in the foreground architectural remains, and always round forms opposed to square ones. We will suppose that he has too many straight lines in a picture; the broken remains of a column come to his relief. If he wants to bend or curve one of his figures, to make it assume an attitude at variance with those which are upright, immediately a piece of an old wall, a broken pedestal, starts from the ground at his command. He makes a very judicious use of the variety of these forms. But beside that the repetition is fatiguing, it takes away the illusion, because it is implied only.”

When going to the arbitrary productions of Bourdon, we find him an ardent student of antiquity. In his classical subjects may be recognised much, though irregular knowledge of his subject; and especially in his “Seven Charities” are we led to believe him cognizant of much that is described in the following passage from Heeren: "The house of the horses were large and spacious, and, at the same time, suited to the climate. The court was surrounded by a gallery, about which the bed-chambers were built. There was a direct entrance from the court to the hall, which was the common place of resort; moveable seats stood along the sides of the walls. Everything glistened with brass. On one side was a place of deposit, where the arms were kept. In the background was the hearth, and the seat for the lady of the mansion, when she made her appearance below. Several steps conducted from thence to a higher gallery, near which were the chambers of the women, where they were employed in household labours, especially in weaving. Several outhouses, for the purpose of grinding and leeking, were connected with the house; others for the common habitations of the male and female slaves; all they used from that country." In his picture of "The Plague," much of this is visible.

There are occasions, however, when architecture is not simply, in the pictures of Bourdon, an expedient to produce contrast in outline, to balance the masses of colour, or to make the squared part appear less square by opposing them to round ones, and vice versa. When this is not the case, his palaces, almost wholly invented of a new and original style of architecture, have all the grand eccentricity of his landscapes and historical subjects. There is a composition by this master, one of those which perished with the Hotel de Bretonvilliers, and which the burin of Bourdon and his pupils has preserved, in which architecture is the object. It bears a singular title, "Magnificentia." Artemisia, surrounded by her women, contemplates the monument which she has erected to and also stables for the horses. The stalls for cattle were commonly in the fields. Astonishment is excited by the abundance of metals, both of the precious and baser ones, with which the mansions were adorned, and of which the household utensils were made. The walls glittered with them; the seats were made of them. Water for washing was presented in golden ewers on silver salvers; the benches, arms, utensils, were ornamented with them. Even if we suppose that much, called golden, was only gilded, we still have reason to ask, whence this wealth in precious metals? Homer gives us a hint respecting the silver, when he speaks of it as belonging to Aliba, in the land of the Halizones. Most of the gold probably came from Lydia, where this metal in later times was so abundant that the Greeks were, for the most part, supplied with Mansias. Here the decorator has proved himself to be possessed of extraordinary invention. This monument, of which the model exists nowhere but in the brain of our artist, is composed of three orders of architecture piled one upon another, and is surmounted by a pyramid which, on all sides, presents a flight of steps running from the base to the summit. From the angles of the edifice dart forth four horses in a row, which prance and are kept down with difficulty by the groans. This immense tomb, which is opened in its lower part by a gallery of the Ionic order, shuts up and closes as it rises in elevation. The second story receives light by arches, which separate pilasters of the Doric order. The third story is without windows, and completely closed up, and it is pleasing to survey the steps ranging round the pyramid and reminding us of the great and majestic stairs which lead to the lower gallery.

The last days of the life of Sebastien Bourdon were absorbed in ceaseless labour. According to a very excellent authority, the "Dictionnaire des Beaux Arts," he worked in a sort of garret, where he sometimes remained whole months without coming out. He covered his canvas with unexampled and unceasing activity. Though age had a little softened his natural fire, he preserved enough to have the decoration of a palace confided to him; a kind of painting which, as we have already remarked, so admirably suited his fertility of mind and the rapidity of his brush. Louis XIV., in fact, confided to him, in company with Nicholas Loir, his pupil, and already his rival, the task of decorating some halls of the palace of the Tuilleries, especially some of the lower halls. But Bourdon was unable to finish the task he had undertaken. A violent fever seized him in the month of May, 1671, and carried him off in a few days, at the early age of fifty-five. He died president of the Academy.

There was also a certain Guilletot, whose renown does not seem to have extended very far. Learned men alone are aware that he copied an unlimited the landscapes of Bourdon as well as he could.

Felibien, who was the friend of Sebastian Bourdon, speaks with interest of the prodigious facility of this master, whose error, however, he freely censures, while he is warmed and animated by the fire which animates his works, especially in his youth and riper age. But a writer who appears to have admired Bourdon very much, cannot help expressing his regret "that he did not finish his pictures a little more, and that he did not preserve that boldness and that courage of the mind which gives strength to perfect his invention by constant labour."* We may be allowed to suggest that, perhaps, a greater assiduity would not have corrected the defects of a too ardent imagination. "It is even true," says Felibien,† "that his first thoughts, and what he executed with

THE FLIGHT OF THE HOLY FAMILY. FROM A PAINTING BY BOURDON.

Bourdon left behind him several daughters, who were very successful painters in the miniature style; and some pupils, who were rather too faithful to the frivolous traditions which he had brought from Italy and spread over France. We have mentioned Nicholas Loir, who was more of a colourist than Bourdon, and Fribquet de Vaurose, professor of anatomy in the Academy of Painting, who, more of an engraver than a painter, undertook the task of reproducing the works of his master in line engravings. To these names we must add that of Pierre Mosnier, who was only a heavy Academician, different in this respect from the wit Piron, who wrote his own epitaph:

Cy-gît Piron

Pas même Academicien

the least finish, were the works which were then more successful than those which he tried to work up more completely; because at the first outset, the fire of his imagination supplied him with the power to satisfy the eyes; but when he tried to paint a subject completely, he stopped short, and could never successfully carry it to the point it should have reached. In this way, by too careful a work, he obscured his first ideas, rather than rendered them clear and beautiful. This has often been noticed with regard to portraits from his pencil. For whatever pains he took to complete a head, it was noticed that the more he sought to reach the tural and the likeness, the more it fled before him, because he did not sufficiently comprehend the first principles of his art."

We are told, on the subject of this marvellous improvisatorial painter of Montpellier, that one day he laid a wager to finish, in a day's work, twelve heads of the size of life, and that he won his wager. We are credibly informed that they were by no means the worst heads produced by his fertile pencil. So much power of prompt conception and quick painting was partly owing to a very dangerous faculty for an artist to possess, memory. He seldom had seen a thing and forgotten nothing. His head was like one of those museums, in which are collected all the finest pieces of every school of painting. Hence his reminiscences, sometimes flagrant, sometimes faint, sometimes lumpy, sometimes disjointed, ineffectual, and discordant.

We could point out many of these evident and marked instances of memory, in a series otherwise so beautiful. "The Seven Deeds of Mercurius," the originals of which are in this country, the engravings everywhere, one of which we reproduce (p. 8), under the title of "Works of Mercurius." Raphael, Poussin, and Hannibal Carracci, are all held under contribution. Here we have a figure of the "Incendio del Borgo" taken wholesale; here a complete copy of the Germanicus of Poussin. The masterpieces of Bologna and those of Venice find in him to the caprices of the French painter. But we must be just. These diverse reminiscences Bourdon makes his own. Figures, gestures, attitudes, everything which from all sides comes to his memory, he unites, he "marries" together, and introduces them to his own canvases, which, after all, is improvisation—original creation, if we may associate these two words which have so little right to meet together. Sebastien Bourdon stamps with his clix the treasures he has pilfered here and there, and it may be said that his work is a melting down of Italian coins.

From Sebastien Bourdon to Nicolo' Poussin, there is apparently but a little interval; but that interval is the magic abyss of genius. Imagination, wit, memory—these are, doubtless, very fine qualities in a painter. But there must be added to them that profound sentiment, that sublime reason, that judgment, which Poussin calls Le Rameau d'or de Virgile, qui est le port emillie, s'il n'est ex duit par le destin.* The golden branch was what Sebastien Bourdon wanted, to take the very first rank in the French school. There are too many thoughts with a want of judgment, they become scattered and without guide, just as the Jewish multitude of whom Tacitus speaks, who finding themselves without masters, were struck with terror and alarm. Vulgus sine rectore periculum, scena!

Bourdon, as we have said, is not known by his pictures alone; painters of a certain class admire him also for etchings and engravings. D'Arzeville only attributes forty to him, but the number must be raised to forty-four, and the description of them may be found in the excellent work of M. Robert Dumesnil, "Le Peintre-Graveur français." To this the learned student is referred; we shall confine ourselves to the best of the pieces.

OLD TESTAMENT. "The Return of Jacob;" "The Seven Works of Pity," a continued series of pieces in Roman figures, with the following titles:—"Esurientes pascere;" "Potare sitientes;" "Hospitio capere (excipere) advena;" "Vestire nudos;" "Liberos curare;" "Liberare captivos;" "Sepelire mortuos." These seven works, engraved and known by the above names, were copies of seven pictures which are now in England. They are his finest productions. There is in them great nobility in the arrangement of the figures and in the lines, but the details are diminished and sacrificed to the dignity of the figures. The expression we should expect to meet, the evangelical tenderness of the sacred text which the painter has sought to translate, are replaced by a somewhat grand eccentricity, by a marked and striking style which astonishes and pleases. "The Works of Mercurius," allied as they are with reminiscences, have become a potent source of inspiration for subsequent artists; they have, in fact, been copied by L. Audran—a fact which demonstrates their success.

NEW TESTAMENT. "The Angelic Salutation;" "The Visitation;" "The Annunciation to the Shepherds;"

* That golden branch of Virgil, which nobody can pick, unless he is led on by destiny.

HOLY FAMILIES. Oval pieces. "The Virgin;" "The Virgin and the Christ;"

UNFINISHED PIECES.—"The Virgin and Book;" "The Virgin of 1649;" "The Infant Christ trampling on Sin;" "The Flight into Egypt;" another "Flight into Egypt."

LARGE PIECES.—"The Holy Family and St. Catherine;" "The Virgin of the Terrace;" "The Virgin and the Bird;" "The Dream of Joseph;" "The Angel advising St. Joseph;" "Flight into Egypt;" another "Flight into Egypt;" "Halt in Egypt;" "Return from Egypt;" "The Holy Family and Angels;" "The Holy Family and the Washerwoman;" "The Baptism of the Eunuch."

SCENES. Two pieces in the style of Pierre de Laee, not numbered. "The Poor resting;" "The Child drinking."

LANDSCAPES, chiefly with subjects from the Old and New Testament. These form a series of twelve, not figured, and to which the catalogue of M. Robert Dumesnil gives no name, but of which there is a full description.

There are three apocryphal pieces attributed to Bourdon:—

1. "The Holy Family," in an octagon frame. This piece has been recognised to be the work of Jean Miel, in the excellent catalogue of Rossi, picture-dealer at Rome, in 1700, in which we find this line:—"Intaglio d'argento forte di Giovanni Miele."

2. "The Holy Family," full length, which M. Robert Dumesnil supposes to be by Cars, who is simply called the publisher of it.

3. "The Virgin beneath an Arch," which is believed to have been executed by Mariette.

The engravings of Bourdon show the power of his talent in many respects; but, as we have had occasion to remark, they are rough, and want finish. The extremities of his figures want correctness and delicacy. His heads are marked by distinctness, and his Virgins are admirable in their attitudes.

With regard to the engravings which have been executed after Sebastien Bourdon, there are many of very mediocore character, and a few only that are worthy of being admired. Amongst these may be quoted those of Van Schuppen, Natalis, Bailly, Pitau, Boulanger, and Nanteuil.

The last-mentioned engraved one, admirably, as usual, of the Queen of Sweden, which is known by having the following verses at the bottom:

"Christine peut donner des lois,
Aux cœurs des vainqueurs les plus braves,
Mais la terre a-t-elle des rois,
Qui soient dignes d'en être esclaves?" *

The first proofs of this fine portrait have a full stop at the end of the verses; the second have a note of interrogation, in the form of an S; the third have the ordinary note of interrogation.

Natalis engraved, after Bourdon, some valuable plates; especially "A Holy Family with Angels;" "The Marriage of St. Catherine;" and "The Virgin, with the Infant Christ asleep." In the first proofs of this work the bosom of the Virgin is not covered.

Van Schuppen has engraved "The Virgin and Dove;" in brilliant style, the first proofs of which are before the drapery is made to cover the child. At public sales these fetch over £3.

Picard le Romain, Boydell, and Earlam, also engraved after Bourdon; and the enumeration of these engravings is to be found in the catalogue of Brondes.

Bryan mentioned among the celebrated prints, which "are esteemed by the judicious collector:"—

"Jacob returning to his country in the absence of Ladan."

"Rebecca meeting the servant of Abraham."

"The Ark sent back by the Philistines to the Bethshemites;" source.

The drawings of Bourdon, says D'Arzeville, are full of a delightful fire and freedom. The strokes are generally executed in lead pencil; sometimes in red chalk; and, on rare occasions, with a pen, and a slight wash of Indian ink, bistre, Indian blue, or red chalk, relieved with white; he has also, sometimes, watered the work with black lead and white chalk. He has left several landscapes in water body colour, very effective, though much injured. The drawings of this painter are recognised by his heads, their singular head-dresses, and the extremities, which are heavy and neglected.

As for the numerous paintings of Bourdon, they must be sought for rather in churches than in museums. We have been unable to find a trace of a picture by this master, which is mentioned in the abridgement of D'Argenville, and which it would be curious to find.

"Some business," says his biographer, "took him to Montpellier; and during the short stay he made, Bourdon executed several large pictures, and numerous family portraits. A tailor of this town, esteeming the artist, whom he knew not to be rich, sent him, by a painter named Francis, a complete suit of clothes, with a red cap and cloak. Bourdon made him a present in return of his own portrait, dressed in the same dress, with the same cap, and painted Francis alongside him. This painter looking upon it as a very fine production, made a copy, which he gave to the tailor, and kept the original."

It would be interesting if any tidings could be had of this picture, and we should be glad to learn that some of our learned readers are able to furnish the information.

The Museum of the Louvre has nine pictures by this master:—

1. "Noah offering a Sacrifice to God after leaving the Ark." Valued at £320.
2. "The Halt of the Holy Family." Valued at £320.
3. "Holy Family." Valued at £12.
4. "Christ and the little Children." Valued at £160.
5. "Christ taken down from the Cross." No value is set on this; at the time of the estimation being made, this picture was, doubtless, in some Paris church.
6. "The Crucifixion of St. Peter." Variouslly estimated at £400 and £300.
7. "Julius Caesar before the Tomb of Alexander," a picture in the style of Poussin. Valued at £110.
8. "A Halt of Gipsies." Valued at £140.
9. "The Portrait of Sebastien Bourdon." He is seated, and holds in his hands the head of Caracalla. Estimated at £80 and £100.

These are all that are found in the "Handbook of 1817." But in examining the new French galleries of the Louvre, we find another portrait, and two other Bambocchades of Bourdon, in the style of Jean Miel and also Le Nain, in a gray tone, which would be agreeable if it was not too uniform.

It appears to us that the connoisseurs, who in general underrated the real value, have here given it too high.

The Louvre also possesses some drawings of Bourdon, more precious even than his paintings.

We remark amongst these, studies for the "Crucifixion of St. Peter," and the repetition of the same subject with changes.

"Tobias burying one of the Children of Israel by Torchlight;" a drawing washed over pencil and touched up with white.

"The Apparition of the Saviour and the Père Éternel granting the prayers of St. Roch;" a drawing with the pen touched up with white.

The "Portrait of the Author," after that which he painted in the picture of "Simon the Magician."

The "Adoration of the Magi," drawn with a pen, coloured, in the collection of Mariette.

In the native town of Sebastien Bourdon, there are some fine works of this master. The following are contained in the Fabre Museum at Montpellier.

1. "The Portrait of a General."
2. "A Landscape," a very large composition, but not equal in conception to its size.
3. "Landscape crossed by a River."
4. "Discovery of the body of St. Theresa."

The three last pictures were given to the town by the founder of the museum, M. Fabre.

5. "A Halt of Gipsies," gift of M. Valadet, of Paris.
6. "A Descent from the Cross," a little picture, presented to the museum by the government.
7. "Portrait of a Spaniard." This was formerly in the mayor's house at Montpellier.

8. "Portrait of Bourdon which he painted of Caracalla." A copy from that of the Louvre, by M. F. de L., in a panel of the art academy of Montpellier.

In the Museum of Grenoble, is "The Continence of Scipio." This picture formerly formed a part of the gallery of the Hotel of Brestovilliers, of which we have already spoken. It was placed over one of the chimneys of that hotel. In 1811, it was given to the Museum of Grenoble by the imperial government. In that of Toulouse, "The Martyrdom of St. Aude." This picture is well painted, and is not wanting in style. In the Museum of Lille, "A Car supported by Angels."

The paintings of Sebastien Bourdon which are found in the Museum of the Louvre are not small. The signature, which is preserved of this painter, is taken from the record of the old academy of painting, of which he was the master.

ANTONIO SOLARIO, II. ZINGARO.*

THE BRIGAND-PAINTER OF NAPLES.

SALVATOR ROSA has accustomed the student of art to the wild scenes of those forest-clad mountains where lived, in days when the world had little else to do but fight, bands of lawless men, whose avocation, though not much worse than that of many a hired band of condottieri in the pay of the emperor, pope, or duke, was without the pale of the law, and subjected them when captured to most serious consequences. But here it was, amidst the rugged fastnesses and savage gorges, where pines and rough briars and the wild flower only grew, and where the foot of nothing but man or goat could make way, that Salvator drew his inspiration, and that many an artist before and since has sought that gift, which the outward world can never give, if the inner soul be not gifted with its burning light. Steady and observation never created poet or painter. It has finished and elevated both; it never made one.

There is a gorge which opens near the Mount Velino, on the road by which travellers sought some years ago many years, indeed, ago, the city of Naples. It is wilder and more striking, even, than any other around. The road, which has wound along the side of a hill for some time, suddenly becomes level for about a hundred feet, bordered on one side by a precipitous bank, which towers fifty feet above, before it slopes away, clad with trees, upwards to the mountain; on the other, by a fall of half as many feet down to where a small hollow, in which a spring nestled from the sun, precedes another hill-side, which falls away into a rich plain below. At the end of this level space, the road narrows, and is overhung by trees that border what, in heavy rains, is a mountain-torrent—in warm and dry weather, a stony and gloom-clad gorge.

* The painting to which this episode in Italian art refers is now in Naples, in the Galleria de' Capri d'Opera, and divides audience with superb productions from the pencils of Titian, Spagnoletto, Sebastiano del Piombo, Raffaele, Giulio Romano, Andrea del Sarto, Annibale Carraccio, Velasquez, Claude Lorraine, Domenichino, Correggio, and others. The Virgin is represented on a throne, surrounded with saints, and the Boy Jesus on those of Colantonio's daughter. The portrait of H. Zingaro and his father-in-law, we also introduce, the latter, even, the gentleman—says M. Lalry—"of a very ugly old man." There is, indeed, a strong and singular resemblance in the lives of the Brigand of Naples and the Blacksmith of Antwerp. Nor is there reason to doubt the truth of each account. All the biographers of the Italian painter relate the incidents connected with H. Zingaro, becoming an artist. They are related pretty fully in Count Orléans' "Essai sur l'Histoire de la Peinture en Italie," tom. ii., p. 330—345. The particulars relative to Quintin Matsys are more familiar to general readers. H. Zingaro was born in 1382, and died in 1455. Quintin Matsys, born in 1450, died in 1529. The inscription on his monument outside the Cathedral of Antwerp is: "Comitibus Amore Mulieribus fecit Apollonius."

It was along this somewhat picturesque bridle-path, for it was scarcely anything more, that, one summer afternoon, two men rode in grave discourse. They were men of different ages. The one was about five-and-twenty, the other about forty; and, from their materials beneath. There were lace ruffles, too, a jaunty cap of dark velvet, a plume, a dagger, a sword, a short Spanish cloak, pistols—all, in fact, that belonged to a gay cavalier in a day when men were more mindful of their exterior than of the soul within, which, in the majority of instances, they left to its own impulsive culture.

The serving-man was a gaunt, tall fellow, with little eyes, a large mouth, low forehead, and an expression which seemed to convey much cunning and little confidence in his own physical powers. As he rode along, he appeared anxious to make as little of himself as possible; and, for this purpose, stooped low, and rode with his dress, it was pretty evident they were master and man. The younger of the two wore a kind of semi-warlike costume, that left his profession in doubt. He was well-knit, of middle height, and not ill-looking. His features were marked, and a little coarse, though a thoughtful and somewhat intellectual expression softened the outline which otherwise would have been harsh. His hair was light; his nose thin, and rather aquiline; his mouth wearing an aspect of singular scornfulness; his eyes having a habit of searching beyond his age. He wore a fine tunic of cambric and lace, the collar of which showed his neck; and over this a doublet of dark cloth, which, though fastened at the waist, showed the rich head projecting over that of his horse, only sorry that he could not wholly vanish and conceal himself from mortal eyes. He had by his side an armoury of weapons—a vast blunderbuss, two huge horse-pistols, a rapier that would have delighted the celebrated knight of La Mancha, and an old breastplate, that would equally have moved the heart of that worthy descendant of Amadis of Gaul.

“Ma jök,” said the serving-man, in tones of reproachful gravity; “why do you laugh, maitre Louis?”

“I never look at thee, worthy André of my heart, but I do laugh,” replied the other in the peculiar tones which immemorially belong to a genuine Parisian. “Thy armoury is worthy of the most valiant Bayard, whom, doubtless, thou art anxious to rival."

"No—no!" cried the other in a deprecating tone, glancing hurriedly round at the road they had passed, and eyeing each bush and tree with uneasiness, speaking, meanwhile, for any lurking brigand who might overhear him. "I don't want to fight—I'm not a fighting man. I couldn't draw this sword—it's too long; the pistols are extracted from a collection of curiosities; and the

"I said nothing about my volume," resumed the other drily. "I was only observing that a more faithful friend and devoted servant the respected Chamoiné of St. Denis—Heaven bless him!—could not have found. I never leave you, sir; I never complain; you kick me—I say nothing; I am the dog obeying the dissatisfied master——" gun has not been loaded these fifty years. Besides, I've a good respect for the gentlemen of these mountains."

"Silence, radotte!" said the other sternly. "I do believe my uncle gave me such a wretched serving-man to make me ludicrous. There's more valour in a vineyard scarecrow than in thy whole body, and more death in a jar of Falernian than in thy whole armoury."

"I don't know about what death there is in Falernian wine; I know there's more taste in it than in my master's head. Why, where could you get such another page?"

"André Mothe, haiker," said the Frenchman drily; "I took thee to please my uncle; I dislike thee not personally, but I have thee imposed on me."

"Sure I am, I never imposed upon any one."

"Name it thy dull jokes, knave. But mind you, André, I can bear thee very well, if thou art not, as I expect, a spy. My uncle sent thee to watch and send tales to him of my acts."

"No, sir," began the man; "I may retail some of your adventures by way of small talk, but I am incapable of reporting."

"How dost thou mean, insufferable bandaud?" asked the other fiercely.

"Why, sir, to retail a fact only requires a tongue, but to report requires a pen, and André Mothe never was suspected of writing before."

"So much the better, Monsieur André; that consoles me, because, when we return to France, I have but to cut thy throat to prevent thee telling any of thy long-winded stories to my uncle."

"Then take my word, sir, if you stick in that mind, I shall not stick to you."

"Be then on thy good behaviour (= oh! what have we here? soldiers of the emperor or bandits? Draw, maître André, and show thy valour."

"I'd rather show my heels," said maître André, trembling and falling off his horse as if shot; "now, my good gentlemen," he roared, "be merciful. I'm the father of seven children, entirely dependent on—"

"Silence, coward! What want ye? Why bar you the road? We are quiet travellers; but if you seek battle, we are ready. Up, André, and shoot the first man who—"

"No, I won't; I'll be shot myself first. Good messieurs, my name is André; I'm a poor serving-man."

"Get up," said a rough fellow, "get up; or, by our lady of Loreto, I'll give you more inches of my steel than ever you eat of macaroni. Signor Cavalier, resistance is useless. We are nine. Our orders are to use no unnecessary violence, but down with your sword, or—"

The young Frenchman surveyed his enemies. They were nine as ill-looking Abruzzi bandits as ever startled a quiet traveller, and all armed to the teeth, with odd-looking muskets, swords, pikes, and other weapons of the day. Their eyes were fierce and their gestures menacing. To fly was to ensure a dangerous volley, to advance was impossible.

"Gentlemen," exclaimed the volatile Frenchman, taking off his velvet cap, after sheathing his sword, "your arguments are over-powering. I resign myself to their cogency."

The brigands smiled, and assisted the son of Gaul to alight, while one with a hearty kick induced André to rise. They then disarmed both, gave their horses to a lad of their party, and, placing their prisoners in their midst, moved up the gorge, which, rough as it was, appeared a familiar road to the whole of the band.

About half-a-mile higher up in the hills, where the rocks were nearly barren, was the place where the brigands were wont to encamp. A small ledge of rock, marked by many fires, lay before a cove of no very large dimensions—but still sufficient for the shelter of some dozen men accustomed to the rough life of the mountains. Within this cave, which was hung round by gay apparel, guns, swords, pistols, and the floor of which was covered by rude beds, sat a solitary man—scarcely a man either, but a beardless youth, of not more than nineteen summers. Rudely dressed in the gaudy attire of those mountains, he was, by the light of a torch of pine, a study for a painter. His face was very handsome. A lofty forehead, dark, curling hair, a mouth of wonderful expression, combined with marked though regular features, and a commanding form, to make him a perfect study. But it was his eye that attracted chief attention. It seemed to roll in an absolute frenzy, as he sat wrapped in thought, a book on his knee, a book which he had just abandoned—he, the runaway favourite of a convent to think, and that book, Dante. He had been poring over it for hours, until the light of day had faded, and then he had lit a torch and read, until the magic of the poet's lute had awakened in him ideas, thoughts, and feelings which, though already common, grew stronger and stronger every day.

Beneath the swarthy skin of that youth, there burned that restless, nameless fire, which impels to deeds of good and ill. A yearning for something beyond that rude life already overcame him. Already had its impetuous feelings driven him from the calm convent cell to a cavern in the Abruzzi. A student who devoured books, especially books of song, records of heroism, deeds that won for man and woman immortal fame, the lad had in the library of the abbot felt that uneasy craving for action which often pervades the being of the man born for a purpose, the man inspired by the intuitive desires of genius. Fired, inflamed, excited to a pitch of frenzy, believing himself capable of anything, he had written verse, made drawings in charcoal in his cell, roused himself to fits of oratory, and then run away to seek fortune. This was at seventeen. At nineteen he was a brigand chief, the life and soul, by force of mere mind, of a band of lawless ruffians, who knew no law but their own passions. There was a wild excitement in the position, which pleased Antonio Solario, and yet he was not satisfied.

Suddenly he started, as the sound of footsteps caught his ear. He rose, took up his gun and went out into the open air, well aware that it must be some of his comrades and men returning, but yet using all the caution which was necessary in his position. If "uneasy is the head that wears a crown," how much more uneasy is the head of the man who seeks to live by rapine, whose hand is against every man, and against whom every man's hand is raised.

"Who comes?" he cried in the rich tones of his native land, with a slight guttural, which often belongs to men of mountain birth.

"It is the band, with prisoners," replied one; and the foremost came suddenly in sight, with the French cavalier and his somewhat prudent servant, the worthy, and in general, merry-tongued André.

"Welcome!" said the brigand chief. "Welcome! I was weary of being alone, and I should have joined you soon. Enter, strangers."

"Your politeness is too strong to be resisted," said the Frenchman, sarcastically.

"Be quiet," muttered André.

"Gentlemen," continued the youth, "sit down and tell me who and what you are. Believe me, we are not so bad as we are painted."

"I do not deny but you would make excellent studies for an artist, but I must say that I prefer those I am in search of in the good city of Naples."

"You are an artist," cried Antonio Solario, impetuously.

"I am," replied the other, "proceeding to Naples to study under Colantonio."

"Then you are welcome; he seated, I beg; your residence here will be less unpleasant than you expected."

The Frenchman smiled, the servant-man André looked agreeably surprised, and the robbers did not appear so gratified as might have been expected at this announcement of their chief, which seemed to convey the impression that he did not intend to pillage the travellers of every article of property they happened to have about them. Not being artists in practice or in ideas, they could not sympathise with the feeling which the announcement of De Rien had excited in Antonio Solario, who was said to be of gipsy origin, and hence was called Il Zingaro.

Of the consequences which ensued from this interview we must speak at a future period.

THE FRENCH EXHIBITION.

ONE of the effects of the present happy union between two nations which should have ever been joined happily in almost marital connexion, has been the foundation of "an Exhibition in London of the productions of the most popular artists of France," which it is hoped "must greatly contribute to augment the esteem of the British public for the French school."

Under the direction of a visiting committee, consisting of two celebrated English artists, Messrs. Stanfield and Maclise, and four other gentlemen more or less connected with art, this Exhibition, the first of its kind, has been opened at No. 121, Pall Mall, opposite the Opera Colonnade. Had not our own Exhibition demanded the first place, we should most assuredly have directed the attention of our readers to this very interesting gallery of paintings, which we accept very heartily, but rather as a promise than as a performance.

The various specimens of the French masters here exhibited are not very numerous (there are but 195 pictures catalogued, a few others appear since to have been added), nor do we believe them to form by any means a fair criterion of the power and ability of artistic France. Still they are decidedly worthy and interesting, and in a few cases, such as the "Delacroix and Ary Scheffer," works of genius which could not be surpassed by any other nation.

The most noticeable thing which strikes the visitor unaccustomed to French pictures, is the want of that glowing colour which peculiarly distinguishes the English, and also the excellent drawing almost everywhere prevalent, an excellence unfortunately not observable in every English picture. There is also, here, a large preponderance of conversational cabinet pictures, beautifully drawn, and imagined with great delicacy, but wanting in force and colour.

Another peculiarity is the arrangement of the numbers, which are not consecutive upon the walls, but stuck about in the oddest manner possible, No. 1 being next to 15, and the next to 102, and so on. Upon consulting the catalogue, the visitor finds that all pictures by the same artist have consecutive numbers; but the pictures being of various sizes, and thus requiring to be separated, the numbers attached thus appear as if they had come up in a lottery.

(No. 6), "Repose," by Henri Baron, is almost familiarised to the reader from his acquaintance with the artist's illustrations upon wood. It is a pleasing design, of good colour.

(No. 7), "The Rose-coloured Domino," by Joseph Beaume, an artist of standing, and celebrated in Paris, is the very best specimen of portrait painting, both as to finish, colour, and grace, in the exhibition. The work in question is, indeed, of very high-class merit.

(No. 7), "Madame Du Barry consulting Cagliostro on her Destiny," by François Bruid, is rather distinguished for its subject than for its treatment.

(No. 13), "Gulliver in the island of Brobdignag—microscopic studies of plants in the forest of Fontainebleau," by the same artist, is worthy to be classed with any eccentric absurdity ever perpetrated by a painter. It is absurd because it travels out of the region of art. An immense canvas is covered with gigantic leaves and flowers, insects, &c., which almost hide Gulliver, who in relation to them is a pigmy, and who seeks to escape from an immense hand, which, with part of a face, far bigger than that "Of Memphian sphinx,

Pedestalled, haply, in some palace court,
When sages looked to Egypt for their lore," is shown in a corner of the picture ready to pounce upon him. Had this been the only picture by Bruid we should have been inclined to speak but slightly of him. (No. 14) however, "The Interior of a Custom-house," with an enraged lady, whose bonnet has been completely sacrificed by the douaniers, and several other victims of these intelligent officers, affords us one of the few pictures which are provocative of mirth, and at the same time artistic. The picture before us is full of very high comedy, and although hilarious in the highest degree, and perfectly true to nature, is by no means coarse.

(No. 43), "The Portrait of the Emperor on Horseback," by Alfred de Dreux, is admirable, not only as a portrait, but as a work of art. The position is spirited and free; the drawing of the horse might be improved.

(No. 46), "An Arab Woman," by Auguste Delacroix, is a fine study, remarkable for its colour.

Paul Delacroix, one of the greatest of French artists, not only of the present day, but also of all time, is represented here by four specimens from his pencil. (No. 49), "The Great Artists of the Revival," which seems to be a sketch of the composition painted in fresco in the hemicycle of the Ecole des Beaux Arts, Paris, and which is scarcely within our province; (No. 50), "The Death of the Duc de Guise;" (No. 50^b), "Napoleon at Fontainebleau;" and (No. 51), "The Burgomaster's Family," a sepia drawing. Of these "The Death of the Duc de Guise" is the chief. It is the property of the Duc d'Anmale, and is a work of art of the highest class, at the same time that it is of the most ambitious kind—the historical. The stiffening corpse of Guise, lying with glazed eyes and matted hair; the whispering group of assassins, one of whom is sheathing his sword; the approach of the king, who draws back the arras with a guilty look, are all excellent. The grouping and attitudes are true to nature, and by no means exaggerated. The costume and details of the picture accurate and most carefully painted. The chiaroscuro is especially remarkable, everything being perfectly distinct in the darkened gleam of the vast chamber. This picture has been now painted some twenty years, and criticism on so well known and valued a work of art may, therefore, be somewhat supererogatory; but we would earnestly call the attention of all English artists to this picture, which they now have an opportunity of studying.

Louis Davidoux, pupil of Paul Delacroix, contributes two specimens of paintings, which are both excellent in colour, but which are destroyed by the subject; they are (No. 52), "The Chinese Guitarist," in which a not ungraceful Chinese woman is represented as playing upon that instrument, and (No. 53), a pendant to the foregoing. The high cheekbones, and the transverse position of the eye betokening the Mongolian race, render the pictures so opposite to ideas of beauty formed in an European school, that we look upon these rather as curiosities than works of art.

(No. 54) and (No. 56), "Cupid and the Graces," and the "Woodcutter's Family," quite stand out from amongst the surrounding pictures; the colour being remarkably beautiful, very much in the manner of the best productions of Titian. They are painted by Diaz, an artist who has studied much in Rome.

"The Widow's Mite" (No. 60), by Edouard Dubufe, is a production worthy of his father's pupil. Our readers will call to mind a pleasing example of the elder Dubufe, now in the Vernon Gallery.

Of (No. 67), "Cows and Landscape," and (No. 67^b), another "Landscape," by the same artist, Raymond Esbrau, we can say little favourably. In truth, the French do not by any means excel in landscape. Not so, however, in cabinet conversational pictures, of which the next thirteen pictures in the catalogue, from No. 68 to No. 80, are excellent examples. The four first, "Consulting Cards;" "A Young lady;" "Meditation;" and "A Page," are by Jean Fauvelet, a pupil of Lacour. The remainder are by Eugene Fichel, pupil of Drolling and Delacroix. Of his productions, "The Music Lesson," and "The Desert," are probably the best, but all are excellent. The drawing is capital, the accessories well managed, and the colour, which is the most faulty part of the pictures, is delicate. The great fault in these little gems is, that they want force; but a little varnish, for which the majority of the pictures in the exhibition are perishing, would add both brilliancy and force to them.

"A House in Cairo" (No. 84), and "A Street" in the same city, by Theodore Frere, are picturesque and interesting; both productions are well painted.

Edouard Frere, another of the pupils of Paul Delacroix, contributes five cabinet pictures of the class criticised above. Of these (No. 86), "La Blanchisseuse," and (No. 89), "The Prayer," are most excellent. They are distinguished by all the qualities which distinguish those before noticed.

(No. 90), "The Caravan," by Eugene Fromentin, is a desert scene, painted with great force and extraordinary knowledge of the subject.

Theodore Guclin, who, in common with the majority of artists noticed, has received both medals and honours, has sent to this exhibition no less than six sea-pieces; of these, none of which can bear comparison with our English masters. Cooke or Clarke or Stanfield, (No. 100), "Fishing Boats in a gulf," is perhaps the best. (No. 104), "Evening after a Week," is also highly meritorious.

(No. 105), "Virginia at the Bath," from St. Pierre's well-known romance, is a very nicely painted and drawn production by Oscar Guet.

C. Hoguet, contributes five landscapes and several sea-pieces, none of which are of a very high class. Eugene Isabay, a name well known from the fame of a former artist, is also represented by various sea-pieces of usual merit; and Charles Louis Legn has sent five sea-pieces, well painted, and excellent in finish and colour. Still, it is neither in landscape or in sea-piece that the French, judging from this exhibition, excel.

(Nos. 126 and 127) are two "Portraits of parallel reformers, Calvin and Luther." They are undoubtedly well painted, but the flesh tints are somewhat dark. The portraits are at once recognised, being evident studies from known pictures of these great men.

So (No. 144), "The Right of Might," by Eugene Pottévin, is one of the finest and most originally-treated pictures in the exhibition. A camp-follower of the time of the Wars of the League, stripped to his waist, and infuriated by drink, is represented in a farm-yard, with his foot upon a pig which he has stuck; a naked sword in one hand and a pet rabbit hanging dead from the other. The farm buildings burst in flame around him, and in the distance a woman struggles in the arms of one of his comrades, whilst amidst the wreck, the principal figure roars out a drunken catch. Anything more finely conceived, or originally treated, it is hard to imagine. Its quaintness and truth are fully equal to any of the groups of "Les Misères de la Guerre," of the renowned Jacques Callot.

published of the "Francesca di Rimini of Dante." The entire devotion of love was never more thoroughly and chastely exhibited; Paolo, in pain and contrition, veils his face from Dante and Virgil, whilst around him Francesca clasps her arms, tears at the time starting from her eyes, as, thus embracing, the figures are borne onwards through the gloom of Hades.

And firm, to their sweet nest returning home,
Cleave the air, wafted by their will along;

Her Majesty, we believe, commissioned the admirable artist to execute this duplicate, for which she has given £1,200. Ary Scheffer has five other productions in the gallery, but none of them are of equal interest with the one we have criticised, and all of them want the glow of colour which distinguishes Titian, Rubens, and our own Etty.

Last on the catalogue are two pictures by Horace Vernet, one of

GRAMMAR.—FROM A PAINTING BY LOUÏSON

(No. 155) "Greek Children," by J. de Moulignon, has the merit of excellent colour and drawing.

From No. 161 to No. 168, the productions of Antoine Emille Flassan, are cabinet pictures, so delicate in their finish, and chaste in their execution, that they have attracted universal attention and admiration; the best of this artist's productions (No. 162), "The Foot Bath," a little picture, which is perfect in every respect, has been, we hear, purchased by her Majesty, at a price which, for the size, is very high indeed. It does not measure more than ten or twelve inches, and has been sold for forty guineas.

(No. 170), "An Incident in the life of Peter the Great, wherein he attends Menzikoff upon his sick bed," by Robert Fleury, is an historical composition of great merit. It does not, however, from its size and the unpleasant nature of the composition, show to advantage in this gallery.

(No. 176) is an admirable drawing of a "Turkish Odalisque, laughing, as she indolently langes in the enjoyment of a Chibouque." The texture of the skin, the ease and grace of the figure, are beautifully rendered by the artist Schlesinger.

The great attraction of the room is the piece by Ary Scheffer, a reproduction of his picture so well known from the engravings which only (No. 194), "Hunting the Mouton in Africa," is a fine specimen of his powers. The drawing of this is as spirited and excellent as Horace Vernet's productions usually are, the drawing is especially fine. In the second (No. 195), "Death Purifying the Soul," an allegory is attempted, which, in our opinion, as the majority of allegories do, signally fails. The arrangement is besides faulty, and the sky so intensely and deeply blue, as to be, to English eyes at least, unnatural.

There is one thing which the visitor will be struck with, not in the gallery but in the catalogue, where he will find that every artist, even of comparatively moderate capability, has had honours abundantly showered upon him, and everything has been done to elevate him in his art. He will contrast English encouragement to art most disadvantageously in this respect, and will involuntarily recall Mr. Thackeray's dictum in the last number of the Newcome's, "that a gentleman may be allowed to toy but not to marry with the Muse of Painting, and that an English gentleman would as soon think of bringing up his son as a confectioner or hairdresser as of placing him as a pupil to a painter."

If it only induces our "Society" to remedy this injustice, the French Exhibition will have done much for English art.

ADRIAN VANDERVELDE.

NATURE never showed herself to this painter but full of grace and sweetness, smiling and happy as youth. Bitten in her aspect to Ruysdael, arid and melancholy to Wynants, she appears to have however perturbed, that will not catch a gleam of inward peace. By what miracle of art is it possible that, with a few colours spread over his canvas, the artist is enabled to awaken in us the same ineffable sentiment of repose, of abandonment, and happiness that the actual colour of the fields and the solitude of nature produce? To paint trees, animals, meadows, woods, and lakes, with a surprising fidelity to truth, is, without doubt, a rare merit, but may we not wonder that Nature should ever permit what a poet used to call the secret of her influence to be ravished from her?

Few men have attained celebrity in any intellectual pursuit without having, at a very early age, given striking proofs of the natural bent or their inclination for it. This is particularly true of poets and painters. Every one is aware of the truth contained in the well-known quotation, and, however much a man may exert himself, however skilful he may become in the mere mechanical part of the art, in the nice appreciation of lights and shades, however great the praise he may possibly attain at Cambridge or Oxford, for a certain number of shining polished lines, dignified by the name of a prize poem, and destined, after no very long space of time, to be buried for ever in oblivion, he will never be a poet unless Nature herself has implanted the sacred fire in his heart; if she has done so, that fire will give indications of its existence in the spring of life as certainly as that, in the spring of the year, the blossom will precede the fruit.

reserved for Vandervelde her loveliest pastorals, her most refreshing verdure, and her most invigorating brooks. In contemplating the meadows in which this master groups his goats, his sheep, and his ruminating cattle, there is no mind, however ill at ease, no spirit,

What is true of poetry, is true also of painting; and Vanderdelde is one of the very numerous examples in support of our assertion. Scarcely had he learnt to read, before he had learnt to paint. During the hours when he was not at school, he seized the brushes belonging to his brother, or his relation William, who was six years older than himself, and behaved with an indefatigable hand the walls and even the furniture of his paternal home.* The animals, the cows, the sheep, and the goats, whose peculiarities of form and feature he was subsequently desirous to reproduce in unequalled perfection, formed the subjects of his first essays. His father, who was a ship painter, saw with regret that his son preferred the more elegant and artistic pencil to the unwieldy brush which he himself had handled all his life. He was, therefore, but little inclined to admire the drawings and paintings with which the young Adrian covered the walls of his house. One day, however, Adrian dared even to paint a millmaid on the foot of his father's bed, and this painting so far exceeded any of his former attempts, that the old painter gave up all hope of conquering his son's evident vocation. He determined to take him to John Wynaerts, who at that time enjoyed a high reputation at Haarlem; and this great master, on seeing the child's sketches, was unable to conceal his surprise and admiration. It is related that Wynaerts' wife, who was present, exclaimed to her husband: "Wynaerts, you have found your master!" †

This happened at Amsterdam, where Vanderdelde was born in 1699. Entirely devoted to his art, he soon justified, if not the prediction, at least the enthusiasm, of the wife of Wynaerts. This, however, did not for a moment awaken the jealousy of the master, who only felt proud of having had such a pupil. A noble example, but one which is rarely met with in the history of art! It is said that his introduction to Wynaerts made him acquainted with Philip Wouwermans, who was his senior by some years, and who also was a pupil of Wynaerts. The intimacy of the two young students were very similar, and this circumstance caused a feeling of friendship to spring up between them, which was not without a beneficial influence upon Vanderdelde, whom Philip Wouwermans aided with the advice his greater experience enabled him to give.‡ He ever this may be, it was not long before Vanderdelde familiarised himself with every practical difficulty of his profession; and Wynaerts himself declared that he no longer needed any instruction, excepting from that great mistress—Nature,—who has always endless lessons in store for the man of genius. It may be said with truth, that no artist was ever a more studious observer of nature than Adrian Vanderdelde. He never permitted his imagination to supply the knowledge in which he was deficient, and it is easily perceived that he never painted a picture, or executed an etching, without having beforehand prepared himself by making patient studies of every object which he was desirous of representing.

That this is the only way in which a man, however gifted, is sure of becoming a great painter, we have the testimony of one of the greatest artists that England ever produced:—"I can repeat," says Sir Joshua Reynolds, addressing the students of the Royal Academy, "you are never to lose sight of nature: the instant you do, you are all abroad, at the mercy of every gust of fashion, without knowing or seeing the point to which you ought to steer. Whatever trip you make, you must still have nature in your eye. . . . Let me recommend to you not to have too great dependence on your pencil or memory, however strong those impressions may have been which are there deposited. They are for ever wearing out, and will be at last obliterated, unless they are continually freshened and revived." §

The qualities which strike us so forcibly in nature are her softness and repose. In the pictures of Vanderdelde the flocks feed in rich pastures, beneath noble trees whose leaves are scarcely moved by a breath of air, with the pale azure skies above, in a sort of terrestrial paradise where the noise of the world does not penetrate, and the agitations of the heart are calmed. There is scarcely an amateur in Europe who has not viewed with delight his "Sunrise," in the Louvre, or at least the beautiful engraving of it which was executed during the last century. Who does not feel inclined to sit down for a few hours beside those careless herdsmen, who are fishing on the bank of the river? To the right, in the distant horizon, some light clouds, rose and amber-coloured, announce the rising sun. The earth is awaking gently, the water flows silently on, the foliage is almost motionless, and the pure invigorating air of daybreak braces the limbs that have been relaxed by sleep. The animals themselves appear to enjoy this refreshing coolness, which the sun's rays will soon disperse. The cattle bathe their feet in the waters of the river, which is so still that it might be mistaken for a lake. One of them breathes forth a suppressed and melancholy lowing, and then suddenly ceases, as if alarmed at having disturbed the surrounding silence; another, on a mound, which is sharply defined against the sky, illumined by the sunrise, stretches its powerful neck, and seems, with expanded nostrils, to be snuffing the fresh air.*

Rivalling Paul Potter in the art of representing animals, Vanderdelde is richer in accessories than his illustrious predecessor. Paul Potter concentrates his whole genius on the reproduction of the expression, the physiognomy of the soul—if we may use the expression—of animals. In his eyes the landscape is but an accessory; a scrap of green pasturage suffices him to make a picture, where two cows are lying down at the foot of an oak awaiting the time to return home. Vanderdelde, too, is a great animal painter, but this is not all; he possesses a true feeling for landscape as well. His flocks and herds feed in meadows dotted with bushy trees, and varied by lakes and rivers, beyond which the landscape stretches out until it is lost in the distance, while a gentle breeze slowly scatters across the sky fleecy clouds, such as Karel Dujardin delights to paint. In a word, every beauty of nature is enlisted to contribute to the effect which he desires to produce. The cows and the horses of Paul Potter are unambiguously univalved, and no other painter has been able to combine, in so great a degree, power of reproduction with accuracy of observation; but Vanderdelde, with a different feeling for nature, attained a perfection no less rare, for in his works gracefulness and truth are invariably found united to each other.

The mind of an artist is a mirror, endowed with the marvellous power of reflecting natural objects, and at the same time of communicating to them something, as it were, of human vitality. Nature, infinitely varied in her aspects, takes every form which genius is pleased to give her. Melancholy to poets who are gifted with a restless sensibility, tranquil to hearts that are at rest, strong to impassioned souls, her manifestations are as numerous as the phases of the human mind. To every different person nature wears a different aspect, but in her entirety she is invisible, like the Almighty Creator. A painted landscape is, therefore, not to be regarded as representing only a fragment of material creation, but also the impression produced by the subject of the picture on the mind of the painter. In viewing the paintings of Paul Potter and those of Vanderdelde, we are inclined to fancy one the very image of good-nature, and the other a mixture of gracefulness and simplicity.

The ancients used a sublime word to express their idea of nature; it was: Alta Mater—the kind mother. These words might be placed at the foot of every canvas signed by Vanderdelde, and little would remain to be said to characterise his peculiar spirit. We should err greatly in attributing any system or philosophical consciousness of his power to this simple Dutchman. He only endeavoured to prove himself a skilful and accurate imitator of the objects which he studied carefully in his long country walks. He saw animals, trees, meadows, and grassy hills, and painted them with delight. Animals, above everything else, attracted his attention; their structure, their physiognomy, the varied appearance of their hair, from the fine and glossy coat of the horse, to the long and tangled covering of the goat, is represented in his paintings with the power of rare and pleasing truthfulness.

In the pictures of Vandervelde, the animals always occupy the foreground, and it is to this, no doubt, that we must attribute the pleasing impression which the works of this master produce. Wherever man appears, the repose of solitude takes flight. The silent flock form part of a landscape; they live the same life as the herbage which serves them for food and bed; and they in nowise disturb the sentiment which impresses the soul when viewing the silent landscape. Figures may animate the scene, but they disturb the mystery and destroy the air of peaceful repose. When ever Vandervelde introduces shepherds or shepherdesses into his paintings, he generally takes care to confine them to the middle distance. Thus, in the "Sunrise," the two careless herdsmen who are fishing are scarcely to be perceived; and the whole of the foreground is occupied by cattle, sheep, or goats. These domestic animals need no guardians to prevent their straying from the accustomed pastures, or the calm lake which is their watering-place. In another picture, a woman is conversing at the door of a cottage with two men. It is really a difficult task to discern them beneath the thick foliage of the shadowy oaks, while the eye is attracted by a white cow, painted with charming softness, descending the slope towards the spectators; by a sheep lying down, whose fleece, as seen from behind, is a miracle of execution, and by a cow, also lying down to the right in a half that, whose hind-quarters are modelled with a vision, and painted with a truth of colour, which is unsurpassable.

We may here remark the difference which separates the Dutch painters from the ideas and manner of the French school. "What is chiefly to be blamed in their figures," says de Piles, "is inaction, since this fault deprives them of every connexion with the surrounding landscape, and causes them to appear unreal. Without wishing, however, to shackle painters with any fixed rule, I am persuaded that the best method of causing figures to be appreciated is to arrange them so far in accordance with the character of the landscape as to make it seem as if the landscape had been created entirely for the figures. I would not have them either lasipit or inactive. They should tell some story to excite the interest of the observer, or at least to give a name to the painting, by which it might be distinguished from the mass of others by those who are judges of such matters." How strongly characteristic is it of the national spirit of the French school, that its disciples make the landscape subordinate to the figures, and not the figures to the landscape, never allotting to man a secondary place in nature. An lasipit or useless figure is a fault in the eyes of a French painter, while, on the contrary, the simple Vandervelde, in his love for the country, feared to make his figures play too prominent a part. To him the herdsmen is a part of his flocks, and he is satisfied with the great spirit of nature which seems to sigh in the breeze that moves the tree-tops, or to speak in the deep and solemn lowing of the cattle that crop the herbage in his meadows.

While Berghem delights in multiplying the figures in his paintings, exhausting his spirit and his genius in varying their attitudes, and attracting the eye by his rosy countrywomen with their brilliant skirts and scarlet bodices, Vandervelde leaves the foreground to his flocks, and does not find it necessary that the stillness of nature should be enlivened by the human voice. In his compositions nature preserves the deep poetry and silent happiness of her solitudes. Berghem, who looks at nature through the smiling atmosphere of his imagination, who often ornaments her with historical recollections and the reflection of the brilliant colours with which Italy impressed his imagination, fills his pictures with life and motion. Vandervelde, devoted entirely to his true and almost tender admiration for nature, draws with a more discreet hand. He is generally sparing in detail, and the simplicity of the composition heightens the grace and harmony of the whole.

But though Vandervelde showed such marked predilection for animals, it must not be imagined that he was made to ornament a landscape with graceful and lively animals. It is true, however, that he made less use of this talent for himself than for his friends, except in those pictures where the figures form the chief subject, as in his "Winter," so beautifully engraved by Jacques Allamet.*

* One of those who have most successfully engraved from Adrian Vandervelde, is Jacques Allamet the Elder, who must not be confounded with his brother, François Allamet, an engraver of but little talent or industry. Jacques Allamet was born at Abbeville in 1727, and died at Paris in 1788. He therefore belongs entirely to the eighteenth century, which was a very brilliant period for engraving in France. During that period the French engravers proved themselves thoroughly national, in bringing to bear upon the practice of their art that critical spirit, that elegance and good taste, and that absence of all exaggeration, which characterise the Gaulic character. We shall have some what more to say hereafter respecting the revolution in art to which he contributed more than any other. We may mention here, however, that Jacques Allamet was his pupil. He commenced, says Watlet, by the execution of those small engravings which are introduced into books, and called planches. Huber and Rost have not mentioned these, although deserving of notice. Those which we have seen in the collected edition of his works in the print room of the National Library at Paris, are executed for the most part from the designs of Graylot, and some from those of Bouchard and Cochin. They accompany a very elegant edition of "The Decameron" of Boccaccio, which was published in London in 1755. Although these charming vignettes are small, they are treated broadly, and never slurred over, as often happens when the subjects are confined to such small dimensions.

Jacques Allamet soon attracted the attention of publishers. In fact, it was not difficult for a practical eye to perceive in the vignettes of "The Decameron" a talent which would rise without effort to greater productions, and which would lose nothing in being employed on more important labours. His first attempts were of the class in which he afterwards met with the greatest success, namely, landscapes and sea pieces. His beautiful engravings of "The Fire by Night," "Stormy Weather," and "The Fog," after Joseph Vermet, are the most highly-prized. These are all engraved in perfect accordance with the sentiment of the painter. The plate is full of work, and, like the original picture, presents a full-toned appearance. Deep, close, and bold lines present the effect produced by the brilliant and daring brush of the master. If Jacques Allamet was less successful than Bouchard in rendering the mountain-waves of a stormy sea and their foaming crests, which are so admirable in the celebrated "Tempest" of the latter engraver, yet, on the other hand, he has succeeded in representing with rare fidelity the clouds of mist which it is so difficult to render with the graver or the etching-needle. By mingling different methods of execution, and by lowering, or rather blending, all his lights, Jacques Allamet has imitated to a remarkable degree "The Fog" of Vermet. Following nature, the engraver has left his positive lights only on those objects which are nearest to the eye, while in the background and the sky he has produced the effect of having stippled his plate, and yet he has employed neither the needle to fill up the cross-hatching, nor the roulette, nor any of those processes by which the effect of stamping may be produced. He has thus obtained the soft effect of mezzotint with those tools which would appear most unlikely to produce such a result, the needle and the graver. Still the real merit and originality of Jacques Allamet are more distinctly visible in his landscapes after Berghem than in his sea pieces after Vermet. It is in the former that he has perfected the use of the dry-point, which was invented and first brought into repute by his master, Lebas. By this process he obtained the most varied and pleasing gray tints, and nowhere was he so successful as in the large folio engraving from a landscape by Berghem in the Dresden Gallery. The animals,—the dogs, sheep, goats, cattle, and asses,—though prepared with the etching-needle, were almost entirely finished with the dry-point, as well as the faces of the peasants, whose flesh was wholly executed in this manner; skilfully-applied touches of the graver completed and brought out the work. Opposed to the system of very dark engravings, Allamet is reported by a contemporary to have compared their effect to that produced by a torsion, departing from nature, and grimace on the stage to attract the pleasures of the multitude.

Allamet thoroughly appreciated his own talent. Notwithstanding his aversion to making his engravings black, he was always able to avoid monotony and coldness. This powerful effect arises from the fact that the master touches, the free handling of the brush, and the bits of brilliant colour, are rendered by abrupt transitions

Wynants, who had long availed himself of the pencil of Wouwermans, was not long in preferring that of Vandervelde—a fact that renders praise superfluous. To say that Vandervelde was in this branch of his art the rival of the most elegant painter in Holland, gives a sufficiently exalted idea of the powers of this charming master.

The celebrated landscape-painters of his day held in great esteem the little figures which he placed in their paintings with such grace and spirit, while his inexhaustible imagination varied to infinity their gestures and actions, according to the aspect of the scene which they were intended to enliven by their presence. Hobbema, Vanderheyden, Moncheron, Peter Neefs, Hackert, Ruysdael himself—the great and pathetic Ruysdael—whose genius might well have stood alone, all availed themselves of the pencil of Vandervelde, to give a greater value and charm to their paintings.

Vanderheyden, in particular, found the value of his somewhat frigid pictures doubled by the crowd of little figures with which the inventive spirit of his friend peopled them. In one of these pictures, where Vanderheyden has represented the square and Town a man, who is sitting down, appears to search in a pocket for some article which a woman standing before him has just asked for; further on, two grave citizens of the capital of Holland are seated on a stone bench placed against the wall of the Town Hall, and are conversing about the events of the day; here a carman whips his horse, harnessed to a heavy dray loaded with wood; there a group of men, women, and children run after a kind of chair drawn by a horse, which appears to excite their curiosity; to the right, another horse of a dark bay colour, exquisitely painted, awaits his load, which a man is bringing in a basket. In the centre of the foreground, and in the middle of the picture, two gentlemen are bowing to each other with a truly aristocratic grace. May they not be two Frenchmen of the court of Louis XIV.—there were many in Holland at that period, and might we not expect to hear them use the words of Moliere? "La place n'est le cause a coas y ren-coatre."

Thanks to Vandervelde, this picture of Vanderheyden's, which is in other respects so valuable for its finish of detail and skilful perspective, becomes an animated scene, displaying the activity of a

Hall of Amsterdam, we may see clearly with what liberality Vandervelde lavished his talent. More than thirty figures, with horses and carriages, fill the space left vacant by Vanderheyden. The groups are arranged with great skill, concealed under the appearance of the most perfect observance of nature. At the left, from light to shade, and that the local colours are in his engravings exceedingly well contrasted with clear and well-defined lights. In this manner, while the engraving remains light and airy, it is not tame, and preserves all its piquancy. We must add to this merit the power of execution, the delicacy of touch, and the lightness in the handling of the points employed to define the figures, darkening them when necessary, and expressing the exact qualities of the objects represented—whether they be the silky hair of the goats, the rough coats of the beasts of burthen, the fineness of linen, the coarseness of frieze, the cracked and parched earth, or the polished surface of fruits. All that we have here said respecting Aliamet, may be verified by examining his various engravings from Berghem:—"The Old Harbour of Genoa,"—"The Ransom of the Slave,"—"A Rustic Watering-place for Cattle," great city, peopled by men of every rank and every calling, from the beggar who awaits at the door the descent of the rich stranger in quest of local antiquities, to the lazy noble who rolls along, softly reclining in his carriage. To convey an idea of the spirit, of the artistic talent, which Vandervelde has manifested in these figures,

"The Meeting of the two Village Girls," and generally all that he has engraved from this master. His skies, but little burthened with work, are transparent. The lines seem readily to follow the forms of the clouds, or rather indicate the formation of them by their varied directions, which are happily contrasted with the smooth sky which is produced by horizontal and rather wide lines, ending in breaks and consecutive points. All this is full of feeling.

Wouwermans and Teniers have more than once given employment to the etching point of Aliamet. His two plates of "The Sabbath," after Teniers, are vigorous, brilliant, and held in great estimation by connoisseurs. But nothing is more delicious than his "Spanish Halt," and "The Advanced Guard of Hulans," after Philip Wouwermans. Even Moyreau, who so perfectly of all the difficulties which he must have encountered, so that the interest of the spectator might be rivetted to his work, without detracting too much from the essential objects of the picture, it would be necessary for us to enter into a minute analysis of this view of Amsterdam. We must content ourselves with having pointed out what his imagination, seconded by a light and infallibly certain pencil, could produce. But how much shall we increase the surprise of the reader when we state that the largest of these life-like and truthful figures is only an inch and three-quarters in height, while the smallest are not more than from half to three-quarters of an inch high.

Sometimes, certainly, Vandervelde made use of that talent which annals after the manner of Boucher, to may be observed in one of his principal works. "The Departure of Jacob from Lalem," Even in this case it may be said that the painter, in surrounding Jacob and his family with his imaginary flock, in a subject taken from Scripture, again betrays the invincible direction of his mind, which in this instance is in perfect accordance with the requirements of the subject. At other times he represents scenes where the landscape and the animals are confined to the middle distance; in examples of this description, it is the intricate manner which attracts and concentrates the spectator's eye. Such are his two "Views of the Beach at Schevling." Schevling is a little village on the sea-shore, where the inhabitants of the Heer are he lavished for others in the embellishment of his own works. Occasionally he fills his composition with a number of men and understood this painter, never did anything superior. Aliamet represented with no less success than the latter the vapours of the low lands and those stretches of country which so often have the fault of appearing like velvet. His choicest work is reserved for the coquetry of accessories and the expression of the figures. The handling of the master, his firm but softened touches, and the pithiness of his manner are charmingly transferred to the copper of the engraver. Horses' coats are expressed by great masses of dark touches without distinction of the hair, as it is right to represent it when the animals are not in the foreground, or of unusual size, for then the detail of their coats, of their manes and tails, are not supposed to be distinguishable.

"Winter Amusements," after Vandervelde, is another excellent engraving by Aliamet. The scene is made agreeable, which is not usually the case in such subjects. The French painters, Boucher, Augustine Flourens, and Simon de St. Amand, Vandervelde, in one of these paintings, show us the state carriage of the Prince of Orange, which is preserved in the city of Leyden.

Gouze, Jeurin, severally employed the truly French talent of this artist. His representation of the deep effects and stippled manner of Boucher, as well as the broader handling of Gouze, was admirable, and he was even able to render their very faults without exaggeration, as, for instance, the coarseness of the draperies of Gouze; but the painter whose style he most admired most successfully was Jumeau, whose beautiful pictures, "Le plus Maubert," and "Le plus des Bains," he engraved. Aliamet was an engraver, what Charlin and Jeurin were as painters — a natural and simple artist, but at the same time clear and full of spirit and clearness. His brother Fran, is went to London, where he worked under Robert Straetz; but his engravings bore no resemblance to those of Jacques. They were always heavy, affected, tasteless, and uselessly overburdened with work.

The carriage, the running footmen who attend it, the postillions, the fish-boat who runs up, net in hand, to see the catch, the poor man who uncovers beforehand in expectation of alms, are the elements which form the painting, and yet the six noble horses of German race, which are so vigorous and elegant that we might fancy them sketched by the pencil of Vandermeulen, and touched up by Wouverman, contribute not a little to the charm of this courtly scene. The second "View" is peopled with figures only. The carriage and horses of the prince are seen, it is true, in the background, but the foreground is occupied by the fishermen of Schiedam, who are playing with their children in front of a tent. What a delicious chef-d'œuvre is this painting! The fishermen are true without being vulgar; for Vandervelde did not, like many other Dutch painters, believe himself called upon to sacrifice grace for the sake of simplicity. The calm and untroubled sea is of boundless expanse; the waves roll with a soft murmur upon the beach. How happy is the possessor of such a talent! to him even the waves of the ocean are without storms, to him peace smooths the waters of the sea just as she revels in the meadows of Holland.*

One of Adrian Vandervelde's master-pieces, to give it no higher title, is the picture in the Museum at Amsterdam. The view is very limited, and we might be induced to believe that when he painted the animals, he was lying on the grass beside them. After an hour spent in the admiration of this marvellous work of art, we arrive at some conclusions which it may not be out of place to mention here. "If it is desired that flocks or other animals represented in fields should attract the attention of the spectator," says Hazeborn, "the landscape itself should be composed of but few objects, bounded by mountains, or with a light and misty distance. Over the latter the eye should wander, on the former it should be made to dwell. If the artist intends to arrest the spectator's eye by the principal objects of the foreground, he must not attract it by a too varied distance, or impair the effect by bestowing too much labour on the foreground itself. He should rather contract the view and close in the pastoral scene by mountains or woods. The artist must, however, conceal this carefully, and so transform the necessity into a beauty. Thus Adrian Vandervelde often represents the shepherd, his dog, and his flock grouped around a spring, part of which is hidden by a coppice; the spectator who only sees the edge of the pleasant green wood enjoys, as it were, the freshness of the peaceful spot by the help of his imagination." These remarks upon the art of closing in a portion of a landscape, show great discrimination; they apply to Vandervelde as well as to Berchem. But, leaving out of the question all reference to what imagination may gain by one part of the landscape being closed, we may say that Vandervelde has made use of this artifice with much address to detach the different objects, and make each one relieve the other. If on one side of the picture there rises a hill which sharply breaks the line of the horizon (we refer to the picture of "The Rising Sun"), it is not only for the purpose of confining the attention of the observer, and preventing it from wandering into the distance, but also to form a kind of mound of a dark brown mass, by which the light colours of the most prominent cattle are clearly brought out, the object of the artist being to direct particular attention to their spotted coats and picturesque forms. But if the painter places animals upon the ground, whose brown mass throws back the horizon, he will take care to choose such as are of a sombre and uniform colour; he will place dark bay horses, black geese, or cows of a deep plum colour, so that they serve to relieve the eye. The light colour of light animals, which enliven the foreground of the picture, and the sun (find that their own outlines are sharply defined against the clear sky). Thus, we find that in the works of Vandermeulen, who are apparently so simple, and appear to have composed at hazard the flocks grazing in their meadows, the laws of distance are well observed, and the painters themselves, perhaps unconsciously, so skilful, that their compositions are full of instruction. The laws of the distribution of light and shade are so clearly defined in Vandervelde's pictures, in which an amateur only perceives the charming and natural side, that a professor might readily make them the subjects of his discourse, and say with the learned Lairese: "When an object in a full light is to be relieved by a clear background, it is necessary that the object, having no shadow, should be of a sombre colour, in order to produce a good effect. For the great art consists in placing the objects of a sombre and warm colour upon a light, tender, and soft ground, as well as in relieving light and soft colours against dark and warm backgrounds; in the same way the most vigorous objects of the foreground may be relieved against the extreme distance, and the reverse."

The atmosphere is light and pure in the paintings of Vandervelde: we feel inclined to inhale the freshening breezes which sweep across the broad bosom of his lakes, whisper among the immitable foliage of his trees, and flood the spreading pastures in which he represents the cattle cropping the short thick grass, or contentedly ruminating as they slowly chew the cud. Through the fluid and transparent atmosphere we behold skies of a tender blue, where fleecy clouds float on in graceful and undulating lines; so light are they, too, that a breath of air would suffice to disperse them, but at the moment chosen by the painter the winds have left the ether undisturbed. The peaceful skies are reflected in unruffled lakes. The clouds, the animals, the trees, the shepherds, melt together in the reflection of the transparent waters. No landscape can be absolutely beautiful without a river, a lake, or a torrent. A poet who loved nature as one loves a mistress, has expressed this in some charming lines:—

"S'il n'a point de rive humide
Je fais un site admiré,
Comme un front pur et sans ride,
Mais dont l'œil serait aride
Et n'aurait jamais pleuré.
Otez les flots à la terre,
La terre sera sans yeux,
Et jamais sa face austère,
Plaine d'ombre et de mystère,
Ne réfléchira les cieux."†

The greatest landscape-painters of swampy Holland were all well aware of the indelible charm a landscape gains by the presence of water, whether it slumbers imprisoned by the shores of a lake, or glides murmuringly between the banks of a river. Vandervelde, following the example of Ruysdael, loves to lead us to the sea-beach, where the waves sport among the pebbles, or to the pond, whose freshness attracts the thirsty flocks towards midday. But nothing can be more dissimilar than the manner in which each of these two artists treats the same subject. While Ruysdael delights to contemplate the ocean when maddened by storms, and represent it to our astonished gaze stretching our into the distance, until it is confounded with the fearful masses of dark clouds that are seen booming dandy through the hazy atmosphere, and contrasting with the white-crested billows which rise upon the grand and threatening waves, and only serve to make the general darkness more awfully

* Vandervelde also painted hunting-pieces much in the style of Wouverman. Sir Thomas Baring possesses, in his picture-gallery in London, a "Bédouins de Chasse," by this master, representing the moment when the huntsmen meet on a terrace adjoining a house. Among the figures may be distinguished an elegantly-dressed lady and gentleman, and two pilgrims who are demanding charity. Further on are pages, dogs, and hunting paraphernalia.

† If no stream the landscape grace, Quickly from the spot I fly,
As I would some calm, pure face,
Where sad tears ne'er left a trace
In the cold and haughty eye.

Take the waters once away,
And the earth will have no eyes—
No more then its face shall play
With expression blithe and gay,
As it mirrors back the skies.

apparent, and lend a kind of savage sublimity to the whole scene. While Ruysdael, too, casts a gloomy shadow over his lakes, Vander-velde scarcely raises a ripple on the smooth, unruffled surface of the sea, and does not permit the polished mirror of his lakes to be ornamented or overcast by menacing masses of dark and gloomy clouds, which were so little in unison with his calm, loving disposition.

We once travelled through Holland with a friend of ours, who was a distinguished literary man, full of enthusiasm for painting, and who took a fancy to discover the points of resemblance existing between celebrated writers and the painters that we had come on purpose to see. If we are not mistaken, he asserted that Rembrandt, in his mind, corresponded to Holman, the author of the "Contes Fantastiques;" the melancholy Vandermeer was compared to Young, the author of the "Night Thoughts;" and, while Boucher called up to his recollection the Chevalier de Florian, he recognised a familiar kind of Theocritus in Berghem, and a Virgil in Vander-velde. "Do you not perceive," he said, "a singular resemblance between Vandervelde and Virgil?" On our smiling at the idea of these two names, one of which was so famous, and the other so modest and so little known to the world, being compared with each other, after the lapse of so many ages, he proceeded with his comparison, and, without allowing himself to be stopped by our smiles, gave us the proofs in favour of his theory. "Have they not both," said he, "exquisite grace and ideal beauty in place of that boldness and virility in which both are equally deficient? If I may use the expression, there is in their works the same bucoolic sentiment, the same talent of imparting a certain indescribable softness to the representation of pastoral scenes, the same sobriety, the same elegance of composition, and the same harmony. But it is in the finish, the soft and perfect style of their execution, that they particularly resemble each other. The pencil of Vander-velde is as delicate and mellow as the pen of Virgil is elegant and chaste. The style of Vander-velde, replete with studied transitions and gentle gradations of colour, contributes not a little to the soft and peaceful effect of his landscapes. With him we find none of those violently contrasted lights and shadows, none of those struggles between night and day, which many Dutch painters appear to have borrowed from the Persian theologians; if thick trees or rising ground intercept part of the light, enough remains for the broad half-tints to harmonise with the lighter portions of the picture. He does not, like Berghem, use those bold and brilliant touches which cannot be looked at closely without appearing somewhat coarse. So dashing a style does not suit his fancy; the use of half-tints, the softness of his touch, the peculiar truthfulness of his manner, distinguish him among all the great Dutch masters."

The trees, those stumbling-blocks to ordinary painters, are always treated by Vander-velde with singular felicity. Whether he paints a thick and branching chestnut, or the poplar with its straight and pliant branches, or the aspen with its trembling leaves, he succeeds with unvarying skill in giving the most agreeable form to the masses of foliage, and in making the breezes appear to blow round them, or in relieving the long and slender branches against the sky. The conscientious nature of his genius is exhibited in the care with which he obviates this most difficult portion of the landscape-painter's task.

To these general characteristics, which render the works of Adriaen Vander-velde unmistakable, we must add the preference which he always showed for young animals. The painter, full of admiration for the graceful, could not but be struck with the supple and sprightly movements of young animals in their sports. He often delights in painting the lambs of a young lamb, creeping itself beneath its mother in search of nutriment, while the patient ewe continues to crop the grass before her.

This familiar scene in pastoral life must have often attracted the artist's eye during his rambles in the beautiful meadows which surround Amsterdam. Among his sketches, that portion of his works in which an artist gives way to the caprices and originalities of his genius, he has reproduced it as in his larger works. The lamb is given with striking fidelity. Its limbs, though still clumsy, have yet that flexibility of articulation which characterises the young of all kinds of animals. The delicacy of touch, and the correctness of execution, give every characteristic of perfection to this composition.

There is one picture by the master, which has not escaped notice. We allude to the one in which he has represented himself in company with his wife and family. Not only is it rarely observed among his very best productions, for the artist is seated, with his easel and brush, at the very centre of the group, but the composition of his scene is singular, and extraordinary, which does not lead us to the fact of its giving us an idea of his own personal position. Vander-velde, dressed in brown, and holding in his hand a painter's stick, is seen strolling about a country seat, while his wife is walking with him on his left side. Her dress consists of a red gown, over which is thrown a black shawl. Before her, a child, also dressed in brown, who is holding in each hand a round wheel, is pulling at the cord, and revolving the motion of the wheel away. Sitting on the trunk of a tree, a young woman is nursing a baby, and amusing it with flowers. To the left of the picture, a meadow, in which some goats are seen grazing, is visible, and a cow stretched on the grass, with a pipe in his mouth, is watching them. On the right, a little further on than Vander-velde and his family, is seen a wagon drawn by two grey horses. The driver, engaged in doing something or other to their harness. The ground in the foreground consists of a large hill, with some tall, old-fashioned trees and old stumps of trees. Near the top of the hill, a number of young oaks, planted in the new, are visible in the distance. The figure appears so natural, that the spectator might almost fancy that he heard the leaves rustle as the breeze passed, and the crunch of them. Beyond these only is a line of thick, bushy trees, while on an eminence beyond is a small house partially embosomed in trees, with a river running, its calm waters before it. This picture is a perfect gem, and conveys an idea of quiet, rural repose, such as Vander-velde loved so much to depict. The light, warmer, vapoury clouds, which partially mask the blue expanse behind them, as they float lazily about in mid-air, give the finishing touch to this harmonious composition, and impart a most beautiful and soft effect of evening to the whole.

Vander-velde's designs are not all of equal merit. Bartsch, whose opinion on this subject is of great value, distinguishes three epochs in the works of this master, consisting of twenty-four subjects. In 1653, that is, at the age of fourteen, Vander-velde engraved five plates; in these we easily recognise the youth and inexperience of their author. The ton is too heavy, the cutting is too fine and close, the heritage is softened, the foliage unworked and devoid of taste; six years later, however, from 1657 to 1659, he is already in the full exercise of his talent. "Nothing can be suggested," says Bartsch, "to censure his drawing the truthfulness of the animals, their attitudes, the correctness of the models, and the perfect care with which every detail is rendered. The engraving discloses the practical part of the matter; it is to be seen in the plates dated 1653, and the lines are bold and more expressive." His last engravings, of the year 1679, two years before his death, are all master-pieces. The "Ewe suckling her Lamb," of which we have already spoken, is of this date. The "Two Lambs resting," of which the only one in the book is a copy, of truth, of knowledge, and good taste, bears the same date. We may form an idea of the path which the artist pursued, by viewing the more extreme points of his career, being, for example, "The Peasant on Horseback," one of his works which is not preserved, and with the "Two Lambs." Between these two, the engraving, composed of twelve years' intervals, is to be seen, and it is not a little remarkable, is well drawn, and the horse is skilfully and correctly drawn, its mane and tail never appears to be raised, and the ewe, who is the object of the artist's study, has a fine, well-defined line of character. In the latter on the contrary, there is no comparison, and there is not a single which has not been rendered with striking and faithful effect.

This picture is a work which is not only found in all the public collections of the works of Vander-velde, but also in the private collection of an Amsterdam merchant, who died in 1728. The picture is the number of the works which are certainly known, as well as of those in which he merely inserted figures, and it is not a little curious to observe that it almost certainly is not a work which would have found time to execute them, all parts being well we take into consideration the minute and exquisite delicacy of finish by which they are, with scarcely a single exception, distinguished. This fact has led some of the authors who have written on Vandervelde to suppose, that the dates which we have given as those of his birth and decease, respectively, are erroneous: but we know what seeming impossibilities may be effected by never-flagging perseverance: and we therefore see no reason why we should distrust the authorities to whom we are indebted for the facts of this notice. He left a daughter, who handed down verbally to Houbracken the few particulars which we know concerning the life of her father. He never left Amsterdam and its immediate neighbourhood. He was the painter of the rustic scenes of his died, leaving behind him his great but unfinished opera of the "Zauberflöte."*

The illustrious amateur, Gersaint, who was a friend of Watteau, and the author of some of the most learned catalogues of the eighteenth century, has given an opinion of Vandervelde which must surprise us by its exaggeration, proceeding from a man usually so free from this fault. "This landscape-painter," says he, "has the most delicate pencil, and is the most mellow in his tones, of any artist I know. Even Corneille Poelenbourg appears dry, so to speak, in his touch compared to Vandervelde: his figures are generally simple and well-drawn; his colouring is rich and vigorous; and his paintings are perfectly harmonious. He is, in native country; he found the materials for his pictures, with but few exceptions, in the broad, verdant meadows that surrounded the city of his birth, and had no need to seek for them in foreign lands. His works produce the impression that his life must have been full of peace, of private virtue, and unwearied labour. May he not have been, like Mozart, a victim of that affection of the chest with which so many great men have been afflicted from their birth, and which their excessive labour aggravates rapidly? Consumption, which develops in those whom it devours so many precocious powers and such melancholy grace, may have caused the premature death of this extraordinary artist, who, at the age of fourteen, was already a great master. At eight years of age, Mozart, who was till more remarkable, performed before the court of Louis XV. on the organ of the chapel at Versailles, and thenceforward ranked with the greatest composers of the age. At thirty-six years he fact, the most interesting painter to those who value beautiful work and high finish."

* It may not be uninteresting to the reader, nor altogether misplaced, considering the affinity between all the arts, and the striking resemblance between Vandervelde and Mozart, both in their precocious talents and their early end, if we here give a few extracts from a curious paper, by the Hon. Daines Barrington, F.R.S., printed in the Philosophical Transactions for the year 1770—

"If I was to send you a well-attested account of a boy who measured seven feet in height, when he was not more than eight years of age, it might be considered as not undeserving the notice of the Royal Society.

"Joannes Chrysostomus Wolfgangus Theophilus Mozart, was born at Saltzbourg, in Bavaria, on the 17th of January, 1756.

To say that Poelenbourg is dry beside Vandervelde, is certainly going too far; and therefore this must probably be no more than a figure of speech. Poelenbourg is so melting that he gives inanimate objects the appearance of velvet; Vandervelde, on the contrary, having to paint animals, the forms of which are well defined, such as horses, cattle, and goats, takes especial care to avoid falling into the fault of Poelenbourg, and without making his outlines as strongly marked as Paul Potter, he finishes his figures with a light and delicate touch. In this respect he is more justly appreciated by Descamps, who in the two insignificant pages which, as usual, are all that he devotes to one of the most charming painters in his gallery, has only said a few words concerning the sturdy, crisp and lively work of Poelenbourg, and that the silky shimmer through his trees points rather to the work of the too silky Poelenbourg.

After examining the immense labour of Vandervelde, we cannot doubt that he was possessed by that fever of never-ceasing activity which hastens the end of those who are destined to die young. Not only is he reckoned among the first Dutch landscape painters, but he also deserves to occupy a distinguished position among historical painters. There are several compositions by his hand, taken from the Passion of Christ, and which, in Heurdael's time, were in the Roman Catholic Church in the Spanduisweg at Amsterdam. There is also in the Church of the Appelmarkt a style of this master, but his remarks in this case are more direct and pointed than usual. He even adds that the leaning of Van-

"I have been informed by a most able musician and composer, that he frequently saw him at Vienna when he was little more than four years old.

"By this time, he was not only capable of executing lessons on his favourite instrument the harpsichord, but composed some in an easy style and taste, which were much approved of.

"His extraordinary musical talents soon reached the ears of the present empress-dowager, who used to place him on her knees, while he played on the harpsichord.

"The notice taken of him by so great a personage, together with a certain consciousness of his most singular abilities, had much emboldened the little musician. Being, therefore, the next year at one of the German courts, where the Elector encouraged him, by saying he had nothing to fear from his august presence,

"Dissent from the Cross, but that he generally is, with the graceful painter of "The Rising Sun," his sketch of one of the most

"At seven years of age, his father carried him to Paris, where he so distinguished himself by his compositions, that an engraving was made of him.

"In this print, little Mozart is "Xlrd, Compositeur et Maître de Musique, âgé de sept ans."

"Upon leaving Paris, he came over to England, where he continued more than a year. As during this time, I was witness of his most extraordinary abilities as a musician, both at some public concerts, and, likewise, by having been alone with him for a considerable time at his father's house, I send you the following account, amazing and incredible as it may appear.

pathetic subjects of Christian art, that he was capable of representing the strong emotions of sacred subjects no less admirably than the joyous tranquillities of past and life. One of Vanderweide's most successful efforts, perhaps, in this peculiar branch of his profession, is a "Repose of the Holy Family," which is dated 1668. The Virgin is represented as supported by cushions, which are placed on the ground, and holding the Infant Jesus in her lap. Joseph is seated on the stone pedestal of a Fountain, some distance off. On the other side of the Virgin is an ass, while behind her is a sheep in the act of grazing. The figures of the two animals are in the master's best style. Had Vanderweide lived a few years longer, he might probably have gained further reputation by these works, and have given to the world his Enoch as a sequel to his Benedics. It was, however, determined otherwise. As we have seen, he was snatched away in the full vigour of his talent at an age when his contemporaries might naturally have expected a long series of fresh masterpieces from his prolific pencil.

In the present day the name of Vanderweide recalls only ideas of rustic scenes, of peaceful cattle ruminating in the midst of the artless sheep lying at their feet, and of rich pastures where the flocks are wandering listlessly about, while the shepherd is sleeping under the thick foliage of the beech-trees.

Adrian Vanderweide was one of the most skilful engravers of the Dutch school, as well as a correct, delicate, and harmonious painter.

The catalogues of Dutch sales do not mention more than twenty-two subjects engraved by this master. Adam Bartsch was acquainted with only twenty-one, and yet we have every reason to believe that the subjects engraved by Vanderweide were at least twenty-four in number. In the catalogue which we are about to give, we shall preserve the number and titles adopted by Adam Bartsch:—

1. "The Cowherd and the Bull." In the upper left-hand corner we find: A. V. V. f. 1659, and at the right: Just. Dauck its, etc.
2. "The Cow Lying down." On a rough stone to the left is written: Adriaen Van de Velde, f. 1657.

"I carried to him a manuscript duet, which was composed by an English gentleman to some favourite words in Metastasio's opera of Demofonte."

"The whole score was in five parts: viz. accompaniments for a first and second violin, the two vocal parts, and a bass.

"I shall here likewise mention that the parts for the first and second voices were written in what the Italians style the contralto cello. The reasons for taking notice of which particular will appear hereafter.

"My intention in carrying with me this manuscript composition was to have an irrefragable proof of his abilities as a player at sight, it being absolutely impossible that he could ever have seen the music before.

"The score was no sooner put upon his desk, than he began to play the symphony in a most masterly manner, as well as in the time and style which corresponded with the intention of the composer. I mention this circumstance, because the greatest masters often fail in these particulars on the first trial.

"The symphony ended, he took the upper part, leaving the under one to his father. . . . His father was once or twice out, though the passages were not more difficult than those in the upper part, on which occasions the son looked back with some anger, pointing out to him his mistakes and setting him right.

" Having been informed that he was often visited by musical ideas, to which, even in the middle of the night, he would give utterance on his harpsichord, I told his father that I should be glad to hear some of his extemporary compositions. . . . I said to the boy that I should be glad to hear an extemporary 'Love Song,' such as his friend Manzoli might choose in an opera. The boy on this (who continued to sit at his harpsichord) looked back with much archness, and immediately began five or six lines of a jargon recitative, proper to introduce a love song. He then played a symphony which might correspond with an air composed to the single word Affetto.

"It had a first and second part, which, together with the symphonies, was of the length that opera songs generally last. If this extemporary composition was not amazingly capital, yet it was really above mediocrity, and showed most extraordinary readiness of invention."

3. "The Three Oxen." Below, at the left near a stick: A. V. V. f.

4. "The Two Cows and the Sheep." Toward the bottom, on the right-hand, close to a stick, we read: A. V. V. f.

5. "The Three Cows." The letters A. V. V. f. are to be seen in the left-hand corner of the engraving.

6. "The Ox in the Water." At the top, on the left-hand side: A. V. V. f.

7. "The Horse." We read at the bottom, on the left-hand side: A. V. V. f.

8. "The Calf." At a little distance towards the right will be seen a prostrate tree, where, on the stump, may be observed in reversed letters: A. V. V. f. 1659.

9. "The Dogs." In the upper part, at the left, is written: A. V. V. f. 1657.

10. "The Goats." The name A. V. V. f. is inscribed in the upper right-hand corner.

These ten pieces were executed at the age of eighteen or twenty, and the engraving already shows the hand of a practised master. At the Rigal sale, in 1817, they were sold in one lot for the sum of £2.

11. "The Cow and the Two Sheep at the Foot of a Tree." In the centre, at the bottom, we read: 1670, A. V. V. E. This plate is the masterpiece of the artist.

12. "The Pied Bull and the Three Sheep." This piece is equally remarkable: at the bottom, on the left-hand side, is written: A. V. V. E., and beneath it, 1670.

13. "The Two Cows at the Foot of a Tree." Below, on the left-hand side: A. V. V. E. This plate is executed in the same style as the former.

(These three plates fetched £16 at the Rigal sale.)

14. "The Sheep." Marked A. V. V. E. 1670, below, on the right side.

15. "The Two Sheep." Below, to the left, A. V. V. E. 1670. (These two plates, in superb proofs, were sold for £4 at the same sale.)

16. "The Goats." In the lower left-hand corner: A. V. V.

These six plates ordinarily go together as forming a series. They are very rare, particularly the last one. Adrian engraved them two years before his death. The drawing is admirable, the style is large, the landscape and the herbage are done with richness, and expression not laboured, and in excellent taste.

17. "The Shepherd and the Shepherdess with their Flock." We find, in the upper part, on the left-hand: Adriaen Van de Velde, f. 1653. This plate is very scarce. (It was sold at the Rigal sale for £8.)

18. "The Castle Gate." On the left-hand side, above: A. V. V. f. 1653. The figure 3 is reversed.

19. "Hunters Resting." On the left-hand side, above: A. V. V. f. 1653. (This plate fetched the sum of £11.)

20. "Countryman and Countrywoman." This plate is extremely rare, and does not bear any date. Bartsch, who made a magnificent copy of it, believed the original to date from 1653.

21. "Peasant on Horseback." In the upper right hand corner is written A. V. V. f. 1653. This plate is the rarest of all: it has also been copied by Bartsch. (It was sold for £4.)

These five engravings are feeble, and executed in fine, but rather meagre, lines. Adrian engraved them when only fourteen years of age.

The following are the pieces which have not been described by Bartsch:—

22. "Landscape," partly bordered by a river. On the right-hand side two villagers standing; further on a cottage and an inn, with a carriage standing near one of them, the horses taken out; some travellers and a four-wheeled carriage are in front of the other; to the left, at the water's edge, a boat on the stocks; the spire of a village church appears on the horizon, on the other side a flight of birds; towards the right, and nearly over the inn, is inscribed: A. V. V. f. This plate is not highly-finished.

At present only two proofs of this plate are known to be in existence; one which, in the Rigal sale in 1817, sold for £16; the other in the collection of the King of the Netherlands.

23. "Girl Spinning," seated near a tent where a man is lying down; she is speaking to a peasant who is in a hollow road, and leaning on the bank near her feet; beyond, on the left, an ass and two goats; on the same side, in the sky, J. F. Vilde, f.; below, 1653. The figure 3 is reversed.

This proof, the only one known, was bought at the Riga sale for £38, and was formerly in the collection of M. Van Leyden the younger, which was sold at Amsterdam in 1811.

21. "A Cavalier and Two Huntsmen." The cavalier, with his left-hand elevated, appears to be pointing out a place of meeting to one of the huntsmen, who is standing near him, with his hat in his hand and his gun on his shoulder; behind them is a large tree. The other huntsman is seated on the opposite side on some rising ground, with his hand resting on a gun; behind him are five dogs of different breeds; on the left-hand side, in the sky; J. F. Vilde, f. 1653; the whole traced in reversed characters.

This plate sold at the Riga sale for the same price as the preceding one, £38, and came originally from the same collection. These three pieces were engraved during Adrian's youth.

If the engravings of Adrian Vandervelde are the delight of amateurs, his pictures, not less sought after, are the ornament of many public galleries and private collections.

The Louvre possesses six valuable compositions by Vandervelde:—

"A Flock of Sheep and Cattle on the Banks of a River," also called "The Rising Sun," which those experienced in such matters valued at £1,440 at the time of the French Empire, and at £1,000 under the Restoration in 1816.

"A Pasturage with Flocks," valued at £480 under the Empire, and £600 after the Restoration.

"The Beach at Scheveling," valued at £720 and £480.

"A Shepherd and his Wife playing with their Child," valued at £240 and £400.

"Landscape and Animals," valued at £200 and £120.

"Winter Amusements," valued at £100 and £120.

The Belvedere Collection at Vienna contains only one painting by this master, signed and dated 1664. It represents "A Landscape," with a small flock near a stream.

In the Museum at Munich there are five or six charming paintings by Adrian, all representing, with some variations, his favourite subjects.

The Royal Gallery at Dresden only possesses one.

There are only two at Amsterdam, one representing "A Landscape," in which we see a woman seated upon a horse, a herdsman on an ass, some sheep, a dog, and in a river a boat bearing men and animals. This painting is carefully and delicately worked out. In the second, a peasant woman is seated before a cottage; there are several groups of cows and sheep, and a man riding on a white horse. This picture displays great delicacy of handling.

The Royal Museum at the Hague possesses two of minor importance.

The Collection at Dulwich College contains two very remarkable paintings by Vandervelde.

In the collection of Sir Robert Peel there are two specimens of this master's best style, a herdsman and a young milkmaid, five cows, two pigs, some poultry, and a frozen canal.

In the Bridge-water Gallery there is a picture of two cows and a sheep by Vandervelde. A small work, but most luminous in effect.

Lord Ashburton possesses "The Haymaking," a loaded wagon before a haystack, with four men and two women; and another picture representing a flock of sheep and two horses in a meadow.

In the well-known collection at Grosvenor House, belonging to the Marquis of Westminster, may be seen a delightful picture by Vandervelde, dated 1658, when the artist was scarcely nineteen years of age; it represents cows, pigs, sheep, some fowls, a man, and two women.

Among Mr. T. H. Hope's pictures there is a Vandervelde, representing "A Meadow," in which are cows and horses, with herdsmen.

In Pall-mall, in the private collection of George IV., we find "A Landscape," enriched with two cows, and a horse that is drinking; further on, a woman who is drawing water, and conversing with a man on a white horse. The picture, which is delicately painted, is dated 1659.

In the collection of Earl Grey, there are two good pictures of cattle by Vandervelde.

At Sutton House, the property of the Marquis of Bute, there is a composition by this master of an old herd man, a shepherdess, and a flock reposing near a stream, a small painting of such delicate execution, that we think it preferable to many of the larger works.

It now only remains for us to mention the sales at which pictures of Adrian Vandervelde have been disposed of at public sales.

At the Julienne Sale, 1767. Two small pictures fetched 2,000 livres (£120). In the one there are two cows, one of them standing, the other lying down; three sheep near a large tree, watched by a young boy; to the left a cottage, to the right in the distance several animals. In the other, a horseman, and a woman standing, with two cows and two sheep.

A subject containing two cows, one lying down, the other standing, four sheep, a man, and a goat, with a shepherd and shepherdess in the background, 1,014 livres (£10).

Beve de Jully Sale, 1779. A group of three figures, a woman, sleeping, and two men, with three cows, goats, and sheep, 3,100 livres (£124).

Blondel de Geny Sale, 1776. Five pictures by Vandervelde, among which we must mention that which represents two men near a cottage; one, whose back is seen, holds a gray horse by the bridle; the other, on horseback, is seen in full face; a woman suckling a child, accompanied by a blind man who is playing on a flute and soliciting alms; his dog is held by a string. The celebrated picture, which we have engraved under the title of "The Blind Man," was sold for 14,981 livres (£599). The other four pieces fetched the sums of 2,000 livres (£80), and 1,000 livres (£40).

Prince de Conti's Sale, 1777.—Seven pictures by Vandervelde:—"The Beach at Scheveling," which is now in the Louvre, 5,972 livres (£203).

A frozen canal, engraved by Miamet, under the title of "Winter Amusements," from the Marietta collection, 4,000 livres (£160).

A man sleeping, and a woman sitting down speaking to a man on horseback, some sheep, goats, and cows, 2,610 livres (£104).

"A Landscape," cows and sheep; in the middle distance, a man near a cottage and a woman milking a cow, 2,450 livres (£98).

"The Forest of La Haine," in which are several animals, 990 livres (£36).

The others, which sold for about 500 livres (£20), were of minor importance.

Randon de Boissé's Sale, 1777.—Five pictures by Vandervelde; one, in particular, of considerable importance, containing four cows, one of which is drinking, and two men, one of them fishing with a rod and line. This picture is dated 1661, and is eighteen inches high, and two feet two inches wide, and sold for 20,000 livres (£800). It is in the Louvre, and is known under the title of "The Rising Sun." The four others reached the sums of 7,000 livres (£280), 5,000 livres (£200), and 1,800 livres (£72).

Robin Sale, 1801. "Haymaking," four figures, with a loaded wagon, drawn by two white horses. We have given this picture, which was engraved by Boissé, and fetched the price of 9,000 francs (£360).

The Cavalier Earl's Sale, 1802. Five pictures by Vandervelde. A peasant woman sitting by a brook in the middle of a landscape, suckling her child; at her feet is a pig, besides a dog; further on, cows, goats, and sheep, 8,850 francs (£354). The four others, 3,320 francs (£132), 7,000 francs (£280), 3,120 francs (£125), and 201 francs (£8).

Duke de Berri's Sale, 1807.—"Merry and Amus," a white cow, sheep and rams, 9,500 francs (£380). "The Pastoral Musician," 4,110 francs (£164 s. 4d.).

Comte Peregau's Sale, 1811.—"The Start for the Hunt," containing five hunters on two horses, pack of hounds, &c., a large and beautiful composition, 26,850 francs (£1,074).

Peel Barrié's Sale, 1843.—"Landscape," animals at the watering-place, 9,000 francs (£360).

Duval de Geneve's Sale, 1843.—Two Vanderveldes: first, "View of Scheveling, a sandy beach, with a fisherman lying down, and another standing; a dog gnawing a bone; in the background some small figures and some vessels, 3,400 frames (£136); second, five beautiful cows, a peasant endeavouring to embrace a young girl without being aware that he is observed by a herdsman, 24,925 frames (£997).

Adriaen Vandervelde almost always signed his etchings and paintings as follows:—

ELIZABETH STIRLING, THE SCULPTOR.

BY SILVERPEN.

“Oh! weep for Adam—he is dead.”

Amongst the speculative thoughts incident to an event like the Great Exhibition, none was of more interest than that relating to the lives and labours of the individuals who contributed to so magnificent a result. From the poor Hindoo weaver, or the Tunician designer, to the artist-potter of Dresden and the scientific engineer or mechanic of our own country—what histories might have been written of patience, earnestness, endurance under countless difficulties, of noble motives, and exalted aspirations! There was not, we may be sure, one fragment of human labour there, however rude or simple, that had not called into action some of the best qualities of the human soul; and there were renunces of labour, that if written or known, would have enhanced the world's idea of human nature. Much as is necessarily unspoken and evanescent in the psychological progress of labour, some such histories might be imagined, some were known; and, here and there, a few brief words in the official catalogue, gave us glimpses that stimulated the purest curiosity. A simple history, so indicated, we now proceed to write. We do so with a faltering pen, for friendship and attachment had hitherto enriched that history to us; and now, alas! the world no longer holds a genius that, had life and maturity been spared to it, might have excelled in the sculptor's art, and rivalled, indeed more than rivalled, the figures of Georgina Duchess of Devonshire, and the busts of the honourable Mrs. Dawer.

The visitor to the Fine Arts' Court of the Great Exhibition may have observed amongst the smaller, but not least beautiful objects of art, a little statuette of Waverley, exquisitely carved in ivory. It was but a few inches in height, stood beneath a glass shade on a small black pedestal, and arrested the attention of even the uncritical eye by the beauty of its proportions, the delicacy of the carving, and the spirit with which Scott's first prose hero had been conceived and represented. Turning to the catalogue, this brief notice, at page 151, added surprise and interest to the admiration elicited—“Class 30, No. 186, Stirling, Elizabeth, Mrs Pinn's, St. Thomas, Exeter. Des.—Statuette of Waverley, in ivory, carved by a self-taught artist, twenty years of age, from her own conception of the character of Waverley, without the aid of any drawing or modelling.” Such was the truth; though richer facts lay hidden beneath.

If there be a characteristic more broad and marked than another between genius and talent, it is the universality of power in the former. This is Shakspeare's distinctive characteristic beyond that of all other men; it is Milton's; it is that of the greatest painters as well as the greatest musicians. Recollect Michael Angelo—recollect Mozart! and it is equally a characteristic of the higher degree of female intellect. This power would, perhaps, be better expressed by the word comprehensiveness, or the faculty of not so much doing many clever things, as the general perception of how they are done; though, at the same time, one faculty or power predominates above the rest. This, as in so many cases of real genius, was a distinctive feature of Miss Stirling's intellect. She wrote with facility in verse; often admirably in prose; and possessed a range of intellectual power rarely equalled; yet she was emphatically an artist in that highest of all departments—delineation of the human form.

Elizabeth Stirling, who was of Scottish extraction, was born at Newton Abbot, in the county of Devon, January 2nd, 1831, at which place her father kept a school. When she was three years old, he was appointed master to the Free School of Colyton in the same county, whither she accompanied her parents. Here she remained till 1839. They were then so good as to entrust her to the tender care of the two excellent aunts, who were affectionately connected with her future history, and who resided at a pretty rustic cottage of their own at St. Thomas, near Exeter. But the child and parents saw each other at stated intervals; the summer months being always spent at Colyton by the aunts and their beloved charge.

Prodigies in childhood no more result in gifted men or women than a facile knack of rhyming constitutes a poet. Yet there is a certain degree of intelligence and comprehension in a child that indicates much; and it is a curious mental, as well as psychological fact, that where this intelligence is high in kind, its first spontaneous efforts at expression are usually in verse. We could give countless instances of this, were it worth while—and amongst men whose after intellectual excellences were of the severest and gravest character. An analogy in this case would seem to lie she wrote some verses. "On being left alone on the Sabbath, which, though still childlike in rhyme and unpolished in diction, elucidate that most consoling of all mortal thoughts, that God is present with us everywhere; and show her devotional, as well as metaphysical, cast of ideas even whilst so young.

But it was towards art—the art of form—that the light of her genius began so rapidly to shine. It sought expression, and found the means where only genius would have found it. Bits of bone and ivory were searched for or begged from friends. From these, and with no better graver than a common penknife, exquisite things were fashioned as well as carved: paper knives, seals, figures, and other small objects. Parasol and umbrella handles were, as she once told us, her great resource at this period. "But how could you learn to cut a substance so very hard as bone or ivory?" we asked; "it must have hurt your fingers so." "No, the power came to me I don't know how; and aunts would be often surprised at the change I had made in one of her parasol tops." Yes! this between the first dawnings of creative power in the child, and the first intellectual tastes of vigorous, but rude, nations. Thus, this young child, whose love of art, as it related to form, was afterwards uncontrollably repeated little hymns at twenty months old with great distinctness; at eight years old she wrote them; and somewhat at the same date, or rather earlier, she began to draw figures of little men with a pen. Some of these latter are preserved, that were traced by her baby-hand at five years old. From her first verses, entitled "Morning Thoughts," and "Evening Thoughts," we extract a verse. The measure and ideas were undoubtedly caught up from the repetition of others' hymns, yet it is curious in a mental point of view.

"Father of light! the morning comes;
Praises and thanks we owe to Thee;
For Thou hast kept us through the night
In tranquil sleep, from labour free."

There was immense mental progression after this. At fourteen is an eternal attribute of genius to lay the simplest, the useful, and impress a beauty of its own upon the simplest things. By degrees, as gifts from various friends, Miss Stirling became possessor of more appropriate tools, much to the benefit of her artistic labours. At this period, namely, her thirteenth year, she received lessons in landscape-drawing from Mr. Williams of Exeter, for about ten months; and this, be it recalled, was all the instruction she had, in any branch of art, previously to her conception and carving of the statuette of Wayrlay. At the close of this brief period, the lessons had to be given up owing to the state of her health, which, always delicate, now greatly declined. Writing was even prohibited, as well as any kind of work that caused her to lean forward. But this latter prohibition was of little use. She wrote abundantly, though secretly, for she knew it was against the wishes of those who loved her tenderly. Her habit was to take a pencil and scraps of paper to bed with her, and rise to write at the first dawn of day. Our talking, flogging, or scolding, was of no service," writes her youngest aunt to us in her most affecting letter: "it only made her try to hide it from us. But I don't think she would have lived without it." Her artistic labours, thus temporarily stayed, took a new direction. She cut out in paper landscapes diversified with human figures, which she either painted or pencilled. Many of these were so beautiful as to be considered worthy of preservation and framing.

After the age of sixteen, the young artist's health improved, and she was allowed to follow her odd tastes without restriction. She drew, wrote, and carved by turns. A singular present now enriched her, and supplied the material for new and more elaborate carvings. This was a quantity of sea-horse teeth, such as are used by dentists. From these were produced brooches and other things of beautiful design.

In 1849, Miss Stirling commented her brief connexion with literature and literary people. Lured by the progressive spirit of a journal of the day, she forwarded articles of considerable merit, more particularly those in prose. They were received with overwhelming congratulations and promises the latter so golden and prolific, that the highest gifts of fortune seemed to have fallen at once, and without measure, at the young artist's feet. But these promises came to nothing. After three years' weary hopefulness, Miss Stirling found out her error; though at the same time newer and more sincere friends raised her drooping spirits by showing her, that disappointment in one literary quarter was not tantamount to all, that depression was unwise, and that all work must be accepted in noble faith, and with reference to its disappointments as well as to its triumphs. These friends at the same time pointed out to her, with judicious kindness, that with a faculty so great as hers, it was to the art of sculpture that her attention ought to be permanently directed.

In the year succeeding that in which the sea-horse teeth had so enriched her, the same friend presented Miss Stirling with two fine pieces of ivory. They were larger in size than any she had yet carved; and the subject of the Great Exhibition occupying at that time everybody's mind, the thought struck her that she would use her utmost skill, and prepare some piece of work for the Fine Arts' Court, which should exceed anything she had previously effected. Scott's novels had already supplied her with countless day-dreams, and she had little hesitation in choosing the character of Waverley for her imagined statuette. But there arose a point of difficulty as to what should be the attitude. "There is much hesitation in the character of Waverley," thought the young artist; "and this I must endeavour to express as the leading idea. But what would be the characteristic attitude of such doubt or vacillation?" By one of those intuitive flashes of thought that are the prerogative of all true creative power, it occurred to her that her own condition in asking herself such a question was itself one of hesitation. "Therefore my attitude at this moment will be the true one for Waverley. What is it?" Rousing herself to observant consciousness, she found it was one of thoughtful rest, with the index finger of her left hand to her lips. There was no longer a moment's delay—she saw Waverley prefigured in the ivory, and began her work, without design, drawing, or model, other than the conception in her own mind. In three weeks this elaborate work was finished, and Waverley stood revealed!

The influence of true genius is as beneficent as it is exacting. Of the homage paid to the productions of Scott, none was ever so truly more genuine than this dedication of the young artist's labours to the representation of one of his most delightful, if not greatest characters. His most humorous smile would have been her reward if he could have looked upon the handsome face of his hero, and the part-like life may be traced upon curls and ruffles, hat and sword! And what pity would have been his, had he at the same time read her early fate, and foreseen the return of this precious gift of genius to the Great Giver!

"The bloom, whose petals nip before they blow!"

By the aid of a friend, Waverley was mounted, and consigned to the Great Exhibition. Miss Stirling at the same time repaired to London, in pursuit of those literary illusions we have before referred to. Nothing but pre-conceived hopes was the result, and she returned to the country after a lengthened absence, all mind and unconquerably depressed. But the success of the little statuette—valued at ten guinea—was decided. A bronze medal was awarded to her, and her further pursuit of art resolved upon. She returned to London, in the guardianship of her youngest aunt, who from this time watched her through her London life with anxious solicitude. In this duty she was after a while assisted by her sister, Mrs. Finn—who, giving up her cottage and the pleasures of a country life, came purposely to London to join in this pious care of their beloved child. No more than Milton can be separated from the image of his father, or Cowper from that of his mother—can Elizabeth Stirling from those of her incomparable aunts. Their little Islington parlour was a picture worth going far to see.

In February, 1852, Miss Stirling became a student in the Government School of Design, Gower-street, Bedford-square. With her usual enthusiasm she began and carried on her work, and, fertile in invention, countless other things besides. She was soon tacitly the leader of the junior room, though unconsciously to herself—and the post was resigned to her with inconceivable good-nature. If an eager discussion was being carried on, Elizabeth Stirling was at its head; if there was anything to be written, she was both author and scribe; if a grievance of that small republic of art had to be represented, hers was the voice—and the amount and kind of authorship and discussion that was carried on would startle many who have had no insight into these female republics. Art, politics, theology, anatomy, philosophy, and metaphysics, were in turn discussed—and that one voice, with but scanty scholarship, but commanding grasp of intellect which in a great degree supplied the deficiency, was certain to be at the head and have the best of every argument. Not content with this, private classes were organised among the pupils themselves, for all sorts and kinds of culture. Miss Stirling was as busy as a bee amidst these. A sketching class, an anatomy class, a class for drawing humorous figures, one for essay writing, and so on—in fact, the enthusiasm of knowledge could go no further—in each of these she had officiating duties. A curious fact was begotten by this intellectual ferment. As the reader may recollect, at the time when preparations were making for the Duke of Wellington's funeral, the task of embroidering the pall was consigned to a certain number of the young ladies belonging to the senior classes of the Female School of Design. This circumstance led to a general desire among the pupils to witness the forthcoming funeral procession from no less a place than Somerset House. How could this be accomplished? After much discussion, it was agreed that an address must be written, and presented to the gentlemen of the Department of Practical Art, or in other words, the Board of Trade! What sort of an address? A poetical one, suggested Elizabeth Stirling. The suggestion was enthusiastically received—and to Miss Stirling the task was, as a matter of course, consigned. Without premeditation she turned away to her pencils and scraps of paper, and wrote, as it were impromptu, what follows. It was among the best things she ever wrote.

TO THE GENTLEMEN OF THE DEPARTMENT OF PRACTICAL ART—FROM THE STUDENTS OF THE SCHOOL OF DESIGN, 37, GOWER STREET, LONDON.

Most Friendly, Practical, and Gallant,—

We ladies in due appeal to you,

Revering wisdom, valour, talent,

As earnest students ought to do,

This Nursery of Art expresses

Our Lady-Sovereign's love and taste—

Which, in confessing, thus confesses

By woman's progress she is grac'd.

We would—our loyal feelings showing

In more than 'broider'd ornament—

In more than form and colour glowing,

Ourselves to her design be lent.

We hold ourselves part of her glory,

As titled Lords and Captains be;

Ourselves would aid to trace the story,

Which crowns the grave of Victory.

Would join the acknowledgments of splendour

For warfare waged, that war may cease;

We ask to watch our Land's Defender

Pass, honour'd, to the Home of Peace.

With all our love of truth and beauty—

With train'd appreciating mind—

To contemplate the end of duty,

And, in the lesson, grow refind.

We would behold the Grand Procession—

The signal of a land's regret—

From that proud Hall of Art's profession,

The regal House of Somer set.

Never were the promptings of female curiosity more delicately veiled; and we can fancy the mirth of the grave gentlemen to whom this poetical address was written and sent—for sent it was—producing the result desired, with the exception that Marlborough House was substituted for that of Somerset.

Previously to this, Miss Stirling had been introduced to Mr. Bohnes, the eminent sculptor. He at once formed a high opinion of her capability, gave her lessons gratuitously whenever her time permitted, and allowed her to model under the care of his artists. Latterly—that is, through the spring and summer of 1853—she took these lessons frequently; and we, who often saw her on her way home from Mr. Bohnes' studio, can never forget the enthusiasm with which she would relate her progress, or talk over her future plans of work, nor her expressions of grateful pleasure at the kindness shown to her. In fact, no one with the least pretension to feeling or heart, could act otherwise than justly and kindly to her. Her simplicity of character, her entire and most touching innocence, her disregard of self, the generosity and truth that neither allowed her to think or speak evil of others, were the most perfect we ever knew. She was not without faults; but they arose from disease rather than nature. Age and more culture would have tempered her of them; and better health and stronger nerves added perseverance to a naturally great firmness of character.

With the judgment of a true master, Mr. Bohnes likewise supplied Miss Stirling with elementary works, as collateral to her modelling. This elementary knowledge was precisely what she needed, both as respected literature as well as art. Up to a certain age she had lived buried in the country, surrounded by no intelligence superior or equal to her own; and with the usual result, of leading the individual to aim at ends before means are effected. Quiet, judicious, dignified culture was what her mind required, as the means of tempering a somewhat exuberant enthusiasm, and justifying the possibility of expected results. This advantage, both as respected art and book-knowledge, was becoming hers, when her life so unexpectedly and prematurely closed.

Our first acquaintance with Miss Stirling began in November, 1852, when she paid us a visit. We talked of countless congenial subjects—of art and the spirit of our time—of literature and of the glory and dignity of all work. The history of the little statuette was related; with it, all the struggles of soul and genius; and we never can again listen to anything that is so deeply interested us. We listened quietly to the story of literary disappointment, and at once austere, negative depression on its account. There were other and noble sources of work; yet, at the same time, we gave it as our opinion that Art and Literature were jealous masters, and could not be efficiently served at one and the same time; and with genius so decided, and with sculpture so unbacked as a female pursuit, it might be well to direct attention to this, and this alone. But it was evident that the counter-current towards literature ran very strong. Her natural capacity was so excellent that she would have excelled in either—perhaps in both; and there can be no doubt that the intellectual end of her mind, her power of seizing remote analogies, would have led her to choose subjects for sculpture that might have assisted the progress, and enlarged the taste, or rather the spiritualism, of modern art. She might have seized the Spirit of her Time, and set it broadly in sculpture; thus realising Mackay's beautiful lines,

“And whatever thy medium be,

Canvas, stone, or printed sheet,

Fiction, or philosophy,

Or a ballad from the street.

Or, perchance, with passion fraught,

Spoken words, like lightning's hurra,

Tell the people all thy thought,

And the world shall be thy own.”

It would have been in some form of expression of this nature, that her genius would have found its vent. In writing fiction or narrative, formed, as we think, she felt to be no portion of her power. But in analogies, in inductions drawn from facts, in speculative trains of thinking, her genius excelled. A experience, and a command, that would have told in her sculptural productions. She might have placed, if it were, some of the ideas of the age in stone or marble, and thus benefited her captives way from its eternal copy at Glasgow, in sculpture. The simple, the ideal, the natural, exist now, as it did, for the Young Men of the Heronry, or the Lessons were drawn by a man whose genius which will attempt and succeed in doing as good as any pieces, conceived with reference to a form the spirit of it never ages. That a prolific age of art, so called, should not be characterized, will come, may, is rapidly approaching, as what we currently believe. It will be different from any former, and far more success; woman's labour and idealism will take their place; there are branches in all the arts which none but she can enter. Had Elizabeth Stirling survived, it might have been her duty to work to have anticipated, in some degree, the place of advancing time; or, at least, to show the capacities that she felt in it. But, even if she had not advanced so far, but only indicated woman's capacity for the sculptor's art, and her ability to assume it as a profession for bread—she would have done much. Each day only increases the degree in which woman is then a peculiar own resource for the whole with us. Teaching and literature are the only channels in which she can seek this object, and she do not afford remuneration for the half who seek it. Were this the place to discuss broadly the question of labour, we think we could place this relation of it in a different and more advanced light; namely, in a general division of the social idea of labour, and woman's own cheerful desire to many useful forms of it, which she now, if educated, thinks irrelevant to her position and intelligence. Leaving this point the enlargement of any profession to woman's capacity and duty would be a blessing. In sculpture there is a visible field for this, in our want of a more multiplied and advanced household art. Twenty or thirty years ago, the plaster casts, which replace the panels and cuts of a bygone time, were an immense advance, and certainly there can be no doubt, popular taste in an immeasurable degree. We need now to proceed onward. The public eye is at this date too well cultivated to tolerate one-sided Varnishes and Marshall's Wellingtons—though bought for sixpence. We advocate cheapness, for it is a necessary item in the cultivation of household adornment; but better things are at the present date needed for the money. Why cannot woman's taste and labour be directed towards the supply of this need; and her idealism, in both respects, in increasing the many kinds of all-sided domestic art. She could be the sculptress of the ordinary things, as well as the supplier of copies, this with reference, too, to more elegant subjects than Italian taste or prohibitions would or could give us. Do we wish our walls and our ideal. We best answer the accusation by mentioning Shakespeare, Burns, and Goldsmith; and of a few others, our various palaces of glass and iron, and the many things that are or a great approaching age of time into. There would be, too, in our history that would afford noble and valuable subjects, enough for this need, not to mention that our present art, lady never, tell of true idealism; and that the British the case of literature, is all a fall of the grand Classical age, and that the poetry of art which alone, shall exist now in the world, is done. Be this as it may, a necessity exists, mainly, and needed, and in behalf, for woman's art, to be given to the world.

Miss Stirling had already contributed to our present periodical Erasmus, and through this, besides of the course of her life, literary friends, and her efforts, by judging, and her assistance. Amongst these friends, we speak of Mrs. and Mr. Howitt, Miss Francis Brown, and others, who all alike warmly regarded her. Mr. Howitt, her old friend, and a fine artist, greatly appreciated her talents. Her time spent in her own home, was a happy one, and she had no fault to find with her life, as she spent the Summer of her early life, in the Reading Room, of the British Museum, and in the course of these elementary studies that she found would be of service to her. She also contributed two excellent papers, one on “Shelley” of Design," the other entitled "Gold," to our pages. The latter, especially, is marked by great originality of thought.

As summer advanced, those self-instituted classes, to which we have before referred, were carried out still more effectively. There were sketching parties that visited, for pleasure and art, Hampstead and other places in the neighbourhood of London; books were sought at the British Museum for views of Alpine scenery; and the humorous style of drawing found time and place. To this latter class belonged a remarkable sketch Miss Stirling made of "Tam O'Shanter's encounter with the Witches on returning from the Fair." Their figure and attitude, as half-clothed in mist they gather round and assail Tam, his attitude and expression of face, and the terror exhibited in every muscle of his reined-in, snorting horse, form a most striking sketch, and evince power and humour of no common kind. For Tam, though wonder-stricken, looks more puzzled than terrified at the burly-burly that thus so suddenly encompasses him. In thus referring again to Miss Stirling's labours of love amidst her fellow students, mention must not be omitted of Mrs. McLan's unvarying kindness to her gifted pupil, or to the solicitude with which she watched her progress. As far as regarded drawing, there were undoubtedly some, even amongst the junior classes, superior to Miss Stirling; but in general gifts, and in the direction of her taste for form, there can be no doubt she was unequalled. To this predilection in her pupil, Mrs. McLan ministered, as did also her gifted eadjudtor and teacher, Miss Louisa Gann, whose name, as the reader may recollect, is connected with so many fine designs in art-manufacture. For Mrs. McLan Miss Stirling always expressed the greatest and most respectful admiration and gratitude; and her enthusiastic desire to please that lady, and give proof that she was a diligent and earnest pupil, was too affectingly connected with the last moments of her life, to be taken otherwise than at its full amount of entire sincerity and beauty. For Miss Gann there was equal admiration, mingled with the most touching affection; and were we at liberty to mention one lovely act of thoughtful generosity of this lady towards her pupil, it would render only what is due. Yet one thing is evident in this beautiful instance, as in many others, that with her better education, woman's moral nature is gaining strength and expansiveness; and that those whose genius is telling with most effect upon the age, even if silently, are characterised by a nobility and a beauty of self-sacrifice peculiarly and touchingly their own.

At the usual vacation of the Government Schools of Design, Miss Stirling, with her aunts, left London for Devonshire. The last time we saw her, though she was looking weak and ill, her old enthusiasm was in no way abated. "What do you think I am going to do?" were almost the first words she said to us. "Why, try for one of the prizes for sculpture at the next Exhibition of Art at Marlborough House. And oh! I will work so hard; for I should like to please Mrs. McLan and Mr. Behnes." We shook our head, and said she had better run about the fields, and get rest and air. "That I will do, and work too; for I've got such a capital subject!" It is no less than the old town-crier of Colyton. He is very deformed, but full of humour and character; and he will be patient whilst I work, for I have known him from the time I was a child; and he will be rather proud, I think, to see an imitation of his oddities."

A little circumstance occurred that same evening which was quite in keeping with our first interview, and our talk about sculpture and Waverley. We had bought in the street a little sixpenny cast of Power's Greek Slave, and had been trying to smooth some of its angularities with a penknife. The little artist's quick eye saw this, and said "Let me—I will finish it." As soon as tea was over, she brought out her working-apron from the old reticule, and some chisels, and began to smooth the excrescences which had pained our eye. This was a work of some time; and as she stood there in the waning light of that July evening, with her picturesque apron spotted with clay, and with her spiritual, earnest face bent over the tiny figure, she was herself a model for a sculptor. Not that she was beautiful in the ordinary sense of the term; but there was a vitality of intellect in every action and look that had a beauty and worth of their own. She was small and slight in her figure, but with a certain expression or air in both gait and movements that was rather masculine than feminine. This was increased by the custom of wearing her hair in loose short curls round her head, by her close-fitting unadorned dress, and by a favourite way she had of resting her hand on her hip, or brushing back her hair with it, when, with upturned face, she stood or sat energetically talking. Her friends used to smile at these little mannish ways, and yet they dearly loved them. Her face and hands were both wonderfully full of expression. Brow and eyes, chin and mouth—the two latter especially—were full of the intensest expression of intellect, shadowed by a touch of melancholy that rather added to than detracted from it. Then her hands' never were any more fitted for the sculptor's art. Rather large, and of great strength, they seemed made to model and carve and form; and the fingers always looked as if they were in the very act of moulding and smoothing surfaces into roundness, and lines into curves of beauty. Then, as Keates' did, these hands looked so old, as if on them were written the first signs of premature decay!

Instead of resting when she reached Colyton, Miss Stirling proceeded with her model of the town-crier, and worked at it incessantly, in order to finish it by the time of her return to London. She succeeded in accomplishing her object; and the work, modelled in pipe-clay, and about a foot high, was a perfect triumph. It was her best and her last work! "People who knew the old man," wrote her aunt to us, "came from far and near to see it, and all pronounced the same judgment on it. The excitement, I fear, was as hurtful to her as the work had been; and her weakness brought on that insidious disease diabetes, which increased rapidly, and took a fatal direction towards the brain. Yet, whilst she continued sensible, her cheerfulness remained, and she had a smile and a kind look for all." Her love of writing was not extinguished till the end. The last time she sat up—four or five days before her death—she wrote these verses, so curious in a psychological point of view. They were found, after her death, amongst the leaves of a book she had been reading:

The universe, like a spirit bell,
Hung o'er my sleeping head;
Rolling its tones in solemn swell,
Thou' my dreaming ear was dead.

It seemed one fine and fading tone
That lived along the sky.—
As through the bell of time alone
Comes the peal of memory!

The sea was lit with a spirit blaze,
As the stars that live in light;
But before my eyes there stole a haze
Through which the stars took flight.

I cannot gaze on Nature's soul,
Nor form to me my own;
I cannot hear the tones that roll
From thought's commanding throne.

The string hangs slacken'd on the bow,
Its power and task unknown
The voice of Nature's harp is low,
Hath miss'd her master-tone.

I catch no sound of stream or rill,
No words of bird or bee;
The sunny sermons cease to thrill,
The gladsome visions flee.

Yet, I could sing in weakly tone,

* * * *

The song was for ever over—the voice was mute! Criticism has nothing to do with these visions of a soul ready to take its flight into the great mystery of Eternity—yet of which, we may have rightly abiding faith, is full of beneficence, progress, and glory. We stay our faltering pen!

Elizabeth Stirling died on the 26th of August, 1853, in the 23rd year of her age. Her simple history, revealing, as it does, so much real genius and admirable moral qualities, cannot be read, we think, without great interest; nor without a higher appreciation of those arts which humanise and exalt us all!

BREUGHEL DE VELOURS.

A CELEBRATED German Baron, who is considered an authority in art—we suppose, because his books are very dear—M. de Hüneke, pretends that John Breughel was surnamed De Velours (velvety), because of the delicacy of his pencil; but to say nothing of the little connexion there would be between the nickname given to Breughel and the delicacy of his pencil, rather dry than soft, it is well known that the habit this painter had of wearing velvet which but offers no other example, except in the works of the lady Van Thullen, and the admiral Patenier, to use the words of the jolly curé of Meudon, Rabolais.

John Breughel was born at Brussels, in what year we cannot exactly say. Houbraken, in fixing the date in 1589, was undoubtedly mistaken, for we have in the archives of the Brotherhood of St. Luke d'Anvers, especially in the Liggers, where are inscribed the names of all the members of the corporation, the proof that John Breughel was received a free master in 1597. According to the date given by Houbraken, he would have then been only ten years old. Other biographers fix the birth of Breughel de Velours in 1575, and this date is, at all events, much more likely. According to Karel Van Mander, the son of Peter Breughel was educated in the house of Peter Koek d'Alst, his maternal grandfather; he there learnt to paint in miniature and by water colours, and became so clever in his first pictures, representing fruit and flowers, that they passed for prodigies. He then studied oil painting in the studio of Peter Goekindt, whose fine cabinet served him instead of a master. This is all we know of the early days of John Breughel. That he was the pupil of his father, as Houbraken pretends, is very improbable, when we examine into the difference of their styles.

Whatever the truth of this theory, it is certain that John Breughel soon felt the humour of a landscape painter awake within him, and that he wished to travel, and make, as others had done, the tour through Italy. He remained some time at Cologne; it was doubtless here that he was struck for the first time with those picturesque points of view presented by the borders of a river, and with the good effects that can be produced in a landscape by banks seen in foreshortening as they ascend the current under sail, or when they are moored to the bank, along which stand houses with roofs of different shapes and form. Breughel, whose soul was dresser was the true cause of the surname given to him. He belonged to a family of peasants which came originally from the village of Breughel, near Breda, whence they took their name. His father was that Peter Breughel who was called le Jeûne, because he painted the manners of the village, and particularly their fêtes, with a certain joviality and a sentiment of the picturesque, of wrapped up in the observation of nature, and who never ceased drawing provisionally all that appeared to him worthy of being painted, found on the borders of the Rhine subjects which subsequently became more familiar to him. What, however, appeared most seductive to him, was the occasion which presented itself of grouping a number of figures into little space; for no one excelled him in executing them, in preserving in the most minute proportions, correctness of motion, and perfect nature, without ever becoming vulgar. He was destined to lead the way in this style to the Abraham Storcks, the Francis de Paulo Fergs.

It was, however, by a picture of flowers that he established his reputation at Cologne, or at least by a picture in which shone above all a framework of fruits and flowers. It was "The Judgment of Solomon;" but not that by which the wise king discovered the good mother. The Queen of Sheba presented on day to the King of Israel six flowers of natural lilies and six flowers of artificial lilies; these latter so artistically imitated that it was very difficult to distinguish them from the real ones. The wise king causes a lie to decide the doubts of the spectators. Breughel has rendered this subject with affection, and we can easily see that flowers play as large a part in the painting as in the legend.

In the same way that Paul Brill, Cominloo, David Vickenbooms, and Roland Savery, studied, John Breughel saw the colours of nature in their very highest intensity; he employed the tones of his pallet in all their energy, without hesitation, without thinking of softening their dazzling character. His greens and his blues are dazzling, like all those which had been brought into use by the first painters in oil. Hubert and Jean van Eyck. It is an erroneous view, in our opinion, to attribute this crudity of tone to the disappearance of the layer of gum which toned them down, it is said, when the painter first finished them. If ignorant cleaners have sometimes destroyed the keeping of these old pictures, it is not the less certain that some have come down to us well preserved, and that these have a vivacity of colour which offends the eye, or, at all events, offends it. In Italy, as in the Low Countries, with the Germans as with the Spaniards, everywhere painting began by virgin tints and dazzling colours. The fifteenth and sixteenth centuries presented to us the aspect of this phenomenon, which is easily to be explained by their near proximity to Gothic art, which had brought out the colours of the plain in sparkling splendour on the glass windows of churches and illuminated manuscripts of the middle ages with the most splendid tints.

From Cologne, Jean Breughel directed his steps towards Rome. His reputation, says DeArenville, had gone before him. Cardinal Frederic Borromeo, having made his acquaintance, protected him, and even took him for some time into his service to paint a number of little pictures, which were afterwards taken to Milan. There was, for example, "Daniel in the Lions' Den," "A perspective view of the Cathedral of Antwerp," "A St. Jerome in the Desert," of which the figure is by Crespi; and "The Four Elements," painted on copper, which passed for the masterpieces of the Flemish painter.

There is not a traveller, who goes to visit the Bibliotheca Ambrosiana of Milan, who has not been shown these marvellous pictures, of which the subject is so well chosen to show the qualities of Breughel de Velours; the richness of his imagination, capable of transforming earth into Paradise; his ability to render everything animated and lively figures as well as the least details of still nature; his knowledge of animals; and his pallet, which was a jewel-box. The artists who have painted the "Four Elements" are innumerable. But with Breughel it was not, as often happens, a series of cold allegories, or a representation of the pleasures which man may find in the earth, in the water, in the air, or near fire. No. Breughel went to work in a more original style, and aimed at resuscitating creation. On plates of copper, which were about two feet wide, he conceived the idea of putting a whole world—animals of all kinds, birds of the air, the fish of the ocean; and he gave to all these a freshness of tone, a light, a profusion of details which have never ceased delighting, during the course of two whole centuries, all the most tasteful and experienced amateurs and travellers who have seen them. "I know no painter," says Cambry, "whose colours sink deeper into the memory, if I may use such an expression."

In truth, Breughel dared to struggle against the beauties of nature. The earth is not with him a symbolical figure, a woman with her hair like a Sybil; it is the earth itself, that which we tread under foot, dressed in verdure, adorned with flowers, shaded by trees—the earth, with all the animals which inhabit it, from the most ferocious to the gentlest. It seems as if Breughel had transported himself in imagination to the fifth day of Genesis, and that he saw in the green plots of Eden, romping about in fraternal quarrels, all the wild beasts which ordinarily suggest to our minds carnage and blood, and whose mission appears to be that of devouring each other.

Fire is represented by a collection of all the instruments of alchemy, of all the tools manufactured on the anvil and in the forge, or that are made of glass; by a million of vases, of every variety of form, adorned, chiselled, sculptured in relief, finished by the brush of Breughel as they might have been by the chisel of Cellini. The air is peopled by birds, butterflies, beetles, flying insects, which a child with a glass watches as they fly through the clouds. Here are reproduced, in all their dazzling brightness, the beautiful plumage of the China pheasant, the pintado, the humming-bird, the kingfisher, which colours itself with all the tones of the rainbow, and shines with all the lustre of silk; the peacock with its splendid and harmonious tones, its wavy and fugitive shades, and its dazzling robe of rubies, emeralds, sapphire, gold, purple, and azure. Water shows us an innumerable quantity of fish and shells. But this time the history of creation is rendered complicated by mixing with it the fictions of the mythology. The humid element yields to the presence of an amorous naiad; carp are being wounded by Cupids; and, as if the painter was not satisfied with all the rich variety of colour which he was compelled to use when representing the finest products of the sea, he has dared, by a miracle of his palette, to imitate the luminous and celestial shadows of the belt of Iris. "Everything," says Cochin, in his "Voyage Pittoresque," "is represented so small that one is astonished that the pencil has been able to do it; but when we examine them with a magnifying-glass, our astonishment redoubles; for the animals and other objects are then found to be painted with the greatest truth of colour and form. They seem to move. They are drawn and touched up in the most admirable manner, and appear exquisitely finished, even with the magnifying-glass."

It is a remark useful to be recorded, that the Flemish painters who went to Rome in the sixteenth century, and even in the seventeenth, contracted, instead of a taste for religious subjects, a taste for mythological scenes. The Capital of Christianity, as it was called, had become the abode of paganism, and it was the divinities of Olympus that adorned the palaces of the princes of the church. The love of antiquity was then the mark of an elevated mind, and the gods of fable, of which the nineteenth century has become suddenly so tired, then filled the imaginations of poets and the compositions of painters. Breughel de Velours, who had found so much charm in painting naively a garland of flowers, then views of rivers, boats, mills, and peasants, now saw nothing else in nature but nymphs in the train of Diana. When he had to paint again and again his "Four Elements"—those little pictures of his being much esteemed, in which he elaborated, without confusion, a whole abridgment of the universe, and he was always being asked for copies and variations of them—Breughel borrowed his figures from the mythology. The sun crosses the sky in the car of Apollo; the nymphs of Permessus are called upon to figure as the elements; and there is to be seen in the Louvre the muse Urania seated in clouds, figuring as the air, and holding on her fingers an attribute of the invention of Breughel, a parrot.

In what year did John Breughel paint at Rome? We are not able to answer this question with anything like precision. Mariette supposes that Breughel must have been in this town about the year 1593. "I took this date," he says, "from a drawing in the Coliseum executed by him." It seems natural, indeed, to suppose that he did not pass free master in the brotherhood of St. Luke, until his return from Italy. What is certain is, that in the year 1597 he had returned to Antwerp. Rubens was not admitted into the corporation until the next year, and only left for Italy in 1600. We may therefore very reasonably suppose that Rubens and Breughel commenced their acquaintance about this time, and began to combine their talents. We have often, indeed, seen the pieces painted in the youth of Rubens adorned with flowers by Breughel. In general, it was the Madonnas of Rubens which Breughel adorned so elegantly with his garlands of lilies, tulips, pinks, jessamines, roses, and marsh-mallows; amidst which flickered little insects, beetles, butterflies, and one of the favourite birds of the painter, the parrot. Sometimes, as if to amuse the infant Saviour, a little lion-monkey hangs from the garland, and makes an irreverent grimace, which may well shock the spectator who is ecstatically contemplating the Madonna of Rubens, but which does not shock the ingenious artist, devoutly prodigal of his fancies and his colours. The genius of the pencil and brush of Rubens would have crushed any other companion; Breughel alone was fit to shine alongside Rubens, and we may add, that Rubens alone could have attracted the eye to his human forms divine, amidst the dazzling bouquets of his friend.

Breughel de Velours often painted "A Terrestrial Paradise." He is accordingly sometimes called Breughel de Paradis, out of opposition to Breughel d'Enfer, as his brother, Peter Breughel, was called. All the figures of these pictures of Paradise are by Henri van Balen—this is the case with the picture in the Louvre—or by Henri de Klerck, as in the "Terrestrial Paradise" of the Bibliotheque Ambrosienne; or, on other occasions, they are by Rubens. Many persons have seen, in the museum of the Hague, the magnificent Paradise in which Rubens and Breughel have mingled their pencils. The great master has painted on the ground-plan the figures of Adam and Eve, and a superb brown horse, which occupies the corner of the picture. Adam is seated at the foot of a tree, Eve stands up in all the magnificent beauty of perfect womanhood, with its fresh complexion; and, as if to show the graceful roundness of the mother of the world, she raises her arm to pick an apple which the serpent, who is concealed in the tree, offers her. Rubens has executed these figures with admirable care, in a finished and graceful style, such as the harmony of the picture and the finished execution of Breughel required. Contrary to his usual custom, he has signed the picture in company with Breughel. Myriads of quadrupeds and birds people the enchanted spot where dwelt the first man, a place which none can hope to describe after Milton—garden of Eternal beauty, where " Southward went a river large,

Nor changed his course, but through the shaggy hill
Passed underneath ingulf'd; for God had thrown
That mountain, as his garden-mould, high raised
Upon the rapid current, which, through veins
Of porous earth with kindly thirst up drawn,
Rose a fresh fountain, and with many a rill
Water'd the garden; thence united, fell Down the steep glade, and met the nether flood,
Which from his darksome passage now appears;
And now, divided into four main streams,
Runs diverse, wandering many a famous realm
And country, whereof here needs no account;
But rather to tell how, if art could tell,
How from that sapphire fount the crisped brooks
Rolling on orient pearl and sands of gold,
With mazy error under pendent shades
Ran nectar, visiting each plant, and fed
Flowers worthy of Paradise; which not nice art
In beds and curious knots, but nature boon
Pour'd forth profuse on hill, and dale, and plain;
Both where the morning sun first warmly smote
The open field, and where the unpierced shade
Imbrown'd the noontide bowers. Thus was this place
A happy rural seat of various view.
Groves whose rich trees wept odorous gums and balm;
Others, whose fruit burnish'd with golden rind,
Hung amiable, Hesperian fables true,
If true, here only, and of delicious taste.
Betwixt them lawns, or level downs, and flocks
Grazing the tender herb, were interposed;
Or palmy hillock, or the flowery lap
Of some irriguous valley spread her store;
Flowers of all hue, and without thorn the rose.
Another side, umbrageous grots and caves

Of cool recess, o'er which the mantling vine
Lays forth her purple grape, and gently creeps
Luxuriant; meanwhile, murmuring waters fall Down the slope hills, dispersed or in a lake,
That to the fringed bank with myrtle crowned
Her crystal mirror holds, unite their streams.
The birds their quire apply; aurs, vernal airs,
Breathing the smell of field and grove, attune
The trembling leaves, with universal Pan,
Knut with the Graces and the Hours' dance,
Led on the Eternal Spring."

The two artists have combined to render on canvas what Milton has so admirably conceived in verse. "This picture," says the old catalogue of the museum of the Hague, "came from the cabinet of M. Delaourt Van der Voort at Leyden. It was bought by the Stadtholder for 7,380 florins."

Breughel de Velours was married at Antwerp to a beautiful Flemish girl, whose charms and virtues have been sung in verse by the painter-poet Cornelius Schut. By this marriage he had a daughter, Anne Breughel, celebrated in the history of art for having had three illustrious masters, Cornelius Schut, Van Balen, and Rubens; but above all, for having been the first wife of David Teniers. Connected with all the great painters in his own country, John Breughel held a high position in Antwerp. When Van dyck began that magnificent collection of artistic portraits, which have been engraved for us by Lucas Wosterman, Pontius, Bils-wert, and Peter de Jode, he so far honoured Breughel de Velours, as to engrave his portrait in with his own hand. This is one of the most admirable works of Van dyck. The head alone is modelled, but it thinks and breathes. With a few dashes and some points, Van dyck has given to the face of Breughel life, expression, and character; and the character is, at the same time, full of nobility and good nature. The intimacy in which the painter enrolled in the Brotherhood of St. Luke lived, sufficiently explains why we so often meet with their names together in the same picture, when they could very well have done without one another. Assuredly Rubens, himself so great a landscape painter, had no need of any one to paint in the background of his historical pictures; but it was from taste that he asked from Willem, from Van Uden, from Breughel de Velours, a landscape to accompany his figures, a garland of flowers to encircle his "Madonna." On the other hand, if Breughel had recourse to the pencil of Rubens—if he selected Van Balen to paint the figures of his "Paradis," or Rottenhamer to insert the figures in his "Flight into Egypt," which is to be seen in the Museum of the Hague—it was not because he was incapable of painting them himself. Nobody, in fact, knew better how to draw a figure elegantly and well, with more correctness and more finish. Breughel proved this abundantly in his "Views of Flanders," in "The Fair of Bruges," which made a part of the collection of Appony at Vienna, of which M. de Martin speaks; and better still, in his famous little picture in the old gallery of Dusseldorf, afterwards transferred to Munich, which he made to hold the whole camp of Scipio Africanus before Carthage—a picture of marvellous finish—a fine miniature in oil, over which move an innumerable quantity of interesting figures, of which the principal group represents the eminence of Scipio.

The general ability of Breughel in this line was so thoroughly recognised that his assistance was asked in all quarters. While on the one hand, Van Balen, or Henri de Klerck, painted their pretty nymphs amid the verdant groves of Breughel, he took a flock to pasture in the pasture fields of the landscape painter. He often employed his time in ornamenting the mountain site of Josse de Momper with figures and animals; he was often engaged to fill in the crowd in the interior of churches by Peter Neefs and Henri Steenwyck. We say the crowd, advisedly, for Breughel was never so pleased as when he had to paint a crowd of many figures on a very small canvas. He was eminently successful when he represented a crowd of worshippers kneeling on the flags of the cathedral of Antwerp, when he painted thirty emons sitting in the choir, grouping the singers round the organ, or when he represented a whole family in holiday garb coming out of church, surrounded by beggars, after a baptismal ceremony. We have on this point some remarks by Mariette, in his oft-quoted manuscript, the "Alphabetario?" "One of the finest Breughels I have seen is now in the cabinet of Prince Eugene, of Savoy. It represents the Procession of the Twelve Virgins, which takes place at Brussels on the Place du Sablon, according to the foundation made by the Princess Isabella. It contains a vast mass of figures, which are painted with all the art we could desire. The heads are so admirably touched off, that they appear to be Vandycks. Nevertheless, the works in which he was most successful were landscapes, animals, and flowers, which he painted in a very finished and delicate manner, though somewhat dry."

Felblen fixes the date of the death of John Breughel in 1642. The correctness of this date appears at first to be very doubtful, from an examination of the picture of "Scipio Africanus before Carthage," of which we have already spoken, in which we read, according to the catalogue:—"BREUGHEL, 1660. FRC. ANVERSA." But we must come to the conclusion, that the author of the catalogue of the gallery of Dusseldorf is incorrect; for in 1660, Breughel would have been eighty-five years of age, and it is hardly possible to conceive that at such an age such a picture would be executed with so much finish, so bold and sure a hand. Besides, it is not possible that this painter should have been alive in 1660, because Lebas, where the point has corrected the faults in colour committed by Breughel, we shall find all the natural tone of Ostade, with the wit of a Teniers, and in his landscape the sentiment of Paul Brill, and his lovely, firm, and light touch. Some of our readers may be familiar with the level and monotonous plains of the province of Antwerp. From these Breughel draws his favourite subjects. He loves, doubtless, from memory of the canton of his fathers, to carry through the midst of his pictures the road of Breda, bordered by great trees; and he covers it with travellers on foot, on horseback, and in carriages. The coche, as the old coach was called, of Antwerp, the chariot of the peasant, the carriage of the gentleman, escorted by his people, the car of the citizen, are all represented in the foreground of his compositions, and animate his roads. Sometimes this flat landscape is diversified by mills; sometimes it is enlivened by a family of barn-door fowls, at the entrance of a smiling village, divided by the sinuosities of a stream. Sometimes we gaze on a town on the borders of the Escant, up which the fishing-smacks ascend, with trading-vessels and shallops. All is in motion, all moves in the pictures of Breughel. Nature is not for him that unknown divinity which lives in the uneasy soul of Ruysdael. It is with him but the dwelling-place of man, the his daughter had guardians when she married David Teniers, and this marriage took place, we have every reason to believe, long before this date. Teniers, born in 1610, scarcely waited until he was fifty to marry a first time. Of this we have pretty good evidence in the pictures in which he paints himself with his wife, under the figure of a young man of from thirty to thirty-five. We may therefore with certainty accept the date given by Felblen as the true date of the death of Breughel.

It is scarcely to be understood how amateurs should have attached so great a price at first to the works of this master, and then have gradually become disgusted with them. There can be no doubt that Breughel de Velours is not without his defects. He is very properly reproached with forestalling certain moderns in their utter disregard of aerial perspective, with painting his distances with too raw a blue, which gives them the appearance of being on the foreground; with sticking red coats on his men without mercy, which fatigues the eye the more, that his greens are as bright as the tones of enamel. But despite all these imperfections, Breughel is a painter full of charms, a delightful landscape-painter, who can give a picturesque and interesting tone to the most common and ordinary site. If we look at his Views in Flanders, which are the best-known of his works, in the pretty and pleasing engravings of object of his labours, the scene of his agitations and his pains. It appears as if the painter attached an obstinate and fixed idea—perhaps, the thought and image of life—to that great road which flies far away in the distance, and finishes with a vague and dreamy figure towards which all travellers converge.

John Breughel etched four engravings, which are doubtless very rare, for they are not to be found in the rich cabinet of engravings of the National Library. M. de Heinecke, who has given the list of the engravings executed after Breughel, has lost a fine opportunity of describing those engraved by him. They are four landscapes, numbered 1 to 4, with the inscription—Sabbler coeud.

The drawings of Breughel are perhaps held in higher estimation than his pictures; at all events, they have not suffered any depreciation from fashion. The skies are coloured with Indian blue, as are the waters, and the distant parts of the foregrounds are washed with bistre. A slight dash of a pen, says D'Argenville, creates trees and terraces. Sometimes the trees are leaved with pencil, and mixed with red and yellow colours, which produce great effect.

To pass to an enumeration of his great pictures: the Louvre contains seven of them:—

1. "The Earth, or the Terrestrial Paradise," in which the figures are painted by Van Balen.

2. "The Air." Urania is seated on the clouds, holding on her hand a white parrot. Signed, "BREUGHEL, 1621." The figures also are by Van Balen. These two pictures form a part of a continuation called "The Four Elements."

3. "The Battle of Arbela." The field of battle is an immense valley surmounted by a wood. The number of figures is incalculable. The family of Darius are seen prisoners, and his wife is on her knees before Alexander on horseback.

4. "Vertumna and Pomona." This is a rich landscape, of which the front is covered by fruits of all kinds. The figures are attributed to one of the Francks. This picture was given in 1850 to the Museum of the Louvre, by M. Pierré.

There are Breughels in the Museum of the Hague, of Amsterdam, Dresden, Munich, Berlin, and Vienna. There are also some in the gallery of the king of Sardinia, in Turin. There are some very fine ones at Milan, amongst others two oval ones on ivory, let in a font. Florence possesses several, painted on marble or precious stones.

"The Four Elements" are all of and in the Museum of Madrid. We have already remarked that the pictures of Breughel have suffered considerable depreciation. From 2210 sterling, says Lebrun, they have come down to 2120.

The prices at the sales have been very varied.

Sale of the Prince of Charignan, 1742. Two pictures, nine inches high by thirteen wide, one on copper, representing a landscape in which there is painted in, a "Flight to Egypt," another on wood,

THE CATTLE CARriage. FROM A PAINTING BY BREUGHEL.

5. "View of Tavoli." In this picture, there is a large bridge, over which some cavaliers have passed, and near which rises on a rock a temple of the Sybil.

6. "A Landscape." There is a park to be seen in this, with several persons richly clothed.

7. "A Landscape." On a road passing before a mill, two cavaliers meet a chariot drawn by three horses.

These two last pictures were attributed to Paul Brill in the old catalogue.

There are no John Breughels in the Museum at Antwerp, and it certainly is somewhat surprising. The Museum of Brussels has only one: "Abundance and Love lavishing their Gifts on the Earth." The figures are by Van Balen.

of James Stella. His pastorals are of singular beauty. They are said to be naïves. They are so, in fact, from the choice of subjects, and the feeling of the artist as far as the familiar picture of an historical painter can be so. Naïveté is, to use an English expression, simplicity; at all events, that simplicity which pleases is rarely to be met with in those men who, instead of elevating their minds by their study of nature, have been carefully brought up in a school, and this little bit of pedantry somewhat spoils the pleasure of pictures, which would be more agreeable if they were more simple. Reminiscences of historic scenes are to be detected in the attitude of his personages, in their gestures, and their very drapery. The reaper of Stella holds his scythe with all the pride of a hero of Julio Romano; his gleaner, in "The Return from Labour," (p. 11) walks with the majestic elegance of a moving caryatid;

and a solemn conventionalities, using the words even in their best sense. Stella, when he descended to the cheerful representation of village scenes, never forgot altogether his Roman style; he always betrayed the elevated character of his education. Beneath the jacket of the Sabine peasant, you see the anatomy of an antique statue. Despite their glibness and fun and humour, his country scenes reveal the deltoids, the pectorals, the femur, and the knees his farmer's wife and the workmen of the farm dance their rustic hop with a kind of heavy awkwardness which is not without its charm, but which reminds one of the ballet of the mopses half-way up the sacred mount. "The Game at Skittles," and "The Swing," are composed more naively, and yet with more grace, for it is graceful here to be naïve, and there is much picturesqueness and sentiment in the bird-shooting and in the schools. We find sometimes the masculine ease of the leonized rustics of the Bassan, now the step or action of the villagers of

When Stella turned back to devotional subjects, it was in the graceful style that he distinguished himself. To the cold learning of his compositions, grace served as a kind of seasoning. The picture which he painted for the church of the novitiate of the Jesuits, in the Faubourg St. Germain, "Jesus brought back from the Temple," a picture which figured in the famous sale of Cardinal Fesch; "The Virgin with the Sheep," which Stella painted with so much sweetness, and which Ronssleot engraved so admirably; "The Return from Egypt," of which Goyaud executed at Rome an admirable plate, are so many remarkable works; the two last, above all, remarkable for that poetry of sentiment which, in the action of figures, is called grace. "The Holy Family brought back from Egypt," Le Egypto cocari illum meum, has been a hundred and a hundred times over the subject of mysterious pictures and poetical night effects. In this particular picture, three little angels escort the sacred procession by the light of day, amidst a most delicious rural landscape most admirably disposed. One of the cherubim has taken care of the ass, and draws it gently by the bridle to lead it over a wooden bridge; the others, preceding the march of the youthful Saviour, strew flowers in his path, while the child raises its smiling face towards its mother, who looks sadly at her son. Children, so difficult to seize in the adorable and charming awkwardness of their movements, Stella would always draw marvellously well, without making them as robust as those of Poussin, still less with the Herculean forms of those of Michael Angelo, and without giving them any of those delicate carnations, those dimpled and incisive tones which François Flamand has modelled with a chased so true and charming. Keeping always a safe medium position between the great masters, Stella has executed an agreeable collection of children's games, which one of his nieces engraved; and we may say that, if he has not succeeded in being quite true, he is at all events

Annibale Carracci. One degree more, and these peasant subjects would rise from Flemish simplicity to the grandeur of the heroic style. A modern French critic says: "It will be seen that two excellent, and much nearer the truth than most ordinary artists.

Cardinal Richelieu, the superintendent of buildings, De Noyers, M. de Chambray, made illustrations by the friendship of Poussin, the Carmelites of the Faubourg St. Jacques, the officers of the church of St. Germain le Vieux, the cordeliers of Provins, the nuns of St. Elizabeth-de-Bellecour at Lyons, occupied at different times the talent and pencil of Stella. As painter to the king, he was the first who painted the portrait of Louis XIV. then dauphin. The beautiful books printed in the Louvre—for instance, the prayer-book composed by Tristan l'Hermite and dedicated to the queen—Stella adorned with frontispieces, always admirably arranged; and he was unceasing in his supply of designs for the rising engravers of the day—the Rousselets, the Melans, and the Daretz. In recompense for his labour, and to mark the general appreciation of his merits, he was named Knight of the order of St. Michel. He kept his pencil or brush in hand until the latest moment of his life, which, to judge from his works, we should suppose had been very long. He lived, however, only sixty-one years, dying not in 1647, as is often said, but on the 29th of April, 1657. He was buried at St. Germain l'Auxerrois, before the chapel of St. Michel.

His was a splendid genius, says M. de Piles, fit to render all kinds of subjects, but leaning towards the pleasant rather than the grave and terrible; noble in his thoughts, moderate in his expressions, easy and natural in his attitudes, a little cold, but always agreeable. His colouring was sometimes as crude as that of François Perier—now as pale as that of Lesueur. His localities of tone were little marked; and his carnations, for which he rarely consulted nature, were inflamed with vermilion. To take him all in all, Stella is a very distinguished painter, who would not shine in the first rank, but who holds a very high position in the second. Engraved by Mellan, by Goyraud, by François Poilly—upheld, moreover, by the name of his brother, his nephew, his three nieces—the name of James Stella cannot perish. As many amateurs collect the works of all the Stellas in one portfolio, so it is right to speak of the illustrious family as one artist. All would otherwise be out of place.

James Stella himself engraved some pieces which M. Robert Duménil has described in the "Peintre-graveur Français."

1. "The Saviour taken down from the Cross." The Saviour is on the ground, supported by Nicodemus, kneeling on the left, where stands St. John crying. At his feet is the Virgin Mary, with two holy women and Mary Magdalene. On the terrace, to the left, is written Jacobus fecit.

2. "The Madonna." Half-length, with the child on her lap. Two angels hold up a veil behind, and two cherubim raise a curtain. At the bottom is an armorial scroll, with Ritratto della Madonna di gatta di Joe, with a long address.

3. "St. George." He is on horse-back overthrowing the dragon. The Virgin is seen to the right. On a stone is written, Jacq. Stella fecit Rossone, 1623.

4. "A Fancy Subject." Naked children are playing round an urn, and one is receiving in his cup the offering of a spectator. In the left corner is written: Ja qu. Stella fecit.

5. "Presenting Tribute to the Grand Duke of Tuscany." This is "The Festival of St. John the Baptist" we spoke of above. The artist is himself to the left, sitting on a roof, drawing beside a man who holds a parasol over his head. On a scroll is written: Sce. nissimo Ferdinando II. mag. Etruscit. duci Jacobus Stella, etc.

Two proofs of this are known. The second bears on it: L. Paris, chez Nicolas Langlois, en St. Jacques, à la Victoire.

Many engravers, and these some of the cleverest, have reproduced the paintings and drawings of Stella. We may as well mention some of the most curious.

A collection of pieces engraved on wood by Paul Mauvain. They are about one hundred in number. The first forty-five are on blue paper, and touched up in white; the others are only washed in bistre to show the half-tints.

A collection of several drawings of vases, coin-bottles, salt-cellsars, lamps, etc., in fifty plates, engraved by François Stella.

Another collection of several architectural ornaments, ceux-ciils d'Espagne après l'antique—par M. Stella, in sixty-seven plates, engraved au burin by Claudine Stella.

Four subjects from the life of St. Philippe de Neri, in forty-five plates, engraved by Luc-Chamberlan.

The twelve pieces of "The Passion," engraved by Claudine Stella after her uncle. These twelve pieces and others were to compose a collection, which the death of Mademoiselle Stella interrupted; and of the twelve subjects engraved by her there are several unfinished. The first edition of these plates bears the name of Stella, but the dealer substituted that of Poussin, thinking to sell them better. This collection of "The Passion," consequently, always passed for Poussin's, so much the more that the first proofs are exceedingly rare. "The plates," says Mariette, "perhaps scarcely ever drew two proofs, and I never saw them but this time in this work, which was that which Mademoiselle Stella made for it."

"The Pastorals," a collection of seventeen pieces in quarto, very well engraved by Claudine Stella after her uncle. It is one of the most charming things by the painter and the engraver both, as well as the "St. Louis giving Alms," a full-length piece touched up with much sentiment, dated from 1651, and dedicated to Charles Delorme, physician in ordinary to the king.

"Children's Games," in fifty pieces, by the same.

"The Marriage of St. Catherine," by the same.

Gerard Edelinck has engraved, after Stella, a Virgin with a Child, of which the first proofs are before the letter.

There is also "The Holy Family, with Sleep," engraved by Rousselet; "The Return from Egypt," engraved at Rome by Goyraud, with this inscription: Ex Egypto cocchi illium venant.

The Museum of the Louvre contains few pictures by Stella; a little one on marble, of which we have spoken; another representing Minerva and the Muses; and two pictures in the form of friezes, representing the education of Achilles.

The Museum of Lyons, the native town of Stella, only possesses one picture by this painter, "The Adoration of the Angels," which had belonged to the cordeliers of Lyons, who had given to the family of Stella the free right of sepulchre at the foot of the great altar. The picture is signed Stella fecit haut.

As for the drawings of Stella, they are generally very finished. There are five of them in the Louvre.

Pictures by this master have not reached high prices in sales. At the sale of Randon de Boisset, in 1777, a "Holy Family" the Virgin is upright near a tree, and Joseph, leaning against a column, holds a book open—fetched £37. At the sale of the Prince de Conti, in 1777, a "Holy Family, with Angels," was sold for £65. The usual price is £26.

"The Dance" (p. 45), is a very good specimen of his style. The figures are good, and the landscape finished and pleasing.

"Peter Denying Christ" (p. 48) is very fine. The woman who recognises him, the hesitating face of the apostle, the curious looks of the soldiers, the lights and shadows, the rich glare of the fire, are rendered with admirable fidelity. It is a fine picture well painted.

"The Return from Work" (p. 44), already alluded to, is a very pleasing picture. The style of the figures, though somewhat different from the peasant as given by more faithful students of life, is still not sufficiently exaggerated to be faulty. The two who are dancing, and the dog looking back, form a pleasing group.

ANTONIO SOLARIO, IL ZINGARO.

II.

In Naples lived Colantonio del Fiore, an artist of renown; a man proud, too, of his wealth and his noble ancestry, the usual advantages of which, however, he had resigned to follow the arts, which he did with a success of which those who have seen his "St. Jerome taking a thorn out of a Lion's Paw" may judge. To this man, a few days later, came De Rieux, nowise injured in purse or person; Il Zingaro having allowed him to depart as he came, on the single condition of his befriending him on any visit he might make to Naples. Colantonio received the Frenchman kindly, and admitted him at once as a pupil, though he forbore asking him to his house as a visitor.

This puzzled the traveller, who, with the ready perception of his nation, immediately laid it to Italian jealousy, and made inquiries accordingly. His surmise was right. There was a tinge of jealousy in the disposition of the noble artist. He was a widower with one child, and all the love which men sometimes lavish on many did Colantonio give with perfect devotion to his one daughter—the gentle and beautiful Claudia. No man had ever seen her save the attendants of the house, so jealous was the old man of his treasure, beside which his richest paintings were as dross. There is rich beauty in the love of the parent for her who reminds him of one not better cherished, but who, viewed through the mirror of time, appears dearer for the lovely reflection of the past. Colantonio scarce stirred from home, so watchful was he. It would not be wise to guard and enslave young beauty so now, or in our clime; but those were lawless days, when the fancy of a mightier man than himself might have left him childless, and in one day turned laughing joy to sobbing desolation.

De Rieux heard all this and smiled. He was young, thought himself handsome, and was a Parisian—what woman could resist him! The old artist was rich and noble, and then the mystery of the affair piqued his curiosity and excited emotion which the gaiety of Paris had temporarily killed. A marriage with the child of a man who was illustrious by rank and genius, would reconcile his uncle to him, that uncle who thought him now a hopeless scapgrace.

"André Mothe," said he, cutting his moustache at breakfast-time a few days later; "I'm thinking of marrying."

"Of what, sir?" exclaimed the worthy attendant holding up his hands.

"Of marrying, with, vanilla!" continued De Rieux sternly.

"Sir, I'll go and learn to write, or have one of the scribes to write home to your uncle again," exclaimed André.

"Thou shalt do so when I have settled the affair."

"Ah! you will be settled then," groaned André; "you never tried it, I hope!"

"No jokes against matrimony—it is a reflection on the beautiful Claudia."

"Eh! the veiled beauty men talk so much of, eh?" cried André; "it ain't then quite settled."

"As good as," said De Rieux. "See who it is, would be admitted."

"'Tis the brigand—what immodesty!" cried André, returning after an instant.

Il Zingaro stood behind him, looking curiously, but rather haughtily, at the artist's room. He was plainly, but simply dressed, and indeed looked a model for an artist.

"Welcome, terrible intruder," said De Rieux in a protective tone, which grated harshly on the ox-trail's ears; "welcome to Naples."

"Have you seen Colantonio?" asked Antonio Solario, somewhat abruptly.

"I have, worthy mountaineer," said he, "and I have the honour to be admitted among his pupils."

"Is that by him?" continued Solario, turning to a canvas which stood in a good light.

"It is," said De Rieux carelessly; "it is one he lent me to copy at home."

"I never saw a painting before," cried the youth with sudden admiration, "save those in the chapel of the convent. But this is beautiful; that man's eye looks out from the canvas, that woman smiles—wetter than life itself. I would be six months upon the rack to be able to paint such a picture."

"So!" said a rich voice behind a young woman, though she was just reached by a train of people, "young man, you are rather rustic. But to paint such a picture, as that, you need torture your limbs no less, months, not as the production of my youth."

Il Zingaro turned, confused and yet pleased, and gazed with admiration and respect at Colantonio, who had come in unannounced, and leave the untrifling and untrifling exclamation:

"Per Bacco! a goodly head, with that countenance now to my studio, and I will paint it—what art thou?"

"I once a poor handi-craft, but I am I know not, I will come, signor."

"The impertinent scoundrel," said the Frenchman; "I'll denounce that fellow to the police."

"You will do nothing of the kind," said Colantonio drily. "In the first place he acted very nobly, according to your own account; in the second, your neck is not worth a sou, as you say, if you do."

"Why?" asked De Rieux.

"Because Il Zingaro's hand is protected—it exempts certain persons in high places from all attack, and is exempted in turn for all it does to others."

"What laws, what a country!" said De Rieux.

The artist made no reply; but informing the young Frenchman of a court reception and telling him he was invited, he went away, musing as to what character in a great historical picture he should ask Solario to sit for.

Next day Solario was in the painter's studio, and there sat patiently as long as the artist chose to employ him; then he went away without waiting for any reward. This lasted every day for about a week, the handsome, stalwart frame of the young hand serving Colantonio many purposes; he painted his face, his arms, his chest, his hair, his chin, and used him, in fact, as a general model.

"Solario," said he one day, "when you amuse do you expect?"

"Signor Colantonio," replied the young painter, "to a slight entertainment, and some Frenchmen, that is, a good deal of company."

"That's nothing, but, Solario, you must live."

"There is fun in Naples, and you may enjoy leave as much as would fool ten men," said Solario bluntly.

Colantonio took it curiously at him and took it away. From that hour the Zingaro was admitted into the kitchen of the artist, where he not only was well fed, but became almost a resident, being well beloved by all the menials for his wit, humour, and jollity of temper. He was quick at repartee, and small talk, enjoyed, without quite descending to it, the society of the domestics—and above all, sang with a richness and volume of voice which was irresistibly soothing and sweet.

One evening he stood with his back half turned to the door of the spacious hall below, his back against a pillar, surrounded by all the menials, who listened to him with open mouth and flashing eye, as he sang with even more spirit than usual, and of his no certain lays.

Scarcely his back was turned to him, his voice had become more rich and excellent—his manner, which had been the servants' most attentive and one of Il Zingaro's greater exertions. Near the door of the hall was Claudia. She had wanted a maid to wait on her, and had called on a man. Hearing the sound of song, and being, like most Italians, particularly fond of music, she descended stealthily to listen outside, but, completely captivated by the singer's power, she could not help peeping in to look at him. He saw her, and yet seemed not to notice her, and, curious to gaze upon her lovely form, will, even had his face been near than usual. When he had finished, she glided away, believing that her act had been unnoticed.

There is strange news, and the eyes of an Italian mountaineer, who is all the more curious in consequence of his own sex, Claudia and I will be with a person very young, tall, and a good deal above the ordinary young Frenchman, and I will tell you her name. De Rieux might know, but he is dead, and I do not know where he is.

And now Solario changed. He began to try and paint with the refuse canvas, old brushes, and paints of the studio, where he often returned to gaze his fill upon the great works of Colantonio. The great artist had given him a privilege and permission he would have accorded to few of higher rank and nobler blood. But at eventide he was heard no more in the kitchen; if he sang, it was beneath the window of his fair enslaver; and Claudia knew his voice well among all the serenaders attracted by the rumours of her beauty. At first she thought it mere chance; but when she met him continually at the church door, she knew that the charm of her extraordinary beauty had taken his heart by storm.

Claudia was little more than fifteen; an age when a girl may be forgiven for yielding to the influence of romance rather than of calm judgment. She saw that Solario was handsome, and she suspected that he was not so lowly in birth as he looked. She had dreams and yet he strove not against it. And when Claudia listened without being angry, and even hinted that she did not dislike him, the passionate young mountaineer fell on his knees, and vowed to do something that should make him worthy of her.

Like many others in the history of the world, love kindled within him the sacred fire of genius, and impelled him to dare heights of ambition of which otherwise he had certainly never dreamed.

"Claudia," he said earnestly, "I would I were a rich noble!"

"I could not love you more," replied the warm-hearted Neapolitan girl.

"But I could claim you then with some hope. As it is, I must win a name and that power which wealth alone can give. I scarcely know how I shall succeed; but I do know, Claudia, that by some means or other I will make myself worthy of you."

of his being a prince in disguise—of his having heard of her seduction, and being determined to break through it; and, despite aged attendant and calm reason, she could not help accepting water from his fingers at the church door, and gently inclining her head to him, when he gave one of his profound and deeply respectful bows. It was not strange, then, that at the end of six months Solario should have actually spoken to Claudia del Fiore, and spoken, too, of his wild, his hopeless, and his unbounded passion. But it was only in a few hurried words; after uttering which he flew away amazed at his own insouciance. At the end of that time, however, he asked for and obtained a formal interview.

The interview was steady and long. Solario, much improved by six months of study and thought, discoursed with Claudia on many subjects, but chiefly with regard to himself. He upbraided himself for his passion, for which he said himself there was no

"I believe you," said the girl with all that mysterious confidence which a young girl feels in her first love.

They stood near a balcony, gazing

"O'er the glad waters of the dark-blue sea," speaking in low-whispered accents; and, while an aged attendant slept near them, were happy, because alone. Suddenly they started. A heavy foot-step was heard; they turned: Colantonio was before them.

"What does Antonio Solario here?" said the artist, bending his shaggy brows in anger.

They could not speak for a moment; but their attitude—they stood hand-in-hand, unconsciously, both blushing and trembling—sufficiently expressed their surprise and their love. Colantonio thought he had never seen a handsomer couple or a better subject for a picture.

"So," he continued, "Master Solario—you retain your benighted tastes, and would rob me of my daughter. But, though you may both love with the passion of a poet, it is in vain. My daughter must be the wife of an artist."

"My father," said Claudia gently,

"Nay; here not to move or change my resolution," resumed Colantonio.

"My master," said Solario passionately; "I do not desire you to change. Give me time, and I will be an artist. I was born for it. Already I feel the fire within me. But, oh, Colantonio, let me hope, that if I succeed, I may be rewarded."

"Do you know how long it will take to make you an artist?" replied Colantonio.

in company with the artist, she, though in reality angry, and chafing like a caged bird, was determined to give the young man every chance. He was about to undertake him at court, and thus add his views during his subsequent travels.

The artist and his pupil were admitted to the presence of the king, queen, and daughter. Colantonio led the way. The king frowned, not liking that nobility should take notice of him, but the queen and young prince heard it with pleasure, and smiled up on the undulous young husband and painter. He had to do. With this assurance, high hopes, and driving wind, he set out on his art, and was heard of no more for many a long day.

De Rioux had returned to France, that if Claudia, the king, and queen were dead, and the prince was wedded to the artist,

THE DANCE.—FROM A PAINTING BY JAMES STEWART.

"Ten years," said Solario.

"And you expect me," replied Colantonio with a sneer, "to wait ten years on the chance of your becoming an artist—it cannot be."

"I will wait the ten years," said Claudia quickly. "I am sure Antonio will succeed."

"The stammering oath of love!" replied the father, shaking his head; "but since you are willing, Claudia, be it so. Claudia shall wait the ten years, Il Zingaro. But you must leave Naples. I will give you letters to artists over the whole world. You can travel, and pick up information as you go. If you return not in ten years, my daughter is free. Bid my child adieu; you will see her no more for the present."

Half an hour later, Solario was walking on towards the road

Colantonio was an old man, and Claudia a child. She never had regretted her contract with the burglar. But feelings had come of the wandering Colantonio, and he had now and then ways, and disapproved of the artist's conduct.

One day the queen sent for Claudia, and she had to bring she was called to them, and resolved the matter. They found her sitting in a private chamber, gazing at a portrait of her father, from the hands of an artist.

After the usual obeisance, Claudia looked up to the picture. "Your nobility has found some portrait," said the artist, "but my noble being is lost."

"It is not so all-out," exclaimed the young queen.

"It is fresh and full of genius," said the artist; "the coloring is rich and warm, the likeness perfect."

"And what say you to this?" exclaimed the queen, drawing a curtain and displaying a picture, the one alluded to in the opening of our narrative.

"Madam," cried Colantonio, "this is wonderful! In my wildest dreams I never hoped to realise such a picture. Ah! that portrait of myself of my daughter! What is the meaning of all this?"

"Come forth, H Zingaro," said the queen. "I think you have kept your promise."

The brigand-painter stepped from behind a screen, so handsome, so proud, so happy, that Claudia had good reason to be pleased at her own fidelity. Colantonio grasped his hand with rapture, and led him to his daughter, who fell into his arms. The old man was such a lover of art, that he considered he received dowry fit for a prince, when his daughter could lay claim to a husband who possessed such surpassing genius.

And H Zingaro and Claudia were married, and both continued to enjoy the protection and support of the queen. Colantonio died at a good old age, rejoicing in the fact that he had left his child under the protection and care of one who loved her so well, and who so thoroughly deserved her by the gentle care and affection with which he treated her. H Zingaro became a great artist, and his renown is not yet forgotten in the city of Naples.

FINE ARTS IN AMERICA.

It is no longer fashionable to run down America as a matter of course, no longer in good taste to ridicule a country which contains so many of our off-shoots, and which has given such brilliant evidence of its capability for entering into honourable rivalry with us. The reading classes of the community are beginning to appreciate and admire the virgin Anglo-Saxon genius which has done so much to elevate and ennoble the paths of literature in the New World. This fact is owing a good deal to the circumstance that the prejudiced classes, the men of the war time, the rigid martinet of the beginning of the century are dying out. The very memory of a state of hostilities between England and her gigantic step-child is passing away; and though there is yet much ignorance on both sides of the Atlantic, a more generous and noble spirit is rising up on the eastern and on the western shores of that vast ocean, which in its eternal revolutions washes now the feet of England's chalky cliffs, and now the strand before the great ports of America. This is a mighty advance of the human mind.

For many years we have accepted and adopted American authors, and have found them capable of writing the mother tongue in a way which has quite astonished the critics of an antiquated date. We sorely recollect that Washington Irving, Prescott, Bancroft, Cooper, Emerson, Longfellow, Hawthorne, and Mrs. Stowe are children of the transatlantic republic, so identified have these names been with our literature.

We are also rapidly appreciating the progress of our brothers over the sea in the arts. No finer spectacle can be imagined than two great nations, of the same origin, after terrible rivalry in arms, after the battle and the storm, calming down in their feelings, and entering upon the beautiful contest of truth and beauty.

This contest began even before the quarrel. A very acute and excellent writer, George Palmer Putnam, has given us some interesting facts on this subject, and he informs us that the names known in America, in painting, during the Colonial Period, were Watson, Smybert, West, Copley, Peale, and Stuart.

The first in this list is Watson, an artist who, though born in Scotland in 1685, gained his celebrity as a portrait-painter in America. He was a man of talent, whose works are still preserved and appreciated. He dwelt in New Jersey, and began his career in 1718. The next name of note, that of Nathaniel Smybert, is also Scotch, but his fame was made in Boston, where he began to paint soon after Watson. It will be remarked that very many of America's celebrities are of Scotch origin. This does not at all militate against the United States, as the encouragement must exist for men to distinguish themselves in any branch of human acquirements.

But the first American name, of which the children of the old colonists are truly proud, is that of Benjamin West. We are proud of him, but the Americans are not less so. It was in that country he first drew breath and felt the inspiration of genius. He was born in Pennsylvania in 1708, and painted his first portrait there in 1753. But as in those days the materials for study were not sufficient, and West aimed at greatness, he came over to England, where he was received with a feeling which, had it been more general in high places, might have saved us a colony and, perhaps, spoilt a great nation. It is something for an American to have found in England the patronage of royalty and the presidency of the Royal Academy, to which rank he was elevated in 1792. We may probably have occasion to speak of him more fully, but the price of some of his pictures will show the estimation in which he was held. His "Christ Rejected" was purchased for £3,000; his "Death on the Pale Horse" for £2,000.

The father of the present Lord Lyndhurst is another instance well worthy of being quoted and remembered. His name was John Singleton Copley, and he was born in Boston in 1738. He painted the portraits of many distinguished Americans, but studied and carried on his profession with success in this country, where all members of his family and connexions now hold a deservedly high place.

A student of West attained to a very high position as a painter of portraits in America—Charles W. Peale of Maryland. Gilbert Charles Stuart also reached to eminence both in London and his native country, he having been born in Rhode Island in 1754. To him we owe the best portrait of that great and good man, Washington, of whom Lafayette so justly said, that scarcely any preceding man ever combined in himself so much of what was great and good in human nature. This portrait is one of the heirlooms of the great republic, and is highly valued and appreciated.

Since the Declaration of Independence, many painters, sculptors, and engravers, have arisen, of great talent—men who, in all probability, will hold a deservedly high position in the history of art. It is curious to notice, that many of them are of the good old Flemish stock—the Vanderlyn's, the Verbruyck's, and others—though the majority are of the Anglo Saxon race.

William Dunlop, born in New Jersey, 1766, who began to paint at a very early age, was the first secretary of the American Academy of the Fine Arts. He was a pupil of West's, and was an amusing and pleasing writer as well as an artist.

Trumbull combined the arts of war and peace; he was well used to the " Shrill trump,

The spirit-stirring drum, the ear-piercing fife, having been one of the aides-de-camp to Washington, at the beginning of the war of independence. After serving for some time, he quitted the arena of strife,

" To sit on rocks, to muse o'er flood and fall

To slowly trace the forest's shady scene, and succeeded very well as an artist. Several of his paintings on American historical subjects are now contained in the Trumbull gallery at New Haven. He painted four large pictures for Congress, receiving £1,600 for each of them. They are of a very high order of merit. Colonel Trumbull was a travelled man, and died in 1842 at the age of eighty-six.

Amongst the ablest of American artists, we must not fail to quote Vanderlyn, two of whose pictures are well known even in Europe. These are, "Ariadne," and "Marius amidst the ruins of Carthage." This artist has shown himself possessed of great grace and delicacy.

Mallbone is celebrated as a miniature-painter. He would bear favourable comparison with any modern artist in the same line. His merit is recognised by many on this side of the Atlantic.

Rembrandt Peale, who must have been intended for a painter from his boyhood, produced several very fine pictures; amongst which the best known are "The Roman Daughter," "The Court of Death," and "A Portrait of Washington."

Sargent, a Boston artist, born in 1797, produced many works of interest and talent. His best—at all events his most celebrated—is "Christ entering Jerusalem," which sold for 3,000 dollars.

Jarvis, born in England in 1789, was taken to America when five years old, and remained there the rest of his life. An able artist in many walks, he is chiefly known as a portrait-painter. Many of his pictures of public characters are to be seen in the City Hall of New York.

THE GERMAN EXHIBITION.

It may be that we owe the exhibition we are about to notice, more to the presence of Prince Albert, than to the general English patronage of foreign art. Not that the public who care about art in England, and who buy pictures, are at all blind to the merit of foreign artists; on the contrary, in this respect they offer a most gratifying contrast to their continental brethren, for some few years ago, when at the Exhibition of the Louvre, we well remember that there were then only two English pictures by a modern artist in that collection, and those pictures certainly were magnificent—they were interiors by Roberts. Now, not only are our galleries filled with the productions of the Italian and the Dutch schools, but 'tis not long since, when the Vernon collection was bequeathed to the nation, that the foreign productions predominated over those of native talent. The vigorous bearing of the modern English school; so rich in every variety of art; so transcendently excellent as to force itself, so to speak, into notice, has entirely remedied this; and art has been so well rewarded here, that even distinguished French and German painters have been attracted to our shores. The French exhibition may have been encouraged by the excellent feeling at present established between the two nations; the German, we take it, by the ties of consanguinity which subsist between the thrones as well as the people.

From whatever source it may arise, the result is most pleasurable. The exhibition is very creditable, and also curious as establishing an identity of feeling as regards art between the people of each country. This is especially remarkable in their landscapes, many of which are perfectly English in their treatment.

The size of the exhibition is too small, the number of pictures, with additions, only amounting to eighty-five! The price charged for admission being one shilling, the same as the Royal Academy and other exhibitions with three times the number of paintings, this present gallery stands at some disadvantage with regard to the pockets of those who are economical. In fact, it would be not only beneficial, but graceful on the part of the conductors, to open their gallery at half-price to their countrymen and the middle classes of the community.

The first painting in the gallery, "Where there is no Money, there is no Law," is a scene in a tavern, wherein an old cavalier, with a conical look of roguery upon his face, refuses to pay for his entertainment, and we presume quotes the German proverb which forms the title of the picture. The enraged countenance of the host and hostess is excellently contrasted by the calm look of the Dutch Macaire. The colour is very good, the chiaroscuro well kept, and the accessories remarkably well painted by A. Siezert.

(No. 4), Landscape, "Holland," by Stienecke, is a clever picture of flat scenery; the colour is, however, far from good.

(No. 6), "The Anxious Mother," by B. Vautier, is interesting in subject and clever in composition.

(No. 9), "The Andeck Mountain in Switzerland," is a grand scene, finely rendered by the artist, H. Baumgartner. The distance is especially fine.

(No. 12), "A Sketch—subject from the Peasants' War," by O. Knille, is very finely drawn and remarkably spirited. The positions are free, natural and unaffected. (13), "A Fruit piece," by A. W. Preyer, is worthy of the old Dutch artists of the same style. The composition is very simple; a bunch of grapes still attached to the stem, upon which is a leaf wonderfully painted, lies upon a slab of marble, and slightly in the background is a glass of Champagne, not long poured out, with the effervescence still rising in the glass. The effect of this is wonderful, the glass and wine are so painted as to make the visitor believe that they have never been excelled. The whole picture is sound in its finish, and so modestly painted as to put to shame the more glaring compositions of Lauce and Duffield, who would do well to take a lesson from it.

(No. 19), "Sketch—The Battle of Gross-bieren," is very spirited and remarkably accurate in costume; it is painted by G. Bliedtren.

(No. 22), "A Norwegian Landscape," by Andreas Achenbach, is well painted, but it is hard, gray and sordid; the peculiar colour may be, and probably is, entirely true to Norwegian nature, but is not very pleasant.

(No. 24), "A Scene in Norway," by A. Len, is very grand and imposing. On the top of a vast mountain, a lofty lake, probably formed by the water of one great volcano, reflects the sun-st. Deer and elk stretch out their antlers upon the mountain top, whilst wild flowers bloom in every crevice in the stone. Both colour and execution are good.

(No. 27), "Sketch—subject from the Thirty Years' War," by G. Sell, is a spirited scene of war and devastation. Some of Wallenstein's party are besieging a castle, and the painter has chosen the interior of a room wherein a party of defenders are about to fire from a window upon the besiegers. An old man, in instant danger of being struck by a ball, pees down into the court below, whilst another, presenting his piece, pulls him from the scene of danger. The chief centre figure upbraids and threatens two prisoners, one of whom is wounded and reclining on the floor of the apartment. The eagerness of the combatants, the determination and stern feeling of their countenances, and the perfect knowledge of anatomy shown by the artist, render this picture as fine and interesting as any in the gallery. The style is somewhat after that of Charles Landseer with us; but the German painter has signally triumphed.

(No. 37), "Little Miss Vanity," by Geselehap, is a picture which explains itself in its title. It is nicely painted.

(No. 38), "The Death of Louis IX. of France, A.D. 1279." A large historical picture by C. Bawoy, is the most ambitious picture in the room. On the coast of Africa, in an expedition against the kingdom of Tunis, Louis was attacked by a fatal malady. The artist has chosen the scene when upon a bed of ashes, raised in his tent, with the crucifix before him, and surrounded by his army, Louis yielded up his life to Him who gave it. A quotation from the "Biographie Universelle" explains the picture:—"The dying king, the kneeling priests, and devout soldiers, the glow of the sky, reddening with the declining day, all render this representation of a solemn scene, solemn and grand in itself." The armour and accessories are drawn with the same knowledge and minute attention as would be shown by Mielise, but the colour is exactly the reverse, being as much too red as his is too chalky.

(No. 43), "A Landscape," by Pierson, reminds one of Justin.

(No. 44), "A Sketch," by G. Sell, introduces "Laditti," is free and bold, and well drawn.

(No. 47), "The Middy's Lecture on Sobriety," by Henry Ritter, has been exhibited in the Royal Academy; it is now exhibited again, as the best work of the deceased artist. A midshipman, who has had charge of the boat whilst some of his men are on shore, is very properly indignant at finding two of them, in company with the black cook, walking down to the boat as drunk as they can, evidently can be without lying down. The consciousness of guilt, and the comic expression of the man at being checked by their young officer, the earnestness and grandeur of the latter combined with his youth, go far to render the picture one of the most pleasing of humorous productions, and make us lament the loss of the artist.

(No. 50), "Entrance to the Harbour of Chistina," by Muller, is a good sea-piece, freely dashed in; the water is motive and transparent.

(No. 51), "A Norwegian Fjord—Evening," is a beautiful landscape. We are ashamed to say that amid we read some of Miss Bremer's novels, and Miss Martineau's descriptions, we had little idea that scenery during the short Norwegian summer was so beautiful. The artist of this charming landscape is A. Lew.

(No. 56), "A Forest Scene," by A. Barrow, is a very large picture of great merit; the study of the trees and the attention paid to each production in the vegetation of England is certainly immense.

(No. 60), "The change of Fortune—The Deceitful Will," is a prettily painted, but not very meritorious illustration of one of Berger's romances, which are little known in this country.

(No. 62), with the somewhat anomalous title of "Stop This!" is a large landscape by night, of great merit, painted by F. Schlessinger. A small figure, probably starting something from a cart, explains the title.

(No. 63), "Moonlight on the Sagen Fjords," is a landscape with a curious effect, by Larson.

(No. 71), "The Little Admiral," by W. Cordes, is a water scene, of a commander, who, in charge of a boat-load of various provisions for the ship's crew, is quietly floating down the stream. The execution is meritorious.

we find marked in our catalogue with approbation: the rush and foam of the water is especially good.

(No. 84), "A Rustic Ball," by T. Fay, is a very pleasing picture, not unlike in treatment to the productions of our own Wilkie.

THE FEAST OF SAINT MARTIN. PAINTING BY JAMES STELLA.

(No. 79), "A Coin Toss," by Neidenberg, in which several young fellows are making a glass of hot punch through the hot lips of the company above, is very well painted, and is a bona fide property of the Dutch School.

(No. 79), "Torrent in the Valley of Hardanger," by H. Gude,

In conclusion, we must congratulate the committee of this exhibition on the great promise and excellence of almost every picture in the room, one great merit being that there is not a thoroughly faulty production exhibited. To those fond of art we at once recommend a visit to 138, Bond street.

JOSEPH VERNET.

CLAUDE JOSEPH VERNET, father of Carl Vernet, and grandfather of Horace, was himself the son of a painter, and was endowed with a greater share than any one else of that genius for painting drawings executed by him at the age of five, when he was rewarded by being allowed to use the pencil he had tried to parboil. Before he was fifteen years old, he adroitly painted frieze-panels, frescoes, sedan-chair panels, &c., and gave proof of that facility in conceiving and executing which was one of the characteristic marks of his genius.

It was not possible for Joseph Vernet, whose father dreamt of nothing but seeing him pursue the glorious career of the historical painter, to remain for ever at Avignon, his native place. It was, therefore, thought necessary to send him to Rome; consequently, his father one morning put a few livres d'or into his hand, and sent him off with a wazner, who undertook to take him to Marseilles. The journey took a long while to perform; for it was necessary to stop the horses every instant, so that the young painter might have time enough to sketch the landscapes of Provence, which are so different from those of Le Comtat, or to admire a range of mountains, the sterility of which formed a strong contrast with the verdure of the plains which stretched beneath, with the innumerable roads that covered them. But while Joseph Vernet was thus going to consult the great masters, he suddenly met with his real master—the sea.

When he saw it for the first time, from the top of a mountain called Le Viste, near Marseilles, it made so deep an impression upon him, that henceforth his vocation was decided on; he immediately felt that he was destined to be a painter of marine subjects. Before him stretched the Mediterranean as far as the eye could reach, while three islands, which lay at a few leagues from the shore, seemed to be chained there in order to break the uniformity of the immense lake; and to gratify the eye; on his right rose a sloping tower of country houses, intersected with trees; on his left was the little harbour of Mastues; in front, innumerable vessels rocked to and fro in the port of Marseilles, while the horizon was terminated by the tower of Boue, nearly lost in the distance. This spectacle was a suggestion to the genius of Vernet; nature, while which has rendered his family illustrious as artists through four generations.

The wonderful stories told about most celebrated painters are really true with respect to Joseph Vernet. He has himself often related that, on his return from Italy, his mother gave him some able to paint marine subjects, furnished him with mere elements of the picture—she furnished him with the picture itself. We meet, from time to time, with artists who find themselves, in the treasury of their meditations, in the regions of their imagination, forms and figures that they would in vain seek for whence from memory alone; they know how to represent, with colours such as Poussin would have used, not only wonderful phenomena, light, and the visible and palpable objects of creation, but also certain delicate things, the existence of which they have discovered by thought. There are, on the contrary, other artists whose minds are ever ready to receive all outward impressions, while they feel deeply enough to express them with truth and beauty; their eyes are like windows, through which ideas enter under the form of images, and their genius is like an Æolian harp, which, in order to produce a sound, waits for a breath of air. The first, among whom Joseph Vernet must be placed, belong to the class of painters. Until he saw a tempest, Joseph Vernet was nothing more than a painter of ships and harbours; but the day when he first listened to the roaring of the furious sea, while on board a ship that was beaten about by the wind, threatened by the lightning, and in danger of going down every instant, his mind was agitated on a level with the grandeur of the scene; he recollects to have seen the fright and gestures of the sailors, the discomposed manner of all on board, and the grand appearance of the swollen waves.

"It was on going from Marseilles to Rome," says one of his admirers, Monsieur Pitra, "that Joseph Vernet, on seeing a tempest coming, when they were off the island of Sardinia, was seized with a noble terror, but with admiration; in the midst of the general alarm, the painter seemed really to relish the peril; his only desire was to face the tempest, and to be, so to say, mixed up in it, in order that, some day or other, he might astonish and frighten his country by the terrible effects he would then learn to produce; his danger was, that he might lose the sight of a spectacle so new to him. He had himself lashed to the mainmast, and, while he was tossed about in every direction, saturated with sea-water, and engaged by this hand-to-hand struggle with his model, he forgot the tempest, not on his canvas, but in his memory, which he never forgot anything. He saw and remembered all,—clouds, waves, and rocks, lines and colours, with the motion of the boats and the rocking of the ship, and the accidental light which intermingled the slate-coloured sky, that served as a ground to the white foam of the sea foam."

When he arrived at Rome, in 1732, Joseph Vernet became a pupil of Bernardin Fergioni, a painter of marine pieces, whom, however, he soon surpassed. He was now eighteen years old, and had been born in 1714. Entirely unknown in Rome, the young painter lived on what he obtained by the sale of a few marine pictures; he found, however, but few buyers, and obtained but very little money for a kind of painting which, more than any other, is the absence of colour to be regretted; he, therefore, painted many small pieces of smaller dimensions, which he sold for one or two francs each, until a cardinal, one day, gave him four louis (or for 12 francs). The barber, at whose house he lodged at Rome, let several of these small pictures run on expressly with the intention of being eventually paid with a picture instead of money; and on the day when the painter owed four quarters' rent, the barber, who had continually contemplated him while painting, asked him for a picture which he represented day-break, and which had been ordered for the cardinal already mentioned. At this juncture the cardinal arrived, and the barber threw himself at the feet of his pupil, and with tears in his eyes, implored him to let him have the picture which the young artist had just finished.

The reputation of an artist is quickly made at Rome, provided the cardinal takes the slightest notice of him. It was thus that Vernet's name was made; but he thought less of making money by his art, than of improving himself. Every day he left Rome, to wander about the surrounding country, so that he might study at his leisure the different tones of the sky, as he always wished to paint nature herself. He watched for the various hues presented by the horizon at different hours of the day, and tried to imitate its tints; but he soon perceived that his power of observation, and his passion, though it was, could not keep pace with the continued variation of the colours of the atmosphere; and he despaired of ever being able to represent on canvas the moving harmony of those pictures, which nature required so little time to execute in such perfection, and which so quickly passed away. He now invented an alphabet of tones, which is the more curious, because another painter has left us a description of it.²

The various characters of this alphabet were joined together and corresponded to an equal number of different tints. If Vernet saw the sun rise silvery and fresh, or set the colour of crimson, or if he saw a storm approaching or disappearing, he opened his tablets, and there set down the gradation of the tones he admired, as quickly as he would write ten or twelve letters on a piece of paper. After having thus noted down the beauties of the sky in short hand, so to speak, he returned to his studio, to transfer them to canvas, and to render stationary the moving picture he had just been contemplating. Effects, which had for a time disappeared, were thus re-annoyed in all their charming harmony, to delight the eye of every lover of painting.

Far from confining himself within the narrow limits of one branch of his profession, Joseph Vernet determined to take as wide a range as possible. At Rome, he had made the acquaintance of Leontelli, Paulini, and Salimene. Like them, he studied the splendid ruins of the architecture of ancient Rome, and the noble landscapes of its environs, together with the water-courses, the rocks, and the celebrated cascades of Tivoli. He also paid particular attention to the proportions and attitudes of his figures, as well as to the picturesque appearance of their costume, which were mostly those of fishermen or lazzaroni. Such love for nature and for art, such assiduous contemplation, at different hours of the day, of the phenomena of light, and such profound study of the numerous accessories whose importance he wished to raise, being joined to genius of the first order, made an excellent landscape-painter of Vernet; and though he was, undoubtedly, inferior to Claude Lorraine, in producing bold and luminous effects, he was quite equal to him in rendering the effects of vapour, and much superior, as Diderot remarked, in the invention of scenes, in designing figures, and in the variety of his incidents.

The French painter soon occupied a high position in Rome; he was universally sought after, and he now obtained high price for the same kind of landscapes and marine pieces which he had, at first, parted with to discharge his arrears of rent. He received orders from all quarters for tempests, clouds, gales, and cascades. He was also employed to decorate the Rondinini palace and the Borghese gallery with landscapes, which he executed in the elevated style of Salvator. He chose for his subjects the most terrible phenomena of nature, such as frightful ravines, down which rushed foaming torrents that bounded from rock to rock, and dragged along with them entire trunks of up-rooted trees. But the figures which he painted at the bottom of these abysses are far from being as sombre as the brigands of Salvator. On being relieved of their helmets and hauberts, they would still be the same anchalotti fishermen, whom Vernet knew so well how to place, in a sitting or recumbent position, on the foreground of his cabins. The study he made of Salvator was, however, so far beneficial to him, that it strengthened his colouring, gave firmness to his touch, and inspired him with those dark and bold tints by which those of his paintings that date from his stay in Italy are easily recognised.

Endowed with wonderful facility for properly understanding everything, and for painting all he undertook well and quickly, Joseph Vernet had identified himself, for a time, with the wild and rough manner of Salvator, and imitated his rigid foliage, his ragged rocks, and the mournful aspect of his ground-plots, cracked and edged by the sun; but this was not the proper field for the genius of Vernet to work in. He was, above all, a Frenchman, and penetrated, though with difficulty, into those dark regions of the imagination which were not known to French artists before the revolution that has taken place in painting during the present century. In spite of himself, Joseph Vernet always painted places that were inhabited, or at least habitable. Some indication of neighbouring civilisation, a dilapidated villa, or the fragment of an aqueduct, always appeared in the distance, between two mountains that ended

Whenever Vernet wished to represent a gale, he took care not to present the eye with the monotonous spectacle of a number of objects all inclining to the same side. By placing objects that resist the wind by the side of others that yield to it, he gave his scenes a variety of movement which imparted to them an appearance of life. With respect to accidental lights, "it must be observed," says Hermann, "that the greatest painters have seldom introduced them into their pictures. Claude Lorraine never employed them, though he painted both sunrise and sunset. The skies of the Flemish artists were generally overcast, with, here and there, a bluish space. But Vernet, I think, is the only one who, emboldened by the special study he had made of cloudy and stormy weather, ever succeeded in imitating the accidental lights of the sky."

It is also from the same artist that Hermann borrows his examples, when speaking of double lights. There are some landscapes, few in number, it is true, in which the daylight and the light of a fire are thrown upon the same objects. The first of these lights ought to be very faint, and then the effect of the second will be extraordinary. Shepherds or travellers seated, near nightfall, in the border of a forest, would form a very good subject for a rock within sight, and could not invent these imposing, fantastic, severe, and picturesque forms of which nature alone furnishes the models, and which the most fertile imagination would never even dream of.

The spirited painter of tempestuous marine pieces was, as we have already said, a man of the most amiable manners. What he most loved, next to painting, was music. He had formed an intimate acquaintance with Pergolesi, the musician, who afterwards became so celebrated, and they lived almost continually together. Joseph Vernet had had a harpsichord placed in his studio for the express use of his friend, and while the painter, carried away by his imagination, put the waters of the mighty main into commotion, or suspended persons on the towering waves, the grave composer sought, with the tips of his fingers, for the rudiments of his immortal melodies. It was thus that the melancholy stanzas of that ch. f. d'aure of sadness and of sorrow, the Stabat-Mater, were composed for a little convent in which one of Pergolesi's sisters resided. It seems to us, that while listening to this plaintive music, Vernet must have given a more mellow tint to his painting; and it was, perhaps, while under its influence, that he worked at landscape of this kind. Vernet has introduced such a contrast of a fire into several of his moonlight scenes; the fire, however, is too small to clash with the light of the moon. It is, in all cases, necessary for one or other of the lights to have a marked preponderance, for if they were nearly equal, the spectator would be left in suspense, and the effect would be lost. But it will always be a difficult thing to prevent discordance from arising, between the pale, feeble light of the moon, and the strong, red, and sonorous light of a fire. It is not given to every painter to produce a harmonious effect, under such circumstances, in spite even of a laborious effort. "There is," says Delacroix, "the point at which the two lights meet, run into one another, and form a peculiar tint, in representing which it is difficult not to be wrong."

With respect to waves and rocks, the French painter has proved that he did not uselessly visit the rugged coasts against which the white waves dash, as they roll upwards towards the sky, and seem to foam with fury. His success, in this respect forms one of the chief beauties of his marine pieces, a beauty that neither Backluy en nor the Vanbruggles have introduced into their paintings, since, as they lived or were brought up in Holland, they had no his clouds and billows, or, making a truce with the roaring billows of the sea, painted it tranquil and smooth, and represented on the shore nothing but motionless fishermen, sailors seated between the carriages of two cannon, and whiling away the time by relating their travels to one another, or else stretched on the grass in so quiescent a state, that the spectator himself becomes motionless while gazing on them.

Pergolesi died in the arms of Joseph Vernet, who could never after hear the name of his friend pronounced without being moved to tears. He religiously preserved the scraps of paper on which he had seen the music of the Stabat-Mater dotted down beneath his eyes, and brought them with him to France in 1753, at which period he was sent for by Monsieur de Marigny, after an absence of twenty years. Vernet's love for music procured Grétry a hearty welcome, when the young composer came to Paris. Vernet discovered his talent, and predicted his success. Some of Grétry's features, his delicate constitution, and, above all, several of his simple and expressive airs, reminded the painter of the immortal man to whom music owes so large a portion of its present importance; for it was Pergolesi who first introduced in Italy the custom

Like his sister, Madame de Pompadour, the Marquis de Marigny loved and protected the arts. He was desirous of having all the seaports of France painted, and the artist he chose to paint them was Joseph Vernet, who, though he did not inhabit Paris, had never failed to exhibit his admirable marine-pieces there. No one, perhaps, could have been found more fitted than Vernet for this ungrateful task, which, though offering so few resources, required so much knowledge; but it evinced a very slight acquaintance with the genius of Vernet, for any one to give him a sort of didactic order for a series of paintings. Thus imprisoned in an official programme, Joseph Vernet must have felt ill at ease, at least if we may be allowed to judge from a letter which he wrote to Monsieur de Marigny, with respect to another order. This curious letter, which is dated May 6th, 1765, runs as follows:

"I am not accustomed to make sketches for my pictures. My general practice is to compose on the canvas of the picture I am about to execute, and to paint it immediately, while my imagination is still warm with conception: the size, too, of my canvas tells me at once what I have to do, and makes me compose accordingly. I am sure, if I made a sketch beforehand, that I should not only not put in it what might be in the picture, but that I should also throw into it all the fire I possess, and the larger picture would, in consequence, become cold. This would also be making a sort of copy, which it would annoy me to do. Thus, sir, after thoroughly weighing and examining everything, I think it best that I should be left free to act as I like. This is what I require from all those for whom I wish to do my best; and this is also what I beg your friend, towards whom I am desirous of acting conscientiously, to let me do. He can tell me what size he wishes the picture to be, with the general subject of it, such as calm, tempest, sun-rise, sun-set, moonlight, land cape, marine-piece, etc., but nothing more. Experience has taught me that when I am constrained by the least thing, I always succeed worse than usual.

"If you wish to know the usual prices of my pictures, they are as follow:—For every one four feet wide, and two and a half, or three high, £60; for every one three feet wide, and of a proportionate height, £48; for every one two feet and a half wide, £40; for every one two feet wide, £22; and for every one eighteen inches wide, £24, with larger or smaller ones as required; but it is as well to mention that I succeed much better with the larger ones."

When he wrote this letter, Vernet had already begun the "Ports of France." A member of the French Academy of Painting, as he had long been of the Roman Academy of St. Luke, he enjoyed the rare privilege of listening, while he yet lived, to the praises of posterity; for when the public were viewing, at the exhibition, some of these "Ports," to which he often joined shipwrecks, moonlights, or marine-pieces by sun-set, he could proudly read in Grimm's correspondence, the vivacious and witty pages which fell from Diderot's too facile pen, to pay just flattery to Vernet, and to gull all others. "Vernet," exclaimed Diderot, "is a great magician; it might be said that he commences by creating a country, that he has men, women, and children in reserve, with whom to people his canvas as they people a colony, and that he then presents them with what sky, what temperature, what seasons, what happiness, and what misfortunes he likes."

It would be necessary to remain whole hours before the "Ports" of Vernet, in order fully to understand all the labour, all the picturesque and imaginative power, and all the talent he has lavished on them. What is more difficult to paint than a seaport? If you raise the point of view, you obtain an hydrographical map; and if you lower it, you have nothing but a flat horizon, inelegant lines, and an immense sky to fill. The effect of these pictures, which are naturally cold, was greatly increased by Vernet's talent for drawing figures: he grouped them in great numbers under light skies, sometime gray and silvery, sometimes scorching hot, but always cloudy; and he varied the posture, the action, and the attitude of the figure in a thousand ways. Some are selling fish, mending nets, carrying coffee, and rolling barrels, while others are walking and talking in the sun. Here, some girls from Marseilles are stopping to listen to the gallant conversation of a dandy abbe; while at Bordeaux, some men are loading a cannon to return the salute of a frigate; here, a magazine is in course of construction, or a tartan is being unrolled; there, men are piling up cannonballs, or the soldiers of the watch are bringing along a quarrelsome sailor; while in another place, men engaged in fishing for tunny impart an unexpected and lively appearance to the "View of the Gulf of Boudol." Thus filled with animation, the "Ports" of France met with great success when they appeared; and this success was increased when Louis XV., after staking of them in terms of the highest praise, remarked with shameless noachitance, that "the only ships in France now, are those in Vernet's pictures."

On returning to his landscapes and marine-pieces, Vernet again found all the fire of his genius. His famous "Tempest" (p. 57), conveyed in so admirable and finished a manner by Rubens, spread his reputation through Europe. The Czarina wished for some of his pictures to decorate her private gallery of the Hermitage, into which the sensual Empress allowed nothing but paintings and love to enter. And when the prince of the Asturias was preparing for himself a mysterious retreat, beneath the shades of a valley in the environs of the Escorial, he wished to have the panels of his rooms painted by Vernet, and sent him the dimensions of them to enable him to execute them. The Marquis de Lansdowne purchased a "Shipwreck" by Vernet, which sold at the sale of his lordship's pictures for 145 guineas. But the most charming productions of Vernet were to be found in France, in the possession of Diderot and of Madame Geoffrin, and in the celebrated cabinet of the Duc de Choiseul. "The Bathers" (p. 59), which was sold at the sale of the Duc de Choiseul's pictures for £238, is a delicious painting, far superior to the sweetest productions of Puelandour. Some rocks which are kept upright by leaning against each other, have formed a natural grotto, which affords the women a retreat full of mystery and coolness. On seeing these voluptuous creatures, who, as they think they are unperceived, fearlessly abandon themselves to the caresses of the rippling waves, one would at first imagine it was Calypso surrounded in her grotto by her nymphs; but the female attendant, with a basket of wine and fruit, reminds you that it is a Calypso of every-day life, that her nymphs have come from the neighbouring town, and that they will soon be troubled, not by the arrival of Telemachus and Mentor, but by the deriding remarks of some young archins from Marseilles, who are perceived at a distance in boats and on the shore.

Vernet's figures may be blamed for one defect, and that is, their being generally lighted by a special light, narrow enough to allow of the model of the breast, the shoulders, and the naked legs being brought prominently out. It appears as if the general light of the picture was not sufficient for him, and that he kept in reserve a particular ray for the purpose of bringing out the figures of the ground; but the eye of the spectator, entirely taken up by the shipwreck, does not remark these rusés and imperfections, which, however, lend a great degree of piquancy to the work, and cause the figures to stand prominently forth, in a manner admirably in keeping with the place they occupy in the talent of the painter and the sympathies of the beholder. Sometimes, too, the never-varying costume of his fishermen is out of place; this is the case, for instance, when he represents the shores of Greece, and different views in the East, on which occasions Chardin's "Manon" and Greuze's "Loinette" are met, side by side, in the same scenes as the Sultana of the "Arabian Nights" and Louthembourg's "Armenian."

No one, we think, ever surpassed Vernet in the art of composition. At first sight, the spectator would be inclined to assert that, viewing by mere chance vessels, towers, old trees, and rocks, Vernet painted them in the same confusion in which they were presented to his gaze; but, if we analyse the composition, it is easy to see that the lines are perfectly balanced, that the groups answer to one another, that the masses are skillfully calculated, and that, in the midst of apparent disorder, the painter has assigned to each different object the most favourable position as regards the satisfaction of the spectator's eye and the general plan of the picture. How happy is he in the composition of his marine-pieces! See, for instance, in "The Tempest" (p. 57), immortalised by Rubens's graver, how well the strange-looking rocks on the left harmonise with the simple lines and the bold forms of the Roman buildings that extend into the sea itself! Is it not pleasing to behold the graceful manthus, in all its mild, soft elegance, springing up between the fantastic rocks and the angry waves? How great, too, is the effect invariably produced by the old trees, with their knotty, twisted, and shaken trunks, and which are placed in the positions they occupy, simply to show the violence of the wind! These trees have no leaves, save at the extremity of some of the branches, whither the sap still mounts, while their other limbs have been carried away by the force of the storm, or hang down from the trunk, almost snapped off and dead.

A curious anecdote is told of Balechon in connexion with one of Vernet's pictures, called "The Storm," and which the former had engraved. This engraving was much admired for the ability of the water, and the spirit of the figures. One hundred of the prints were consigned to an engraver in London, and part of them sold; but some persons having objected to the very clumsy manner in which a long dedication inscribed under the print, was written, Balechon said he would soon remedy that, and with his graver drew a number of black lines over the dedication, on the copper, so as, in some degree, to obliterate the words, and then sent a hundred impressions to England. All connoisseurs, however, soon discovered these to be "second impressions," and eagerly bought up the first; but no man of taste would look at a print with the lines. This mortified the English printseller, who wrote to the French engraver, and complained that he could not sell the second set for half price. "Morbleu!" cried the Frenchman, "how whimsical these English virtuosi are! yet, they must be satisfied." He, therefore, set to work with his punch and hammer, and having repaired the letters, sent out the print with the inscription apparently in its first state. A few of these were sold; but the imposition was soon discovered by the faintness of the impressions; and then those who did not possess the first impressions were glad to have the plate in the second, rather than the third state; so that nearly all the third set lay upon the hands of the printseller. This produced a complaint; and the complaisant Frenchman, ever eager to satisfy his English customers, again punched out the lines, and brought the inscription to its second state.

Vernet has sometimes been reproached with certain inaccuracies in the disposition of his rigging. Even during his lifetime, the Abbé Leblanc, one of his great admirers, affecting, perhaps, a more profound knowledge of nautical matters than he really possessed, exposed some errors of this kind in the pictures which Joseph Vernet had just sent to the exhibition of 1748. "Words would not suffice us," says this keen critic, "if we endeavoured to bestow on the marine pieces of Monsieur Vernet all the praise which they deserve; of the four he exhibited, and which all are nearly equally fine, two in particular, the second of which represents a moonlight, in which the sea is covered with fishermen's boats, and which is rendered with great truth, have more especially attracted attention by their singular effects. Monsieur Vernet here shows in a very clear manner how different vessels may pursue different courses under the same wind; a circumstance which the spectator is enabled to comprehend very easily by noting how the sails are trimmed. However, there is one of the boats which he has not represented sufficiently inclined; I allude to that one which, in nautical phrase, is hugging the wind, and which does not heel over enough. However well a vessel may behave under sail, she is always more deeply immersed on the side to be wind than on the other." When persons speak of matters so important as the movements of a ship, it is doubtless allowable for them to avail themselves of all the knowledge they possess, and even to be a year in their judgment. But, although it may be true, that one great marine painter had himself sometimes open to criticisms of this description, it is certain that, by pushing this spirit of observation too far, the critic will become ridiculously injudicious. The end of the real painter is not this scrupulous exactness in the rig of a vessel. His object is to paint the terrible deep; and who, when contemplating a fine representation of a tempest, would ever think of the pulleys and gaskets? It Vernet now and then forgot some trifling details of the rigging, it was because his great wish, above every other, was not to sacrifice any of the boldness of his composition. In painting, truth in small things sometimes injures the effect of the great ones. The naval draughtsman, who draws the plan for a vessel about to be constructed on the stocks, is, doubtless, obliged to observe the necessary accuracy even in the smallest details, but the same obligation is not binding on the artist, whose object is to move the human passion. Vernet comprehended the general features with sufficient accuracy for a sailor, who can perceive things at a glance, to see what name over the painter wished to depict; but he did not stop to count the nails, pegs, and other objects, which artists of small talent have such a notion to be painted, to the great detriment of the general effect of the whole scene.

Towards the end of his life, and a very long, which he had ever spent in a manner that had become to himself and country, he began to fear that he would end in prison, as he had been oppressed by the troubles arising in France; and as a century, perhaps, of age is rather too late a period for a man to take any very active part in national disputes, he mediated a retreat to the country, where, as he was, however, prevented by his debt, he would have been forced to displease, Leveillé, and Voltaire, but the latter, who was a contemporary of Vernet, should have allowed him to share in the inordinate enthusiasm then universal for the marine pieces of this great painter, is easily comprehensible, especially when the writer is one so apt to become intoxicated with his own writings, and who criticises under the influence of passion, and makes reason subservient to poetry. But the feeling of admiration for Joseph Vernet which took such a hold on the eighteenth century, and which was expressed on every occasion by the great men of those times, from Voltaire to Ladoeur, has come down to us, and been sustained in our own age. In spite of the excessive variation that public opinion has and is prone with regard to painting, the school of David, which had a horror of every one who had ever held a pencil under Louis XV., and which included in its contempt even the indimitable Chardin, the school of David, we repeat, make an exception in favour of Vernet. Tullisson has written some eloquent pages, when speaking of this great artist. "He is represental," says Tullisson, "better than any other painter the beautiful form of the clouds, these immense, light, dazzling, or dark bodies, these floating mountains, raised, overthrown, and dispersed by the wind. No one expresses, as he does, the raging of the fearful storm, by a sublime distribution of light and shade. Who, we need but hint, like him, beauty, grace, energy, and, so to speak, expression to the waves of the deep? If others have drawn all the rig of a vessel, he alone has endowed them with soul. Their disordered rigging, their shattered masts, their torn sails, and their melancholy fragments, are full of the most powerful interest. What painter of this style of picture has displayed in his works so much of one truth and pathos? At one time painting the freshness and mild light of morning, he represents the sun starting from the bosom of the boundless sea; while at another he paints it descending into the waves, surrounded by gold and fire, and sending at once and the same time to kindle into flames the cork, the leaves, and the sea. Sometimes, again, he shows it almost invisible beneath a thick fog, which lends nature a new sort of interest by scarcely allowing her to be perceived. Fires in the middle of the night, these ravining, painful, and horrid, slight, especially in a tempest, have been rendered by him with faithful truth. Oftentimes he depicts the moon sliding up in the placid scene below, and the water, illuminated by the silvery, faint, sparkling, and celestial light, forming a beautiful and varied scene, the play of light and shadow, the reflection of the sky, the reflection of the clouds, the reflection of the waves, are all so full of spirit, and so much so, that the landscape, sometimes they present to the eye, is so full of life, by yes, it would have been impossible to see a more beautiful and shining view, and a more beautiful and more interesting landscape, so to speak, than the picture of a storm at sea. It was as if that Vernet, as if he had been a painter, had been a painter, and taken place in painting, as well as in politics. At the present day, all the foreign nations still place Vernet in the first rank. He him-oh, how I have pronounced me myself. The sentence describes me as a fool, for it is a noble one. Comparing himself to the greatest artists he rivals, he says: "If you ask me whether I paint better than such and such an artist, I should answer 'No!'—but if you ask me whether I paint better than any one else, I should also say 'no!'—but if you ask me whether my Landscapes better than others, still I should answer 'no!'—of fogs, water, and vapours better than others, my answer would be still the same; but though inferior to each of them I am superior of the rest, I surpass them in all the others."

In speaking of Joseph Vernet, Chelmers says: "His works will live as long as those of any artist of his day." For a light and airy management of his landscape, in a deep and tender diminution of his perspective; in the clear transparent line of the sky, liquid appearance of the water, and the buoyant air of the vessels which Joseph Vernet is one of the most fertile painters of the French school. He enjoys, with his illustrious countryman, Claude Lorraine and Nicholas Poussin, the privilege of figuring on nearly all the public picture-galleries of Europe, and of there maintaining the brilliancy of French genius by the side of the greatest masters of Italy and of Holland.

Mention is made of more than 200 Landscapes or marine pieces in the "Cabinet du Cabinet du Cabinet d'Estampes de Brandes," compiled by Huber.

More than fifty engravers have been employed to reproduce with their burin the works of this painter. Among those who have understood and rendered his genius the best, are two female artists, Anne Coulet and Mademoiselle Lempereur; J. J. Avril, endued with superior talent for rendering the motion and waves of the sea;

he excelled, he had no superior. In small figures employed in danger, or the least, raising a ship, or carrying goods from the quay to a warehouse, or any other employment which required action, he displayed great uncommon knowledge, and gave them with such truth and life, sometimes a little in the French flattened style, as has never been equalled by any man except our most excellent Mortimer, and to be the fabricator to Mortimer in that line is no dishonour. It has been the fate of every painter who ever lived, and will probably be the lot of all who ever will live. He carried that French style to its highest degree of perfection. As a proof of it, we may mention that when it may be mentioned that most of his pictures were purchased by Madame du Barry for two thousand pieces sterling. It is a proof of him, that his genius has been so long and so highly

Bertrand, Veitroter, Dandei, W. Byrne and the elegant Jaquet, Alonnet, Langueil, Bernard, Le Gouz, Carheim, the skilled De Marengay, J. Ouvrier, Auler, Braun, Charry, Paribony, Maniet, Guyot, Lincan, Devilliers, Hermann, Fortier, Marchand, Cahan, and Belas, to whom we owe the attain "Sicaps of France," painted by Vernet, by order of Louis XV.; Belle, Flupart, whose noble talent is readily reproduced in a rich style by Vernet, as it did a tranquil scene by Grouze; Palumeu, Maspieller, the celebrated Wollert, Heban, Charpentier, Chereau, Nédet, De Flumet, N. Patou, and, perhaps before all, Babou, the celebrated engraver of "The Storm," "The Calm," and "The Bathers."

Like all great painters, Joseph Vernet did not entirely confine himself to painting; he has left a few etchings, executed with the same spirit and reality which he employed in his paintings; they

"A Marine Piece," a view between two rocks, in the style of Salvator Rosa; "A Gale;" "A View of a Port in the Mediterranean, by Sunset;" the same view, by sunrise; and a small marine piece.

In the Museum of Rouen there are three pictures, namely, "Stormy Weather;" "A Tranquil Landscape;" and "A Marine Piece."

The Museum of Lille contains "A Marine Piece, by Sunset."

The Museum of Montpellier contains "A Landscape," signed and dated 1774; "A Tempest;" and two marine pieces.

The Museum of Grenoble contains "A Marine Piece, representing the Effect of Fog," dated 1764.

The Museum of Lyons possesses "A View taken on the Shores of the Mediterranean."

Joseph Vernet's pictures are rare in private collections; we are, however, acquainted with five very remarkable ones in the possession of M. Deloison, the banker, at Paris. They are: "A Rainbow," from the Tolozan collection; "The Entrance to a Port," from the gallery of Comte Perregaux; "A Cascade, with an Aqueduct," signed 1759; and "A Cascade" and "A Landscape," both of which formerly belonged to the collection of M. Silvestre.

In the Borghese Palace at Rome there are eight landscapes, or marine pieces, by Vernet.

In the house of the Prince de Lichtenstein, at Vienna, there are also some fine compositions by the same artist.

Count Czernin, of the same city, likewise possesses a large marine piece.

We will now acquaint the reader with some of the prices fetched, at public sales, by Joseph Vernet's pictures.—

At the sale of M. de Julienne's pictures, in 1767, "A Seaport," engraved by J. Daullé, fetched £156 12s., and "A View of Tivoli," containing eight figures, was sold for £106.

At the sale of M. de Lulive de Jully's collection, in 1770, "The End of a Storm at Sea," and "The View of the Port of Civita Vecchia," fetched £200 0s. 10d.; and "A Moonlight," engraved by De Murenay de Ghuy, was knocked down for £29.

At the Duke de Choiseul's sale, in 1772, "The Bathers," which has been reproduced in this work, and which is one of the finest of Vernet's pictures, was sold for £238.

At the Leopereur sale, in 1773, "A Boisterous Sea," engraved by Le Veau, fetched £80; and a picture, representing "Mountains lighted up by the setting Sun," engraved by Dardet, was sold for a similar sum.

At M. de Blondel de Gagny's sale, in 1776, "A Marine Piece" was knocked down for £48 16s.

At the sale of the Prince de Conti, in 1777, "The Bathers," which came from the cabinet of the Duke de Choiseul, was sold for £204; "The Castle of St. Angelo," with two men in a boat in the foreground, and three others on a rock spreading nets; and "The View of the Porte Riatta," which contains several houses, and three men fishing with a line, and which is the companion to the preceding picture, fetched £208; two marine pieces, full of vessels, were sold for £236; "A Moonlight," engraved by De Murenay de Ghuy, fetched £29 6s.; two small marine pieces and landscapes, painted on copper, were sold for £84 0s. 10d.; and "A City on Fire, by Moonlight," fetched £64.

At M. Randon de Boisot's sale, in 1777, "A View of the City of Avignon, from the Rhone," was sold for £200 all but a son; "A Tempest," and "A Calm," both containing a great many figures, fetched £34 12s.; and "Morning" and "Noon," painted in very small dimensions on copper, and engraved by Allamet, were sold for £160.

Joseph Vernet has signed his paintings Joseph Vernet, Peintre; and almost all his paintings in the manner indicated by the paraph to the right. To the left, we reproduce his signature, as it appears on the books of the Academy of which he was a member.

A TALE OF THE LUXEMBOURG GALLERY.

I HAD already made some progress in the study of painting, when I went over, about sixteen years ago, to France, for the purpose of self-improvement amid the priceless treasures of art amassed in queenly Paris.

For some weeks after my arrival I rambled from gallery to gallery, from church to church—dreaming, hoping, worshipping. I spent long days in the Louvre. To me it was a sacred, almost an awful place; and I well remember how I often stood gazing into the golden glooms of a Rembrandt, or lost myself amid the classic groves and airy distances of a Claude, till the quick tears of boyish enthusiasm blinded the picture from my sight.

It was strange, but I allowed almost a month to pass away before I visited the collection at the Luxembourg. Many events combined to occasion this delay. My lodgings were situated in a street branching off the Boulevard Montmartre, quite at the north of Paris, and consequently distant enough from the palace of Marie de' Medici; I had seen the Louvre first, and there was a daily fascination in its portals that I could not resist; I was devoted to the old school of painting, and I knew that the Luxembourg was principally filled with the works of modern artists; in short, it was only by resolutely appointing a day in my own mind that I at last accomplished what I felt to be a visit of duty. I went to Paris with the intention of copying some of the masterpieces of ancient art there assembled; but as yet I had not touched a pencil. Oppressed with the splendour of the Grand Musée, I had wandered from painting to painting, unable to choose where everything was perfection. Now I resolved upon "La Belle Jardinière" of Raffaele; now I was tempted by the youthful beauty of the conquering David, and again by the marvellous grouping and the vivid life of the "Nessus and Dejanira" of Guido. Sometimes a painting of the Italian, and sometimes one of the Flemish school reigned paramount—but only for a day.

I was in this state of luxurious, indolent uncertainty, when one superb morning in June I visited the gallery of the Luxembourg. There had been rain, and the bright drops were yet glittering on the flowers and quivering on the broad leaves of the acacias. The sky was blue and sunny overhead; the dancing fountains, the graceful statues—white among the trees—the glass dome of the Observatoire, and the stately summit of the Invalides, all looked glad and golden in the radiant summer light, as I entered from the Rue de Vaugirard and turned reluctantly from the sight of so much joyousness and beauty into the low portal leading to the upper apartments of the palace. Listlessly I passed through the first of these, pausing but briefly now and then before some of the more striking works of Delaroche or Vernet. At last, in an obscure corner of a small and ill-lighted room, my eyes fell upon a picture that completely rivetted my attention. The subject was, "Cain after the Murder of Abel;" the artist's name, Camille Prévost. Never shall I forget the sensations with which I first beheld that dark and fearful painting, or the haunting expression stamped upon the haggard countenance of the world's first fratricide. He stood upon a bold massy rock forming the brink of a precipice. His head was partly turned, and his wild guilty stare fixed full upon me. The red sun was setting behind a gloomy forest on the horizon; the sky was blood-like, and its scorching hues were reflected in a coppered-ore glare upon the stagnant ocean far away; a glittering snake was gliding beneath a group of lonesome weeds in the foreground; and a distant vulture hovering in the air seemed to scent the first outpouring of human blood.

But the design, powerful as it was, formed the least part of the picture. There was a wondrous unity, an atmosphere of death and crime, about it that fascinated me with horror. There was a look, almost of madness, in the ghastly face of Cain, the drops of agony seemed starting on his brow, his tangled locks were knotted like the serpents of the Medusa, and an unearthly meaning in the dilated pupil of his eyes appeared to tell of some strange vision passing before them.

The very sea looked thick and lifeless—the distant trees were like funereal plumes.

How long I remained there I know not; but four o'clock came, the notice for withdrawal was uttered by the guardians, and I was still standing before the picture.

When I went out, the bright glory of the summer afternoon offended my eyes: I chose a shady avenue amid the trees, and there paced to and fro, still thinking of it. Evening came; I went into a neighbouring restaurateur's, but I had no appetite for the dinner placed before me—I stepped into one of the theatres, but the laughter, the music, the lights, were all insupportable to me. I went home to my books, but I could not read, to bed, but sleep forsook me.

All night the picture was before me, and early the next morning I found myself again at the entrance to the palace. I came too early, and I paced about with feverish impatience till the hour of admittance. Once more I spent the entire day before the painting—I resolved to copy it. The next day was occupied in the particulars necessary for my task, and a week elapsed before I was able to commence; but in the meantime I had paid many visits to the gallery.

Once established there with my easel, I became utterly absorbed in the subject. I got the general effect in the first few days, but I longed to reach that point of finish when the nameless expression of the whole should be my employment.

Gradually, this picture acquired over me a strange mysterious power; I began to dread it, and yet I felt how impossible it would be for me to leave it. Weeks passed on, and I was sensible of a great alteration in myself. My youthful gaiety of heart, my ambition, my peace of mind was gone. My health suffered—I lost appetite and rest. My nerves were painfully overwrought; I started at the slightest sound, and trembled at the merest excitement. Excepting while in the very act of painting, my hand had lost its steadiness and my eye its certainty. I could not endure even the light of a candle unshaded, and was not able to pour out a glass of water without spilling it.

This was but the first stage of my disease. The second was still more distressing. A morbid fascination now seemed to bind me to the picture. My identity of being became merged in the canvas, and I felt as if I could no longer live away from it. Cain became to me as a living man, or something more than man, having possession of my will, and transfixing me with the bright horror of his eyes. At night, when the gallery was closed, I used to linger round the precincts of the palace; and when at last, worn with mental and physical fatigue, I went home and tried to sleep, I lay awake and restless all the long night; or, starting from visions of the picture, woke but to dream again.

Let it not be supposed that I yielded myself a willing victim to this mental suffering. Far from it. I strove to subdue, to fight against it. I wrestled with my delusion, I reasoned, I combated, but in vain. It was too strong for me alone, and I had no friend, not even an acquaintance in whom I could confide, in all that city. I was young—I was imaginative—I was impressionable—the place was new, and the language all around was foreign to my ears. I might die, and there would be none to weep for me. I might go mad—ah! that was the thing I dreaded—thither I was tending—what should I do? Write to my friends in England? Impossible, for of what disease could I complain? I might leave Paris? Alas! my power of volition was gone. I was the slave of the picture, and though it were death, I felt I must remain.

Matters were at this crisis—and I devoutly believe that my reason was tottering fast—when a young man, somewhat older than myself, took his station in the same room, and began copying an altar-piece at a short distance from me. His presence gave me great uneasiness; I was no longer alone with my task, and I dreaded interruption. At first he seemed disposed to open an acquaintance with me, but my evident disinclination repulsed his advances, and our civilities were soon limited to a bow of recognition on entering or leaving the room.

He was very quiet, and respected my taciturnity, so I shortly ceased even to remember that he was in the same apartment. I may observe that his name was M. Achille Désiré Leroy.

It were useless, as well as painful, for me to analyse more minutely the monomania that possessed me. Each day it became less endurable, and each day found me more than ever incapable of resistance. The whole thing wears now, in my memory, the aspect of a dream—long, terrible, vivid, but still a dream. Even while subjected to it, I felt as one walking in sleep.

At last the time came when I could no longer bear it. It was a dark, oppressive day; and a tempest seemed brooding in the air. The atmosphere of the gallery was warm and close—the bright, bright eyes of Cain seemed to cut into my soul; I felt suffocating; my head swam; my brain was wildly throbbing; my fingers refused to obey, and my pencil fell upon the floor.

I staggered back, dropped into a chair, and, uttering a suppressed groan, covered my face with my hands.

A light touch on my shoulder arrested me. "It was M. Leroy."

"Come, mon ami," he said in a simple, but stern, "you are not well, and a turn in the garden below will restore you. Where is your hat; now take my arm, and let us go."

I was passive as a child, and did as he desired. He led me out among the trees, and I sought a bench in a retired spot, where we sat down. I had not yet spoken, and after a few moment's pause, he began.

"I have been observing you," he said, "for some days; and I see that you need a change of occupation. That picture of Provoost is not a very lively subject for a nervous man to work upon, and it has a bad effect upon you. Take my advice, Monsieur B—, and give it up."

"Alas," I said, hopelessly, "I cannot."

"Cannot? Ah, my dear sir, that is a delusion. A man can do anything he wills. There is nothing impossible in art or science. There is no difficulty, real or imaginary, physical or moral, which can long maintain its ground against volonté. A resolution, Monsieur, is the most powerful agent in the world."

"No," I said, "there is something more powerful still."

"And that is—"

"Fate."

My companion laughed aloud. A bright, cheery, ringing laugh, such as I used to utter myself two months previously.

"Very well," he said, holding out his hand to me with an air of cordial kindness that was quite irresistible: "I will be your fate, and I will not lose my hold upon you till I accomplish your cure. It is of no avail to refuse the services of your doctor—remember, he is your fate; and against that, you confess, it is useless to strive."

He rose, and making me take his arm, walked briskly into a neighbouring thoroughfare. Then he called a fiacre, drove to the Boulevard des Italiens, and, taking me into one of the most brilliant cafés of that quarter, ordered a somewhat extravagant repast to be served.

"A generous diet is your best medicine," he said, gaily, as he filled the sparkling champagne, and nobled my health.

Well, he would not permit me to bear the least share of the expense; but when seven o'clock arrived, he insisted on my accompanying him to the Théâtre Gymnase; thence we returned to my apartments, where he left me, announcing his intention of visiting me early the next morning.

I slept better than I had done for many months, and had but just risen the following day when M. Leroy arrived. He had an overcoat on his arm and a small carpet bag in his hand.

"Good morning, M. B—," he said, as pleasantly as ever: "are you ready to start?"

"Perfectly," I replied: "but may I ask, where to?"

"Certainly. To M. Lunz, first of all, and then to Fontainebleau. We shall be absent about eight or ten days; and at the end of that time, Monsieur B—, — by the way, what is your Christian name?"

"Frank," I replied, without hesitation.

"By the end of that time," he was observing, Frank, we shall both be the better for our journey, as regards health and spirits."

"Upon my word, M. Leroy, I am able to do it."

"Come, now, Frank," interrupted M. Leroy, "not suffering me to remonstrate, we must needs be careful in talking. The train starts at ten o'clock, and you have only half an hour packed. Where is your carpet bag?"

And thus, hurried on to my resolution, and self-possessed, I found myself in the arms of half a dozen in the road to Fontainebleau, and inextricably engaged by my "Fate."

We went, as he had proposed, to M. Lunz, and from thence proceeded on foot to Fontainebleau, where we remained for more than a week, visiting the splendour of the palace; wandering for long days in the vast forest, and sketching the ravines, valleys, and wooded slopes, in which that most picturesque region is so abundant. Here we saw the Weeping Rock, and had a picnic at the Hermitage of Franchard. In short, at the end of ten days we turned towards home; and when we entered Paris, laden with plants, crystals, and sketches, I was perfectly recovered.

The next day we went to the Luxembourg together. The picture had lost its terrible fascination for me; but I shuddered once more as I stood before it.

"Decidedly, Frank, this 'Cain' is not good for you," said my companion, who was attentively regarding me. "Let us both go to the Louvre and copy Titian's 'Mistress.' Nothing could be a finer study. You shall entrust me with the sale of your copy from Prevost; and if you follow my advice, you will never look at either of them again. I will send a porter to-morrow for our property, and there will be an end of the whole." Now, come out with me into the gardens, and I will tell you something about this picture, and why I was so resolute to tear you away from it."

ITALIAN WORKWOMEN. — FROM A PAINTING BY JOSEPH VERNET.

"We went out. He chose a pleasant seat beneath the trees, in front of the principal fountain, and thus began:

"Camille Prévost was the younger of two brothers. I knew both intimately, and their father was a gentilhomme of moderate fortune. He died; and following the dictates of an unjust partiality, left everything in the hands of Hippolyte, the elder brother; so that Camille had to depend entirely upon his profession as an artist. Neither of them were amiable men. Hippolyte was an excellent man of business, prudent, cold, crafty. Camille was sullen, violent in temper, and somewhat of a misanthrope. After the death of old Prévost I seldom visited Hippolyte; and had I not met Camille almost daily in the Louvre and at the Ecole des Beaux Arts, I have little doubt that our acquaintance would altogether have ceased. Fickle as he was, Camille could love; and that passionately. Men of his disposition love but once; they are frequently jealous, exacting, even harsh to the objects of their attachment; but the feeling has its roots in the inmost depths of their being. The lady on whom Camille centered his affection was by birth a cousin, and by choice a neighbour. Mademoiselle Dumesnil was remarkably beautiful, and possessed a considerable dowry. She was an orphan, and shared her home with an aunt, who was sufficiently advanced in life to act as her chaperone. Camille Prévost was a proud man, and one who could not endure to owe all to the bounty of a wife. He avowed his love, was favourably received, and resolving to make at least some name, and to render himself worthy of the lady's hand and fortune, he left Paris for Rome, and there applied himself assiduously to his art, that he carried off not only several prizes from the Italian academies, but, on forwarding to Paris a painting of especial merit, he obtained the title of Chevalier of the Legion of Honour.

"When he received intelligence of this distinction, he returned.

"Those who knew him in Rome said, that reserved and taciturn as he was, the arrival of this news seemed to overwhelm him with joy. He gave a farewell entertainment to his fellow-students, and was, for the first time in his life, hospitable, and almost cordial. Before a fortnight had elapsed he was in Paris; but if his absence had been fortunate in one way, it had been fatal in another: if he had gained fame, he had lost happiness.

"Mademoiselle Dumesnil was married to his brother.

"Totally unprepared for the blow, he had hastened to her hôtel immediately upon his arrival. He asked for Mademoiselle Dumesnil, and was told that Madame Prévost was within. He entered, and found her in her boudoir reading the last new novel by Dumas, with his brother, in his dressing-gown and slippers, sipping his morning chocolate at the opposite side of the table. Hippolyte had played his cards well, and while Camille was toiling day and night in his Roman atelier, the more fortunate and less scrupulous elder had stepped in, and borne away the bride and her twenty thousand livres of dowry.

"The lady received him as if there had never been any affection or understanding between them. Hippolyte affected to welcome his brother with delight, and pressed him to make the Hôtel Prévost his home whenever he was in Paris. Camille disguised his rage and disappointment under an impenetrable mask of silent politeness. He neither wept nor stormed. He was outwardly cold and cynical as ever, and did not betray by word or glance the passions that were boiling at his heart. When he withdrew, after a brief stay of scarcely half an hour, Monsieur and Madame Prévost fluttered themselves that he had forgotten all the circumstances of his early passion.

"'Three years' travel and application, ma chère,," said the husband, as he put on his gloves for his daily ride in the Bois de Boulogne, "make wonderful havoc in a lover's memory."

About a week afterwards the body of M. Prévost was found murdered in one of the retired contrasallies of the wood, with his horse standing beside him. He had been shot through the head.

No suspicion attached to any one: there were no traces of the assassin—the police were completely baffled in their investigations, and after a while the event was forgotten. Camille, who had inherited the bulk of his brother's property, continued to follow his profession with great industry, and many said that he would now, in all probability be united to the fair and wealthy widow; but no, he never re-entered the Hôtel Prévost, and it was at last rumoured that he had married a young and handsome widow, and was now a wealthy man. He had, however, as it were, disappeared insensibly at the foot of the rock. He had, on one of the occasions, called in the assistance of a medical man, who, on the artist's recovery, endeavoured, but without avail, to induce him to desist from art for awhile, and try the effect of change of air and scene. Camille, with the fatal obstinacy of his disposition, refused to listen, and treated the doctor with such rudeness that the visit was repeated no more.

"At last the painting was finished, and he had now obtained a place on the walls of the Luxembourg. Death, it is said, only to use the words of the catologue—meurtre—and honourable asylum in the galleries of the Louvre, where it will take a place beside its illustrious predecessors, and continue the History of French Art."

"But the artist?" I exclaimed, when Leary had finished speaking; "what became of the artist?"

last rumoured that he had married a young and handsome widow, and was now a wealthy man. He had, however, as it were, disappeared insensibly at the foot of the rock.

"About this time I began his lecture on painting—Cain, after the murder of Abel." It is not necessary for me to describe to you the merits of this wonderful composition, for you, Frank, of all men, except the artist, can best appreciate them.

Ever since his return from Italy, Camille Prévost had sunk deeper and deeper into a dark and sullen morbidity. He had always been misanthropic, but now he seemed to shun all contact with his fellow-creatures. He shut himself up in the study behind his door, and it was not till that he would half-day and nearly all night upon his picture; and during this time his despondency increased continually. People said that the murder of his brother had given a painful shock to his feelings; but whether it was so, or whether the fearful subject, as I still more fearful working up of the "Cain," dwelt too forcibly upon his imagination, as in your case, I cannot tell. At all events, he became subject to paroxysms

We had some bird's nest, and a few other things, and was now walking for a leisurely stroll in the old-fashioned park of the Luxembourg. It was a fine day, and we were away from the bustle of the city. The artist, however, was not in the mood to enjoy the scene. He was, as I have said, in a state of morbidity, and he was now in the study behind his door, and it was not till that he would half-day and nearly all night upon his picture; and during this time his despondency increased continually.

Leary, however, was not at all affected by the artist's morbidity. He was, as I have said, a man of a cheerful and generous disposition, and he was now in the study behind his door, and it was not till that he would half-day and nearly all night upon his picture; and during this time his despondency increased continually.

Everything in this house seemed so silent and oppressive that even Leroy's usual spirit had forsaken him. Since we had reached the door he had not addressed a single word to me, and something appeared to restrain me from even repeating my unanswered question.

The servant led us, silently and swiftly, through several long corridors, and stopped at first before a door thickly clamped with iron. I had observed, in this gallery that the doors were all secured in a similar manner.

He drew a key from his pocket, and unlocked it, and motioned us to enter. We were in a small sitting-room, neatly but plainly furnished. There was a bookcase at one end and an easel with a half-finished painting (a wretched fantastic dumb, by the way) at the other. The window, like the door, was secured with iron bars.

There were strange sounds in the inner room, I thought, as our guide, still proceeding, us, went on and entered.

A trace of light, though not my eye could follow him. A raving maniac stamped in and he, observing the attendant by his side, leaning, yellow, and crying aloud that his brother was Cain, and the murderer of his brother!

"There is the artist, Frank," said Leroy, pointing to the bed. "There is Camille Prévost. This is one of his violent moods. That fatal picture drove one painter mad, my poor boy, and I was determined that it should not do so by another."

"But did he really murder his brother?" I asked, as I turned away pale and shuddering.

"God only knows," said my friend, solemnly, "and He alone can judge the culprit now. Jealousy is a dreadful passion. Pray to Him that you may never know its misery."

THE SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

Among the few honours which Mr. Baskin allows to his country but just amateurs on "Modern Painters," the painters in water-colours occupy a high place. As a body, he declares, they are truthful to nature, careful and loving in their treatment, and learned in their work; and few who have seen the exhibition this year will dissent from that great critic on art.

That which people under hand, even partially, will always be a favourite with them. "A little learning" is, to the public, by no means "a dangerous thing." The science of phrenology, the laws radiance of which are easy to comprehend, will always have its disciples and admirers, while the astronomy and useful sciences are neglected, and the objects of table-turning or spirit-rapping required to bring knowledge to them or up, that in every family a professor was found. Hence, without any disparagement to the general value of water-colour painting is more admired, because more understood, than that of the middle and upper classes, that the more it holds itself aloof, the more it is valued. Most young ladies, whether with taste or not, have completed at school some kind of acquaintance with the lithograph of Flaxman, or brilliant drawing, a few of the best names. The picture, our middle-class friends, and even the middle-class, find in the manner in which "art" is taught at schools, and in the exhibitions, the means a sufficient to light to make them admire those professors who are noted. Hence the number of school-boys, if one may call them so, in water-colour drawing, is considerably larger than in one devoted to oil painting; but the casual visitors and artists are proportionally less.

The Old Society of Artists in Water-colours, consists of twenty-seven, a combination of new names, who are members, and of twenty-five, who are honorary. The society was instituted in the year 1788, and has since that time, and thereon, the fifth day. At the number of members, exclusive of amount, to three hundred and fifty-six, we may infer, on any one day, many which are excellent and most worthy, but our readers will probably even be acquainted with some of the names of some.

(No. 10, "Bellevue," by John Constable, is one of the best oil paintings, and the only one which is not a study, but a picture, paying with the usual freedom of his subjects of the painter; the treatment is much, and very much, of Sir Joshua, and the touch is firm and bold, that one might mistake the picture for a study in oil rather than in water-colours.

(No. 11, "The Foxglove," by J. P. Naftel, is a careful study of the flower named, exceedingly true to nature.

(No. 12, "The Vicar, Nisold," by T. M. Richardson, is a very beautiful landscape. The middle distance is well managed, and the heads of the mountains lost in the sky are very finely painted.

(No. 16, "A Scene on the River Conway," by C. Branwhite, is a beautiful bit of scenery; pure English, and refreshing.

(No. 18, "Hudibras and Ralph in the Stocks," by John Gilbert, will have been made already familiar to the reader by the copy in oil, drawn by the same artist, and engraved for a pictorial companion copy. But the printing-ink and the burin of the engraver cannot render the exceeding beauty of colour, and the truth and feeling shown in the rendering of the ivy-covered wall and the foliage of the cross. The faces of Hudibras and Ralph are admirable; the depiction of knight and squire being, however, scarcely honest enough. Gilbert does not care to do much more.

(No. 19, "The Ours of Fallow-stone," by Gley Filding, is a fine picture, breezy, and full of air and atmosphere; the distance is especially natural. It, in common with all this artist's productions, is sold. The possessor of such a picture is to be congratulated.

(No. 23, "Scarborough," by C. Bentley, is an admirable sea-view. The water is motive, deep, and excellently rendered. The scene in the middle distance is, however, too crowded, without being sufficiently busy.

(No. 25, by the same artist as No. 18, previously noticed, is worthy of much praise.

(No. 31, "Evangeline at Prayer," by Joseph Jenkins, is a very pure and natural illustration of Longfellow's admirable pastoral. The figure of Evangeline, in a devotional attitude, is carefully studied and very finely painted.

(No. 34, "The Drug Bazaar, Constantinople," by John Gilbert, is the fruit of that artist's recent visit to the East. The picture bears the impress of being painted on the spot. Turkish women, merchants, and priests, wander through the sombre court. The dresses are accurate and well drawn, the feeling for the subject is very apparent, and the treatment in Gilbert's peculiar style.

Another sketch from Constantinople, by the same artist (No. 137), "A Turkish Water-carrier," is a fine study of a head in a green turban, very much resembling one of Rembrandt in its colour and treatment. The solid manner in which this artist paints, will be especially observable in the first picture, where the colour is laid on very thickly, so as to be perfectly opaque.

(No. 35, "Near Southend, Essex," and (No. 36, "Interior of a Barn, Kilsen, near Bath," respectively by George Frip and Mr. Remond, are not only pleasing, but excellent specimens of the art.

(No. 139, "Eastgate Street, Chertsey, Autumnal Evening," by William Callow, is a very fine view of part of the ancient town. The foreground is especially worthy of remark.

(No. 32, "Cutting Seaweed on the Coast of Guernsey," by E. Deacon, is a favourable specimen of an artist who has rendered himself famous for his marine pictures. The depth and motion in the water, and the colour in the sky, are very noticeable.

(No. 32, "An Interior of a Bathwater Churn, Sussex," by the celebrated artist of "The Masters of England," is painted with all his excellence, but also with all his conventionalities. The great fault with this artist is, it seems to us, that his smoothness and finish are such that he has no content, that his productions always remind one of lithographic drawings. Unfortunately, also, the peculiar brownish or bluish tints, says to keep up the idea.

(No. 50, "A Spanish Fairy," by Nancy Keyser, is so pure in tone and mild in colour, that it leaves little to be wished for, and that Filding might be expected on the drawing, the leg being too long from the hip to the patella. The face and bearing of the lady are, both undoubtedly different from those given us by Mr. Hunt, in his "Spanish Scenes," but yet bear evidence of equal truth.

(Nos. 49 and 50, "View of the South Downs, Sussex," and a View of the same of the Old Church over the World, are both very fine specimens of the master, Gley Filding. The air and breezy freshness of these are, in those peculiar English scenes, and which only a very great master in art could render as in these pictures.

(No. 61, "The Witch Actæa Charming her lover in the Bower of Bliss," is altogether weak in conception, and poor and purple in

Who do not also remember Rembrandt's sketches of poor families? It is well known that he was born at a mill, in the midst of rural scenery. His habit of studying and depicting men among the peasantry to whom he was surrounded, taught him not to despise the poorer classes, when, at a later period of his life, he settled in best scenes. He paints the Holy Family in any poor hut, or cabin. He surrounds it with sunny splendour, and exalts the labour of the workman in such a manner as to awaken almost the envy of the favoured man of leisure, who pursues his studies in quiet retirement. ARENT, OR ARNOULD VAN DER NEER.

THERE is a constantly-recurring interest in an examination of the lives of Dutch painters. Apparently so similar, their diversity is

They please us in the same way that White, the historian of Selborne, delights us among writers. They are in general natural and true, even when their subjects are not always in good taste. In forming the artistic mind of modern times, it is to be wished that some of our painters would in this respect study the old men of Flanders, who sought to be true rather than brilliant. They idealised nature, they comprehended and rendered the poetry of landscape and still life, and yet they neither distorted it to serve a purpose, nor painted impossible oaks, nor trees which a naturalist would be puzzled to discover the name of.

The pictures of this school of artists have increased in value, and have been appreciated just in proportion as men have become observers of nature, and lovers of the simple and the beautiful. Mankind at first are dazzled by bright colours, an array of glitter and show quite foreign to reality; but as reason and sound conceptions make way, we are led to better notions of what is true and pure in art, as in other things.

This is pre-eminently true at the present time. Never, in the history of the world, was art more generally a favourite study. A taste for pictures, and pictures of a very high order of merit too, has penetrated to the ranks of the millions; but the painters of ordinary life are always more readily understood than those who take their subjects from past history. Mantegna is a painter whose name is familiar. His "Belsazzur's Feast" is looked upon with surprise, and almost with awe. But Landseer is understood, and more freely talked of.

The artist of whom we are about to treat is eminently calculated real and marked. No two of them are exactly alike. They are all, however, pervaded by a quiet domesticity which has peculiar charms.

to be popular; and yet, though his pictures are in so many great galleries, the greatest uncertainty exists with regard to him. We have not his portrait, and we do not exactly know his name. Some call him Art; others Arthur; some say Arrould; and the learned M. de Burtin baptises him by the name of Arent Van der Neer. We do not know with any precision either the date of his birth, or that of his death, or by what magic in study he succeeded in the rare and difficult art of rendering night effects with so much poetry and truth.

The historians of the day do not condescend to speak of him; and Descamps himself, who wrote at a period when the paintings of Van der Neer were already celebrated, has only given him two or three lines in a short biography of Eglon Van der Neer, speaking of the father à propos of the son, as if so eminent a landscape-painter were not worthy of a frame to himself.

Van der Neer was the painter of winters and fires; but he was also the painter of the melancholy beauty of night. He loved and studied night, of which the poet, Young, thus says:—

“Night, sable goddess! from her chon throne,
In rayless majesty, now stretches forth
Her leaden sceptre o’er a slumbering world:
Silence, how dead! and darkness, how profound!
Nor eye, nor listening ear an object finds;
Creation sleeps. ’Tis as the general pulse
Of life stood still, and nature made a pause—
An awful pause, prophetic of her end.”

The life of this solitary and unknown artist was passed wholly in contemplating landscapes sleeping 'neath the moon, when it shows itself from behind a wooded hill, or when it rises behind a pool bordered by huts, or fired by a handlet. From the first sign of twilight to that undecided and mysterious hour, which the delicate La Fontaine has painted so pleasingly in one line:—

when we observe passing before us, like a panorama in the sky, a slow and solemn succession of peaceful tableaux, which appear monotonous to the ordinary man who has only noticed them once, but which, to the judicious and romantic artist, present an infinite variety of effects and shades. We are familiar with artists who have improvised moonlight effects with ability, either by means of a few dashes of black and white pencil upon azure paper, or by some pencil-strokes learnt by heart, and cleverly dashed off upon a blue ground, with accessories of architecture, and some gently-rippling water. Those who have seen these rapid pencil sketches dashed off, will with difficulty be persuaded, at all events will scarcely understand, how Van der Neer has been able to see in the course of the night and in its aspects almost as much variety as Joseph Vernet in day effects—that he even noted the different hours of the night so distinctly, that on examination we can really recognise them. This is indeed what has made Van der Neer a painter of the very first order of merit in his peculiar way.

The study of the effects which are produced at night by lights and shadows has introduced into painting one of the great and successful charms of poetry, and that is mystery. Certain landscapes which, in the broad daylight, would have been completely wanting in interest, are wrapped at night in fantastic tints, are elevated to lofty proportions by the way in which the shadows stand and fall, and are idealised beneath the influence of these pale lights, which, no longer illumining and showing the ordinary life of man, make the earth appear more tranquil and great, and water more solemn and vast in its effect. What a picture does Shakespeare give us of moonlight:—

“How sweet the moonlight sleeps upon this bank!
Here will we sit, and let the sounds of music
Creep in our ears; soft stillness, and the night, Becomes the touches of sweet harmony.
Sit, Jessica. Look how the floor of heaven
Is thick inlaid with patines of bright gold;
There’s not the smallest orb which thou behold’st,
But, in his motion, like an angel sings,
Still choiring to the young-eyed cherubim;
Such harmony is in immortal souls;
But, whilst this muddy vesture of decay
Doth grossly close it in, we can not hear it.”

We all know the effect of moonlight scenes upon our own individual emotions. If in the silence of the country we suddenly discover a little glimmer of light from the window of a hut; if presently, behind the distant trees of that sleeping landscape, we fancy we behold a cavalier gliding away like a ghost, how many emotions rise within us, and how ready are we to cry—

“What may this mean,
That thou, dead corse, again, in complete steel,
Revisit’st thus the glimpses of the moon,
Making night hideous; and we fools of nature
So horribly to shake our disposition
With thoughts beyond the reaches of our souls?”

Such a picture, and such a subject, finds us prepared to be interested and attentive. Why does that lamp burn at such an hour? Is it that some terrible drama is being prepared; or is there sickness—a watching mother, a babe near to death? No matter what; we are interested. And then why is that man creeping along as if afraid to be seen? Imagination—which would have been quite tranquil had such a thing been noted in the day—when “the moon is up, and yet it is not night,” for “sunset divides the sky with her,” is moved and warmed directly there appears that veil of mystery which always attends the movements of night. All seems to become greater, to be poetised under the influence of the moon; and though the earth is still, there is yet sufficient motion and life in the quickly flying clouds, reflected on the surface of the river or in the deep bosom of the sea. What strange, majestic, and sublime spectacles do we sometimes see! Sometimes the moon advances, surrounded by a procession of light fleecy clouds, which shine as she borders them with a luminous fringe; at others, leaving her court far behind, like a saddened and deserted queen, she crosses the vast plain of the air alone; sometimes, clearing her red and sulphurous disk from the vapour of the horizon, she hangs for a time suspended over a dark brown mass, until by degrees her azure forehead is quite cleared up, and she stands out upon the firmament whose dark azure is slightly dashed with green.

The moon has ever been the favourite subject of poetry; and never has it been better described than by Milton and others, whose words have suggested many a brilliant and successful picture. The crescent moon has been a favourite phase, because it presents a singular appearance in the sky. Under favourable circumstances, the whole lunar circle may be seen, the dark part appearing of somewhat smaller dimensions, in proportion to the illuminated. The appearance is popularly described as that of the new moon with the old one in her arms. It arises from the light reflected from the earth to the lunar surface; hence called earthshine; and lumière contrée by the French, or ashy light, on account of its inferiority, in quantity and brightness, to that which is directly received from the sun. It only serves to render the unlightened portion of the moon very faintly visible; and the dark part of her body appears disproportionate to the size of the crescent, owing to the optical illusion which the presence of a strong light creates—that of apparently augmenting the magnitude of objects. Two causes contribute to render the dark portion of the lunar disk invisible in other stages of her progress: the increase of her directly-illuminated part diffusing a stronger light, which proportionably nullifies that which is reflected from the earth; and the actual diminution of the earth itself. When the moon is a crescent to us, the earth is about full to her; and, consequently, more light is then transmitted from the earth than in other circumstances, which has the effect of then bringing that portion of her disk not exposed to the solar rays into feeble visibility. The effect is not produced when the moon is half full, owing to the cause, for the reason stated, being less influential.

Arent Van der Neer did not live in a land which was of itself much suited to the poetry of grand effects. Had he exercised his art on the borders of the Rhine, amid the accidents of flood and field presented by a varied style of landscape, with ruined castles on mountain-tops, he might readily have found landscapes naturally accessible to the majesty of night. But in Holland, near Amsterdam, Van der Neer had only before his eyes long level plains, great lakes surrounded by huts on a level with the water, common trees, and a lowering sky. Nevertheless, to this flat country Van der Neer succeeded in giving an interest quite poetical, when he painted his moonlights; and with no other resource than clumps of trees, thatched roofs, and marshes, he had the art to produce pictures full of charm and sentiment. The Dutch easily recognise the villages he has painted. They are nearly all situated between the city of Amsterdam and that of Utrecht. As you leave the borders of the sea and approach Utrecht, you see, it is true, the fertility of the country increase, the canals are bordered by gardens, which are a kind of framework of verdure for them, vegetation is more abundant and more lively, the trees send forth more vigorous shoots, the meadows are of a brighter green, and the trelliswork of the avenues disappears under the weight of foliage. But though nature becomes brighter here to the eyes of the traveller, it still offers to the painter nothing but perspectives without life and without grandeur; and it required all the genius of Arant Van der Neer to render for ever celebrated pictures where the beauty of the model is so little compared with the power of art. One of the most famous is that which is called "The Van der Neer of Zutputz." That is the German name of a Dutch family called Van de Putte, for a long time naturalised at Cologne, to whom the picture belonged. It passed to the gallery of M. de Burtin, who has given us the following description of it, which is worthy of being read carefully, and which gives a very good idea of the general style of Van der Neer.

"It represents," says the amateur, "the village of Brambrugge, traversed by the Vecht, whose limpid and transparent waters are bordered on both sides by houses mixed up with trees as far as Nieuwersluis, from which we can see land in the distance far away in the horizon. Amid the numerous barks which ornament the river, we notice two sail-boats, one of which is drawn by a white horse, the driver of which is on its back; the other, full of passengers, is stopped near a wooden bridge over a piece of water communicating between the village and the Vecht, and from which the men gaze at the boats. Two boats are placed conspicuously in front, one with fishermen in it, the other with a peasant, who is ferrying over some oxen. Several trunks of trees lying on the ground, reeds on the edge of the water, willows, fish reservoirs under the bridge, a stockade, and some trees which hide a part of the church and houses in the foreground, add beauty to this admirable composition, in which, despite the shades of night, nothing is black, nor cold, nor dry, as in many other works of this master; but, on the contrary, everything, even to the sky itself, is warm, clear, transparent, soft, harmonious, and of a charming velvety hue. The water reflects everything as in a mirror, and the light of the moon, shed upon the right of the river, produces a very pleasing and piquant contrast to the demi-tint of the left side."

This description, leaving out some details, is applicable to many pictures by Van der Neer. These landscapes have, in truth, a family likeness, from the elements of which they are composed. They are, in general, sheets of sleeping water gently rippled by the night wind, barks which serve as a set-off in the foreground, and villages, the streets of which are planted with trees, their tranquil and stumped masses being in contrast to the clearness of the star, which of itself makes up the drama of the picture. But if there is some monotony in the way in which Van der Neer composes his moonlights—we mean in the style of managing the lines, of distributing the masses of light and shade, and of arranging the different grounds—on the other hand, what variety is there in the tints, and how many shades delicately observed, distinguish landscapes so like one another at the first glance! Other painters have reproduced the same effects, while varying their models. Van der Neer, without scarcely changing his models, has infinitely varied the effects of his pencil, or rather his own impressions. Some particular village floating on the water, with its moored barks, fishermen's nets spread out in the foreground, and the wretched clothes which are drying on the bush, has often served as a subject for the landscape-painter. But, then, the village has been studied by the artist at different seasons of the year, and at different hours of the night. Sometimes the whole magic of his effects is concentrated in the west. While the earth, wrapped in deep shadows, is yet unable to participate in the light which is rising on the horizon, some few feeble rays, scarcely visible, escape from the upper part of the luminous disk, work their way between the boughs of the trees and the rustic boats, glide over the surface of the canal, and break in sparkling pearls over every tiny wave raised by the motion of the wind. On other occasions, having attained its utmost height in the heavens, the moon looks down upon the prairies, the woods, and hamlets, of Van der Neer, and everywhere spreading its blue glimmer, forms a great layer of light over a similar layer of gloom. Often the same landscape passes through all the degrees of twilight, and appears indistinct and fantastic at that hour when, in the absence of the stars, a mysterious veil hangs over the country, and would make the dawn of day look like its setting, if a painter like Van der Neer did not know how to seize the exact shade which separates the fresh and silvery tones of morning from the golden and vigorous tones of evening—shades and tints which can be more readily recognised in his pictures than in the engravings, admirable as they are, of Jacques Philippe Lebas, of whom we shall speak more fully by-and-by.

Nature is, in some respects, like living beings. True painters readily represent her to themselves as a woman with passions, radiant joys, sorrows, and moments of calm and unexcitement. Sometimes smiling and agitated, tempestuous and serene, she pleases, by her rapidly-changing caprices, those who really love her. Some love her melancholy, like Ruysdael; others delight in her merry moods, like Berghem. Van der Neer, while yielding to varied impressions, has followed the bent of his character, which impelled him to seek in nature only the variations of his sadder moods. Not only did he in preference choose her night scenes, but in his day-scenes he preferred selecting the winter. Often to the melancholy of his moonlights he added the additional painted excitement of night fires. His finest picture of this kind—a picture which has made him illustrious—is that which is to be seen at Copenhagen, in the gallery of the King, representing a fire seen from the grand canal of Amsterdam. Nothing more solemn can well be conceived. Between the spectator and the fire are several bridges covered by people, and the agitated outline of the crowd is relieved admirably against the sinister light of the centre of the picture. The vague colours, the uncertainty of the distant masses, the indelision of forms—of those, at all events, which are not relieved with vigour upon the fire—and the depth of space—all contribute to make the picture seem larger than it is in reality. The houses of Amsterdam, arranged in perspective along the quays, and rendered with an exactness and a charm which are quite worthy of a Van der Heyden, give the idea of a considerable town, so that upon a small canvas the picture of the fire appears immense. On this occasion, the painter has cautiously refrained from attempting a struggle between two lights, by opposing a contrast between the vast blaze and the moon. To make a sublime picture, all he needs is the night and a fire. This is, then, truly the finest Van der Neer which can be seen. The fire effect is observed twice, in the town, and in the water of the canal, which ripples and shakes, resembling a running stream of hot lava. The flames sparkle, crackle, and produce a thousand piquant effects on the windows of the houses, and wherever the waters of the Amstel reflect the sparks; but all these brilliant details are admirably toned down, and the ensemble presents a spectacle so hap-sing, so dramatic, of such luxuriant beauty, so full of life, so full of grandeur and unity, that we are rarely more affected by any production in the history of art.

"Fire," says Valenciennes, "does very well by night, when its light contrasts with that of the moon; but what is essential to produce a good effect is to paint water at the same time. Without water a landscape is dead, especially at night. Great tranquil masses admirably bring out the reflection of the moon and that of the natural or accidental fires which are introduced into a picture, like volcanic eruptions, torches, and burning houses. Nevertheless, if the eruption or the fire is too great, the effect of the moon will disappear, and in this case its light will only be necessary to the light of the fire which is to be represented. There is more charm in allowing the moonlight to predominate, and leaving the fire to be but a secondary effect."

There is much sense in these reflections; and we could almost fancy that they were a kind of criticism on some works by Van der Neer, if the writer had not said a little before of this excellent and admirable landscape painter—"Van der Neer has scarcely painted anything but moonlights; and he has succeeded in rendering them with a charm, a transparency of tone and colour, and a warmth of tint, which give us great delight. His waters are limpid and deep, and of astonishing planimetry. In truth, we believe we can say that this painter has most fully succeeded in rendering such efforts as those to which we allude."

A man, who loved nothing but silence and night, and who delighted in painting elegies of the moon, and who preferred the country when it was covered by ice, or feebly lit by poetic glimmerings of light,—such a man, we say, must have lived and died obscure. It is, therefore, not surprising that we know nothing of his private life, of his habits, nor of how he began to be a painter. Some have thought that Albert Cuyp was his master; but this is scarcely likely, if we recollect that Albert Cuyp often painted in the figures of Van der Neer's landscapes. It is very unlikely that and which bears as its title, "The Life and Works of Dutch and Flemish Painters," has little to say of Van der Neer. "Some foreign writers fix the date of his birth," he says, "in 1619; others in 1613; and that of his death in 1683. With Haber," we may allow that the time at which he flourished was 1660. These same writers, Pilkington and others, fancy that he was born at Amsterdam. It is beyond a doubt that he lived for a long time in this city—a great number of his landscapes, chiefly taken by moonlight, representing views of villages known to be in the neighbourhood of Amsterdam, and between that city and Utrecht. We find also, some similar views by him taken at sunrise, and during the day. But, in general, his paintings are moonlight effects, this being the style in which he excels, and, indeed, in which he has no equal. His pictures are composed of villages built on the borders of the water and near river-banks, where the moon is reflected on the water, and the scene is animated by ships, boats, and numerous figures. His skies are the parts in which he shows most art and the master, instead of taking his pupil for assistant and comrade, should become the assistant of the pupil; that is, that he should consent to embellish—by painting in the accessories—the pictures of one of his disciples. However this may be, and without denying that Albert Cuyp was strictly the master of Van der Neer, we believe that this landscape painter was seduced by the works of Elzeimer, which had been brought into Holland by a gentleman of Utrecht, the Count Palatine, Henri de Gondt; that he adopted and continued the traditions of this unfortunate painter; that, in fine, the love of study, and a passionate love of nature, did the rest. It is remarkable, moreover, that the Dutch historians, living in the country where Van der Neer flourished, and writing in our day, have found nothing new during two centuries to tell us about their countryman. Since Houbraken, who assures us that Arnould Van der Neer, in his youth, was major in the house of the lords Van Arkel, we must accept the theory that no new fact has come to light relative to the life of a painter so well known by his works. In fact, M. Immerzell, in the book he published in 1843, in Dutch, beauty. His winters are also admirable and excellent representations of nature. They are very rich in composition. His colours are varied, his touch easy and prompt; and in all his pictures there is a harmony of tone which enchants. In former times, his pictures were found in abundance in Holland; and that is what explains why his talents—less common than his pictures—were not appreciated at their full value. Foreigners, taking advantage of the low prices at which the pictures of Van der Neer were sold, have not failed to fill their cabinets with them, and his works have now become exceedingly rare in Holland. They are now, therefore, sold for very high prices when they appear in public sales. In 1825, 'A Winter,' from the cabinet of M. Vranken van Lokeren, was sold for €120; it is now in England, in the possession of Mr. Henry Bevan. But another picture by the same master, engraved in the gallery of Lucien Bonaparte, under the title of 'Paese con Figure ed Animali' (Landscape with Figures and Animals), was sold by public auction at London, in 1837, for £808."

It is rather surprising that an Amsterdam writer, in order to trace the life of a Dutch painter, should be reduced to repeat what has been said about him by foreign writers. And what would have been the value of the memory of so many great painters, if they had not taken the trouble to raise monuments to themselves, and written their own history, in their masterpieces?

Winter and its icy plains, and its sad and dreary amusements, necessarily excited the attention of a painter who loved nature in her melancholy moods. But if Van der Neer is imitable in his fires and his moonlights, he is not without a rival when he represents frozen canals, covered by sledges and skaters (p. 76). He may then be readily confounded with Isaac Ostade, his contemporary. Some naked trees, with a foliage of snow, mills, boats fast in the ice, and making it fall on the water, to the picture before and behind, and on the side, a little more faintly than in the representation of day: "in order that it may be taken for a true moonlight, and not for the light of the sun, which it greatly resembles in its sudden touches of light and its sharp shadows," with some stars shining in an azure sky, appearing here and there, even on the clouds. If we were to follow up the lessons of Nature, the moon would have to be supposed out of the picture, and would only be in the flat masses, the doubled and sharp outline of foliage, and the full colour of the local colours, that would be made to pass on, felt in the sky, without exposing it to the eye. We should then have to weaken the reflections, which are necessary to be by the soft light of the moon's rays as by the warm glow of the sun.

If beside these lessons of the learned painter, we place a fine night scene of Van der Neer, we shall see the difficulty of a crowd of skaters—some timid learners, motionless in their awkwardness, while others, launched out like arrows, cut the frozen mirror in straight lines, or turn in elegant and spiral curves on one foot. Such are nearly all his winters; and, if those of Arnold resemble those of Isaac, it is because the two masters, in their perfect nature, both resemble nature.

It is curious here to make a comparison—and perhaps we shall never find a better occasion for so doing—between the academic precepts of a professor and the examples furnished by an artist who allows himself simply to be guided by a sentiment of art. Gerard de Lairesse, in his "Grand Livre des Peintres," declares, that if he had to paint a moonlight, he would not be so naive that he departed from truth by following the principles which he has indicated in his representations of the sun: that is to say, never introducing into a picture the luminary itself, but only its light; establish a date rule. In practice, however, it has occurred to Van der Neer to add the moon to his scenes of frost; but then we must say its effect is not so good. There he has endeavoured to render a bright night, and the moon is twilight spreading over the earth after the setting of the sun. As for things which possibly become indistinguishable to the eye, but the impression of the uncertainty is well expressed. The moon is not a phenomenon to be observed. When we have seen it, we are not its being merely perceived. It is not a thing which we can see in a building, as body, the first thing that we see, and which is immediately and fully perceived. It is a thing which we see in a picture, that is to say, that we see it as a picture, and not as a thing, and we are not indistinct about the nature of the thing, but we are indistinct about the nature of the picture, and we are not indistinct about the nature of the picture, as is often the case with those of Rembrandt. When viewing a landscape like those of Van der Neer, the spectator who is not able to say whether he is gazing at the dawn or at twilight, whether it is the sun which has just finished shining, or the moon which is just beginning to shine, must be also unable to feel the proper emotions which the painter intended he should experience. Besides, what becomes of the scene if the principal actor is left out? If the star is not introduced into the picture, the artist loses all those resources which he can derive from the arrangement of the sky, when the moon plays the first part in it. For it is to the firmament that the attention is first drawn in pictures of the night. There the drama of light is going on, and there is seen the movement of the clouds which appear to carry on the life of the earth that sleeps.

"I should like," adds Lafrèze, "to render the lights more strong and the colours redder and yellower, to use torches, burning piles of wool, sacrifices, and other artificial lights, the shadows of which would be less defined than those of the moon. This, according to my view of things, would produce a very great effect, principally if these accidental lights were placed in obscure corners. But we must, above all, take care to throw over the whole more obscurity than light, and to introduce colours brighter than the sky."

To these observations of the learned professor, we prefer the simple piece of advice—to follow in all things the principles of unity. We may, doubtless, remain faithful to this principle, even if we introduce into a moonlight the fires of fishermen, the glare of torches, or any other artificial light, so that it be secondary and really subordinate, as is the case in many of the night efforts of Joseph Veret. But Van der Neer appears to us more expressive and more imposing, when, suppressing the contrasts which would attract the eye or occupy the mind, he brings down to us, in all their unity, the grand impressions produced by the spectacle of nature in the solemn hours of silence and of night.

There is in the feeling of melancholy a sweetness which appears, from their own confession, to have remained a long time unknown to the French. It is only of late years that the breath of the North has wafted to them its vague and romantic emotions. The consequence is, that the pictures of Ruysdael and of Van der Neer were never more highly appreciated, or better understood there, than they are now. Alfred Michiels thus speaks of them:—"What dreams, what wandering thoughts, rise in the mind when gazing on the canvases of Van der Neer. Above all, this painter loves the moonlight, and pictures it to us with magic ability. A slow, winding river flows through the picture. Tufts of reeds stick up along the banks; some buildings rise a little further off, and behind the huts we see the dejected line of the forest tops. The melancholy star silvers the surface of the wave; a brilliant train divides it; a pale light is reflected into the smallest creeks, now coating them with a light glazing of illumination, now giving them a tinge of white. The clouds which surround the radiant orb are touched by different shades, and a dim, religious light falls over the darkness. The queen of night is the centre and the divinity of this obscure world, the forms of which would disappear without her. The genius of Goethe could not have invented anything better."

At the time when Van der Neer painted his silent and nocturnal landscapes, nobody in France would have thought of discovering any sentiment which might have moved the heart of the painter in his productions; nobody would have written such a page. These poetic ideas were beyond the intelligence of the noble, profligate, and warlike men of those days. They were gross and profane in everything. They knew nothing of what old Martine so quaintly says, that to translate is to spoil: "J'imagine qu'il y a quelque ombre de triandise et de délicatesse au grain me-mé de la mélancholie!"

Bryan says—"Some place his birth in 1643, and it was said that he was living in 1691. The picture by Van der Neer and Cuyt, in the National Gallery, was offered for sale in London Bompard's collection, and bought in at 360 guineas; at Erard's sale, at Paris, it was purchased by Lord Pemborough for more than double that sum, and bequeathed by him to the nation." The same writer gives an account of a son, Egzon Hendrick Van der Neer, born in Amsterdam in 1643, who received his first instruction from his father; but his taste leading him to a different branch of the art, he was placed under the care of Jacob Van Loon, a painter of history and portraits at Amsterdam. When he was twenty years of age he went to Paris, where he passed four years and painted some small portraits and domestic subjects, which are generally admired. On his return to Holland, he attempted some historical and fabulous subjects, which have little to recommend them but delicacy of colour and careful finishing. He was more successful in his pictures of conversation and gallant subjects, which are tastefully composed and carefully drawn, in which he appears to have imitated the style of Terburg and Netscher. His pictures of this description are justly held in high estimation; they are very highly finished, and though less mellow and harmonious than those of Metzù and Miéris, they are well coloured and touched with great delicacy.

Pictures by Van der Neer are very rare, and this necessarily adds to their value. Still there are some found in almost every museum in Europe, and in most of the celebrated private collections of France, England, and Germany.

The Louvre only possesses two pictures by this master:

1. "A Border of a Canal in Holland." This is an evening effect. On the right are three cows, of which two are lying down near a boat; to the left is a row of trees and houses along the canal. In the foreground is a man leaning on some wooden pilings. Further off, we see a man impelling a boat along with a pole, and, among the houses, the spire of a church. We read on a plank to the right the monogram of the artist, AV. 187. The animals, says the catalogue, are ascribed to Albert Cuyt.

2. "A Village on the Road-side." To the right are houses on the borders of a canal, and in the foreground we see the reflection of the moon and some ducks; on the road are some fallen trees, a dog, and some figures; further on, a peasant, and a cavalier followed by a footman. To the left are trees and houses, surrounded by an open fence. At the foot of a tree is the monogram of the painter, AV. 1818. This picture was bought for the Louvre at the sale of M. de Monay, the 24th May, 1852, for £270.

Dresden Museum. Three Van der Neers:—1. A little landscape, representing some buildings on a lake. It is painted on wood. 2. A Dutch landscape. The day is falling; it is already moonlight. A river, the banks of which are bordered by trees and buildings, cuts the country in two. In the distance, a large town. 3. The fellow to this. A plain, water, barks, clouds, very admirably executed. The whole makes a magical moonlight effect. Both these are also on wood.

Pinaothek Museum of Munich. A fine large picture, representing a lake in the midst of a forest, the trees of which are reflected in the water. This picture proves that the most celebrated of moonlight pictures was equally able to paint nature by daylight.

Bavliere Gallery at Vienna. "A Moonlight." We see a beautiful garden and a building on the banks of a river cut by dykes. In the distance is a town, near which some ships have cast anchor.

In the Copenhagen Gallery is "The Fire," to which we have already alluded.

Ducal Gallery of Götting. There are here six pictures by Van der Neer. In this number is one with the monogram of the artist, and the date 1643. This is also a moonlight. On the foreground is a river, with a bridge. The second is a country site, lit up by the light of the setting sun. Of the four other pictures, the majority are night effects, with the monogram M, composed of the letters AV. 18. Interwoven.

Her Majesty the Queen possesses a fine Van der Neer. It represents, as usual, the borders of a canal in Holland, with a slight effect. We see a carriage and horses; to the right, a château surrounded by trees; in the background, a city.

There are no Van der Neers, or very not recently, in either the collection of Sir Robert Peel, which is so rich in Dutch masters of the first class, or in the Grosvenor Gallery, or in the possession

With an infinity of tact and judgment he soon saw what each one of his pupils was fit for. He employed them all, each in his peculiar way, and the best results ensued. He was an excellent master of a school. He encouraged some by steady and well-directed praise, others by ironical laudation, being a great master in the art of flattery and joking. If a young man showed any signs of being pleased with himself, Lebas complimented him, embraced him warmly, and sent him away overwhelmed with delight, until the moment when his comrades explained the true character of the perfidious flattery of Lebas. No pupil ever allowed Lebas to embrace him twice. The school was large and well attended. There were out-door scholars and boarders, that is, pupils whom Lebas fed, lodged, and taught gratuitously; they, however, giving him their time. While amusing the class by his fun and humour, he also set them an example of unwearied activity, worked every day until five or six o'clock in the evening, the name of the master, and the usual address of the dealer. "A Paris, chez M. Lebas, Rue de la Harpe, Maison du Foyancier, à la Rose Rouge." "Lebas," says Watelet, "quite convinced that the number of connoisseurs is very small, thought that the artist whose name is oftener seen in print is the best, and the reputation he acquired proved that he was correct. But it would have been more solid had he acknowledged only those pieces which he engraved himself, or, at all events, which he had touched up after his best pupils." It must be allowed, however, that his piquet and delightful touch gave life, movement, and grace to even the worst productions of his pupils. At all events, such is the opinion of good judges, and especially of Watelet.

In art, as in everything else, reputation brings money. Mademoiselle Lebas saw the prediction of her husband verified. Opulence fell upon the house commenced under such humble auspices. But Lebas, a true artist, naturally disinterested and generous, used his without ever leaving, of those merry characteristics of mind and language, which were the most marked features of his character.

Assisted by so many arms, the impatient engraver was able to undertake and carry out many very vast operations, such as "The Ruins and Monuments of Greece," with the text of Leroi; the large view of Toulous after Toulous; the battles and camps of the Emperor of China; the festivals, rejoicings, and illuminations of the city of Havre, at the time of the visit which Louis XV. paid to it; the vignettes for the Paris Directory; and other series of engravings, some of which, it must be said, seemed rather publishers' speculations than works of art. These speculations succeeded. Lebas soon saw him self at the head of an extensive house, which had connections and correspondents all over Europe. The engraving trade was inundated by pictures bearing the name of Lebas. Landscapes and historical subjects, geographical charts, subjects from natural history, fire-works and public festivals, theatrical decorations, vignettes, frontispieces and tail-pieces for books, all coming out of the numerous school of Lebas, and bearing fortune without precaution, without care, and without order, as many men do who have no children, and who believe themselves beyond the reach of want. Too witty, too impulsive to become a business man, Lebas, if he sold a picture or credit, took a note of it on a stray piece of paper, which he was sure to lose before the day was over. If he accepted a bill, he never thought of entering it in a book, and was in the habit of being startled by the sudden presentation of the forgotten document. One day, when, as usual, he had been surprised by one of these bills, he asked the bearer to give him till the next day. The creditor replied by a threat of protesting the bill. Lebas rose in a towering passion, seized the creditor, put him down by main force in an arm-chair, locked him in the room, and rushed out in slippers and dressing-gown. In half-an-hour he returned, having borrowed the money of a friend.

The liberality of Lebas was inexhaustible, and assumed various delicate forms. His generosity was shown particularly to artists. Having one day called to see a landscape-painter of some reputation, named Laeroix, he found him ill and short of money. Presently thought fit to temper the habitual coquetry of his point, introduced much style into his manner, and reached a rich tone of harmony, if not the intensity of effect which Woollett had obtained.

The five hundred pieces engraved by Lebas—an enormous and almost incredible figure, when we reflect that they are pieces engraved with the burin and the sharp graving tool—did not prevent him giving himself to pleasure, to the cultivation of the world, nor from shining there by the liveliness of his fancy and the exuberance of his spirits. This amiable temperament was combined in him with a true sense of the dignity of the arts and his own self-respect. M. Hocquet, his friend, quotes many examples of this. A lady of the court, of distinguished rank, begged him to give lessons to her son, at the same time taking every due care for the young man. Lebas consented; but having perceived, from the very first lessons, that he was made to wait, and that the young nobleman often only came in to give his master a cahnet,* paid for very dearly, was by first refusal to receive money he did not earn. Having one day noticed in the ante-chamber a valet with a very pleasing countenance, he ordered him to announce him in the mother's apartment. "Madame," said he on entering, "I wish you to allow me, when Monsieur the — is not prepared or not inclined to take his lesson, to allow me to give it to this young man," pointing to the lackey; "I shall then not lose my time, nor will you, madame, lose your money; and as your lackey will take lessons much oftener than his master, he will derive more advantage than him, and will soon know enough for Monsieur the — to continue his studies under him, and learn all that you appear to wish he should learn." The proposition of Lebas was received as he anticipated, and the master took his leave of his noble pupil.

A few years before his death, a noble lord having lent him a picture to engrave, Lebas, when the plate was finished, asked permission of the proprietor of the original to dedicate the production to him as a testimony of his gratitude. The reply he received was, that permission was granted to him on condition that the affair cost nothing to the person who accepted the dedication. "I will make a present to Monsieur," said Lebas, "of the right to call himself the protector of artists; and will give him an engraving framed with his arms, and twelve copies as a proof of his title!" Haughty with the great, Lebas was delightful with his equals and with the humble. In their company, he laughed at his obscure birth; and if he took upon himself to criticise the wig of a visitor or the hair of a portrait, he would add in the simplest tone possible, "I know something about it; I am the son of a hairdresser."

Portraits were not in the style of Lebas. He was, in general, rather weak in them. That of the painter Chzes, which he executed for his reception to the Academy in 1750, did not merit the reception it met with. It was the custom at that time to require, that candidates who presented themselves to be received in the class of engravers, should execute the portraits of two academicians, the plates of those received being the property of the Academy. Lebas competed for the prize, and sent the two portraits of Jacques Chzes (after Avod) and of Robert Lemblin, after Drouais. But Lebas failed in his attempt, less from the error of his burin than from the imprudence of his tongue. Some words imprudently uttered by him with regard to an academy man, were repeated to this person by a called a friend, such as are always to be feared; so that on the day of admission our academicians made a bitter criticism on the work of Lebas, and by chance found in his pocket a letter, with which he had scribbled up and demonstrated the defects. According to this important critic, the engraving had too many faults; and it was really like the coquetry and impudence of M. Jacques Philippe Lebas to have said the day before to his pupils: "Tomorrow, gentlemen, you will be received at the Academy!" So Lebas was rejected, but not without violent protestations from the minority. Dumont le Romain went so far as to say, that he should like to see a pencil put into the hands of any of those gentlemen and Lebas. He was certain that the engraver would beat them all.

It was thirteen years after this failure that our artist presented himself again. This time the Academy departed from its ordinary rules in favour of Lebas; and, instead of two portraits of academicians, they gave him as his trial-engraving the pretty picture of Lancret, known as "La Conversation Galante."† The picture is well known, and as much admired. What brightness, what freshness, what transparency! It seems to have been dashed off under an earnest impulse of enthusiasm, without hesitation, fatigue, or doubt—a very labour of love. The somewhat fantastic trees of Lancret, transported by him from the gardens of Watteau, were executed boldly by Lebas with his point, as the painter had grouped and massed them with his brush.

Received unanimously in 1743, Jacques Philippe Lebas obtained the following year the brevet of engraver to the king's cabinet. In 1771 he was elected "councillor of the king in his Academy," and also received, with the pension of 500 livres, granted by Louis XV. to Laurent Cars, who had not lived to enjoy it. Nothing was now wanting to raise the name of Lebas with foreigners. The reigning prince of Deux-Ponts and the king of Sweden attached him to their courts as engraver, and gave him the title.

Lebas was often accused, and not without propriety, of executing his plates in the same way that people painted fans—that is to say, with the assistance of several artists—fully up to each speciality of style. One did the heads, another the draperies, another the landscape. This was true in the case of a great many plates, to which Lebas put his double signature as an artist and as an engraver. He himself groaned over this custom, of which he regarded himself as by no means the inventor; and he sought to correct the evil effects of it by making his pupils apply to different branches of art. He had, moreover, quite sufficient tact to see their particular aptitude of style, and always showed them models of masters who could be imitated without peril, rounding them always of the words of the French fable-writer:

"L'exemple est un dangereux leurre:

Où la guêpe a passé, le moucheron demeure."‡

During his whole life, Lebas was on the best terms with artists, learned men, and men of letters. Voltaire, of whom Madame Lebas requested as a favour some pit tickets for the first representation of "Merope," sent her tickets for the best boxes, saying that he owed this mark of respect to a comrade. Lebas was intimately connected with many artists, especially with Chardin, after whom he engraved four pieces so much sought after now-a-days: "The Morning Toilet," "Good Education," "The Drawing Lesson," "Economy." One day, when he went to call on his friend Chardin, he found him in his workshop before the picture of a dead hare, which he had just finished painting. "I should like very much to have that picture," said Lebas; "but, then, I have got no money." "That can be arranged," said Chardin; "you have got a waistcoat on there that takes my fancy very much." "Done! Take the waistcoat!" (Voilà pour la veste!) cried Lebas. He immediately stripped off his coat, threw the waistcoat on a chair, and walked off with the picture under his arm.

We must not omit to quote, among the friends of the painter, Cochin, who, before being the friend of Lebas, had been his pupil, or at least his assistant. For a long time Cochin had gone to work every morning at Lebas's unknown to his father, whom he allowed to think that he had just begun his day, when he had already gained his three francs by two hours' early work. At a later period the younger Cochin made himself a name in literature, by writing on the subject of art. He had acquired great influence, and a powerful name. When it was determined to engrave "The Ports of France," which Vernet had painted for the king, Cochin was charged with the undertaking. He confided the whole of them to Lebas, reserving to himself the right of touching up the plates and sharing the profits. We read at the bottom of several of the plates, Lebas et Cochin filius socii sculpsit aut! But the most intimate friend of

* It is usual in France, when you take lessons at so much a lesson, to buy of the professor so many cahnets or medals, which you give to him one at a time. When you have no more, you renew the supply. The same is done in eating-houses, where a diminution in price is made on twenty dinners.

Lebas was Desamps, the author of "The Lives of Flemish Painters." A constant of the domestic quarrels, he was always the means of making peace in the family. Our readers should peruse in the Memoirs of M. Hequet, already alluded to, the acts and deeds of this jealous husband, who had no excuse to be so; and, above all, a certain adventure which amused the pupils of Lebas for a very long time. One day about some of his wife's walks and journeys in the town, our French husband rushed one day out into the street, called a cab, and dashed after his wife in his morning costume, which was none of the most complete. The cab, instead of following the carriage in which Madame was, followed another, which was taking a worthy abbe to the Marais. The coach stopped, the abbe got out, the jealous husband rushed furiously into the house which he believed his wife to have entered, abused the coac'opp, made a horrible noise, called for his wife, burst open a door and fell upon the unfortunate abbe, who, seeing the angry artist in a very simple nightgown, burst out laughing in his face.

The admirable woman and devoted wife, Madame Lebas, died in 1781. Her husband, who was then seventy-four years of age, was profoundly affected by her death. At an age when one wants repose, he for the first time felt annoyances, afflictions, disarrangements, and distress. His undertaking, the figures of "The History of France," which required considerable advances of money, had placed him in great pecuniary difficulties. The wretched slowness of Moreau the younger, with whom he was on odd terms, in giving him drawings for this work, which was brought down only to Louis IX.; the necessity he was under of leaving the house where his wife had just died, after living there forty-five years; all combined to overthrow the courageous old man, and he died. This event took place in 1783, just as it became evident that his "History of France" was a great success.

Amid all the annoyances of his last days, he still had some remnant of his old fun and humour. "In 1782," says Hequet, "we were at the Trianon. We were in the apartment of Madame the Princess of Montbazou, whose windows opened upon a little garden with water and fountains, where the dauphin was walking, or rather carried about, by his attendants." The little prince having stopped before the window, Lebas began, by making faces, swelling out his cheeks, and striking them with his hands, to make the child laugh. It was hinted to him that these demonstrations were not respectful, considering the rank of the child! Lebas immediately checked himself, and, turning round, addressed the heir-presumptive to the throne, who was but one year old. "I am Jacques Philippe Lebas, engraver and pensioner of your grandfather. I am delighted to have been the means of making his grands-uncle laugh." More natural than those who were silly enough to take him away from the contamination of laughter, the child showed, by its cries and lamentations, its regret at being taken away from such joyous company!"

On the 9th Thermidor, in the year IV. (1796), the National Library purchased the collection of the works of Lebas, made by Hequet, for the sum of 4120. It is a very valuable part of the riches of that great and admirable institution, which, with many defects, is so superior in many other things to our British Museum. We have the more readily told the story of Lebas's life, the whose name is put to so many engravings, with which millions are familiar—because his life has scarcely ever been written. In fact, the materials have only recently been discovered to exist, since the revolution of 1848, when some of the eminent literary men who took a part in that demonstration obtained access to certain of the archives which had been buried and lost to the world from the carelessness and negligence of certain parties. Brevet, of Jéhu, a celebrated French engraver, who has left a considerable number of pieces, executed in an excellent manner. He was born at Paris in 1708, was instructed in the art of engraving by N. Tardieu, and was one of the most ingenious artists of his time. He excelled in landscapes and small figures, which he treated with infinite spirit and neatness. He availed himself much of the freedom and facility of etching, which he harmonised in an admirable manner with the graver and dry point. The popularity of his works procured him a number of s-holders, whose talents were employed in advancing the plates which he afterwards finished and polished with his own hand. His prints after Titians are more than a hundred.

PERUZZO, to whom, in this city, about which cling such memories of the past, memories of a superstitious, of a terrible, struggle for the world's mastery, and which is yet the centre of so much that is important, I have become acquainted with very many facts which, if all recorded, would be worthy of a volume. "Childless and crownless, in her voiceless woe!"

and, though glad at times to mix with the gay throng that crowded the halls of princes, prelates, and bankers, I have sought, according to my usual characteristics, as much as possible to initiate myself into the mysteries of humble life. I have never neglected art, that study, which, of all others, repays so well the labour and time bestowed on it; and though I have not, with Clodion, experienced "an acute feeling of pain on beholding the frescoes of Raphael and Michael Angelo," because they owe their preservation solely to the durable material on which they are painted, I have studied them with earnest love. In fact, my days have been spent, and would be still, but that I am about to leave for Florence, in marvelling at the beauties of painting and sculpture I see around me—my evenings in wandering in Rome and the outskirts in search of studies of manners. I am, in my artistic productions, at the style of Ostade or Gyp, rather than that of our Titian. It was in consequence of this feeling of mine that I met with an adventure which I purpose recording at a future time on my canvas—the note, that it has a connexion with a countryman, and is, therefore, interesting.

I had extended my walk to some distance one evening. The night came on sadly while I was wrapped in contemplation; and, turning round, I scarcely knew where I was. I saw distinctly before me the ruins of an old tower, which told me about what distance I was from Rome; and yet I felt little certainty of finding my way. I was not sufficiently familiar with the road to trust to my guide, but after a few minutes' hesitation I set off, as I thought, along the path which I had followed in the light. In ten minutes I had lost my way. I could speak Italian, and could have asked the road, but there was nobody to ask. This made me reflect on the sage remark, that a man may be a fool in many languages, and I said many things to myself which were of a nature scarcely worthy remembering. I endeavoured to persuade myself that I was on the right road, but it was of no avail; so at last I stood still and looked around. I was near a ruin, which just alluded to, and I was on the point of turning back, and showing a little of the signs of my mind.

It soon found that I was alone in a little stream, as I heard, not by the noise of waters from the headlong height, but by the gentle rippling of the tiny waves. I began to suspect that I really did not know where I was. I stood still. The scene was new to me; and yet, at sight of that pile of ages long ago, as the light began to stream from our mid planet on rich business, and soil, I suspected I had seen the place before from a distance. My eyes began to assist me to resolve the doubt, and presently I distinctly saw a kind of rude hut, such as are commonly built in our districts by the peasantry.

I had now felt that I was in Rome. I had a very thought of it, but not a longer, this, and was, as usual, walking up and down on

The hut was below me in a kind of hole, and I had to descend our rude steps to this dwelling, perhaps purposely concealed, for what I knew, and I conjectured hardly safe for any one who had with him ought to lose. But I had nothing to lose, and on that score was easy. My dress was plain. I wore a blouse and cap, and my shoes were heavy and rudely fashioned. Still I clutched my stick as I turned to the hut, and approached a side whence came a light.

"Is there any one at home?" said I, in a loud and, I hope, cheerful tone.

"Si, signor," cried a rough and rather harsh voice. "What do you want? Who are you?"

"I am hungry, tired, and thirsty; and I am an English traveller and artist, studying nature, who has lost his way."

There was a dead silence for a moment—a silence I could feel, but not understand.

head, and altogether a pretty simple face that might have been little noticed but for her eyes. They were of that deep, dreamy cast which strikes the painter because they tell a tale of sorrow, or regret, or hope; at all events, always indicate some passion which it is useful for him to study.

My attention, however, was called away by my supper, of which I partook freely, all the while, however, casting glances towards the young woman, who was absorbed, I began to fancy, by some memory of the past.

"You seem partial to Englishmen," I said at last, addressing the old man.

"We have no cause to be," grumbled he in a half good-natured tone.

"Hush!" said the girl, rising and standing erect, her right hand held out;—this is the instant I hope to seize in my picture.—
"Hush, father! Do you not remember it was thus he came!"

THE SKATER.—FROM A PAINTING BY VAN DER NEER.

"Welcome!" then exclaimed a voice—a voice of touching sadness and melancholy. "Welcome, stranger: no Englishman was ever turned from this door."

I was, I confess, a little startled by this reply, but certainly not qualified than startled; and I advanced to the open door and entered the hut. It was only a hut, a poor mean building with one room, as I at first thought, and three occupants. There was an aged pair, still active and healthy, in the dress of peasants, and a young woman, not far from thirty, of handsome, yet melancholy mien, on whom my eyes were the more fixed, that she examined me with a curiosity and anxiety quite painful to behold. She then sat down by a table, and gazed with a vacant look at the wall, as I thought, it being dark, and the place illumined faintly by a sorry lamp.

The old people gave me a stool, and I had leisure to examine the young woman while they prepared a frugal meal of bread and cheese and wine, with some grapes, always welcome. She was dark, with black hair, black eyes, a small but well-shaped fore-

It was a dark and gloomy night, and he had lost his way; do you not remember?"

"Well, cavissima, I think I should remember it," replied the father.

"To what does your daughter allude?" said I; "if I may be so indiscreet as to ask."

The young woman seized the lamp, and holding it close to the wall, bade me look. I rose quickly and gazed at the place on the wall indicated by her, and there I saw, to my utter amazement, a delicious little oil painting, representing a young man of fair and delicate features, beside a dark-eyed beauty, which I easily recognised as the holder of the lamp in her younger days. It was a perfect little gem, and astonished me so much I could not at first speak; but presently the peasant girl calming down, I resumed my seat and entered into conversation with her. And she told me her story, I suppose, because my lips had imparted to her the secret of my birth in the land of his origin.

It was about ten years before that a youthful traveller lost his way under somewhat similar circumstances to my own, and sought shelter in the same hut, where then dwelt Francisca Patrana and her parents. He was a gentle but enthusiastic youth, who felt grateful at once for the hospitality offered and accepted. He spent the evening in conversation, chiefly with the young girl, and went away next day, promising to return. He did return, though they did not expect it, and so often that it soon became clear he was smitten with the charms of the young girl. His visits were discouraged. He cared not. He painted the hut at first, and then, after some coaxing, the young girl, who began to take a deep interest in him.

At last he offered his hand and his heart. A romantic and fervent spirit, he knew only that she was beautiful and good. She was uneducated, but that was a delightful thing for young love to remedy. He was refused at first, because of the difference of religion; but his earnest and sincere eloquence overcame all difficulties, and it was finally settled that the whole party should at an them, and not a single stumbling-block stood in the way of their great happiness. How she longed to see the happy land he painted in such glowing colours! and how he too desired, with pride and joy, to be the being who should open up to her its beauties and its new graces!

To marry in Rome was difficult, if not impossible. Every preparation was then made for their departure. At last the letter came, and all was ready. Just then he died. He was of a delicate, frail nature, and caught a fever, against which youth laboured in vain. He died, and left behind him one who, though not his widow, because she had not been his wife, yet was determined to be in everything his heir on this earth. She saw him to his lonely grave, and returned to her hut—saddened, blighted, hopeless, and yet—for he had conquered all her prejudices—hopeful of another world, where they must meet again.

She kept his picture, that one, and the lesson books he had given her; but she touched them no more: the chord was snapped that early period emigrate to England, and there the young couple should be united. The old people heard the plan at length with complacency, and the youthful artist wrote over to his home for money to return.

All went well. He painted and taught. The young girl was apt and willing, and she learnt to read and write, and imbibed much knowledge from her enthusiastic lover. His studies were now confined to nature. He was always near the ruin, and it was in the hut in which I was listening to the tale that he painted his picture, which gave unbounded delight to all parties. And there it was, too, that she combed over her books, her grammar, and her little elementary works—a very school-girl in earnestness and devotion.

And he was never tired of teaching, nor she of learning. It must have been a pleasant and cheerful thing to see that couple, so attached, so earnest, so single-minded, pursuing their mutual tasks; he, yearning and battling for fame, she, for simple knowledge. And the time passed so pleasantly all the while, for all smiled on made them musical. And yet I saw with what veneration she still regarded them. All efforts to make her change, to induce her to wed, were useless; she was the bride of the departed, and as such she solemnly announced herself to her parents. They combated her will in vain. She would not be comforted, and would not be left.

And thus I found her and a subject for my pencil, which, if I can ever replace, I am sure will find my name in some little niche where the smaller specimens find a fitting shelter. And then I left her next day, much moved by meeting with one to whom she could speak unreservedly of the lover who had been dead ten years, and yet whom she looked on with such freshness of memory. I saw her no more, my stay in Rome being but short; but I write this hurried letter to record the deep impression the scene made on me.

Perhaps I should have rather told of the seven-hilled city's pride, of what remains besides the cypress and the wrecked broken thrones and temples; but thus is it ever with me; the little bit of nature makes me forget all the glories of the greatest art, because it moves my heart. Not that I despise the mighty monuments of times past, but that real life moves me more deeply when it presents itself to me in such a form, and especially—egotist that I am!—when it comes wrapped round in the enchanting witchery of a subject for a picture.

AN ARTIST'S IDEA OF CONSTANTINOPLE AND ENVIRONS.

THE East has always been the peculiar ground of the artist. Thence he has drawn his most rich materials. Martin, and Turner, and many others have made us familiar with much that is great and splendid in the fields and hills of Orient, now to be made further familiar as the scene of military operations. It is pleasing, however, to turn from the terrible stories of "our own correspondent," narrating all the horrors of war, starvation, and cholera, to the views of an artist. Mr. F. Hervé visited the land some time back as a portrait painter, and brought back, not only rich sketches of the country, but communicated much pleasing information.

He visits the place to paint; and hence it is natural that he should tell us, that though there are few spots in Europe which have called forth more panegyrics than the charms of the Bosphorus, yet the reality far surpasses all preconceived ideas. The position, the very sensation that you are between the extreme points of the great divisions of the globe known as Asia and Europe, is enough to rouse the mind to a certain degree of enthusiasm. It is hard to say on which side most beauty lies.

You gaze on palaces of the purest white marble, with doors of bronze and gilded cornices, tall minarets, rising with chaste and taper elegance beside the round and massive tower, light trellises, shaded terraces, latticed windows, all savouring of mystery and romance. Then you turn from the present to the past, as your eye catches a sight of the heavy castles of other times, with their gloomy turrets frowning on each other from the opposite banks as they peer up in solitary grandeur—here a fantastic and ephemeral style of architecture, there a heavy massive line of solid walls and lofty towers, which raise their proud heads on high.

Every form of habitation is to be found in the Bosphorus, from the habitation of the peasant to the palace of the monarch. There is the lowly fisherman's shed, formed of a few planks, pitched up and plastered together with mud and clay, with a hole to creep in and a hole to look out from, the waves oft dashing against its base, and the rain entering its roof; whilst not far off stands the Sultan's gorgeous palace, where the sculptor's art is profusely displayed, where gaudy painting and the richest carved work unite their powers to adorn the splendid monument of Ottoman pride, and its polished marble walls, its granite balustrades, its porphyry columns, are crowned by a resplendent crescent of gold. All this may outrage the pure and classic eye of the chaste architect, for we know that it is in bad taste; but the effect is most brilliant and imposing; and as there is a succession of these palaces on either shore, when the sun shines upon them, it produces one dazzling blaze of eastern magnificence.

But art alone has not lent enchantment to the view. It is not possible for us to comprehend, here at home, what nature is under the "Blest power of sun-shine!"

in a land where it may be truly said, on many occasions:

"There was not, on that day, a speck to stain
The azure heaven; the blessed sun alone,
In unapproachable divinity,
Caredred, shining in his fields of light,
How beautiful, beneath the bright blue sky,
The billows heave!—one glowing green expanse;
Save where, along the bending line of shore,
Such hue is thrown, as when the peacock's neck
Assumes its proudest tint of amethyst
Embathed in emerald glory."

And all this lights up a place gifted by nature with almost sublime charms. It is nature that has given the bold and varied outline, the rocky mazes and the myrtle bowers; she it is that gives us that gigantic and overshadowing plane-tree, the growth of centuries, and the shelter of thousands of men and herds, to gaze at and admire. See the rugged oak, the spreading elm, the weeping ash, the bright sycamore, the dark-green fig, the stately cedar, the orange, the lemon, the soft acacia, the trembling aspen, the drooping willow, the sable yew, the tall poplar, and, the loftiest of all, leaving every other far beneath, the sombre cypress, rears its aspiring stem. And then, above, there is the almost bare rock, clad at times by the hardy pine of the North.

And then, besides these and many other trees, there are fruit-trees innumerable. The mulberry and the vine are the most frequent. The latter climbs about the awnings and palisades in all directions, and producing, in almost all parts of the East, a vile compound, has been the fertile source of death in our army. The shrubs are endless and innumerable; the laurel, the myrtle, the box, the arbutus, and laurustinus are everywhere to be seen. Of the flowers it would be in vain to attempt to speak.

The palaces, harems, and villas of the rich Turk—less frequent now than in Hervé's time—and the foreign merchants, are a graceful and pleasing addition to the beauties of nature. Their gardens are perfectly fairy-like in many instances. They surround the dwellings, and then go back, getting wilder as they ascend, until they, too, reach the barren crag. There they rise, terrace after terrace, communicating by winding steps, often of marble, with beds of flowers and dark-green shrubs rising on all hands; and then the bowers, arbour, alcoves, obelisks, kiosks, pagodas, fountains, temples, awnings, lattice-worked screens and trellises.

Elsewhere upstart the blue cupolas of a mosque, very much like the Panopticon in Leicester-square, half hid by an umbrageous curtain of trees, except where the fluted minarets rise alongside the dark trees. And then from some window peers a dark-eyed Greek girl, watching the boats as they pass; or an Armenian or Turkish lady darts a modest look and drops her eyes; while Turks smoke lazily near the water, boats richly carved and gilt float by, filled by men in embroidered costumes, though now, in general, the European garb is alone seen. The boatmen alone preserve their old dress.

Well, and with all this beauty of scenery, with such a sky, and such temptations, neither Turks, nor Greeks, nor Armenians, nor Jews, nor any other of the mixed and nondescript dwellers in Turkey have the slightest conception of art, or the slightest leaning towards a study of it. The Greeks are very behindhand. They neither comprehend music nor painting, as the daubs in the inside of their churches will readily show. As to music, some Souliots were once singing very sweetly the air of "Il Pescator," and an Englishman remarked to a Greek friend how well they did it. His reply was curious. "They sing well indeed! they have some knowledge as to using their mouth, but they have no idea whatever of using their noses!" It is through the nose that the Greeks usually sing.

There have been many young Greeks sent to Europe to learn various accomplishments. Singing and painting they could never compass. We have heard Greek singing enough, and the less we hear for the future the better. What half a century of civilisation may do we know not, but the arts are nowhere in so deplorable a state as amid the ruins of temples and monuments in Greece, in Athens itself, and in the country of the Turk, where religion sets its face against every form of the art of painting and sculpture.

The prejudice is wearing away, however, and this—like everything else—denotes that there is a crisis of civilisation about to take place. The presence of the allied armies may be the cause of Turkey awaking to real civilisation, literature, and the arts, and finally to Christianity—not the Christianity of Greeks and others in Turkey, but to the purer Christianity of countries where civilisation has gone hand-in-hand with religion. Then may we hope to see even high art taking root in a country formed by nature for all that is lovely and great, and they too may produce works from which "We gaze and turn away, and know not where,

Dazzled and drunk with beauty, till the heart
Reels with its fulness: there—for ever there,
Chained to the chariot of triumphal art,
We stand as captive, and would not depart."

As one indication of the approach of a better state of things, we may mention that, as the French army in the East is accompanied by Horace Vernet—whose business it is to produce worthy pictorial representations of any striking scenes, any remarkable objects, and any brilliant exploits that may meet his view—so Omar Pasha has an artist in attendance upon him for a similar purpose, who is said to be engaged upon a painting of the siege of Silistria, that glorious struggle in which Turkish valour, assisted and directed by the English skill of the gallant Lieutenant Butler and his friend, effectually repelled all the attacks of a Russian host, in spite of a great disparity in numbers. It may, perhaps, be some time before Omar Pasha's enlightened views on general subjects and just appreciation of the value of art are shared by the mass of the subjects of the Sultan; but the influence of his example, seconded by the high position he deservedly holds in the estimation of all, must, sooner or later, bring about this desirable result.

THE EXHIBITION OF THE ART UNION.

SOME of our readers may smile at the fact of an exhibition of the Art Union of London being included in matter, great part of which relates to the works of ENGLISH MASTERS. But the article will not be so irrelevant as it might upon the first blush appear.

The object of our work is to cultivate amongst all classes in England a taste for the beautiful, and the beautiful includes, according to the sententious German, the good! It is not unnatural, therefore, that any glaring departure from the rules of Taste and of True Art should be noticed and reproved, for it is by reproof that education is promoted, and by the example of the bad that the good is inculcated.

Very few people are ignorant of the constitution of the Art Union. It is a society, instituted in 1837, and incorporated in 1846, having for its object a promotion of the knowledge "and love of the fine arts, and their general advancement in the British Empire by a wide diffusion of the works of native artists," and also "the elevation of art and the encouragement of its professors, by creating an increased demand for their works, and an improved taste on the part of the public."

That an institution having so generous and so great an aim, should have so signally failed, as this and other exhibitions will show, is more to be deplored than to be wondered at. Taste requires education, and is by no means a mere natural production. It requires also time to grow. It is not to be presumed, that because a man or a woman wins a prize at the Art Union, they should be sufficiently judges of pictures, to select the most meritorious out of so many galleries; and the fortunate prizeholder has the Royal Academy, the British Institution, the Society of British Artists, the National Institution, the Water Colour Society, and the New Association of Painters in Water Colours, to select from. It might probably happen that if the fortunate or unfortunate prizeholder had only one gallery to choose from, something like a good selection might be made; but under the present system the body of prizeholders, with a perverseness which is puzzling, clear the whole of the galleries of their dross and refuse.

It is another unfortunate circumstance that the drawing of the Art Union takes place very late in the year. Therefore, if there be a good picture by a rising artist, prizeholders are pretty sure not to get it, because buyers of taste and of art education have had the run of the galleries before them; and, moreover, to render, we suppose, any collusion between the buyer and the seller impossible, the committee of the institute have framed their by-laws in such a manner that one may be construed into a direct prohibition of the prizeholder's using any judgment other than his own—a good rule in some respects, but exceedingly injurious in others.

Thus it is, that the result is frequently very seriously injurious and noxious to British art. Those who have to choose the pictures are of all classes, and the sellers of the pictures are as various. Some there are who get a pretty good painting; but the majority are so bad, that the effect of the gallery to an eye accustomed to good art, is really very sad indeed. But, besides this evil, the Art Union has another effect. It discourages the artist who may be very clever, but may not have sold his picture, when he sees, one with not a tithe of the talent which he has, get for his production a price which is preposterously high. But it has a worse effect upon the artist who sells his painting. Having an eye to the Art Union prizeholders, he has put an enormous price on his production, because he is just as likely to get it as a smaller one. Judges do not buy his pictures; but others do; and the prizeholder must give the full price, or else return part of it into the reserve fund of the society. We happen to know a case, when a young artist asked £200 for a picture exhibited in the Royal Academy, purposely to catch the Art Union prizeholder—a work to which, had a dealer bought it, he would gladly have taken £50. He sold his picture; and it so elated him, that his works had such prices put on them that he never sold any more. He is now in one of our colonies, taking portraits, and earning a very fair living; but a great or even a talented artist he never will be.

The pictures, also, on account of the advertisement which their exhibition affords, are obliged to be exhibited, and therefore to be chosen from exhibitions of the current year. Artists are not, consequently, allowed to paint upon commission; but, if they were permitted to do so, surely something more creditable might be obtained. In a word, as a purpose of art education for the spread of taste, this society is a dead failure; and, although it undoubtedly gets rid of a great many pictures, still there is not one out of the one hundred and ninety nine exhibited, for which we would give—and we believe there is no professional person in London would—half the price which the artist has obtained for it. From this censure we may, however, except three; and also the lithograph by Maguire; and the whole of the terracotta models, from 175 to 199, both inclusive.

A hasty run through the gallery will, we have no doubt, convince the reader of the truth of remarks which, however harsh, have for their aim the advancement of art and the improvement of taste. The society ought, without any hesitation, to remodel their rules; so that it might be an honour, instead of the reverse, to be selected by a prizeholder of the Art Union.

The present exhibition is held in the rooms of the Suffolk Street Gallery. In the great room the first picture which attracts the visitor will be, in all probability (No. 1), "Common Fare," painted by Mr. Sidney Cooper, and selected from the Royal Academy at the very large price of £367 10s. Mr. Cooper is a first-rate artist when combined with Mr. Leas as a landscape painter; but in "Common Fare," which represents a group of the poor, a half-starved donkey on a common, he, to a certain extent, fails. The landscape is unpleasant; the position of the donkey, on the apex of a hillcock in the centre of the picture, being to prominence; and the effect is, on the whole, unpleasant. Parts of the picture are unexceptionable; the sheep are excellently painted. The amount of the prize is £250, the prizeholder having added the remainder.

(No. 13), "Hippo's leaving the Common," by E. Williams, s. p., for which a gentleman has given £200, is a very common specimen of a picture manufactured without the slightest attention to nature; vivid colours and lurid greens being the staple commodity.

(No. 19), "A Scene from the Play of the Hambleback," by A. J. Simons, has, luckily for the artist, fetched £40. Had it to be sold in any sale to-morrow, it might not rise £10.

(No. 21), "The Lady of Sador," by R. S. Lander, R.S.A., has been chosen from the new institution at a price of £50. It bears the quotation from Tennyson:

"But in her web she still delights
To weave the mirror's magic sights."

But it is in reality a thing, but a very ill-drawn one, of homogeneity, with a pretty but unnecessary, to be sure, first mirror. What relation it bears to Tennyson's May Queen we cannot say.

No. 22, which hangs just below, is a contrast in every particular. It is a sweet landscape, "Evening on the Merston, North Wales," with a wild duck lying pickly over the still waters of a lake. The colour and the feeling are both good. The taste exhibited in the choice of this deserves honour to Mr. Allen. The price offered by the artist, Mr. Deane, is twenty pounds.

No. 26, "Gone and Fought," by Dunfield, is a very fine picture, which we noticed when first exhibited. We will particularly call attention to the painting of the blackcock and the partridge. Mr. Cooper, a prizewinner of one hundred pounds, has selected it.

(No. 28), "A Fishing Village," from the coast of Normandy, by J. Wilson, jun., for which Mrs. Saunders has given one hundred and fifty pounds, is a meritorious but by no means a first-class painting.

(No. 31), "The Siesta," by C. Landseer, exhibits a girl lying upon two antique chairs. The position is awkward, and the drawing, especially the foreshortening, not well managed; but on the whole, the picture is more worthy than nine-tenths of the others.

(No. 34), "The Young Boat-builder," is so bad, that it should be gibbeted, not exhibited.

(No. 36), "The Rehearsal of the Village Choir," by F. Underhill, is the production of one, who, with more time and finish, may do much better. The faces of the young girls, whom the music-master is drilling, are very sweet and arch.

(No. 37), exhibits the sort of picture which is likely to be bought by prizeholders. It is of the genteelly pious order. Not that we quarrel with simple piety, but with its theatrical exhibition. It is called the "Mother's Prayer." A lady with a doll-like face, without one atom of devotion in it, watches over her child in bed. It

(No. 68), "The Youthful Hairdresser," exhibits quite as simple an incident; but, from the nature of its treatment, is very much better. A little girl is nailing the wig on a wooden doll, the stolid look of which gives the piece a very comical air. The dress and face of the girl are well painted by the artist, Miss M. A. Cole.

(No. 76), "Keeping Guard," by J. Hardy, jun., is interesting and well painted, with the exception of the sky, which is exceedingly murky and heavy. A dog is watching by some game, which his master has deposited near him.

(No. 84), "The Monastic Life of the Emperor Charles V.," exhibits great knowledge of drawing and a good eye for colour and arrangement. The present little picture is but a sketch, and some crudeness must therefore be pardoned. The picture is decidedly the best ten-guinea prize in the exhibition.

(No. 90), "The Brunette and the Blonde," of course being the portraits of a pale young lady, and of another with a Spanish chocolate complexion, is a work by Mr. R. S. Lander, for which he has been lucky enough to get sixty guineas.

(No. 103), "A Bible Class in a Scotch Parish School examined by a Committee of Presbytery," is one of those pictures which strike you with two subjects for wonder—the one, that it ever got hung in any gallery; the other, and the greater, that having been hung, it ever got sold; the artist mistaking coarse caricature for character, is calculated to touch maternal hearts, and we have no doubt that Mr. Fisher, in selecting it, was guided by his female friends.

(No. 46), "Isola die Pescatori," an Italian landscape, by G. E. Hering, is very meritorious. With the exception of a certain harshness in the shadows, it leaves little to be wished for.

(No. 54), "A Cabin in a Vineyard," has at least a great name to help it, that of Mr. Uwins. We criticised it in our notice of the Royal Academy. A mother who has left her children asleep in the cabane of the garde de vigne, returns to look at them. The figure of the mother is somewhat graceful, but beyond that the picture is nameless and hackadaisical.

(No. 61), "Evening," by E. Williams, sen., is excessively after the manner of a tea-board in its finish and treatment. It bears a great many more marks of manufacture than of study from nature.

(No. 66), "What shall I sing?" instances one of those prettinesses with little meaning and small skill in execution, which, nevertheless, captivate the many. A young lady in a curious dress, a mixture of modern and fancy costume, holds a guitar in her hands, and seems to ask the beholder the question which gives its title. It is perfectly unworthy both of the artist and purchaser.

and being content to exhibit a picture without tone, or finish, or colour, properly so termed, in it.

But we will not detain the reader any longer. The water-colour department of the exhibition is perhaps a little better than that of the oil paintings; the best amongst them being "A Head of a Roman Monk" (No. 186), by Carl Haag, to which we called attention in our notice of the Water-colour Society. The statuettes are much more creditable, especially "The Dancing Girl reposing" (198), and (199) "Innocence," after an original by Foley.

The print, to which subscribers are entitled next year, is not worthy even of the Art Union; the artist, Mr. J. J. Chalon, seldom producing anything worthy of engraving, and, in this instance, Mr. Willmore, the engraver, by no means doing what he should have done. Any one familiar with the works of Woollett will at once see what a tremendous distance there is between the water which he represented, buoyant, sparkling, and deep, and the heavy graver and point lines of Mr. Willmore, which look like nothing in nature and little in art. The thirty wood engravings, illustrative of "Childe Harold," promise much better; but we must decidedly register our opinion, that the Art Union is every year less worthy of its position and of the patronage it obtains. Unless the council makes some very great efforts towards improvement, the sooner it gets replaced, or extinct, the better for British art.

JOHN ASSELYN.

THERE is in Switzerland a charming writer, whose productions have all the perfume of the land in which he dwells, and all the suavity and bombance of the simple and good pastor of his flock.

His leisure hours are not spent in contriving gross satires, written with a pen dipped in Egyptian darkness, in the style of the bitter old monk of Meudon. No! he is no modern Rabelais. His gray

Excellent Topffer! may your name be more widely known, and your books be everywhere appreciated? This observing man has spoken sometimes of art; and thus does he tell of his humours and fancies.

"I select a Landscape by Asselyn. A matter of taste. This master is so sweet, so amiable, so redolent of all that is smiling and peaceful in country life. In the foreground we have a miniature strand, and some cattle drinking in the waters of a river. Goats, mares, even donkeys, are covered by the shadow of a bridge, the unequal arches of which support layers, now of blocks, now of hewn stone, some covered by plaster or cement, some concealed under tufts of grass. On the edge of the horizon the sky shines with all the temperate brightness of a beautiful evening; above, clouds fringed with gold float in a calm and deep azure. This picture has been really painted; and it is a masterpiece. Does the place it represents exist? I know not, and I do not care; for if it does not exist entire, every one of its lovely details are real and true copies of nature in her sunniest moods."

The writer of the above passage, which in the original is charming, has himself painted a picture in so many words. In so doing, he has not sought to make the painter subordinate to nature; he has rather given the man a power over nature. If it is this great power which furnishes the subject, and even more than the subject—the inspiration, still the artist must have felt and understood the inspiration. "Without Asselyn," he tells us, "nature would display her whole store of beauties, would look indeed in the warm and genial sun; but all this would be neither felt nor expressed. Without Asselyn it exists; but the peaceful, the gentle, the amiable—who will impregnate us with it?—With it him the canvas may be a view, but not a picture."

* Topffer, "Reflexions et Menus propos d'un Peintre Genevois, précédées d'une notice par Albert Aubert." Paris, 1848.

Topler loved nature; he, like the poet would cry

"I care not, Fortune, what you may deny,
You cannot rob me of free Nature's grace;
You cannot shut the windows of the sky,
Through which Aurora shows her bright'ning face;
You cannot bar my constant feet to trace
The wood and lawn, by living streams at eye
To health my nerves and limber fibres brace,
And I their toys to the great children leave,
Of fancy, reason, virtue thought can ne'er deprave."

None but masters ever inspire in the refined the thoughts which we have noted above, or raise any question important or interesting to art. Asselyn was a master—decidedly not of the first order of merit—but so pleasant, so agreeable, as Topler says, so lively in love with rural beauties, so luminous in his execution, that we must give him a place in the history of landscape between Claude Lorraine and Both, of Italy; and, in the history of animal painting, between Karel Dujardin and Bandoche. It will scarcely be credited by those who have at all extended their researches in art, that the name of Asselyn is not even mentioned in Descamps. Houbraken just alludes to him, and that is all. As for the other biographers, they have fallen into innumerable errors on the point. Some say that he is a pupil of Jehu Miel, some of Israh Vander-yelde. Hauns, in his chronological table of painters, fixes his birth in the year 1567; D'Argenville makes him born in Holland, about 1610. In the midst of all these uncertainties, what appears to those who have examined into the matter in modern times most likely and reasonable, from every indication and known fact, is, that he was born in Holland, about 1610, and that he was the pupil of Israh Vander-yelde, who doubtless taught him to paint battles, which, as we shall see, was one of his peculiarities. This inference we are led to draw from a passage of Sandrart, who knew Asselyn personally, and whose testimony appears to be incontestable. His words are: "Inter Amstelredamensis sublimium pictores valde celebris erat tunc quondam episcopus, quoniam admodum animalium hominumque figuras et quodlibet pictor. Disipulis enim fuit Isaac de Velde, artifex in hoc pingendi genere opti. Hinc comitis habebat?"* Elsewhere Sandrart speaks of Amsterdam as the country of Asselyn: In urbe patris Amstelredamensis†.

We are able to say with tolerable certainty, that Asselyn started at a very early age for Italy, that he travelled much, and lived for a long time at Rome, where the community of painters of his own country gave him the surname of Crabbi (which in Dutch means little crab), because he had a twisted hand and crooked fingers. It is a remarkable fact that this minced dwarf had an easy and ready touch—a pencil remarkable for its lightness and elegance. But, surrounded by so many masters, he fell upon two whose manner seduced him at once. These were Claude Lorraine and Bandoche. The mixture is singular; and it is rather difficult to conceive of the man who could have a passion for any two artists so dissimilar. One, grave and solemn, devoted to the study of light, and the more solemn phases of landscape; the other, from taste, a student of the crooked and the tapering—a painter who dashed upon the canvases of the humour of a tavern with a post beside a buffoon. But so it was with Asselyn. He was thus able to satisfy at the same time the impulse he felt for representing Italian nature and the natural taste which, as a Dutchman, he had for the ordinary things of life; especially "The parlor splendours of that festive place,

The whitewash'd wall, the nicely sandal floor,
The varnish'd clock that creak'd behind the door;

* "Among Amsterdam painters of out-door scenes he was very celebrated for his figures of horses as well as of other animals and men, and for battle. He was a pupil of Isaac De Velde, an artist in this style of painting, who lived at the Hague."

† "Academia nobilissima artis pictoriæ, Norimbergæ, 1685." Florent Levoite says that Asselyn was surnamed Petits-Jean, because of his small stature. Hence many writers have confounded Asselyn with Petit-Jean of Holland, an artist who also painted landscapes with very minute figures. But D'Argenville observes that this painter, whose surname was Bellon, died at Rome before the year 1651. He must, then, be confounded with Asselyn.

The chest contriv'd a double debt to pay
A bed by night, a chest of drawers by day;
The pictures placed for ornament and use,
The twelve good rules, the royal game of goos,
The hearth, except when winter chill'd the day,
With aspen boughs, and flowers, and fennel gay,
While broken tea-cups, wisely kept for show,
Ranged on the chimney, glisten'd in a row."

Following in this respect the example of Claude, Asselyn spent much of his time wandering about the environs of Rome; not so much to study and note the objects or the sun upon the country, as to draw some of the noble ruins he met with at every step, and which he laid by as subjects to be introduced at a future time into his landscapes. Whether it was that he possessed a more intuitive and grand conception of nature—one more elevated and sublime than belongs in general to the artists of the Low Countries—or whether it was that association with Claude Lorraine had elevated his ideas, Asselyn at once showed himself possessed of a style which did not wholly prevent him from retaining his Dutch manière. These ruined monuments of Roman power were observed and studied by him under every phase and intonation of light, at every hour of the day; but in preference, when the sun shone in all its brilliancy. He knew them by heart. Opening his mind to the poetry of ruins, he attached himself from choice to those which remind us of the great deeds of history—the events of the heroic era. Here he would find a vestige of the home of Cæsar's venerable ruins—where trees have taken root and have spread their green boughs over the disjointed stones. There he would fall upon some arches of the ancient aqueduct of Frascati, which conducted water to the palace of Augustus. Further on, he would discover and sit for hours before the temple of the Tiburtine Sybil at Tivoli—a circular temple, still supported by mutilated columns, the Corinthian capitals of which have lost their acanthus.

The ruins of the Amphitheatre of Marcellus, known familiarly as the Coliseum, and which the Frenchman, Jacques Gillot, was then engaged in engraving with his learned and admirable point, were portrayed by Asselyn many times in all their majesty—that is to say, with their decorations of verdure, with those thousand flowers and shrubs which have started up on the steps of the amphitheatre, there, where once a gladiator expired and the roars of the brutal populace. When examining with an artistic eye the representations of the artist, we feel that poetry alone can render the beauty either of the reality or the copy. Both in presence of the picture and the ruins, who would fail to recollect the oft-quoted lines of Byron, which we scarcely make any apology for transcribing, so wonderful is the affinity between the Dutch artist's melody tints and the noble author's suggestive words!

"But when the rising moon begins to climb
Its topmost arch, and gently pauses here;
When the stars twinkle through the loops of time,
And the low night-breeze waves along the air
The gordian forest, which the gray walls wear,
Like laurel on the bald first Cæsar's head,
When the light shines serene, but doth not glare,
Then in this magic circle rise the dead!
Heroes have trod this spot—'tis on their dust ye tread.

A ruin—yet what ruin? From its mass
Walls, palaces, half cities, have been reared;
Yet oft the enormous skeleton ye pass,
And marvel where the spoil could have appeared.
Hath it indeed been plundered, or been cleared?
Alas! developed, open to decay,
When the colossal fabric's form is marred,
It will not bear the brightness of the day,
Which streams too much on all your ruin have reit away."

Chateaubriand appears to have before him a picture of Asselyn, when he says, in his "Travels in Italy," "I took refuge in the Hall of the Baths, near the Pæstus, under a fig-tree which had overthrown a wall by its growth. In a little octagonal hall a vine pierced the vault of the ceiling, and its great, smooth, red, and crooked stem, climbed along the wall like a huge serpent. Around me everywhere, through these avenues of ruins, I saw beautiful all Upper Italy. We, however, have no precise information as to the time when he visited Venice, but it appears likely that it was about 1643 or 1644. As he was proceeding on his way towards his own country, he passed through Lyons, which was then a city that abounded in painters and amateurs. The eagerness of the latter to pay their court to him, and also to buy his numerous pictures and drawings, kept him a long time in that celebrated city. Luckily for him, the innumerable treasures of his portfolio, the studies he had confided to his memory and his talent, gave him every opportunity of satisfying his admirers without copying himself.

Here it was that Asselyn felt the power of love, of true love

“Founded on reason, loyal, just and pure;”

he had been tempted to yield to the blandishments of the young German nymphs, but this passion “Swift as a shadow, short as a dream, Brief as the lightning in the collied night,” passed away. Not so in Lyons. Here he met with one Houwart Koorman, a merchant of Antwerp, who had two pretty daughters.

blue tones of Breughel* and Roland Savery. Jacques Pinas, the master of Rembrandt, and Rembrandt himself, had accustomed the Dutch to effects of landscape which were rather fantastical. The manner of Asselyn, which was that of Claude, must have necessarily surprised and delighted the schools of Holland, that had never seen so much light either in nature or in pictures. They were in utter darkness as to the lands where were to be seen—

“Those blazing suns that dart a downward ray,
And fiercely shed intolerable day;
Those matted woods where birds forget to sing,
But silent bats in drowsy clusters cling,
There poisonous fields with rank luxuriance crown'd,
Where the dark scorpion gathers death around;
Where at each step the stranger fears to wake
The rattling terrors of the vengeful snake;
Where crouching tigers wait their hapless prey,
And savage men, more murderous still than they;
While oft in whirls the mad tornado flies,
Mingling the ravaged landscape with the skies.”

THE CAVALIER.—FROM A PAINTING BY ASSELYN.

More fortunate than the pilgrims of the Venetian plains, the daughters of Koorman, who had placed themselves under the protection of Lucina, both found husbands. The elder had already married a painter of the Low Countries, Nicolas of Helbt-Stocade, whom Asselyn had known at Venice. He himself married the younger daughter in 1645, and the two brothers-in-law returned together to Holland with their pretty wives. “This is what Genoels tells me,” says Houbraken, “having himself heard it from the lips of Laurent Franck, an historical painter, who lodged at that time in the house of the said Houwart at Lyons, with Artus Ludinne, who was the author of the admirable sculptures so much admired at the Maison de Ville of Amsterdam.”

The productions of Jean Asselyn made a very great impression on the general world of amateurs. Their novelty pleased them. Their clear and fresh tints appeared all the more charming because they contrasted in a most unexpected manner with the crude and wild green of Paul Brill, with the no less crude and no less wild

And as at the same time, Herman Swanevelt and Jean Both returned from Italy, the rays of the great sun of Claude Lorraine illumined all the painting of the North, until the great and excellent Ruysdael, casting over the fields and meadows the melancholy and sombre veil of his genius, made them feel what hidden poetry there was in the absence of the sun and in nature covered as by a funeral pall. Ruysdael was the opposite of Claude, and with Young could cry

“Let Indians, and the gay, like Indians, fond Of feather'd fopperies, the sun adore;
Darkness has more divinity for me!
It strikes thought inward, it drives back the soul
To settle on herself our point supreme;
Here lies our theatre; there sits our judge.
Darkness the curtain drops o'er life's dull scene;

* “THE WORKS OF EMINENT MASTERS,” vol. ii. p. 33.

'Tis the kind hand of Providence stretch'd out,
 'Twixt man and vanity; 'tis reason's reign,
 And virtue's too; these tutelary shades
 Are man's asylum from the tainted throng."

What proves, in a very marked manner, the pitch of fashion and favoritism to which Asselyn had reached in Amsterdam, to use the florid expression of D'Argenville, we may mention, that Rembrandt, who was either painting or engraving the portraits of all the celebrated men of his country, executed an etching of Asselyn, which has come down to posterity as one of the best and most precious productions of that great master. Asselyn is represented in the bust, one hand on his hip, the other clenched, and leaning on a table, where are placed his palette and his books. He wears a high hat, pointed and peculiar, which by no means resembles those of Clement de Jonghe, of Anslou, and the other portraits of Rembrandt—an Italian hat, of which, doubtless, our by titles and claims never to be forgotten. Without any very striking originality, his landscapes are yet to be distinguished at the first glance from all the masters whose influence he felt, or whose manners he voluntarily imitated. If he is compared with Claude Lorraine, whom he almost directly copies, we see at once that he differs from him in style while even copying the same effects of light, the same sites. Claude copies everything that he touches; he interprets nature, giving it at the same time some of his own personal grandeur. His trees are not only those oaks and elms and larches which he may have drawn in the gardens of some picturesque villa; they become rounded, are contrasted, wavy in outline, not exactly as they are seen in nature, but as the painter would have planted and disposed them. Imagine the gardens of a Crystal Palace, with trees planted and fixed in positions by the hand of Claude Lorraine. Edifices, terraces, figures, sky, the heaven—there is nothing in Claude but what recall-artist had adopted the fashion of Rome. While at the same time giving his model a free-and-easy air, Rembrandt has very cleverly contrived to disguise the deformed hands and crooked fingers of Craquelin, so that he has made very good use of a defect which would have puzzled many other painters. The background of the picture represents an easel, on which rests a landscape with some buildings worked in. This easel serves to show us which are the original proofs—that is, the proofs before letters. They are very rare.

To return to our landscape painter, we cannot but believe that it was a piece of good fortune for him to have his portrait painted by the hand of Rembrandt. It was the province and the peculiar glory of that great man, to immortalise those whose portraits he either engraved or painted. Who would have ever heard, in these utilitarian days, even of Abraham France, of the burgomaster Six, or of Coppel, if they had not been the friends of Rembrandt? Asselyn, however, made himself better remembered by posterity at antique times—the days of Saturn and of Rhea. Asselyn, on the other hand, accepted naively the great impression produced by Italian landscape; and he, too, produced in his pictures the lovely and luminous effects. Incapable of rising to the ideal conceptions of the French painter, the reality sufficed to him; he simply admired the beauty of those Roman solitudes, where ruins cluster in every corner; he allowed those eloquent ruins to speak for themselves; and finding them, doubtless, poetical enough, he did not need to add to them the poetry of his own mind. How would it be possible to gaze with a calm and indifferent eye upon those distant remains, crowned with wild flowers, and wrapped in the mists of evening, if you could believe that you were gazing at the roof of Cleopatra's house, or the remains of the baths of Messalina at Tivoli? If never this may be, it is, above all, in the figures introduced into his pictures that Asselyn differs from his master. Those that fill his landscapes are, above all, modern, and like those we see peopling the rugged roads of Bath or Italy, or the works of Bamboche, and in some of the engravings of Berghem. Here it is a peasant in his sheep-skin cloak—like some Greek or Hungarian shepherd—driving an ass before him; a traveller on horseback hurrying on to reach the distant inn; or a herdsman crossing a ford with his flock, and about to seek the pasturage which may be seen at the foot of yon pretty hills, of which the wavy lines are lost in the distant horizon. And, while speaking of the figures of Asselyn, we may be allowed to reproduce the singular remark of a French critic, to the effect that, when they do not play the principal part in his picture, they may almost always be seen turning their backs to the painter, as if they were about to fly into the recesses of the picture, to hide themselves in its far-distant gloom.

We have already remarked, in an early paragraph of our present notice, that Asselyn painted battle-scenes in the style of Isaiah Vandervele, his first master. When he came back from Italy, he brought with him the rough and merry manner of Bamboche, which was so well adapted to this style of subject. It appears from a passage in Sandrart, that the amateurs of Venice, Lyons, and Amsterdam, asked him on several occasions to paint battle-pieces, doubtless with a view to combine in one picture all the excellences of so able an artist. Sandrart himself possessed one of these pictures, representing the Solaris bridge, near Rome, attacked by the Croats, and defended by horsemen covered by steel armour. Sandrart speaks highly of this picture, full of life and motion and truth. D'Argenville adds that we may readily accept the criticism of a man who was himself a distinguished painter.

If we compare Asselyn to Karel Dujardin, whom he resembles very much, we shall discover, on critical examination, that the sentiment of Asselyn is less profound, less intimate. Asselyn rarely goes beyond the exterior of things, and sticks to the taste for surface, and to varied effect, and this is the reason why he is so struck with the appearances of light. Actually burning under the heat of the sun, the country appears to him magnificent, imposing, but utterly devoid of mystery. Less grand in the whole, Karel Dujardin is more complete and admirable in his details. He allures us for whole hours by useless, but charming and seductive, nothings. He interests us in a thistle, which a little donkey is enjoying with supreme delight; and sometimes we find quite unexpectedly that he has thrown his whole soul into some at first unnoticed corner of his picture. There are, however, certain points in which the two masters resemble one another very much, which only proves with irresistible force how true both are to nature. We allude more particularly to those representations of the picturesque scenes which may be noted at the entrance of Italian inns. The stone staircase is on the outside, as often happens in hot countries; down these steps we see a Maritonne descending with refreshments for the travellers, who are cracking their rude jokes with the chamber-girl. One has remained in the saddle, and is drinking out of a pitcher; the other is arranging or plaiting the bridle of his horse, while waiting for the wine which is being fetched. The children of the house stare with open eyes at the fine gentlemen and their handsome steeds. Add to this a vine which runs up over the stairs, and then an Italian sky, and you will have a delicious picture, which might be signed either by Karel or Asselyn.

How at home Asselyn would then have been, had he visited the sunny lands of the East; and what a picture he would have made of such a scene as may be daily gazed at in some of the outskirts of certain Turkish cities, where "a large gateway," says a recent traveller, "generally forms the entrance to the gardens of these dwellings, having on each side of it stone seats capable of containing, perhaps, a dozen persons; and here the family sit at sunset regularly every evening, if the weather permit. I was much struck with this custom the first time I visited the village, as, in riding through its whole range, I saw on either side, at every gate, groups of well-dressed people, of which the greater proportion were females, and who greeted us as we passed, as Mr. Whitthall, an English merchant, to whose house I was proceeding, was known to all; therefore, salutations of recognition were exchanged with every family from each side of the road, as we continued our course toward our destination. From the balconies of some of these agreeable country seats, the view is exquisite; beneath you lies the garden, consisting of plants of the most varied and richest foliage that fancy could have flung together; some they have whose leaves are of the deepest crimson, which contrasts beautifully with the pale-yellow and light-green, which twine themselves together and climb up the trellises, which form a sort of awning round the lower parts of the mansion; masses of beds of flowers display a bright variegated carpet, which compose a groundwork from which rise, somewhat higher, the rich and spreading vine, with its purple, clustering treasures, which, in big profusion, are seen reeling to the earth; then the dark-green orange and lemon trees, with their bright fruit, looking like spots of sunshine glittering amongst the shade; above, in broad clumps, the timber-trees extend their round masses, occasionally broken by the dark, melancholy cypress rearing their pyramidal heads, sometimes, in the distance even to the clouds."

Bryan says of Asselyn, that his pictures were in the style of Berghem. "His pencil is remarkably firm and neat, and the trees and plants are touched with great sharpness and spirit. His pictures are highly esteemed, and are worthy a place in the choicest collections."

Asselyn, despite the charm and grace of his pictures, is not counted in the list of precious masters. We mean that he is not one of those painters whose productions go on always increasing in price, such as Vandervele, Wouvermans, Both, Ruysdael, Claude Lorraine; but he holds an honourable position in museums and in private collections.

In the Museum of the Louvre are the following works of his:

1. "View of the Lamentoso Bridge, on the Teverone." A woman mounted on an ox, conversing with another woman, is about to ford the river. Several animals are also crossing.

2. "A Landscape" (p. 81); a tower, surrounded by trees and built on a rock, overlooks a river. At the foot of the rock is a muleteer discharging two mules; near him is a galley-slave pointing to two barks. In the foreground a man with a dog, carrying a packet. An excellent effect of the setting sun.

3. "View on the Tiber" (p. 92). To the left (reversed in the engraving), a mass of rocks. In the background a bridge with four arches, protected by a tower, and ending in an eminence with buildings on the summit. Herdsmen mounted, one upon an ox, another on an ass, pass the river. The effects of light and shade in this picture are excellent.

4. "A Ruin in the neighbourhood of Rome." Two herdsmen are seated by the side of a hut, erected at the foot of an aqueduct in ruins. Near them are some goats and sheep.

This picture and the preceding were in "the Cabinet of Love," painted by Lesueur, at the hotel Lambert, says the catalogue of the Louvre, prepared by the conservator Villet.

In the museum of Amsterdam is to be seen a very singular picture, painted by Asselyn. It is an emblematical composition, intended to immortalise the zeal and vigilance of the great pensioner John de Witt. It represents a swan defending her nest against the approach of a great dog; an allusion to the person and name of De Witt.

The museum of Brussels has an "Italian Landscape." This is a very fine picture, full of light and richly adorned by the human figure.

The Pinacothek Museum of Munich has a "Landscape with Figures." It represents an Italian view with buildings. Some travellers on horseback enjoy this excellent picture.

Berlin Museum. "A Seaport," signed J. A.

In the Bridgewater Gallery is "A View on the Tiber, with a lofty bridge." Herdsmen and flocks are about to pass the river by the ford.

Neither the National Gallery nor Hampton Court contains any pictures by Asselyn. They are rare also in the rich collections which exist in this country.

Asselyn never engraved himself, and it is to be regretted. But he has been successfully engraved by several, and especially by Perelle, who has given us the following subjects.

"Remains of the Aqueduct of Frascati, which carried water to

* "In pinacotheca mea ipsius manu elaboratum habet potent Solarium, prope Romam, qui a cataphractis custodibus equitibus, a Croatis oppugnatur, ubi velutatio quam proximè ad veritatem accedens summam curam exhibita est."

the Palace of Augustus?" "The Grotto of Aqueductelle, where Charles V. erected a table?" "A View of the Coliseum or Amphitheatre of Marcellus?" "Ruins of the Temples of Marius?" "Temple of the Tiburtine Sybil at Tivoli." "Remains of the House of Cicero?" "View on the Tiber (remains of the Sabine bridge and the Santo Paulo gate)."

Claessens engraved the "Horseman in the Cave," already alluded to in this notice.

Weisbrod engraved a piece representing "Travellers passing under a Roof of Masonry."

The pictures of Asselyn are very seldom to be found in public sales. The prices they have fetched in public and celebrated sales in times past are worth recording.

At the sale Blondel de Gagny, in 1776. "A Landscape." To the right and the left are to be seen houses and rocks. In the foreground is a woman dressed in blue, mounted on a white horse, with eight other figures. £98.

Neyman sale in 1776. Two fine pictures by Asselyn. "The Remains of the Temple of Peace at Rome," and its fellow picture, drawn in Indian ink, with elegant figures. £116.

Sale of the Prince de Conti, 1777. "A Landscape." In the foreground is to be seen a woman, who pours water out of a wooden bowl. She is on horseback, and the horse is drinking out of a trough. £48.

"A Landscape" and "A Seaport," with figures and animals. These pictures, according to the catalogue, were richly composed and very fine in colour. £36 4s.

Two "Landscapes," on copper; one of them representing Tobias and the Angel. £36.

The sale of Randon de Boisset, 1777. Two "Landscapes." In one, a woman on a mule holding a bird. Next to her, a woman who is pulling on his stocking. To the right, cows and sheep in the water. In the other, two oxen, a bull, and a dog on the banks of a stream. £189.

The Sale Laperriere, 1817. "A Seaport." To the right an arched door in ruins. In the centre, the figures of several figures coloured in an agreeable manner. £44. "A Country Scene," in which a lady and cavalier, seated on the ground, are introduced. The latter held his horse by the bridle. Behind them is a servant with a loaded ass. £16.

Sale of the Duchess de Berry, 1837. "Ruins of an ancient bath, seen from an arch, under which is passing a peasant leading a horse and an ass. A young girl is leading a river, led by a little boy by the hand." £44.

Sale of Cardinal Fesch, 1845. "The Baths of Mæcenas at Tivoli." The spectator sees a covered path, a little fountain falling in a cascade into an antique sarcophagus. £33.

"The Road across the Rock." Under a spacious vault, a rick, a peasant drives before him a loaded horse and ass, to load them to a ford, which a herdsmen and two cows are already crossing. £65.

"The Watering place" (p. 85), is an excellent specimen of the style of this painter. The scene is on the Tiber.

Asselyn seldom signed his name to his pictures.

HERCULES BETWEEN VIRTUE AND VICE.

FROM A PAINTING BY LAIRESSE, IN THE GALLERY.

We have already spoken of Gerard de Lairese, who was surnamed the Dutch Poëssin. The picture we now present by this artist is a very excellent specimen of his style. It is a familiar subject, and one which tells its own story. The fable, as given by Xenophon and Cicero from Prodicus, a disciple of Protagoras and native of Ceos, who lived about 400 B.C., runs thus:—Hercules, the celebrated hero of antiquity, when still young, and but newly his own master, lay recumbent in a solitary position, musing on the prospect of life which lay before him. Suddenly, while his thoughts were thus bent upon his fortune, two women of majestic mien presented themselves before him. One, who combined noble simplicity of manners with beauty, struck him almost with awe. She had no tricks of ornament about her. She was simply clothed in white. The other wore all the appearance of one accustomed to luxury and ease, while her face was covered with paint, and her hair full of perfume. With a proud and haughty walk, with impudent looks, and adorned by every art of the toilette, she seemed bent on admiring her own person, and gazed upon herself in the water as in a mirror. When they both came to within a short distance of Hercules, the first advanced towards him with a grave and solemn step, but was quickly passed by the other.

"Hercules," said she, "you do not seem to know what road to take. Make me your friend, and I will lead you by a gentle and easy road. You shall want no pleasures and know no pain."

"And what is your name?" said Hercules.

"My friends," replied the beautiful temptress, "call me Pleasure. My enemies, who calumniate me, call me Vice."

"Listen to me, Hercules," said the other woman. "I know whence you come, and who you are. Your education has revealed your character. I hope, then, if you follow my road, that you may shine among great men by your virtues and your mighty deeds, and that by so doing you will give renewed brightness to my name. It is labour, industry, and self-denial that make life happy and bright. If you would have the gods propitious, bow to the gods. If you wish to be loved by your friends, be generous and noble. If you ask for honours, be useful to your fellow-citizens.

If you wish all Greece to admire you, be useful to all Greece. If you would have the earth bring you forth good fruit, cultivate it. If you would increase your flocks, watch them carefully. If you desire a robust and vigorous frame, practise temperance and habituate yourself to fatigue. If you a pine to rule your fellow men, obtain the mastery over your own passion."

"See you not," said Pleasure, "how difficult is this road? That by which I would lead you through life is smooth and strewn with flowers. Follow me to happiness."

"Be silent, wretch!" cried Virtue. "Of what happiness do you speak? What pleasures are known to you other than to eat before hunger is felt, to drink before thirst is known, to seek the couch of luxury, not for repose, but for the indulgence of illness? These are pleasures of the senses only, indulgence in which sinks man below the level of the brute creation. Your votaries, instructed by your pernicious lessons, pass their days in sloth and inactivity, and their nights in guilty pleasures, which enervate alike the mind and body. A youth of voluptuous illness is succeeded by a painful and premature old age, when palsied limbs, bleared eyes, weakened brain, and the stings of unavailing remorse, show the fearful price at which your boasted pleasures are purchased by your deluded followers. Those who know you avoid your society; while mine is sought by all the good and great, by all who wish to live and die happy and respected. The humblest of my followers is happier than the most elevated of yours. It is I who give happiness to the domestic circle; true nobility to the humble; to the great their most meritorious distinction; to friendship a true more search. It is I who cause youth to be regarded with pleasure by old age, and old age to receive the respect of youth. Those who take me for their guide never fail to obtain the favour of the gods, the affection of their friends, and the homage of their fellow-citizens; and when at last the period arrives when the soul must leave its mortal tenement, they surrender life with calmness and resignation, looking to their reward in everlasting felicity."

Hercules listened attentively, and his decision was then made. He rejected Pleasure, and followed in the track of Virtue.

FRANCIS DE PAULA FERG.*

"You are aware, sir," says Hagedorn, in his letter to an amateur of painting, "of the talents of this famous painter, of his power of representing figures of a small size, those German dancing-pieces, where a multitude of people occupy themselves in gazing on a quack mounted upon the platform of a theatre. Sometimes the painter represents, just as you may have noticed in the pieces of this cabinet, some architectural ruin, white marble and its crevices expressed with extreme delicacy; sometimes a pyramid and neighbouring wall, with a door leading to a long arcade. Here, again, is a fountain surrounded by muleteers, who lead their mules and their horses to the water; one restive or kicking, the other trotting gently along with a village girl on the saddle, who presses her child in her arms, and chats familiarly with her travelling companions; there, in a corner of the foreground of the picture, a young shepherd chats with a shepherdess, who has left her sheep to their own guidance, or to that of a mischievous little wren, who torments a dog; and, as if to prove that there are troublesome people everywhere, even in pictures, the village lovers are disturbed by a passer-by, who asks the way."

From this animated and living description, a very tolerable idea may be formed of the talent and manner of Francis de Paula Ferg, a clever painter, very little known in France, and not even very popular in England, but very much esteemed in Germany. He was born at Vienna, the 2nd of May, 1689, and received the ordinary college education. He had almost concluded his studies when his father, Panerace Ferg, a very mediocre painter, placed him in the hands of one of his colleagues, named Baschnaber, at

* There is no known portrait of this master. The authenticity of that engraved in 1767 by J. P. Baase is contested, though it bears on it "Franciscus Ferg, se ipse pinxit Dresdae."

Wienerish-Neustadt. The selection of the father did not prove of very great service to the son, and it is really wonderful that the natural and rising talent of Francis de Paula was not wholly stifled; for his master turned out to be but a dauber, who employed him only in rough and coarse work, and taught him rather to sneer than to paint. Ferg accordingly wasted four years in the house of the painter of Neustadt; but his father, having his eyes opened, at last recalled him. It is rare that the education of artists has not been interfered with or falsified by their parents. Though a painter himself, Pamerace Ferg did not comprehend the natural taste of his son, and destined him for the higher branch of historic

Sometimes he delighted in introducing peckey, horses, and sumpter animals into the centre of a back yard full of fowls. Landscape, with him, was in general the accessory. Ferg, who was very fond of this style, and did not consider it secondary to that which he adopted, went to one of the most celebrated landscape painters in Germany, Joseph Orient, took him for a master, and, in order the better to profit by his lessons, dwelt in his house. No one could have gone to a better school. Joseph Orient combined with a lively sentiment of nature a poetical invention, which remains one sometimes of Hermann Zalt Leven, and a liking for a style which led him turn towards the heroic landscapes of Goussier. However the painting. This was in exact opposition to the inclinations and aptitudes of Francis de Paula. He had a natural leaning to familiar subjects and small figures. The studies he liked best were the engravings of Chollot and Sébastien Leclerc, who inspired him, moreover, with a taste for line engraving, in which he was destined to excel. But as he must first learn to paint, he entered the studio of a master well known in Vienna for his little figures, named Hans Graf, whose influence over his new pupil was decisive.

Hans Graf succeeded very well in faithful pictures. He was admirable for representing great tails in little pictures. He could people a public place, and express the moving humour of a crowd.

may be, his studies in the mountains of Tyrol had imbued him with a certain savage taste and an original grandeur, which may be up in some measure for what he afterwards learned the conventions of the schools. Orient himself painted the same little figures in his landscapes; but as he was so fond that he took a great deal of time with it, so he was so fond that he wished he had recourse to the pencil of his pupil, that by an unexpected interchange of services between the pupil and his master, Ferg painted figures in the pictures of Orient, while Orient taught him how to frame his little personages in a landscape, but it is a mere select character and not a take with a fancy for travelling. He started from Vienna at the age of thirty-one, and his master, from whom Hagedorn derived all the preceding information, brought him along with him. It appears that he travelled through Germany, and stopped at the court of Bamberg, in Franconia, where his work found many admirers. Ferg, passing through Leipzig, met with a painter of Brühl, Alexander Thiele, a well-known landscape-painter, who had had to retire from nature the finest views in Saxony. Thiele was painter to the court of Dresden. He invited his comrade to come and live at Dresden with him; and, in order to induce him to do so, offered him half his salary. Ferg accepted this proposition, the more readily because Thiele could teach, and this was a bond of union between them; while the landscape painter of Brühl doubtless saw an advantage in associating himself with a comrade from whom he could pick figures with which to enrich his landscapes.

Ferg lived seven years at Dresden with Thiele; and, in fact, he often painted animals and figures on the canvases of his friends. The consequence has been, that the landscapes of Thiele—those at all events that he painted at that time, though somewhat too brown—are more sought after than those of his comrade, because of the traces which are given of the assistance of Paul Ferg. After a residence of five or six years at Dresden and in Lower Saxony, Ferg started for England, and established himself in London, and there entered into the bonds of marriage, without deriving any happiness therefrom. At first fortune appeared to be favourable to him, and amateurs, on account of the extreme finish which characterised his works, paid him a price in proportion to the time he had spent over his work. But no sooner did his domestic affairs turn out unfortunate, and the marriages of foreigners to English women, and the cause, generally do, than he became the prey of that race of false amateurs who, taking advantage of the distress of an artist, give themselves very cheaply the airs of a Macanus, and crush under their pretended protection, the wretch who believes himself bound to give them gratitude and thanks, despite their meanness.

The painter, discouraged, painted very little or very slowly. Ferg became at last invisible even to the amateur, whose sincere generosity might have drawn him from the sad situation in which he lived. We are told that he was found dead one morning, sitting before the door of the house in which he lived, to which he returned, it appeared, on the eve, so weak and exhausted, that he had not the strength to strike or to cry loud enough to make himself heard. The date of his death is not exactly known. It is fixed by some about 1740.

Ferg lived about fifteen years in London; and so long a residence in a country, and among a people so different from all others," says one of his biographers, could not but have much effect in mollifying his manner. Curious critics have certainly discovered this distinction, which is not wholly arbitrary. He became transparent, clear, and fair. There were some of the engravings of Ferg in his English style, in a famous cabinet, probably that of the Count of Brühl—the description of which gave rise to the "Historic Elucidations" of Hagedorn. These pictures were on copper, and had on the back the mark of the painter.

Bayan says: "He visited England in 1718, where his pleasing style, and the agreeable subject of his pictures, brought him into immediate employment. Ferg passed twenty years in this country, and might have lived in affluence and respectability; but an imprudent marriage involved him in difficulties, and kept him in continual indigence. He is reported to have been found dead in the street, near the door of his lodging, according to the anecdote, about the year 1738." M. Dechamps, in 1740, says: "The landscape of Ferg are of very agreeable scenery, enriched with architectural ruins in a very picturesque style, and bear some resemblance to the works of Berghem. His small figures are carefully drawn, and very delicately touched." Other critics say:

It would be difficult to point out, in what respect his pictures resemble Berghem."

Alexander Thiele, having executed some engravings at Dresden, after the departure of Ferg, sent the proofs to him in London, and asked him his opinion of them. Ferg replied, under the date of the 21st of August, 1725—a precious day, because it fixes a time when Ferg was no longer in Germany—that he found the pictures very good, for a beginning, and added that he had serious intentions of executing eight engravings himself the next winter. He kept his word. These eight pieces were engraved with much spirit, and an agreeable and fine point. The frontispiece bears the name of the painter, with this inscription, on a stone: "Capiteci di Fr. Ferg." The little figures are admirably drawn; that is to say, with that clever illuiveness which was needed for such small proportions.

As for his paintings, Ferg certainly merits the first place among artists who have represented a multitude of figures in small pictures. Berni, the well-known fellow-workman of Poussin, and old Mehuert, may be compared to him, but take a position below him. Ferg has the advantage of avoiding, or, at all events, making up for the vulgarity of his subjects by some accessory in good taste. He crowns his ships by excellent buildings, by ruins in an elevated style of art; and his colours, admirably prepared, add to an idea which is not probably poetical, the charm of that velvety brightness which was so much sought after by Wouvermans and Pouchberg. He neither omitted nor neglected any of the happy accidents supplied him by nature. His fountains, his arcades, his remains of columns, are reproduced in his paintings with shades of marble, the transparency of alabaster, the rough solidity of freestone. His touch is substantial, and yet we notice sky lights which bring up the figures and detach the groups one from the other. Hagedorn, who studied Francis Ferg well, observes, that his animals are executed with less finish and ability than his little personages—particularly in an anatomical point of view. "I could wish," he says, "that when representing white horses, he could have studied the variety of Philippe Wouvermans, rather than the evenness of Brouchelet."

There is no doubt that any man who had shown in great things as much talent as Ferg did in little ones, would have taken his position among the distinguished artists of history.

THE VATICAN AND THE ARTISTIC TREASURES OF ITALY.

"Italia! O Italia! thou who hast
The fatal gift of beauty, which became
A funeral dower, of present woes, and past,
On thy sweet brow is sorrow ploughed by shame,
And annals grav'd in characters of flame.
Would that thou wert in this thy nakedness
Less lovely, or more powerful, and couldst claim Thy right, and awe the robbers back, who press
To shed thy blood, and drink the tears of thy distress;
Then might'st thou more appall; or, less desired,
Be homely, and be peaceful, undeplored
For thy destructive charms."—Byron.

Tim, clever author of "The Real and the Ideal,"* a work full of information and valuable matter for reflection, says: "We must feel conscious of some degradation in taste, when we go from the majestic immutability of the Egyptian school, the tranquil, the reposeful, and the simply beautiful of Grecian sculpture, to the roughly attacking and savagely ferocious exhibitions of modern art in painting." There is much truth in this, and the author has so well justified his remarks, that we must feel degraded when he adds: "The fall wing are the subjects which succeed almost continuously in the present small picture-gallery of the Vatican: a woman showing a bloody handkerchief; the burial of a corpse; tearing the entrails out of a man and winding them round a roller; two men beaten to death with sticks; a dying man receiving the sacrament; and the possessed in 'The Transfiguration' of Raffaelle, which Matthew of the Diary says is disgusting."

The fact of such pictures being selected for the adorning of the walls of a gallery, which must necessarily be visited by a large portion of the educated in Europe, involves the existence of an amount of bad taste which it is painful to realise to the mind. Art must have indeed fallen low, when such are its modern masterpieces. We are told that the "St. Jerome" of Domenichino, serve his sacred and profane dispensation, his twin directors, who showed such taste for human slaughter, than by the erection of the Coliseum."

* "The Real and the Ideal in Florence and Rome."

According to Winkelman, this group of a father and his two sons was executed by a father and his two sons. If this be correct, it would explain what otherwise appears inexplicable, its incongruity and disproportion of size. There have not been wanting critics who have asserted that the head of "The Venus de Medici" was the work of a distinct sculptor. We cannot accept this idea.

The Laocoon group was found during the pontificate of Julius II., though it was adopted as his own by Leo. The Laocoon and the Egolino are very alike in subject, and are, as it were, the poetry of the terrible. They have fed the imaginations of many, artists and poets—Agesande, Virgil, Dante, and Reynolds. But the best stands for beauty. The only portrait of Caesar, in the form of a statue, stands beside the wolf.

"The Dying Gladiator" tells better in Rome than any other subject. It is suited to the place. The gentler subjects around are merely Grecian. Who could believe the soft and gentle "Psyche and Cupid," typifying eternal youth and beauty, to be Roman; or the matured charms of a Venus to be like a Roman matron; or an Apollo to be of the same race as the tyrant lords of the world? No! the savage faces of the brutal men of the circus better suit Rome.

The statues of the new chamber of Pius VII. are interesting, though not of the first order in fame. In gazing at the "Apollo" we admire while we are excited; the "Torso," "Laocoon," and "Gladiator," make us suffer. But when we gaze on the "Minerva Medica," to which Canova has given the name of the statues are not Roman, but Grecian. We wonder when we think what Greek art might have done, had the Greeks but had a country. They invented these subjects when Athens was no longer free.

Ease, poetry, the arts, were the resources of the Greeks against despotism. When the Romans lost their liberty, they flew to the circus, to combats of wild beasts. Their arts, statuary, manners, poetry, all came from the Greeks. There was no royal road to success in the pursuit of the beautiful. When the Romans brought a statue of Hercules from Carthage, they prostrated it on the ground, so little had they the sentiment of even nobility of soul.

The Romans have had virtues given to them to which they never were entitled. They were coarse and savage barbarians until, conquering Greece, they adopted the civilisation of the captives. Their barbarism is shown in their own original sculptures, where size draped Apollo, our mind is attuned to gentle harmonies. It is the symbol of wisdom at rest. The intellect is carried back to its sublimest heights when we admire Demosthenes, and remember how he poured forth in the forum the floodgates of his eloquence. All the statues of this room are pleasing and agreeable.

While we are on the subject of Rome, we may allude, as the opportunity may not occur again, to "the modern dead" there; all subjects for the poet, painter, and sculptor, as interesting, at least, as those of the room of Pius VII., as it is called. Rome, indeed, is boundless in its stores of wealth, intellectual and moral. What thoughts of poetry and art rise before us, when we think of the tomb of Tasso on the retired height of St. Onofrio's monastery. The words of the poet can so little be disassociated from art, of which it is a branch, that Tasso appears to be but another Michael Angelo or Raffaele, though the poet belongs to a higher dispensation, because he is a beggar and poor.

The greatest names of the world's history are its beggars. Genius has been generous to the lowly. Homer was but a galley-boy; Virgil a hanger-on of courts; Milton a poor schoolmaster; Dante and Ariosto poor; Tasso a prisoner and a beggar; and William Shakespeare worked hard for a living. And yet there are no names in history, not one, of the rich and great shall live beside them. Who is there in Rome that will have his name remembered with that of Tasso? He sang, as it were, on the wings of his soul, in his dungeon: "I weep my death, and not my death alone, but the manner in which I die: my renown is only a funeral sound, and appears to me buried with my name; I should not be consoled to have for a tomb pyramids or brilliant mausoleums—I who thought to elevate to myself the most noble monument by my verses."

And he succeeded. No monarch who lies crushed beneath a pyramid, no statuary who lives in his marble, no artist who depends on his canvas, has for his memory so secure a hold as Tasso. His name is eternal; and there is his tomb on one of the highest hills of Rome. He ever loved the beautiful. He was born blind like a map under our feet; but, when we recollect how many students of art have gazed at that central attraction with burning hopes of fame, we cannot but be carried away by our emotions and love Rome. Soon we came to the river, which less, perhaps, than any other has felt the revolution of time.

The Tiber waters no other town. It flows dark and secret until it reaches the city, and then, having washed the walls of Rome, wends its way, desolate and unknown, to the sea. The Arno, on the other hand, which rises on the other side of the same hill in the Apennines, considering the short length of its course, flows through a populous territory, and two as glorious towns as any in Italy—Florence and Pisa.

Away we go to the Ponte Mole, by which Constantine entered Rome, and before which the road to the Vatican, the Emilian, and the Cassian, meeting before the bridge, make a wide area, where there is a house of entertainment, much frequented by the Romans in the summer. The triumphal arch and statue were only erected in 1805, as if commemorative of the Pope's struggle over Napoleon.

at Sorrento. He died at Rome. His name is as eternal as that of the city. It is not the few words on his paving-stone—"Here lie the bones of Tasso, lest the convent host may be ignorant,"—that ensure him remembrance, but the fragrant force of genius which never dies.

It is strange to turn from Tasso to another forgotten name—we need not linger on Poussin, which is ever remembered by the visitor to Rome. At no great distance, in the English burial-ground, is the tomb of Shelley, who lies within ground consecrated by that religion he unfortunately knew not. His ashes lie beneath a wall, underneath the ruins of a broken tower; there is a chapel formed by two broken buttresses, and there are cypresses waving over his grave. Peace be to his restless spirit!

There is an interesting monument to Rosa Bathurst, who perished in the Tiber. It is by Westmacott. Her fate is familiar to the visitor to Italy.

Everything is artistic in Rome, even the approach by Acquedante. The name is musical and poetical. Hence do we catch a glimpse of St. Peter's, letting us know that we are in sight of Rome. It is not so beautiful as the sudden appearance of Switzerland like a map under our feet; but, when we recollect how many students of art have gazed at that central attraction with burning hopes of fame, we cannot but be carried away by our emotions and love Rome. Soon we came to the river, which less, perhaps, than any other has felt the revolution of time.

The classe visite, entering the Piazza del Popolo, finds all vulgarised, tawdry ornaments, with crowds in the costume of modern times. There is an Egyptian obelisk, reminding one of the Place de la Concorde at Paris. It is dedicated to the sun, and three streets strike off from it like rays. They take you in straight and regular lines of buildings along the valleys. The buildings are not what they were. Go along the Corso to the Capitol; you will see the palace of the Austrian ambassador; imagine it, gentle reader, built from the bricks of the Coliseum. It is the largest in Rome, and fitly represents the power which has crushed Italy under the leaden influence of German sin. An interesting monument is the house of Madame Letitia, Napoleon's mother, who resided there the dead empire of France, so inexplicably revived. It is scarcely, however, so interesting as the house of Ricci, near the river, which Balzer has so admirably made us familiar with.

It is a ruin now, and was once the abode of Crescentius, a gentler reformer than Ricci, who pulled down the old without being able to reconstruct the new, no fault of his, but of the slaves he vainly tried to make into freemen.

It was the mistake of all the reformers and friends of the Roman people to believe, that because they were born in Rome, they must necessarily be the descendants of the sterling old stock. They were nothing of the kind. They were a hybrid mixture of slaves and barbarians, unfitted by long oppression and mental bondage to comprehend even the name of liberty.

What meaning could art have for the mental? He gazed around stupidly at the statues and works of genius which had been collected by the will of tyrants, from vanity more than from taste; and they were to him no more than the riegel mill-stones of the quarries he lived in. Debased and degraded by long years of suffering, nothing but a remedy impossible in Rome could elevate him to a fitness for freedom.

Many a time before now have careless observers envied the fate of the millions born beneath the happy climate of the South, surrounded by the miracles of nature and the wonders of art, and compared them with the millions of the North, who have a more uncertain climate, and less beauty, both natural and created, to survey. It is a great mistake. Art, literature, science, everything useful and agreeable, has followed in the footsteps of liberty. In this country, the treasures of ancient art collected in palaces are innumerable. This is laying the foundation of an artistic greatness equal to any dreamt of in past days.

Debarred by climate of the rich scenery and the warm atmosphere which is the natural hotbed of taste, we northerners, by bringing around us the treasures of Greece, and Rome, and modern Italy, are elevating the taste of the millions, and exciting that public appreciation which is necessary to success. The difference between the past and the present is very great.

In past times painters owed their success to the good-will of princes. When there sat upon a throne a man of taste, able to appreciate talent and genius, there was an opportunity for art to develop itself. There was no widely-spread and discerning public to continually cherish and support a long and steady series of artists. That is what we are doing. We are educating a people; and there can be little doubt that the ultimate consequence will be, that none but really good artists will be successful. The influence of Rome, however, upon art is still mighty indeed. There, and at Florence, we must always feel that we are at least on classic ground—ground which should be visited by every one aiming at excellence in his profession.

To return to the monuments of Rome. In Thorwaldsen's monument to Pius VII. we have an admirable specimen of the statue portrait. It has been placed beside the production of David and Lawrence. Some have imagined that the angels are too much lost in the height, and are thus crushed by the much greater size of the figures below. The design, however, is simple, ingenious, and beautiful. In the one, Time is represented looking upwards, and seeking, as it were, to dive into eternity. The other represents the genius of history. The idea of the sculptor relative to religion is truly magnificent. It is a figure standing with arms bled, and a foot upon a club. Near this is Wisdom, drawing counsel from the Bible in its hand; the owl at its feet. Various have been the criticisms on this work. Volery only approves of the sleeping lion. "The lion roaring," says Rezzonico, "is not natural; the figure of religion, in stiff drapery, is feeble; and the genii appear rather enervated than afflicted."

The author of "Statues in the Vatican" says: "Bell ends fault with the lack of the 'Venus Canova,' and the slightness of the limbs. Matthews, the author of the 'Diary,' says the head is too large. The legs of his 'Perseus' are said to be too short; this is a avoiding imitation or error, as the 'Belvedere's' are objected to as being too long; and the 'Medici's' head is pronounced too small, and her make throughout is large. The acknowledged copyist of the antique, he sometimes ventures a contradiction. Thorwaldsen, without being called upon to supply an Apollo or Venus to the world, has been more lucky in challenging antiquity; his 'Venus Victrix' is superior to Canova's 'Goddess of Beauty'; his 'Jascon' certainly to the 'Perseus'; and though not aiming at immortality, not a rival of the 'Apollo' in beauty and human proportion; the 'Psyche and Cupid' of Canova are a pendant to the 'Kissing Pair' in the Capitol; but the 'Day and Night' of Thorwaldsen is an effort of poetry, which leaves behind the modern and much of antiquity."

Doubtless, the gem of Rome, the pearl of great price in statuary, the divinity of the Museum of Art in the Vatican, is the "Apollo Belvedere."

"The lord of the unerring bow,
The god of life, and poetry, and light—
The sun in human limbs arrayed, and brow
All radiant from his triumph in the fight;
The shaft hath just been shot—the arrow bright
With an immortal vengeance; in his eye
And nostril be titiful disdain, and might,
And majesty flash their full lightnings by,
Developing, in that one glance, the Deity.
But in his delicate form a dream of love
Shaped by some solitary nymph, whose breast
Long'd for a deathless lover from above;
And, madden'd with that vision, art express'd
All that ideal beauty ever bless'd
The mind with, in its most unearthly mood,
When each conception was a heavenly guest—
A ray of immortality— and stood Star-like, around, until they gathered to a god."

There is no conception in the mythology more admirable in ideality than Apollo, the perfection of manly beauty, as Aphrodite is of womanly loveliness. Apollo is music, made a being too. When the mind fixes itself intently upon this production, when we view it seriously from an artistic point of view, nothing looks well beside it. It casts a shade of melancholy over the soul, which is wrapt in a kind of dream of admiration. The descriptions of Byron—given above—and of Winkelman burst upon our memory, and though neither conveys all we feel ourselves, they still aid us in realising its true character.

As a pagan representation of the divinity, as they understood him, this statue realises the idea to the mind better than any poetical description—better than a picture. The German critic says: "The spectator must first fly with his soul to the regions of incorporated beauty, and become the creator of a celestial nature, to fill him with an idea of a beautiful supernatural; because, as he views it, there is nothing mortal in that figure—no sign of the wants of humanity; "there are neither tendons nor veins, to move or kindle the body;" it is true that he admits disdain upon the lips. Byron describes him as "incarnate vengeance" and while Winkelman tells us that his eyes "are full of that sweetness which they are wont to display when the Muses surround and caress him," he assures us that "might and majesty flash their full lightnings" from his glance.

The very difference of opinion which has made itself manifest upon so many occasions with regard to this statue only proves its power. Its name has gone to the very ends of the earth as the incarnation of beauty. Michael Angelo and Raffaele have been the artist's disciples. Byron, De Staël, Milman, Winkelman, and others have been his high priests and expounders.

When we turn from the records of the past to the reality of the present, everything in Rome and the Roman states is study—matter for the painter. Leaving ruins, statues, temples, and palaces, and turning to the living, we find as much worthy of careful examination as ever. It is true it is a kind of idleness and oppression. But the very poorest priest is picturesque, while what can be more so than the one-horse cart of the wine carrier, with his barrels behind and his cabulet in front, made of skins, of the same skins that clad the him and made him look like a satyr? Then come strings of horses and donkeys, a very caravan, with tinkling bells, fit subject for an Asselyn; or a drover urging on his cattle to the tune of his screeching bagpipes, just like a picture by Chryp. Swine, black as Erebus, and bulls with enormous horns, complete the scene. Next, here comes a Roman nation of capacious form, and looking like a true descendant of the old stock. Tall jines, and plains, ruins, and their quailed and stunted vines, peasants living in holes like Irish cabins or red-skin wigwams, beggars in swarms, serve as subjects for the pencil of the British islanders, descendant of those men whom the Romans despised as the most savage of barbarians. Shepherds' dogs, white as Polar bears, vultures and hawks brightening the timid land, give a little animation to this land of the bygone, where the past is living and the present is dead.

NATIONAL PICTURES.

The chief means of exalting the taste of the people and giving them a thorough knowledge of the end and purpose of art, is the formation of galleries destined to receive the pictures of a nation. Nor do galleries serve that purpose only—although that were indeed a great one; they stimulate artists who behold their treasures, with the hope of having some day their works classed amongst those they behold, and of their being cherished as some of the treasures of the country.

It frequently happens, however, that the country most rich in pecuniary wealth, most capable of forming fine collections of pictures and works of art, either awakes at too late a period to the necessity of their possession, or is gifted with so little taste, that although the selection may have cost an immense sum, yet the pictures may be totally unworthy the wealth given for them, or of the honour of being placed in a national collection; and this, we take it, is unfortunately the case with England. It is only lately, indeed, by the publication of the work of a foreigner—of “Dr. Waagen’s Treasures of Art”—that the people are made aware of the immense quantity of pictures, the treasures, the superabundant wealth of art which exists in England, but of which there is as yet no worthy collection in one place.

True it is, that although many of the pictures may be worthy, the English have a knack of making a government “job” of the building, whereby the architect raises an immense fortune, and the so-called gallery is, like that of Trafalgar square, totally unworthy the name. It, on the contrary, any chance may render the place of exhibition passable; yet the pictures are for the most part so ignorantly arranged, that effect is spoilt, and the possibility of education on the progress of art entirely cut away. But as if these accidents were not enough, we find the government lavishing thousands of pounds upon a baby-house—and worse than a baby-house—for George the Fourth; and yet refusing to make room for a fine collection of pictures bequeathed to them for national purposes, which therefore fly off at a tangent, and at Dulwich form a gallery of themselves. Such, indeed, is the fact with the Bourgeois collection.

The faults of public people do not, however, excuse our own; and the National Gallery in Trafalgar-square, to which we purpose a short visit, notwithstanding its total inadequacy on the score of a “National” gallery, its architectural enormities, and the faults of its conservators, is still—on account of the many very beautiful pictures which it contains—worthy of a visit, and a visit not only of curiosity, but for the purpose of serious and attentive study.

We shall not, we may premise, in our short review follow the numbers given in the catalogue, sold, by permission of the trustees, outside the gallery, as that catalogue contains pictures, for instance, those by Hogarth, which have for these two or three years past been moved away to Marlborough House, and there exhibited in what is called the “Vernon Gallery.”

The pictures which belong to the nation form an altogether imperfect collection, and our notice will be but piecemeal and cursory. In some masters we are comparatively rich; of others we have none; and of some but one, and that a poor specimen. Thus, of Claude we have no less than ten pictures; of Bartolomeo none; and of Salvator Rosa but one; and so on. Of our modern, and as a school by far most meritorious, English artists, we had, before Mr. Vernon made his magnificent bequest, absolutely nothing.

Of the Claudes, that known as “The Embarkation of the Queen of Sheba,” and marked 14 in the catalogue, will attract some notice. A picture of a seaport, with the sun in the midst of the sky, with about two feet of very brilliant colouring on each side of it; ruins, a sea-tower, an archway, rocks, and trees; riggings of ships, and ships themselves; all form accessories of the picture, and all are painted with but one idea—that of scenic effect. There is an utter want of learning or care in this picture. The trees are of no class or kind in nature; the rocks are such as are never seen by the seaside; the ships are carelessly drawn, etc.; but the great reparation made by this master for such carelessness lies in the colour and pleasing arrangement. The picture is nothing less than an illusive fiction.

A Correggio, marked 10, of “Mercury and Venus instructing Cupid,” has for some years been the admiration of all critics. The reason of this is sufficiently evident; for although the figure of Venus is not beautiful, and Mercury, instead of being all light and vivacity, is dull and heavy, yet the beauty of the Cupid, the excellent drawing in the form, and, above all, the prodigious beauty of colour, must win our admiration. This picture was once in the possession of Charles I. The colouring contrasts especially with that of Rubens, but is in its nature equally fine.

“The Marriage of Isaac and Rebecca,” either a duplicate or copy of the picture by Claude in the Doria Palace, known as “Claude’s Mill,” is one of those hasty compositions of the artist which have called down the anger of Mr. Ruskin. People are dancing near some water, which is a lake formed by an impetuous torrent, but which runs nowhere. In order not to break the repose of the scene, the very water into which a cascade falls has no motion in it. The only beauties in the picture are the sky and the colour.

“Christ disputing with the Doctors” (No. 18), is a very weak composition, put down with much effrontery to Leonardo da Vinci. The celebrated John Hunter used to extol the deep anatomical studies of this artist; yet the figure of Christ in this picture is badly drawn, the head unnaturally weak, and the hand drawn without the slightest knowledge of anatomy.

“Adonis quitting Venus for the Chase,” said to be by Titian, is another pretended original, but also a very popular picture. The display of form in the Venus is very graceful; but the Adonis is heavy, ill drawn, and deficient in elegance and dignity. The colour and mode of painting are both good; the former, especially, rich, harmonious, and, in the flesh, soft and fleshy. There is another copy of this picture at Dulwich.

“The Sabine Women,” by Rubens (No. 30), is a fine specimen of force in a painter, accompanied by knowledge of drawing and colour. Beyond this, the Romans are not Romans, the ladies are those of the seventeenth century, and the architecture of the same period. Yet with all these anomalies, the picture is free, bold, and fine; the colour so bright and glorious, that it forces one to admire it.

“Portrait of Cornelius Van der Geest,” life-size, by Vandyck, ignorantly called “The Head of Gervinus,” is one of those pictures of which the nation may indeed be proud. The sentiment and thought, the feeling and refinement, in this face, it is impossible to surpass. One can linger over it for hours. The painting of the mouth and beard, if shut out from the rest of the picture, are alone worthy of the most minute attention; the delicacy and truth of detail, and the breadth of light, are also beyond praise. The interest attached to this portrait of a person almost unknown is to be attributed to the genius of Vandyck alone.

(No. 59), “The Brazen Serpent,” by Rubens, is another triumph of power. The agonised expression of the women, the pallid countenances of the dead, the majesty on the face of Moses, and the wonderful knowledge of anatomy in the drawing, are equally to be admired. A critic, Mr. George Fogg, has objected to the fat and burly persons of those stricken with the plague. He should have recollected that the plague was sudden, and that no previous sickness could have emaciated the forms of the sinful Israelites.

(No. 184), “The Murder of the Innocents,” called a Raffaele, is the largest picture in the Academy. The board under it informs us, that it is the property of the governors of the Foundling Hospital, and that it is by them deposited in this gallery.

The outline alone has any similarity to the works of Raffaele. The murderers are remorseless brutes; the mothers are fighting mad women. There is no delicacy in the painting, which, besides these defects, cannot be seen to any advantage, from any point of view, being covered with a glass, which catches the light, and entirely destroys the picture.

Our space forbids us at this time to say more. We purpose, however, returning to the subject, and going through, during the time that new pictures are not to be seen, some of those of eminent masters which are the property of the nation, or of those noblemen and gentlemen whose liberality enables the public to become acquainted with their galleries. By so doing, we believe that we shall be doing good service to art.

VALENTIN.

There exists among painters a race of rough, haughty men, always ready to fall back and take their stand upon mere matter, immediate between the double row of chefs d'œuvre; you will see them look with an eye of indifference at those mystic compositions where the expression of the faith of former times is concealed beneath spare wan forms and sometimes faded colouring; they will scarcely stop before those sublime works of Lesueur, where the pious personages of past ages appear to the spectator as mere shadows, so timid, so humble, and so subordinate to the ideal is the actual execution; but if they meet with some vulgar scene, where the palpitating flesh stands out boldly from the obscurity of the ground, they want no more to induce them to give way to their feelings and launch out into enthusiasm.

What they admire and hold up to your admiration is the energy of the action, the expression of the gesture, and the success of the foreshortening in a picture. "Look!" they exclaim, "how well those muscles are attached, and how freely they act! how naturally the shoulders are joined on! how forcibly you are impressed with the presence of the veins and the solidity of the tendons! The eyes are brilliant, the nostrils are full of breath, and the blood flows beneath that flesh!" But not one word do they say of the painter's intention, or of the thought that should pervade his work. What matters to them the value of the principal idea and the choice of the subject? A band of brigands, seated round a table in some cavern, and singing over their liquor with courtizans, interests them far more than the "Christ on the Mount of Olives," or "The Tables of Artillery."

directly there is any question of acknowledging the influence of mind. Follow them as they walk down the gallery of the Louvre,

They are enamoured of mere matter. They look upon it as a portion of divinity itself, and cannot understand that there is the least preference to be given to any one of the different parts of which it is composed. In their eyes, all forms in nature possess the same charm, all members of humanity are of equal value, each one being endowed with some peculiar beauty, which the spectator must discover for himself. Thus being the case, the less trouble a painter has taken to choose his subject, the greater is their preference for him, and as mere imitation is quite sufficient to satisfy their ardent love of form, they do not require matter to think, but merely to exist. It is especially among these youth that the admirers of Valentin are to be found.

Valentin, one of the most celebrated French painters, was born in the little town of Coulommiers, in Brie, the 8th June, 1661, in the Rue du Montel-Sainte-Foy, at the corner of the Impasse des Remparts. We do not know why some authors have chosen to consider him as belonging to the Roman school, for if France can claim him as one of her children, it is not only because she witnessed his birth, but because his taste for painting manifested itself long before he went to Rome, to seek inspiration among the marvels of the Vatican.

It always struck us as an extraordinary circumstance that the Christian name of a French painter, and especially of one born in the province of Brie, should be Moïse, according, as it did, but little with the genius of the French nation, which, especially in the seventeenth century, was greatly prejudiced against the Jews and their customs. However, as a considerable number of authors always called him Moïse Valentin, and as there were no documents to clear up our doubts on the subject, we at last believed, as all other persons had done, that Valentin's Christian name was really Moïse. Since then, we have received some curious information from a distinguished painter and author, Monsieur Anatole Dauvoigne, and we crave the reader's permission to transcribe at full length the notes which he has furnished—notes which are the more interesting as they prove the necessity of always going back to the fountain-head, historical errors most frequently proceeding from historians of the second or third generation.

The following is an extract from the genealogical table of the family of Boullongne de Coulommiers, drawn up, about 1780, expressly for the family, by Michel Martial Cordier, Juge de Paix at Coulommiers previous to 1789, and a Member of the Convention, who died in exile, at Brussels, in 1821.

This table was drawn up from documents which are at present dispersed, but which were then accessible to Monsieur Cordier. Eighteen of these dates are given as corroborative proofs. The Boullongne family still flourishes at Coulommiers, and has preserved from father to son a certain pride in its relationship with the painter, who is known by the name of Valentin alone.

I. Stock. Jean de Boullongne, called Rasset, in 1495, born at Bologna in Italy, lived at Coulommiers, at the corner of the Cul-de-Sac, near the church of Sainte Foy. This Cul-de-Sac now bears the name of Boullongne. Title-dieds in 1549.

II. He had issue: in 1538, Denis de Boullongne; II. Jean de Boullongne.

III. Jean de Boullongne, 2nd of the name, married at Coulommiers. He had issue (1576):—

1. Perrin de Boullongne, plumber and glazier.
2. Simon de Boullongne.
3. Jacques de Boullongne, carrier.

4. Valentin de Boullongne, painter on glass.

IV. Valentin de Boullongne, 1st of the name; died in 1618. He had, by Jeanne de Monthyon, his wife, three children viz. —

1. Marie de Boullongne, born the 28th August 1599.
2. Jean de Boullongne, born the 8th June, 1601.
3. Jacques de Boullongne, born the 15th October, 1603.

Monsieur Cordier did not take the trouble to look for these three certificates of baptism of the children of Valentin de Boullongne, father of the celebrated painter. Monsieur Dauvoigne found them after a long search, but the name of Valentin does not exist in any one of them. No gap occurs in the parish registers of Saint-Denis de Coulommiers, during the period in which it is probable that the painter was born; and yet, from 1544 to 1777, we very frequently find the Christian name of Valentin. Valentin Pidoux, uncle of La Fontaine, the author of the Fables, was baptised in 1614.

Monsieur Aubert de Eghny, who was bailli of Coulommiers, speaking of the painter Valentin, writes as follows, about 1770:—

If it is true that he made a journey to Paris, it was not, at any rate, to become a pupil of Simon Vouet, as some of his biographers have asserted: a mere comparison of dates is sufficient to refute this error. Simon Vouet left for Constantinople, with Monsieur de Saucy, in 1612, at which time Valentin was only eleven years old. Vouet, according to the testimony of Félibien, did not return and found his school in Paris before the year 1627, at which period Valentin already enjoyed a high reputation as a painter in Rome. He had resided in that city for a considerable time, and was doomed to end his days there. D'Argenville contradicts himself, when, after having asserted that Valentin began his studies under Vouet, he affirms, in another portion of his work, that Vouet's taste had something of Valentin's in it. This would be to suppose that the master had subsequently taken lessons of his pupil, which is not likely. We are inclined to believe, with some more recent writers, that the two painters were in Rome at the same epoch, and that they studied Caravaggio's manner together.

However this may be, when Valentin arrived in Italy, Caravaggio was just dead, and painters were beginning to free themselves from the influence which he had exerted during his lifetime. Like many other reformers, he had led away his contemporaries by supplanting

“I believe that his name was Valentin de Boullongne, and that he was son and grandson respectively of two painters on glass, who both resided at Coulommiers, and who painted the fine windows, most of which still exist, in the parish church there. His father's name, like his own, was Valentin, and his grandfather's Jacques.”

These two written traditions, as well as the tradition preserved in the Boullongne family, prove most satisfactorily that the painter belonged to this family, which was founded by Jean de Bologne, called Rasset, who came from Italy, and was probably a painter on glass.

We have still to explain the name of Valentin. The eldest of Valentin de Boullongne's children married Jean d'Alençon. We lose sight of the two sons.

Monsieur Cordier proves that Valentin de Boullongne's second son is the painter. The following is the boy's certificate of baptism:—“Die Veneris, octava Junii, 1601. Joannes filius Valentini de Boullongne et Joannæ de Monthyon ejus uxoris, fuit baptisatus. Patrimus dominus Joannes de Boullongne, pictor, et Petrus Lud-tazar-Matrima-Ludŏica, Francisci Rebolé, procuratoris fiscalis.”

The absence of the name of Valentin proves nothing against the fact of this certificate of baptism being that of the painter. At Coulommiers, it is the practice to call the son by his father's Christian name. We have met with twenty examples of the custom. Le petit Valentin ended by retaining the name Valentin.

There now remains the Christian name. As regards that of Moïse, it is simply absurd. It was D'Argenville who misread the manuscript in his possession, and mistook Monsieur Moïse — Vide Lanzi, Mariette, Victor Schoelcher, Brulliot (p. 369, Biographie de Caravage, 1845), Beyle, etc.

Trozzi (Milan, 1832), calls him Pietro.

Félibien, who wrote about 1670, thirty years after Valentin's decease, does not give him the name of Moïse, which is first found in D'Argenville's book, whence, since 1787, it has been copied by a great number of the painter's biographers. The following writers call him Valentin—Le Valentin—Mr. or Mousi Valentino:—

The family name De Boullongne, is written indifferently Debolongne, De boullongne, de Boullongne, de Bologne; but it is still the same DE BOULONGNE, and depends upon the whim of the writer. In the books of the last century, do we not also meet with the town of Bologne (Bologna), written Boullongne, Boulogne?

lines, but the form of the first-comer, and the arms and legs of the passers-by. No more gods or demigods, but itinerant musicians, soldiers, tapers, smokers, and beggars with garments full of holes and patches; the most ordinary scenes chosen by mere chance; the strange, motley, disorderly, but always harmonious and always poetic prism of extreme reality.*

This opinion is exceedingly just and well expressed, but we must not believe that Valentin painted only rags, or always took pleasure in the contemplation of ignoble, wild, and deformed nature. Although his arrangement possesses less grandeur than that of Caravaggio, and his manner is neither as broad nor as imposing as that of the Lombard painter, he succeeded in imparting a certain air of distinction to the most trivial scenes; but, as if fearful that he should not obtain sufficient effect by the mere contrast of light and shade, he sought for additional effect by the juxtaposition of the draperies, poor servant, whose hands are red with washing dishes, a simple girl of the lower classes, coarse and harsh in her charms, modest without affectation or coquetry, hardly understanding what is required of her, and not believing that her beauty is capable of reanimating the ardour of old age.

The two elders who have cast upon this woman the eyes of concupiscence, are men in whose breasts passion is still struggling with age, still vigorous and well preserved in spite of the innumerable wrinkles which furrow their foreheads. One of them, dissimulating his embarrassment and shame under an appearance of rage, endeavours to justify himself by accusing her; there is a tolerable degree of nobleness in his face, and energy in his gesture, while the drapery falls in graceful folds; he is one of Poussin's models rendered with Manfredi's pencil. The other elder, forgetful of the soldiers who have led him to the tribunal, and of the judge who is about to invariably painting the satins and velvets of the rich side by side with the woollen garments of the poor.

The works of Valentin in the Louvre, however, are more than sufficient to enable us to appreciate the vigour and originality of his talent; for they contain all his distinctive qualities, and may therefore be taken as the basis of an exact definition of his style. Among these pictures, there are some, it is true, which are drawn from sacred history, but they are really connected with it merely by the nature of the subject and the complaisance of the spectator. With Valentin, the "Chaste Susannah" (p. 109), is not one of those timid women whose modesty is enhanced by their beauty, and whose charms leave a feeling of regret in the breasts of those who have been unable to triumph over them; such women, in a word, as the skilful and gracious Sauterre loved to paint a hundred years later; no, she is a condemned man, is solely occupied with the young girl, the sight of whom still excites his desires; his glance is humid and dimmed, his mouth gives him the appearance of a satyr, and his head is covered with hair that is turning gray, but which is still thick and well set. It is a common head, treated in the manner of Espagnolet, with some light dryness in the folds of the skin, but unexampled for the vigour of its model, the justness of its tone, and the accent of truth pervading it. In the notices in the Musée Français, Eméric David has very successfully criticised the remarkable error committed by Hagedorn concerning Valentin, when he says: "It is not so much for the choice of his subjects as for the weakness of his execution that this painter is to be blamed; we should be more indulgent towards him, had he been able to attain vigour of touch, and express the roundness of form belonging to his model." This error is such an inexplicable one in so enlightened an appreciator as Hagedorn, that we cannot help thinking that he never saw a single picture by Valentin, or that the painter of whom he speaks is not ours." Monsieur Levesque, on the contrary, says: "Valentin possessed the faculty of passing artistically, by gentle and transparent tints, from the brightest light to the very strongest shade."[†]

The Italian writers have confirmed this last opinion. Not only do they place Valentin above all the imitators of Caravaggio for the art of composition, but they reckon him, although a Frenchman, among the disciples of the Roman school, and look upon him as one of the greatest colourists that this school ever produced.[‡]

Valentin was unskilful in expression, unless he had to depict the most vulgar emotions of the soul. So far from appreciating the shades of sentiment, and the varied language of the passions, he could only seize their coarsest and most simple forms; and, with him, the word expression may be taken to mean not only the contraction of the face, but also historical and philosophical propriety, and a number of circumstances inseparable from the subject.

that the knowledge of the value of costume and the power of painter-mimic expression ought to belong to a painter who confines himself altogether to reality; and yet these qualities are only possessed by the philosophical artist, by him who is content with observing the external signs of the various passions, endeavour to discover that which causes them to spring up in men's hearts. In order to become well acquainted with the effects of the passions, it is necessary to know exactly their origin.

In his "Judgment of Solomon" (p. 195) the truth that is characteristic of a beautiful woman, whose black hair causes her large white shoulder to stand out in bold relief. She is turning round, in order to put her child from the soldier who appears about to eat it in view, and the movement of hers allows us to perceive the type of the Roman face in the severe lines of her profile. It is by this that she is distinguished from the false mother, whose gesture is full of hypocrisy, and whose physiognomy is stamped with a character of baseness.

THE CONCERT. FROM A PAINTING BY VALENTIN.

In order to obtain a correct idea of what he wants in this respect, it is not even necessary to compare him to Poussin. It would, without doubt, be unjust to place Valentin's Solomon, a beardless young man, badly clad, of a lymphatic temperament and clumsy joints, without dignity or grace, by the side of the other Solomon, so majestically draped, and yet so simple, calm and impassive, seated with an air of grandeur, expressing his impartiality by his attitude, and pointing out with his finger the true mother, almost without a movement. It would at first appear if the painter, in his ignorance of the play of the nature, could find no other means of characterising the good and the bad mother, than by giving beauty to the one and ugliness to the other.

In this work of Valentin, we may notice one of his most frequent defects, which consists in giving the flesh a metallic appearance. On the second ground, we perceive some old man's nose which glisten like bronze; and as for the dead child that is strolled out at Solomon's feet, and which, as a model, is a chef-d'œuvre, it resembles far too much a brazen statue. This defect of execution, in a painter who has so few, is not altogether excused by his putting in the light portions of his pictures with leaden half tints, while he exaggerates, in certain cases, the transparency of the colours, by which means he gives a body that is naturally dull, an appearance belonging only to hard and polished surfaces; for light has not merely the effect of giving different objects the colour which is peculiar to them, but it also possesses the wonderful power of enabling us to distinguish their nature by the manner in which they reflect or absorb it. However great the intensity of the light may be, when it comes in contact with flesh, its rays are slightly doctored by the surface of the epidermis, exactly as in a landscape they glide gently over the ploughed land and green hills, while they shine fiercely upon the rocks. With regard to the "Judgment of Solomon," we will again quote Monsieur Eméric David, who has perfectly appreciated Valentin's merit, and the peculiar character of his talent.

"When Poussin painted 'The Judgment of Solomon,' the principal object he had in view was the king's profound wisdom, and this is what he wished to represent; no other painter has ever composed Solomon's face as he did. Valentin was moved by other feelings. He saw a mother—a mother whose child had been torn from her; the child is on the point of being killed, of being cut in twain; and one-half of the bleeding body is to be delivered over to the mother. Such was the subject as he saw it. Poussin, acting in consonance with his feelings, directed the attention to the head of the king, and left that of the real mother in half-light. The principal objects for Valentin were the child and its mother; he was daring enough to attempt the portrayal of maternal love, and he succeeded. On the woman's face, love, terror, and especially innocence, are depicted. Her breast is exposed. She is not looking at the king, but at the child, for whose possession she is praying. All these circumstances reveal a mild disposition and a soul incapable of deceit. The false mother, on the contrary, is seen from behind, which is an ingenious arrangement. In that portion of her face which is exposed to view, the spectator is sensible of a certain harshness inherent to her disposition. The body of the dead child, placed upon the steps of the throne, possesses in this picture an amount of merit in the drawing which is but rarely met with. The tones of the flesh are different in all the figures. The breasts, necks, and shoulders of the two women are endowed with a vitality and warmth which has rarely been attained by the colourist's art. The head of the good mother is a chef-d'œuvre of colour and expression. These two personages stand out boldly from the canvas in spite of the heaviness and uniformity of the ground. The heads of the two old men, placed in half-light, are energetic and perfectly transparent."

If we allow Valentin to be an admirable painter, it is especially on account of the truthfulness and force of his execution, and whenever the subject does not require those qualities of mind in which he is deficient. To understand and admire him more at our ease, we ought to study him when he represents the picturesque episodes of that life of reality which he has chosen for his epic. We ought to follow him into the thick and smoky atmosphere of the guard-room, where soldiers are playing at cards, having their fortune told them, or scraping on a fiddle.

Behold us in a retreat of gypsies. A dirty and sallow-faced creature, with a napkin bound around her head, like the women of Frascati, and hiding her countenance in the shade, is examining the hand of a kind of militiaman, who is having his fortune told. The tranquillity of this low witch forms a striking contrast with the lively emotion that is visible in the soldier's features; and, as if the strangeness of the figures about him, and the appearance of the cavern, into which only a mysterious light finds its way through an archway, were not sufficient to trouble his thoughts, the companions of the prophet's success in exciting his imagination still more effectually by the noisy music which they are playing close to his ears. To the left, in the obscurity, is seen a man putting his hand into the gypsy's pocket, from which he draws forth a living cock, a sort of symbolical animal, such as the old sylvans usually possess. In truth, it is not merely impossible to paint with a more vigorous and masterly touch; but, what is more, to initiate the spectator with greater success into the mysteries of the life led by the gypsies of those days—by that proscribed and vagabond race, with their eccentric costume and copper-coloured complexion, who lived by raving, or on the credulity of the public, who covered themselves with garments of glaring hues, and found in every town some dark retreat or other, unknown to justice, and offering a place of refuge to every adventurer without length or home.

As we have already remarked, the substance of Valentin's pictures is the same as that of Callot's engravings. The former, as well as the latter, offer us a lively representation of the manners of a certain period; but, although the epoch of Valentin's works is the same as that of Callot's, there is a marked difference in their manner of seeing things. The reason that this brilliant arabesque did not unfold itself before the eyes of the printer of Calanmiers, as it did before those of the engraver of Nancy, is, that each of them gave the fruits of his observations the tinge of his own disposition, and stamped them with the impression of his own mind. The one chose the burlesque, the other the poetic side of the subject. Callot was more particularly struck with the air of the praiser-by, the easy swagger of the cavalier, and that kind of misery which, in his day, was crested with a varnish of elegance. He represented the agitated and wandering episodes of outdoor life, which he had seen defiling before him, those joyous caravans of tatterdemalions who used to feast upon the sward, share their booty under the vault of heaven, and gild their rags in the sun. Valentin, on the contrary, devoted his attention to the in-door life of this wandering race; he entered with them the unknown retreats where they reposed themselves from their fatigues, or where, during the night, and by the light of their torches, they indulged in all kinds of pleasure; he entered with them into those places whose sorry aspect was redeemed by the brilliancy of the varied drapery, the poetry of mystery, and the exhibition of false luxury.

Callot worked with a smile upon his lips; he studied this mode of life, which had long ceased to be his own, without deranging his ruff, or losing aught of the spirit of a philosopher or the manners of a man of birth. Valentin mixed with his models. He shared their habits; he thought these beings were grand, and copied them seriously and passionately. Callot conveyed a moral with aqua-fortis; Valentin made use of his pencil to portray vagabonds of good family, the Don Quixotes of his day.

What, in fact, are the so-called "Family Concerts," which figure in the galleries of the Louvre, and which are admired there under that title? What name can we give to the personages executing a concerted piece, and ranged round a table covered with a rich cloth? Would not any one take them for amateurs of the highest rank in society? All their costumes are perfect; some wear superb breast-plates, which the spectator thinks he hears resound—so true to nature are they; others have magnificent doublets, with a plumed hat, and a dagger in their girdle; the stout and haughty woman who beats time upon a spinet is a common type, but she is well-dressed and worthy of those around her. The party is brilliant and complete; there is a violoncello, a guitar, a violin, and a cornet. Nothing is wanting. Each of these instruments adds to the general harmony of the colouring by the beauty of its tones; you think, in a word, that you are in good and honest society; but, if you look more closely, you perceive sinister faces, you behold glistening, in the background of the picture, a certain countenance with a gallows-look, which warns you that the place is a suspicious one; you feel that these pompous garments resemble those which have been stripped from the back of some traveller, and that all these fine gentlemen may possibly be nothing but highway robbers.

In order to be certain that we are not mistaken, we will stop before another of Valentin's pictures, which also represents "A Concert." Is it not rather a wine-shop, where the quartett merely serves as an interlude previous to the different personages proceeding to other amusements? Would you ever take for honest citizens those young men with their illuminated faces, who are accompanying on the violin and mandolin the lady who is singing, while their companions are cutting themselves slices from a pasty, or placing their lips to demijohns, surrounded by wicker-work? In sober truth, this concert is one which, in the eyes of an observer, cannot appear aught but the most decent portion of an orgy; and in the songstress, with the dishevelled locks, who is conducting the orchestra, we can only see the mistress of a low den of iniquity. But, after all, what vigour! what animation! how the picture captivates you by the magic of the chiaroscuro and the unexpectedness of its contrasts! Who would expect to see by the side of a Signor Cavaliere, of such a graceful appearance, a thick-set, fleshy courtesan, exposing her breast to view, and with a skin which shows no sign either of the colour or the circulation of the blood under its coarse exterior?

But there is another point to which we would call the reader's nature can never produce anything great; can never raise and enlarge the conceptions, or warm the heart of the spectator.

"The wish of the genuine painter must be more extensive; instead of endeavouring to amuse mankind with the minute neatness of his imitations, he must endeavour to improve them by the grandeur of his ideas; instead of seeking praise by deceiving the superficial sense of the spectator, he must strive for fame by captivating the imagination.

"The principle now laid down, that the perfection of art does not consist in mere imitation, is far from being new or singular. It is, indeed, supported by the general opinion of the enlightened part of mankind. The poets, orators, and rhetoricians of antiquity true standard of beauty. So that Phidias, when he formed his Jupiter, did not copy any object ever presented to his sight, but contemplated only that image which he had conceived in his mind from Homer's description.* And thus Cicero, speaking of the same Phidias: 'Neither did the artist,' says he, 'when he carved the image of Jupiter or Minerva, set before him any one human figure as a pattern which he was to copy; but having a more perfect idea of beauty fixed in his mind, this he steadily contemplated, and to the imitation of this all his skill and labour were directed!'

"The moderns are not less convinced than the ancients of this superior power existing in the art, nor less sensible of its effects. Every language has adopted terms expressive of this excellence, are continually enforcing this position; that all the arts receive their perfection from an ideal beauty, superior to what is to be found in individual nature. They are ever referring to the painters and sculptors of their times, particularly Phidias (the favourite artist of antiquity), to illustrate their assertions. As if they could not sufficiently express their admiration of his genius by what they knew, they have recourse to poetical enthusiasm; they call it inspiration—a gift from heaven. The artist is supposed to have ascended the celestial regions to furnish his mind with this perfect idea of beauty. 'He,' says Proclus, 'who takes for his model such forms as nature produces, and confines himself to an exact imitation of them, will never attain to what is perfectly beautiful. For the works of nature are full of disproportion, and fall very short of the

The gusto grande of the Italians, the beau idéal of the French, and the great style, genius, and taste among the English, are but different appellations of the same thing. It is this intellectual dignity, they say, that ennobles the painter's art, that lays the line between him and the mere mechanic, and produces those great effects in an instant, which eloquence and poetry, by slow and repeated efforts, are scarcely able to attain."

There is a singular circumstance connected with Valentin's fate, or rather with that of his pictures. They were greatly admired by Louis David, the restorer of classical art in France; yet they contained the first germs of that Romanticism whose advocates were destined, at a subsequent period, to decri the works of David and his school. Compared with Nicholas Poussin and Lesueur, Valentin played a part nearly similar to that which, two centuries later, was reserved for Géricault with regard to David and Prudhon. The Greek and Roman traditions, which, since the time of the Renaissance, ruled the art and literature of France, had not succeeded in completely obliterating all traces of the energetic instinct of reality which formed the foundation of the Gallic mind, and which had manifested itself in Poussin himself, through all his aspirations towards the Ideal. Valentin was, in France, the grandest example of that materialism, which was so striking and robust in the pictures of Le Nain, and which subsequently assumed so pleasing and manly elegant a chagenious Pymandre, do not fail to remark to the latter that Valentin's manner would have been less black if he had not imitated Carravaggio. This profound reflection turns the extent of the appreciation felt for Valentin by one of our masters in the famous "Entretiens," of which many people are in the habit of talking without having read them. It is only in our own time that literary amateurs, belonging to the new school, have written some few pages filled with sympathy for Valentin, because they truly perceived that if Valentin confined himself to the march of an arm, to say others lost in places of equivocal reputation, to dark complexioned mendicants, to bravi and to hoidiques, it was because, in their garments and cuirasses, he perceived the elements of a school of raeter in the compositions of Chardin, down to the time when the disciples of the so-called Romantic School added the charms of a new species of poetry to this sentiment of the Real, this passionate love of Nature. As a necessary consequence of this, we find that the first persons to praise Valentin with any degree of warmth were the writers of the present school. In the books that were published on Painting during the last two centuries, Valentin is treated as a skilful artist who misapplied his talent. He is reproached with having produced low and vulgar types, and chosen subjects deficient in natural dignity. Felibien, in his endless dialogue with the in-painting which possessed of an immense and rich variety, and because, in the wandering and irregular manner of the persons, he had the faculty of drawing the most interesting which was that of a more powerful. It is true that Valentin was in part led by his admirers, who then considered him as one of their deities. It was not, however, the reason that they praised him, but because, in the ordinary, they would find it a strong and beautiful and useful thing.

rendered. But you will everywhere find the most noble examples of nature, and that very frequently in subjects which require more dignity.

* "You admire in Valentin," says Cochin, "a vigour of colouring, a projection and roundness of the different objects, which is produced by half-tints highly coloured, and a truth of detail boldly

Valentin was the representative of this modern pantheism, and, in our own time, his admirers should be none numerous than ever. Nevertheless, no one copies his pictures in the Louvre. This is either because our young painters do not care to attain such skill in execution, or because they have the good sense to understand that they should not imitate those men whose genius is only an excuse. In spite of this, Valentin, who is now deserted, is a master possessing every requisite to charm the spectator, namely, the poetry of colour, the artifice of exaggerated shade, the relief of the flesh, and those striking beauties, in a word, which move us at first sight, and prevent us from discerning those portions of the picture which the artist has sacrificed for the general effect; for it was only by these means that he was enabled, in so short a period, to command our admiration.

One day, when some person was showing Poussin Caravaggio's picture of "The Death of the Virgin," as the very finest production of art, Poussin replied, "It is an assemblage of servants." This opinion of a great man should have decided for ever this much-contested question. It is a crushing argument against all those who deny the intervention of judgment in the choice of forms, and who acknowledge neither the importance of the principal idea, the value of the subject, nor the preponderating influence of thought.

Dying at the age of thirty-one, Valentin left but few pictures and a very small number of sketches behind him: his productions, prized as highly as those of the very first masters, have always been sought after for public collections, which their merit, still more than their size, pointed out as their proper place.

As is natural, the French museums are those which contain the greatest number. There are eleven of his works in the Louvre.

"Susannah's Innocence acknowledged" (p. 109), of which there is an engraving in this account; "The Judgment of Solomon," which we have also given (p. 105); "Cæsar's Penny," otherwise called "Le Christ à la Monnaie," which is placed as a head-piece to this chapter; "A Concert," which we have given (p. 104); "Two Soldiers accompanied by two Women," one of the women has put a soldier's hand in hers, and is telling him his fortune; another "Concert," which we have also engraved (p. 101).

In the Palace of Versailles are the four Evangelists: "St. Matthew," "St. Mark," "St. Luke," and "St. John." We have engraved the one which is considered the finest, namely, "St. Matthew" (p. 108).

Previously to 1789, this ancient abode of royalty contained a composition representing "St. Francis kneeling;" also previously to this period there was a "Christ's Descent from the Cross," at Combonniers, Valentin's birth-place.

In the Palais Royal, previous to 1789, there were three of Valentin's pictures: "The Four Ages;" "A Woman playing the Guitar;" "Music."

In the Museum of Toulouse there is a "Judith." Landon describes this picture in the "Annales du Musée," vol. xiv. p. 87; it once formed part of the collection in the Louvre.

In the Museum of Lille, "Soldiers casting Lots for Christ's Garment."

In the Museum of Valenciennes, "A Concert;" a young man is singing, while three other persons are accompanying him on different instruments: in the background there is a man lighting his pipe.

In the Museum of Nantes, "Supper of the Pilgrims of Emmaus;" one of this master's most splendid pictures, and one of the most remarkable in the collection.

In the Museum at Rome, "The Conversion of St. Matthew."

In the Museum at Tours, a "St. Anthony."

In the Museum at Dijon, "St. John, St. Peter, and the Angel;" "A Recluse in Meditation."

In the Vatican at Rome, "The Martyrdom of St. Procopius and St. Martinian." In the Capitol, "Jesus before the Doctors." In the Sésiana Palace, in the same Capitol, "Rome Triumphant;" "The Decollation of St. John;" "A Copy of 'The Transfiguration' by Raffaele." In the Donia Palace, also at Rome, "Roman Charity;" "St. John," an academical study. In the Corsini Palace, "St. Peter denying Christ." In the Justiniani Palace, also at Rome, "Jesus washing the Apostles' Feet."

In the Museum at Florence, "A Guitar-player."

In the Palais Malakane at Turin, the "Christ with the Column."

In the Pinacotheca at Munich, "Christ Reviled," or "Christ in the Praetorium," the figures half-length; "Queen Artemesia visiting the Basket-maker," figures half-length and size of life.

In the Dresden Museum there is a picture by Valentin, representing Homer: an old blind man is playing the violoncello, while a young boy is accompanying him with his voice.

In the Old Gallery at Düsseldorf, there was formerly "The Game of Morra," painted by Valentin; five armed soldiers are seated round a table, in a guard-room, playing at the Italian game called Morra.

In the Imperial Museum of the Hermitage at St. Petersburg are two admirable pictures by Valentin. The one is "St. Peter denying Christ." It is described in the catalogue in the following terms:—"Four soldiers, amusing themselves at play, are seated in the vestibule of the palace of the high-priest; as the apostle is approaching them in order to warn himself, a daemoniac accosts him and questions him on his connexion with Jesus. Her questions excite the attention of one of the soldiers, who comes up to her. St. Peter yields to the weakness of human nature, and, raising his two hands, obstinately denies the truth of the accusation brought against him, while, at the same time, his looks betray him."

The other picture is entitled, "Jesus driving the Money-changers out of the Temple" (Jésus vengeant la Sainteté du Temple profané). This picture possesses less merit than the preceding one, but still redounds to the glory of the painter.

There are two pictures of this celebrated artist in the Royal Museum at Berlin.

The only specimen of Valentin's talent in the Museum at Madrid is a "Martyrdom of St. Lawrence."

In the Belvedere at Vienna is a picture by Valentin, representing "Moses with the Tables of the Law and the Rod." In Prince Esterhazy's Gallery there is "A Requist."

In London, in the Earl of Ellesmere's Gallery, in Belgrave-square, there is a picture by Valentin, representing "A Concert;" the figures are half-lengths. In Lord Northwick's Gallery there is a composition by Valentin, representing "The Heads of two Angels smiling."

Almost all Valentin's pictures, as the preceding nomenclature proves, are to be found in the various public galleries of Europe; the number of those which have remained in the hands of amateurs and been sold by auction is too inconsiderable to enable us to form a decided opinion on the commercial value of this master's works. We will, however, notice the few whose price is stated in the catalogues.

At the sale of the Duke de Tallard's collection, in 1756, under the direction of Romy and Gilouy, two pictures by Valentin, one of which represents "Soldiers playing at Backgammon," and the other, "Soldiers playing at Cards," were knocked down to the Baron de Thiers for £16.

At M. de Julienne's sale, in 1767, a picture by Valentin, representing "A Roman Soldier," more than half-length, size of life, was sold for £20.

In 1802, at M. Robit's sale, a picture, painted by Valentin on copper, and representing "Susanna brought before the young Samuel," fetched £33.

These are all Valentin's pictures which we found mentioned; but when, on running through the various catalogues, we saw that the works of this master, as well as of Lemain, Charlin, and so many other illustrious artists of the French school, fetched nothing, while the most ordinary productions obtained the high price of £200, or £250, we felt justified in thinking that it was time for amateurs to devote their attention to a more profound study of the art, and learn to distinguish good from bad painting; by so doing, they would avoid throwing away large sums, and subjecting themselves to gross imposition.

With regard to Valentin, more especially, we shall conclude by observing, that he left no pupil, if we except a certain Tournier, a painter of Toulouse, who, according to D'Argenville, painted the "Chapel of the Black Penitents" in that city, as well as a "Descent from the Cross," at Saint-Etienne, and a picture at the Mausoleum of St. Thomas.

Gilles Rousselet engraved the four plates of "The Evangelists," which are at Versailles; Cochin, a "St. Sebastian;" Goussier, two subjects of "Goulders: Boulanger, "The Accusation of Susannah," Baudet engraved "Cæsar's Penny." Four pictures in the cabinet of the Archduke Leopold were engraved by Lisibetion, N. Soutter, Q. Boel, and Vansteen. Subsequently to this, Kauger of Dresden engraved for the Musée Français, "Susannah's Innocence Acknowledged," drawn by Fragonard; Brouillard, "The Judgment of Solomon," also drawn by Fragonard; and Claessens, "Cæsar's Penny."

This last picture was also engraved by Et. Boudet. "Two Soldiers playing at Cards" was engraved by Cl. Donat Jardinier. "Five Soldiers quarrelling over Dice," a composition full of energy, and which we have given (p. 199), was engraved by W. Baillie.

To Valentin, as an etcher, we owe the engraving which we are about to describe. It does not bear his name, but François Lanzi, called Cartes, is reported to have brought the plate from Italy, as having been really engraved by Valentin, after one of his own compositions. It is executed with tolerable care, and is not common.

"Fortune-telling;" a soldier between two women appears to be asking them to tell his fortune, which they are doing. A man seen to the left is picking the pocket of the woman near him, while he is making a sign of intelligence to the soldier with his left hand. The figures are half-length. On the right-hand side, in the margin, is the inscription, "F. L. D. Cartes exculit."

The National Library of Paris, so poor in specimens of the masters of the French school, possesses only one very small volume dedicated to Valentin's works. This volume contains a few bad engravings of his, and a large number of blank leaves, discoloured by smoke, and which time will destroy before any one thinks of collecting the compositions of this great painter.

Not only is Valentin's portrait wanting in the National Library and the Musée, but also in every other collection. It was first engraved from an artistic sketch, by M. Anatole Dauvergne, after the original painting now at Conlonniers.

Valentin put neither his signature nor any peculiar mark at the bottom of his pictures. Brouillot, however, in his "Dictionnaire des Monogrammes" (Munich, 1832), notices the fact of the letters "V B pinx." on the portrait of Nicolas Poussin, engraved by Louis Ferdinand, being attributed to Valentin. This is too vague to inspire us with much confidence; besides, the inscription in question is one found on an engraving executed by another artist, and not by Valentin.

NATIONAL PICTURES.

THE specimens of Guido—a name famous in the history of art—are in our collection by no means favourable; yet there are no less than eight of his pictures in the National Gallery. Two of them are to be found in the small room on the left hand as you enter, and are pendants to each other, and illustrate in a remarkable degree either the bad taste of Guido or that of his age, or perhaps of both conjoined.

(No. 87), "Persons and Andromeda," is an illustration of Ovid's fable. Andromeda, chained to the rock, is standing in an execrably false attitude. Her grief is ridiculous, and her manner in the highest degree fantastical; but the method of painting in some measure atones for this, being fleshy and masterly. The colour, too, is very good; but the picture is deplorably dirty, and is nearly by any means lost to advantage. The bad taste of Guido is further shown in the figure of the approaching Persons upon a perfect rocking-horse, presumed to be Pegasus. This caricature Guido would have us accept as the of Ovid. The taste is execrable.

(No. 90), "Venus attired by the Graces," is an equally celebrated, but equally faulty picture. The ladies who attend Venus, as well as her goldship herself, are to the most extraordinary extent. No—Venus, behind and. The legs which are of her nighly 3s add but rather than yep. I put out in an unready 500 age of gratitude the head, which Empress is dressing, is shown back with a fine lady like air, which would speak rather of the nature of a specimen of the nature than that of a picture. The very Cupid was the first to see, and also he looks up to the Venus, at which, by the way, her ladyship does not look and that of it nothing more than a handsome. The picture is of a fine but, and to be in by a certain amount of a picture. The picture is of half. The colours than a few feet three inches by six feet two inches. It was presented to the nation by E. M. King William IV. It has been engraved many times, the best engraving of it is by Strang.

The colour is, like Guido's general style, such; but, with that exception, were the picture a modern one, and exhibited, say by Frost, in the Royal Academy, it would be treated very roughly by critics who are able to judge. As it is, it has the prestige of the name of an old master.

Another of this master's works (No. 177), "The Madonna," was purchased by the government from Sir Simon Clarke's collection, for £2,100. It is a half-length figure, life size, and is about as far from illustrating the subject the name of which it bears as anything possibly can be. Instead of a face full of repentant grief and holy rapture, mislabbing its own worthiness, yet full of faith, worn by watching and prayer, and with its eyes cast rather upon the ground than raised confidently to heaven, Guido has given us, as his idea of the Magdalen, a fat woman, looking boldly up to heaven, in an attitude struck for the occasion, and which begs the on-looker to admire it for its trick. Add to this that any sympathy for this unskillful mode of treatment, not appealed to; that the touch is out of drawing, and the handling hard and colouring by no means brilliant; and then let any one ask why "a government," or the person who at that time patronized the gallery, could give so great a sum for so weak a picture.

(No. 193), "Old Man and his Daughters," is another of Guido's pictures, which, from the subject, does not admit of criticism. The old man is of a brick-dirt colour; and the subject wants refinement, and is thoroughly coarse and vulgar.

(No. 196), "Susanna and the Elders," by the same master, is another purchase of the government for £1,260. We doubt whether, if brought to the hammer again, it would fetch half the price. The figure of Susanna is graceful, but that is all that can be said in praise of it. It is careless in execution. The two elders are placed in the background, and entirely neglected, there being no variation whatever in their faces or attitudes.

The last and best of Guido's productions in this gallery is another sacred subject, one strange to Protestant ears—"The Coronation of the Virgin." It is a kind of apotheosis of St. Mary; angels surround her, and place a crown of lilies on her head. To keep the principal figure very prominent, the angels and cherubs are, as it were, flattened; but the arrangement is graceful, the drawing is not very faulty, and the colour is vivid and brilliant. The picture, on the whole, is a very pleasing one, and gives a more favourable idea of the powers of Guido than those previously noticed. There is, however, a great want of mind in the picture, and, reviewing the specimens of Guido which we have gone through, one rather wonders at the price his pictures were formerly valued at, than that they have ever been the subject

The master of Titian, Giorgione, was contemporary, his day, and is not a water, as it is, but it is a very good picture in a gallery. It is No. 115, "The Death of Peter Martyr." It is sketchy, well drawn, and terrible; but the hard, black shadows give no idea of the lofty boldness of this master. The painting, however, is very interesting, and is a fine example of exhibiting the progress of a martyr's death.

Titian, the best of the Venetian school, and the painter who shines with Raphael, and is the greatest artist the world has seen, has two pictures in our collection, in Titian's speciality. The first is called "St. Mark Preaching in the Desert." It is a half-length figure, and is a very good picture of Titian. It is badly drawn, but the colouring is excellent. It is quite good, which is a very good thing. The figure is a good one, and

* "Le Peintre Gouzer Français, a Catherine Raouzeau de Estampes gravées par les Peintres et le Dessinateurs de l'Ecole Française," par Robert Dumesnil. Paris, 1834.

(No. 4), "The Holy Family," is a very agreeable picture, also by Titian, and in this case a genuine one. The infant Saviour is very excellent, but the St. Joseph stern, undignified, and forbidding. The colour is admirable, and this praise also applies to the handling.

(No. 32), "The Rape of Ganymede," a life-size composition of a boy carried off by Jupiter's eagle, is a picture worthy of Titian. The action of the boy, carried off without a chance of escape, yet looking backwards to the earth from which he came, is fine; the eagle and the sky well coloured; but, from the fact of the fable forming no point of credence amongst Christians, as well as the impossibility of the action, the picture loses its interest to an uneducated, nay, even to an educated mind. In shape this picture is an octagon, and fitted for the centre decoration of a ceiling, for which it was no doubt painted.

his countryman Dante fills in poetry—of Michael Angelo, we have in the National Gallery but one specimen, and that is, unfortunately, a very inferior copy. It is in the catalogue (No 8), "A Dream—the Vices disclosed at the Last Judgment." It represents a man roused by the angel of futurity to look upon a retributive punishment, supposed to grow out of the vices of man. It is very grand in conception, and the figure of the man is one of the finest of modern conceptions, and will bear comparison with the antique, which Michael Angelo is known to have studied. The fact of imagining so great a picture shows how far superior was this painter to all others in mind. Of his power of drawing and finish, this gives little idea. The original, from which this picture is painted, is considerably larger—more than twice the size—and forms a portion of the royal collection of Spain.

Of the Claudes we have already spoken; those that the national

ST. MATTHEW.—FROM A PAINTING BY VALENTIN.

Of (No. 34), "Adonis and Venus," we have already spoken. The present picture is a copy.

(No. 35), "Bacchus and Ariadne," is the finest specimen of this master which is in this country. Yet to us the action of Bacchus alighting from his car seems awkward and ugly, and such as should not have been attempted; the figure of Ariadne also seems to be destitute of grace. Yet of this picture Mrs. Jameson says, that it "presents on a small scale an epitome of all the beauties which characterise Titian, in the rich, picturesque, animated composition, in the ardour of Bacchus, who flings himself from his car to pursue Ariadne, the dancing bacchantes, the frantic grace of the bacchante, and the little joyous satyr in front, hailing the head of the sacrifice." It cannot be denied, indeed, that this is a very fine picture, deserving of much study, full of excellent drawing, graceful composition, and rich colouring; and that it is one of the pictures well worthy of a national collection.

Of the great rival of Raffaele, the chief of the Florentine school, and the most epic of all artists, filling in painting the place which collection possesses are very fine specimens, nor have they, whatever may be said to the contrary, suffered by their being cleaned.

Of the two Caraccis, Agostino and Annibale, who both adorned the same school, the Bolognese, and flourished contemporaneously, we are not without specimens, nor are those without worth. Of Agostino, the younger Caracci, we have but two specimens (Nos. 147 and 148), and these are cartoons, both of them, however, of a very fine order, beautifully drawn. The first is "Cephalus and Aurora," and can scarcely be too much admired, for its delicacy of conception and its grace of drawing. The arrangement of the picture, the clouds, and the Cupids, are very beautiful; and, as a cartoon, this may be deemed a very excellent specimen, and one worthy every consideration on the part of the student.

In (No. 148) "The Triumph of Galatea," the artist has been indelicate; but the composition, grace, and harmony of the piece can scarcely be surpassed. Had Agostino Caracci lived longer, he would undoubtedly have been the first of the Bolognese school.

No less than eight pictures bear witness to the style and mind of the elder Caracci, Annibale. Of these (No. 9), "Christ appearing to Peter after his Resurrection" is unworthy of its high reputation, although it expresses strong devotional feeling and has about it some excellent colour. The blue draperies stand in curiously affected and sharp folds, devoid of much grace.

(No. 25), "St. John in the Wilderness," is open to much the same objection, and is besides monotonous.

(No. 56), "Landscape with Figures," and (No. 63), "Prince Guistiniani and his Suite returning from the Chase," are landscapes and favourable specimens of this style of painting by Caracci. The latter is a fine landscape; the sky is light, loose, and airy; the trees in the distance well painted; and the gay dresses of the expression, so devout in the faith of the saint, so chaste in character and solemn in tone, that it should perhaps be attributed to Agostino Caracci rather than to Annibale. The reader will do well to study this picture, as a very excellent specimen of the old masters.

Of Raffaele, by many thought to be the prince of painters, we have four specimens, or soi-disant specimens. One we have already noticed. Another (No. 168), "St. Catherine of Alexandria," is quite unworthy of his name, and gives us but an indifferent idea of the painter of the Hampton Court cartoons.

(No. 213), "The Vision of St. George," a sleeping knight visited by an angel, is very good indeed for what it was originally intended for, the illustration of a book. The landscape at the back is what he might have caught from one of his master Perugino's pictures, and in composition is exactly one of those to which we now apply the term Pre-Raphaelite. The colour of this little picture is very courtiers of the prince light up a landscape which would otherwise be dull and sombre. This picture is one of those bequeathed by the Rev. W. H. Carr.

(Nos. 93 and 94), "Silenus gathering Grapes" and "Silenus teaching Apollo to play upon the Reed-pipe," though both small pictures, are both excellent. The latter is especially so; the grace and youth of Apollo, and the timid yet intelligent expression with which he glances at his old master, have never been surpassed. The attitude of jovial carelessness and the connoisseur look of Silenus are also very excellent; whilst the perfect animal nature of the head, in contrast with the quick intelligence of that of Apollo, is both excellent and remarkable.

(No. 198), "The Temptation of St. Anthony in the Desert," is one of the finest pictures in the gallery; but it is very different from any of the specimens of Annibale Caracci. It is so refined in bright and pleasing, and cannot but give delight to those who look upon it as an early specimen of the great Italian master. Beneath it, in the same frame, hangs an outline—no doubt, the original drawing—which the artist has punctured, so as, by powdered plumbago or other means, to get the outline down upon the surface on which he painted the picture. The whole contents of the frame are very interesting, and so valuable, that although the panel only measures seven inches square, the British government, in 1847, gave the executors of Sir Mark Sykes £1,000 for it.

We shall again, and in our third paper, for the last time visit this gallery, in conjunction with another near London; and in the meantime we recommend those of our readers who are interested in art to pay another visit to the national collection in Trafalgar-square.

DISCOVERY OF OIL-PAINTING.

PREVIOUSLY to the commencement of the fifteenth century, the colours used by artists were mixed with a solution of fine gums, the yolks and whites of eggs, or with dissolved wax: and the manner in which the paintings executed in that style have preserved their colouring is surprising. It has, indeed, been asserted by some writers, that oil-painting was known in Italy so early as the thirteenth century; but some Tuscan pictures of that period were analysed by Bianchi, an able chemist of Pisa, and though apparently done in oil, the vehicle used proved to be wax, which served to protect the picture from damp, as well as to give a brightness and gloss to the colours. But all the oil discoverable in any picture of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries which has been experimented upon, is a very small quantity of some essential oil, which appears to have been used in dissolving the wax. When eggs were used, the canvas had to be prepared with a coating of lime or gypsum, which acted as an absorbent; and gum-water required each covering of paint to be dried in the sun before a fresh colour was added, a process which, besides being very tedious, interfered with the harmony of the colouring.

John Van Eyck, an artist of Bruges, experienced the inconvenience of this process in a painful manner by the splitting of a panel he was painting by the heat of the sun, to which it had been exposed to harden the first coat of colour. This accident led him to turn his attention to the task of discovering a substitute for the vehicles then in use, which would acquire a proper consistency and hardness without the aid of the sun. After many experiments, he discovered that boiled linseed-oil and nut-oil were the most drying; and by mixing these with other articles he produced, says Vasari, "a varnish which, dried, was waterproof, and gave a clearness and brilliancy, while it added to the harmony of his colours." This discovery was made about the year 1410, and appears to have soon become known to the artists of Flanders and Germany: for there is a "Holy Family," by Aeyck, in the Dresden Gallery, creditably painted in oil, with the date of 1416.

The artists of Italy, admiring the harmony and brilliancy which colours received under the new method, sighed to possess a secret so valuable to their art. Antonello da Messina made a journey to Bruges to obtain it from the discoverer, and having succeeded, returned to Italy, and communicated it to Domenico, a Venetian artist. The latter, after practising his art at Loretto and Perugia, where he enjoyed a high reputation in 1454, went to Florence, where the success which he obtained excited the envy of Andrea de Castagno, who was the first artist of the day, as regards vigour, design, and perspective. Jealous of the fame of Domenico as a colourist, he obtained the secret from him by pretending the warmest friendship, and then assassinated him, in order that he might be without a rival in the art. The mystery in which the deed was shrouded caused a number of innocent persons to be suspected and imprisoned; but Castagno, on his death-bed, disclosed his guilt, which has rendered his name infamous in the annals of art. His finest works have perished; but there remain a "Crucifixion," painted on a wall of the Monastery of the Angeli, and another picture in the Church of Santa Lucia della Magnuoli. After the death of Castagno, the secret of painting in oil became generally known, and its superiority was so apparent that it soon became generally practised.

The chief painters of Italy, previously to the introduction of the method discovered by Van Eyck, were Cimabue and Giotto, whom Lanzi calls the Michael Angelo and Raffaele of their period. Some of the works of Cimabue are still preserved, as relics of art, in the Cathedral of Santa Croce at Florence. Giotto was the pupil of Cimabue, whom he greatly excelled. There are several of his frescoes in a chapel at Padua, among which a "Crucifixion" and the "Casting Lots for the Vesture of Christ" have been much admired.

Few of the works of Van Eyck are now in existence. A picture containing the Virgin and Child, with St. George, St. Donatus, and other saints, is in the Cathedral of Bruges: this is in oil, and the colours are still fresh; but it has little of the boldness of composition, vigour of drawing, and brightness of colouring, which characterise the productions of later Flemish artists, of which school this painter and his brother Hubert were the founders. The Pembroke collection contains a small picture of "The Nativity," which is the best of Van Eyck's existing works; it is in oil, and the colours are, for the most part, very pure and fresh. The red garment of Joseph looks as fresh as if painted recently, and the same may be said of all the draperies, except that of the Virgin, which has changed from blue to dark-green.

The new style of painting did not make its way, and achieve a triumph over the old methods, without encountering some prejudices, as seems to be the fate of every discovery, whether in science or art. Even the mighty genius of Michael Angelo did not appreciate it; when requested by the reigning pontiff, Paul III., to paint the ceiling and walls of the Sistine Chapel in oil-colours, he replied that painting in oil was fit only for women, and that if he worked at all it should be in fresco. He did so, and admirably as he succeeded, some connoisseurs have thought that the brightness of the colouring of his "Last Judgment" might have been improved. Leonardo da Vinci did not succeed in this style; the cartoon of the battle of Niccolò Piccinino, executed in rivalry with Michael Angelo, was never finished, on this account. Mecheirno, a painter of the Siennese school, was another who succeeded better in distemper than in oil.

The first of this school who adopted the new method of preparing colours was Matteo di Giovanni, whom some writers on art have designated the Siennese Masaccio; but he is far behind the old Florentine master, though he gave more variety of expression to his heads, more grace to his draperies, and more correctness to the human form, than the school of Siena had before exhibited. The first of the Venetian school who painted in oils was Bartolomeo, whose last picture, an "Ascension," will bear comparison with the best works of the period in which he flourished—the beginning of the fifteenth century.

THEODORE GÉRICAULT.

THEODORE GÉRICAULT, of whose biography we gave some particulars in presenting an engraving of his masterly picture of the "Wreck of the Medusa," was a pupil of Guérin: the representative of pure classic art saw grow up in the bosom of his own school the beginning of that violent reaction in favour of the romantic style which became in Géricault a powerful reality. Strange, that the first who protested against the Greek idities and all the race of Agamemnon should proceed from the studio of him who painted "Phœdra," "Clytemnestra," and the "Sacrifice to Esculapins!"

Gras had imparted an heroic sentiment to matters that were really commonplace; Géricault continued the movement, but with more boldness, casting off the traditional rules of the antique school, in all that was antagonistic to the French character, and revealing the poetry of art in a very high degree.

Two passions revealed themselves in Géricault at a very early age, and remained undiminished during the whole of his brief existence; these were a love of the arts and a love of horses. The delight which he took as a boy in being among horses, and witnessing the hippodramatic spectacles and feats of equestrianism at Franconi's have been noticed in the article to which we have directed the reader's attention; and this love of horses he carried with him into the studio. To be a great horse-painter was his earliest ambition, and his first studies were the inimitable horses of Rubens; how far he attained the first, and the results of the latter, may be seen in the illustration which accompanies this notice of his works (p. 112).

Before he obtained a studio of his own, which he was for some time prevented from doing by his father, who disliked the avocation he had selected, he worked in those of his friends, usually in that of M. Dorey. In 1712 he rented an empty shop on the Boulevard Montmartre, where he painted his first picture, an equestrian portrait, in full regimentals, of Lieutenant Diénonne, of the corps of Guides, generally known as "The Chasseur of the Imperial Guard." The fierce-looking officer, who has his face turned towards the spectator, holds a curved sabre in his right hand, and seems to be ordering a charge. The ground is difficult, being broken and craggy, but the attitude of the horse is at once bold and natural. The plume of the rider's military cap is agitated by the wind, which also spreads out the short Hussar's pelisse. The horse is gray; the head is full of fire and expression; and the finely developed limbs show how well the painter had studied the motions of the animal. The filling up of the picture is in harmony with the principal figures. On the right is seen a field-gun, to which two horses are attached, but of which the drivers and gunners have disappeared. Through the thick cloud of smoke which the fire of the artillery has rolled over the field of battle, several Hussars are seen charging, but only imperfectly, for they are partially veiled by the smoke. On the left, a trumpeter is sounding the charge, while about to plunge into the smoke which as yet conceals the enemy. The sky is dark and stormy, according well with the character and tone of the whole picture.

The exhibition of this picture was Géricault's debut as a painter. Among artists of the old school it excited more astonishment than admiration: it was like nothing they had ever seen before, and the boldness of the young painter was not appreciated. Guérin had assured him that he would never become a great painter, and advised him to give up painting altogether. We are here reminded of the advice given by Sir Walter Scott to the Ettrick Shepherd, that he should abandon poetry, in which he would never succeed, and give his undivided attention to his shop and his pastures. Hogg thought differently from Scott, and Géricault differed from Guérin; the result in both cases proved that the pupil had a more correct perception of his own powers than the master.

Géricault was satisfied with his success, and was not long in producing a companion-picture to the "Chasseur." This was the "Wounded Cuirassier," which was exhibited in 1814. It represents a dismounted cuirassier, standing upon a sloping ground, and holding his horse by the bridle. The horse is a dark-bay, and his head recalls those of Gros. The unfortunate cuirassier raises his eyes to heaven, and sees only dark clouds—heavy, metallic, and bordered with a lurid and sinister light. Weakened by his wound, he seems about to sink under the weight of his distress. With one hand he holds the bridle of his horse; the other rests upon his sabre. The expression of his countenance is sad, yet energetic—such as characterises some of the soldiers in "The Battle of Eylau," by David. The sombre and desolate scene seems to imply that the picture represents an episode in the memorable and disastrous retreat from Russia, when the French soldiers were nightly raised from their bivouac fires by the attacks of the Cossacks, and so many thousands of brave men found their graves among the deep snow-drifts.

It was in the interval between the two exhibitions, in 1813, that Géricault produced his two superb studies of the fore and hind quarters of horses, now in the cabinet of Lord Seymour. The former is a series of seven figures in an oblong frame, and is much admired for the fire and grace developed in the attitudes. The study of hind-quarters is a chef-d'œuvre of its kind. The various attitudes of the animals are portrayed with a fidelity to nature which has never been surpassed; the action of scrapping the ground with the feet, the inquiet movement of the tail, all are represented. The horses are of all colours—gray, white, chestnut, and black. These were subjects which few artists would have chosen; but Géricault took a peculiar delight in the representation of horses under every variety of aspect, and he produced them without any apparent effort. Every one saw that the painter had studied the nature and habits of the animal.

Returning to his studio after his brief period of service in the gardes du corps, his admiration of the pictures of Gros became more exalted every day, and he passed whole hours in their contemplation. It is said that he even paid nearly forty pounds for the privilege of executing a copy of "The Bottle of Nazareth." He always pronounced the name of Gros with great respect, and spoke of his work in a tone of the most elevated enthusiasm. Though he had not concurred in the opinion of Guérin respecting his own abilities, he could not despair of ever attaining the eminence of Gros. Yet, in the representation of horses, he excelled that painter. He was the best painter who, after having studied the different varieties of the horse, had portrayed them all with equal spirit and fidelity. Horace Vernet painted only troop-horses; Gros the Arab of pure blood; Vandoumonen the heavy-built Danish horse; Andrye the Spanish pinto. Géricault is, perhaps, the only artist who has painted the horse in all its varieties. The free admiration which he professed for the works of others is honourable to his character, provided it does not his soul was incapable of jealousy. When he discovered a fault in the work of an artist, he pointed it out with pleasure that was evidently sincere, and seemed to feel a much gratification in contemplating it as he would have done had the work been his own.

His visit to Italy had little or no effect upon his style, beyond increasing his contempt of the Low. Returning home a painter of horses, what, in fact, led Italy to show him up even to the horses of Rubens, which he had studied in the Museum? It was after his return from Italy that he produced his striking picture of the "Wreck of the Medusa," which now hangs in the gallery of the Louvre. This fine picture, one of the finest productions of the modern French school, which delimits in the portrayal of misery and horrible scenes of pain and suffering, has been so fully described in the notice referred to at the beginning of this article, that we need not dwell upon it here. It was exhibited in 1819, and occupied the painter six months in the execution.

This fine composition is almost the only one in which Géricault has departed from the representation of his equine favourites. In the "Horse Dealer" (p. 112), five cart-horses, of various colours, are represented, with humpen halters on their head and tails tied up, indicating that they are on their way to some fair or market. The muscular limbs of the ponderous animals are well portrayed, and the artist has thrown into their heads some of the fire which distinguishes his war-horses. The foremost is be-tridder by a rustic, who leads another by the halter, and an old man trundles behind. In his "Coal-Wagon" the horses are of the same kind—fine, powerful animals, five of whom are drawing a waggon, laden with coals, down a hill so steep and uneven, that they have evidently some difficulty in keeping their footing. The attitude of the trace-horse behind the leader, with his extended fore-leg firmly planted upon the ground, and his body thrown back, as if making an effort to save himself from falling, is excellent. One of the coachmen is seated on some sacks on the fore part of the waggon, in a position of easy indifference, while his comrade is holding the head of the shaft horse nearest the spectator, to prevent the waggon from acquiring too great an impetus. The sea is seen in the distance, with a couple of fishing-boats gliding over the rippled surface. "The Flying Trot" is a picture of a different character, and yet revealing the same traits; two race-horses career over a wide plain, one rody, the other black, in a groom; the head and slightly-curved neck of the mounted courier are very fine.

The accident which led to the death of this talented artist, at the age of thirty-three, was an incident in accordance with his whole life. Thrown from a fiery horse on the heights of Montmartre, he received injuries from which he never recovered, aggravated as they were, by his rising from his bed before he had regained strength, and attending the races on the Champ de Mars, when he received a violent shock in a gentleman riding just behind him at full speed. Painting horses, and especially the mounted courier and full speed, being his special avocations, he executed some of his sketches of Oriental animals, in 1817, which are now in the possession of M. François Arago, brother of the noble and astronomer of that name. He even meditated the execution of two grand pictures, the subject of which were to have been "The Arab on Slaves' heads," and "The Opening of the Doors of the Inquisition." From the evidence he has given of his powers in the "Wreck of the Medusa" there can be no doubt that the contemplated work would have added largely to his reputation had he lived to execute them. We can imagine the low show of Géricault, the tall palm-tree, the fish-belly horse, the dog lying on the ground, the still and solitary, the red horse of the Arabian, and the black and white of the slaves, like the black eagle on the rock, the black and white of the eagle, the red horse of the Arabian, and the dog lying on the ground, which Géricault has given such striking evidence of his ability to portray. And then the painting of the victims of shipwreck being represented much nearer to the raft than the painter finally decided upon depicting it. Another design for the same picture, in the possession of M. Ary Scheffer, presents a still wider departure from that which he transferred to the canvas; it represents the mutiny and bloodshed by which additional horrors were added to those of shipwreck and famine.

Inquisition, the liberation of the victims of the Dominican brotherhood—what scope would have been there afforded for the representation of the same strong emotions! But a renewed attack of the malady carried off the artist, whose remains repose beneath a marble monument, the work of M. Etex, adorned with bronze relief, copied from his principal works.

Two pictures by Géricault, called "The Village Smithy," and "A Child Feeding a Horse," were exhibited by his friends shortly after his death. He also left a magnificent design of a man holding a horse, several studies for a picture of "Mazeppa" (a fine subject in the hands of such an artist), a pen-and-ink sketch of a mounted negro, and a design, executed in the same manner, for his contemplated picture of "The African Slave-trade." "A Brigand Scene," which he also left in his studio, is a grand composition, containing a number of spirited figures.

In the collection of M. Collet is a painting by Géricault called "The Sèvres Diligence;" and the gallery of M. Delessert contains a very fine one, representing a brewer's dray, loaded with beer-barrels, and drawn by two stout horses; in the foreground is a black dog. The lithographs which he executed are very numerous, and in the first style of the art. The Bibliothèque Royale at Paris possesses ninety-six subjects; and since the principles upon which Géricault worked have been better understood and appreciated than they were during his life, they have been several times repro-

THE HORSE DEALER.—FROM A PAINTING BY GÉRICAUT.

Some of the most striking productions of Géricault are to be seen in the gallery of the Palais Royal. Besides the equestrian portrait of Lieutenant Diendoné, commonly known as "The Chasseur of the Imperial Guard," that collection contains his "Exercising on the Plain of Grenelle," his "Hussar in a Charge," and his "Wounded Cuirassier," already noticed. "The Wreck of the Medusa," as already stated, adorns the walls of the Louvre Gallery. Many of his drawings are comprised in the collections of MM. Scheffer, Collet, Baroilhet, Eugene Delacroix, and others. The cabinet of M. Marcille contains a small, but very beautiful painting, in a style which Géricault seldom attempted; the subject is the mythological fable of Leda and the swan. In the same collection is a very fine study of a flute-player, and two pen-and-ink designs for the "Wreck of the Medusa," differing from the picture and from each other; the ship which bore down to the relief of the famishe duced. The celebrated engraver, Reynolds, who assisted to make Géricault known in this country by his engraving of "The Wreck of the Medusa," executed several other plates after his compositions, in the dark and striking style which characterises his works.

The pictures of this master are seldom met with at public sales. In 1837, however, a racing-piece, from the cabinet of M. Ducos, representing three horses, mounted by the jockeys who are to contend for the prize, and pushed to a gallop, was sold for £14. Another racing-scene, finished by Géricault, produced £22. A picture of a jockey holding a race-horse was sold for £16, and a study of one of the horses of Napoleon, £36.

Géricault seldom affixed his signature to his pictures; the "Wreck of the Medusa" is not signed; the "Chasseur" in the Palais Royal, however, bears a signature.

JACOB RUYSDAEL.

The father of this eminent landscape painter, exercised a profession which brought him into constant communication with artists. He was a manufacturer of those fine ebony frames which were then in such great repute in the Netherlands, and the simplicity of which accorded so well with the tastes and habits of the people. Having acquired a certain degree of competence, he had given his son a liberal education; and Jacob, after a rapid progress in classical studies, took a degree in medicine, which he is said by Houbraken to have practised with success before he became a painter. We know that Ruysdael learnt to draw, and even to paint, in early youth, his father's shop being frequented daily by the great artists of the day; but we are ignorant of the epoch at which he abandoned medicine and surgery for painting. Descamps asserts, that at the age of twelve he had painted pictures which astonished every artist; but we may be allowed to suppose that the desire of adding to the glory of this great painter the merit of a marvellous precocity, has led his admirers to attribute to him some pictures of his brother Solomon, who was twenty years older than himself.

It often happens that, in strong and impassioned natures like that of Ruysdael, the ruling passion does not reveal itself until it has been a long time buried in the deep recesses of the mind. It is, therefore, more prudent to rely on the testimony of Houbraken, without heeding the assertions of Descamps, whose notice of Ruysdael contains almost as many errors as words. For instance, this very artist, who is represented as having produced masterpieces at the age of twelve, is described by the biographer at a later period as going to acquaint Berghem with the ardent passion he felt for painting. At what age could he have conceived that passion, if he had practised the art so successfully at the age of twelve? But this is not the only error which this writer has committed. "The works of Berghem," says he, "pleas'd Ruysdael very much; it even seem'd as if there was some resemblance between the genius of both; he paid him a visit at Amsterdam, and acquainted him with his great passion for the art of painting. It is not said that Berghem was his master, but we are assur'd that they were closely united in friendship. This is enough to make us believe that, to intimate a union contributed to the advancement of Ruysdael. Summerson's certainty when, on examining his work, we recognise the touch and colour of him who had been his guide." This passage is a curiosity in its way, for if there ever existed two men of a genius not merely different, but diametrically opposite, these certainly were Ruysdael and Berghem. Grace, spirit, gaiety, were the attributes of the latter; grave sensibility and deep emotion constitute the soul and strength of Ruysdael, and therein lies his greatness. At no period of his life can we discover in his touch the resemblance of which Descamps speak. As to his colour, it is altogether different from that of Berghem; the gay and bright tones are rigorously banished; and red, for instance, never appears in his pictures at all. The probability is, that Jacob Ruysdael, who lived at Haarlem with his brother Solomon, yielded, on seeing him paint, to the promptings of his own genius, and formed his first style upon that of his brother. The works which he first executed are easily distinguished by the hardness of the touch, and the colour and composition of the skies.

An engraving, after Ruysdael, entitled "A View in the Environs of Rome," is sometimes met with in the windows of print-shops, which has led some writers to conclude that he had travelled in Italy. But inscriptions under prints are not always to be depended upon; and in the present instance there is nothing to justify the title that has been given to it. It is a gloomy landscape, under a northern sky, covered with rain-charged clouds. No splendid ruin indicates the vicinity of the Eternal City. Some gentlemen are boating on a canal; but their costume is not very characteristic, and no more Italian than the landscape itself. There is no proof, therefore, that Ruysdael was ever in Italy; not one of his works bears a trace of it—on the contrary, they are all of a sombre green, invariably opposed to a sky of slaty gray. The gleams of light which sometimes illumine his melancholy pictures, are nothing more than the rays of that sun which, rending its misty veil, warms up from time to time the marshes of the Drenthe, or the moist plains of the Zuyderzee. It is impossible, however, to believe that Ruysdael ever quitted Holland, though it is asserted by Descamps, "Ruysdael and Berghem," says he, "only copied the environs of Amsterdam and never quitted their country." With respect to Berghem, we look upon it as certain that he went to Rome, and brought from thence the Greek architecture and ruins which enhance the charm and the value of his pastoral pictures. With respect to Ruysdael, it would be difficult for him to discover, in the environs of Amsterdam, mountains so high that their summits tower above the clouds, lakes surrounded by elevated peaks, and waterfalls, such as are seen in the mountain regions, whence spring the sources of great rivers. Amsterdam is situated in a country presenting the fewest inequalities of any upon earth. Meadows, canals, and the sea, are the chief objects to be seen around the Dutch capital; and an author, who was, doubtless, acquainted with the works of Ruysdael, must have carried his ignorance or simplicity very far when he wrote that their master copied only the environs of that city.

The landscapes of Ruysdael are evidently from nature, and it is equally evident that he could not have found these romantic and picturesque subjects in his own country. It is probable that he resided some time on the borders of Westphalia, and there found those wild and sombre scenes, the aspect of which agreed with the sadness of his own heart.

Though a restless and unsociable poet, a lover of solitude, fond of wandering in the woods in reverie, and soothing his melancholy by the roar of torrents, Ruysdael was linked in friendship with a painter whose character and genius were totally different from his own—Berghem. So true is it that sympathy of minds does not always depend on their resemblance. Berghem was a man of a lively and gay disposition. Being ten years older than Ruysdael, he could give him advice with the authority to which his works, his reputation, and his school entitled him; but there was between these artists a diversity of genius which, though the men were united, must have separated the painters. Ruysdael was little understood by Berghem, and thus the union of their talents generally produced nothing but incongruities. They were as dissimilar as the song and the elegy. Upon the verge of the sombre forest of Ruysdael, or on the banks of his foaming torrents, Berghem would paint gay and lively villagers, careless shepherds driving their flocks to pasture, or a peasant carrying the farmer's young wife in his arms, while his companion pulls an obstinate little donkey along by the tail. Who can be blind to such discordance, or ignorant how grievously the unity of sentiment which reigns in the landscapes of Ruysdael must be broken by the presence of those obtrusive figures, which break the solitude of scenes whose solemn silence enchants the pensive dreamer? The intervention of any strange hand in a painting almost invariably spoils the unity of the first impression, that is to say, its grandeur. For our own part, we would prefer meeting in the forest solitudes of Ruysdael only those small figures, awkwardly drawn perhaps, that pass indistinctly in the distance, and, by simply realising the image of man, allow the thoughts of the spectator to flow freely, and make no noise in the picture.

Houbraken informs us that Ruysdael had resolved to lead a life of celibacy; and adds that he sacrificed the pleasures of the marriage state to the desire of assisting his aged father, and of never quitting him. Ruysdael had espoused nature, as it were, and this mysterious love was sufficient for his heart. His poverty may have been another reason for this abnegation. Ruysdael continued poor all his life. How could he pursue fortune, who followed poetry alone? Such fine natures are generally all of a piece, and Ruysdael's disinterestedness might be conjectured, even if it had never been proved. He whose works have enriched so many speculators, lived poor, and died young, on the 16th of November, 1681.

That ineffable melancholy, which art has never fully expressed, and which seems peculiar to a few sensitive minds, tormented this great landscape painter to his dying day. While so many artists looked on the country, like Berghem, only in a picturesque point of view, in its happy aspects, its harmonious colouring and its brilliant light, Ruysdael, a prey to this indescribable feeling, pursued, in the bosom of nature, the imperceptible and unknown ideal. Along the monotonous heaths of Keramer, in the marshy meadows of Haarlem, in the forests and at the foot of the mountains of Westphalia, he aspired to penetrate the all-pervading soul which the pantheists ascribe to the world. And as a proof that the real torment of this great painter was an aspiration beyond the invisible world towards that infinity which seems to be represented by the undecided lines on the horizon of his landscapes, he abandoned an honourable profession, the exercise of which he had successfully commenced, to seek by painting to give expression to his secret thoughts and the mysterious effusions of his melancholy.

Ruysdael is the painter of nature's elegies, and the poet of souls tried by sorrow. He seeks out the most mysterious solitudes, the most hidden recesses; he reclines at the base of a ruin, he wanders amid forsaken tombs, he walks in melancholy mood on the banks of torrents, whose murmuring fall hurls suffering humanity to rest, contemplating at times the creeping ivy as it embraces the stems of giant trees, or is reflected in the inundations of the plains. If there be a corner of the earth forgotten by human-kind, where mourning nature seems to bewail her isolation, it is there he stops. He seems in fact, to have enjoyed that voluptuousness which Montaigne had vaguely divined, without having felt it, when he wrote: "I fancy there must be some relish of epicurism and delicacy even in the lap of melancholy." It often sufficed him, to inspire this feeling, to represent a lofty pine, whose foliage spreads out at the summit of a tall and naked stem. The background of the landscape, ornamented with wood, mingles with the vapours of the horizon: the tree rises, isolated and detached from all surrounding objects, into the deep cerulean sky. Its immovable shadow darkens the waters of the lake which surrounds the narrow promontory where its roots are imbedded. A few cows are enjoying the refreshing fluid a little farther on, and the gurgling of the water against their sides is the only sound that disturbs the solemn silence of the retreat. The idea, the arrangement, and the composition of this picture are all of the greatest simplicity, but the effect is nevertheless great.

But if we would fully comprehend the pathetic beauties which Ruysdael knows how to spread over his works, even the most simple in appearance, we must pause with deep respect before that celebrated picture, which represents the "Cemetery of the Jews at Amsterdam." Three or four tombs, composed of large stones, hewn in a rude and simple style, lie scattered in disorder at the foot of a great elm-tree. The uneven and stony ground, rarely pressed by the foot of man, is covered with a rank growth of weeds and long grass. In the background is seen a clump of trees, above which rises the spire of a church. The sky is dark, but a bright sunbeam breaks between the clouds, and falls upon this field of death. The light of this sunbeam is dazzling; and the whiteness of the gravestones, which are vividly illuminated, is enhanced by the strong shadows which cover the other objects. There is something in the very brightness of this light which it is impossible to define—something which seems to remind us that it falls in vain on the tombs of the departed, that—

"The sun of life can warm the dead no more!"

The sky, too, has a character mournful beyond the power of language to express. It is veiled, like the earth, in a funereal hue. What solemn thoughts must fill the minds of those three Jews, clothed in long robes, who are threading the narrow path between the tombs! How touchingly suggestive! The great painter has represented soaring above those men, so faithful to those who are no more, a flock of swallows, birds of remembrance, whose nests may be found every summer in the same place.

Every one who walks through the Dresden Gallery, where this picture hangs, is struck with its melancholy aspect, which so eloquently reminds the spectator of the dark history of a race everywhere anathematised and proscribed. In the midst of those landscapes of the Dutch school, of those smiling past-lands of Karel and Van der Does, this sublime picture imparts a shock to the mind. By the side of those pale Dutch skies, we are only the more forcibly struck by the sunbeam which falls upon those tombs, and brightens a large broken stone, on which are cut certain illegible characters. There is nothing more solemn than such a spectacle, and nothing more sad. The epitaphs become green under the weeping willow. A dead and naked trunk elevates its leafless head near the tombs, which are already themselves in a state of ruin, offering a strong contrast to the fine group of trees which rise vigorous and verdant, as if to remind us, in the very bosom of death, of the ever-springing youth of nature. There is in this picture an abyss of melancholy, and to render it still more overpowering, the painter has introduced into it the fall of a torrent, which disturbs the silence of the tombs with the dashing of its waters.

A modern critic tells us that, in gazing upon this picture, he found it impossible to shake off the thought that Ruysdael might have himself belonged to that persecuted race, which, at that time sheltered in Holland, produced so many illustrious men. There appeared to him, in this pathetic picture, something more than the feeling of a great artist, and he was impressed with the idea that so fine a work must have been inspired by the sensibility of one of the faithful over the tombs of his brethren. We know to what an extent the Jews carry their respect for the graves of the departed, and that this feeling is amongst the number of their most cherished traditions. Mourning amongst them was always excessively rigid; they beat their breasts, rent their clothes, covered their heads with ashes; and, mingled as they are with the Christian nations of the West, they still preserve among them the vivacity of manifestation peculiar to the Oriental races. Whether Ruysdael really belonged to the Hebrew nation, whose burial-place he has so devotedly painted so often and with such a marked predilection, is a point which must still continue in obscurity, since this conjecture of the critic is based upon no other data than that afforded by this picture. The lives of painters, however, are often written more truthfully in their works than in books; and how are we to explain the frequency and the evident pleasure with which Ruysdael reproduced this picture, if he was not led into such scenes by some impulse of religion and of the heart?

It is a remarkable circumstance, that Ruysdael excited the same thoughts and produced the same emotions at different epochs, and that Taillisson, a writer of the time of Napoleon I., who belonged by education to another class of literature, and had different ideas from our own, criticised Ruysdael, and comprehended him as he is comprehended and criticised by the present generation, and with precisely the same feeling. He speaks of those sylvan retreats, "those wild heaths surrounded by sombre woods, where, separated from the rest of mankind, far from the fatigues of pomp, in the midst of silence and repose, one listens with respect to the sublime voice of nature. The landscapes of Ruysdael frequently offer similar retreats, in which very few figures are seen; the imagination delights to roam there, peopling them at will. He was fond of painting those rocks and corners of woods, mysteriously illuminated—favourable retreats for dreaming lovers and philosophers, where we seat ourselves with a book, which we soon neglect for thoughts we delight to indulge in; these spots are almost always divided and enriched by limpid brooks, which, in their tardy progress, are embellished by the reflection of the sky that illumines them, and of the banks and trees whose freshness they nourish, while the latter in return shelter them from the all-absorbing heat of the sun. Sometimes ducks, geese, and silvery swans are seen upon the peaceful waters, undertaking voyage, which are not of long duration.

We cannot find in the works of the painter of his country such touching poetry as he has imparted to his own, which inspire a tender melancholy; this, doubtless, arises from the sensibility of his mind, from his choice of subjects, and from the depth of all his groans. He has often painted the tombs of the Jews at Amsterdam. The so silent resting-place, surrounded by trees, while moulding the mind to sadness, please the eye by their unity, by the simplicity of their forms, and by the harmony of their colour. We do not see in his pictures the proud and terrible sites of a mountainous country; nor do we see in them pompous edifices, or the noble ruins of splendid architecture, no broken pillars or overturned capitals—the sorrowful remains of faded grandeur; but we see a rich soil, covered with abundant vegetation, the strong and harmonious colouring of nature, the airy vapour, the brilliancy of light, and the modest habitations of a prudent people enriched by their own industry."

There exist some very fine marine views by this painter, the more precious because they are rare. He had not far to go to seek his subjects and his inspiration. At two leagues from Amsterdam, where he had established himself, he found the Zuyderzee; and not far from that all the coast of Holland lashed by the ocean. The Dutch school boasts many painters who have shone in the representation of maritime scenery; but those of Ruysdael are easily distinguishable from others of the same description; like all the rest of his works, they bear the stamp of his genius. His is not the smooth and transparent sea of Van Goyen, the foamy, billowy ocean of Bakhuysen, nor the blue and rippling water of Vandervelde. Ruysdael's waves are deep and sombre; his tempests have an indescribable distraction, and recall the genius of Rembrandt. The Louvre possesses a marine picture by its master, in which are seen some vessels in a small, deserted beach offers no other object than a wooden jetty, shaken by collision with the waves. The colour of the water, which becomes yellow at the approach of the hurricane, is admirable for its truthfulness. The waves, in breaking, bend the long rocks, which have taken root in the mud round the jetty. They are in writhing and mixing with the swelling flood, still transparent, though stirred up. Lead-coloured clouds hide the day; it is so presentment rather than the spectacle of a storm; we do not see the danger of those at sea, but we can divine it, and the imagination magnifies it, struck by the powerful emotion imparted by the genius of the painter.

We have dwelt thus long on the peculiar and, as German critics would call it, the subjective character of the works of Ruysdael, because it is that which essentially constitutes the originality and genius of his works. It is in poetry that the superiority of this great painter consists; and it may be said, that he felt nature even more than he studied it. Valenciennes accuses him of having made use of the means which certain artists employ, who take as models small branches of trees and small stones, in order to draw whole trees and large rocks from them. "These artists," says he, "believe they are painting their pictures from nature, while they are only deceiving themselves; for the more correctly they copy the models, the more they increase the falsity of their painting. And, in fact, for the same reason that the proportion of a child do not resemble those of a man, the formation of a branch is of quite a different character from the construction of a tree. The texture of the bark is very different; and on this point the humblest amateur cannot be deceived." It is not impossible that Ruysdael may, now and then, have employed this convenient method, which rendered it unnecessary for him to leave his studio in order to consult nature; but to say that the majority of his trees are pieced from pieces of wood found in nature, is quite untrue. Ruysdael has been cited at all times for the truthfulness of his trees, and especially of the foliage, which enables us to distinguish one from another; and also for that sharp and firm touch which determines the profile of the masses, and colours the silvery fur of the trunks by the vigorous tone of the foliage; for example, the smooth white bark of the birch and the beech, which shines through the thickest verdure.

If Ruysdael has at times fallen into the fault of which Valenciennes accuses him, it is in his etchings rather than in his paintings. It may be observed, in fact, in the print known as "The Cottage on the top of the Hill," that the fallen tree which leans towards the right does not appear in proportion with the rest of the objects, and may have been sketched from a small bough. Such a liberty may be pardonable in an etching, in which the artist wished to express for his own use the sentiment, or the recollection which occurred to him at the moment, rather than to draw a correct and precise study; but it would be inexcusable in a finished picture, and this fault Ruysdael never committed. While upon the subject of this master's etchings, we may here give the critique of Bartsch: "His prints," says he, "denote the extreme rapidity and light hand of their author. One might say, they are rather written than drawn. The foliage is a spirited and confused scratching, composed of a series of zig-zags, which serve in a wonderful manner to represent real nature, every form of which should not be too clearly determined, if one wishes to avoid falling into mannerism. There is nothing of what is called method, but a rare taste, and the greatest truth reigns over all."

Ruysdael was the painter of melancholy. His pictures were but the reflex of the workings of his own sombre and moody spirit; and doubtless they owe much of their impressiveness to the awe was one of those upon whom the burden sat more heavily, and who never sought to cast it off. Those who possessed some buoyancy of spirit, whose attention was more easily diverted, saw in his works the truthful expression of phases of their own inner life. They saw that he had achieved on canvas what the pen could never accomplish - the expression of the sorrows and aspirations of the soul, by depicting the lonely and terrible in nature. What in them was the result of passing caprice or disappointment, was in him an abiding principle. It was in nature, and in nature only, that he found something to sympathise with every phase of his enduring melancholy; in the waterfall there was the monotonous but soothing evidence, sweeter to him than the voices of a choir, or the sound of stringed instruments; and in the hollow moaning of the winds through the pine forests he uttered his own griefs, in accents that none might hear and mock at. The woes of Electra, the "Sorrows of Werter," and the gloom of Manfred, are combined on his canvas in another form, but expressed no less solemnly and mournfully than in the airy fancies of the poets. No other exponent of this morbid sentimentality has ever met with so much success. The language in which he speaks is that of the eye, the same in all countries; and the idiom he uses is of nature's own devising, everywhere alike, and understood by all.

with which the world ever looks upon complete isolation from itself and its pursuit. It has little sympathy with those who seek it; but if a man seeks to nurse a great sorrow, and let it feel for ever on his own life, nourishing it with the daily contemplation of what ever is gloomy in nature, without seeking relief from his fellows, it watches his proceedings and chronicles his utterances with absorbing interest. The shade of melancholy, remorse, sadness, or despair, which has lent to the genius of Byron so much of its gloomy charm in the eyes of the public, and which has shed interest upon the story of the "Wandering Jew," is seen more distinctly in the paintings of Ruysdael than in either the poetry or the tale. He is the only artist who has fully embodied that passionate longing for rest and solitude, which, though it may be less active or recur less frequently in the lives of some than of others, exists in all. Who is there who cannot recall some hours of satiety or weariness, when the dark glen, the secluded waterfall, the gloomy forest, the stormy sky, the deep mist on the mountain top, or the hoarse dash of the surge on the lonely sea-shore, were sounds and scenes more welcome than any he could find in the busy haunts of men? This gloomy mood in most men passes away like a morning cloud, and they rouse themselves, return to society, and are happy; but Ruysdael

A gallery of paintings is not complete unless it contains some by Ruysdael, who, although he died young, left a great number.

The Museum of the Louvre possesses six, the most remarkable of which are: "A Forest crossed by a River," an admirable picture, with figures and cattle by Berghem; "A Thicket," with fine effect of light, which rivets the attention of all who look upon it; "A Windmill," with effect of the sun; and "A Tempest."

The Polydore Gallery at Vienna possesses two of Ruysdael's pictures: "A Forest crossed by a Brook," and "A Woodland Scene."

The Pinacothek at Munich has no less than nine, among which are "A Cascade," "A Steep Road," covered with trees and brushwood, and "A Snow Scene."

The Gallery at Dresden has seven, of which the most remarkable are "A Village in a Wood," "The Château de Bentheim," and "A Landscape," with figures by Adriaen Vanderveke, whose additions are more in harmony with Ruysdael's pictures than those of Berghem.

The Museum at Amsterdam possesses only two of his: a magnificent "Cascade," and "A Hilly Landscape."

The Museum at the Hague contains three: "A Cascade," "A Sea-shore," and "A View of the Environs of Haarlem."

The Museum at Berlin contains two, and that of Madrid the same number, all forest scenes.

The Hermitage at St. Petersburg is very rich in Ruysdaels, and some of them are of the first order. We may mention "A Sandy Road," with a peasant followed by his dog; "A Pathway in a Wood," on the verge of a stagnant pool; "A Landscape," in which the principal object is an old beech tree, struck by lightning, and fallen into the waters of a torrent; and "An Oak Tree blown down by the Winds."

The Bourgeois Gallery at Dulwich College, a few miles from London, contains five pictures by this master: 1. "A Landscape," a blasted tree in the foreground, and a single figure coming along the road. 2. "A Waterfall," with a hill in the distance. 3. "A Landscape," with two mills. 4. "A Landscape." 5. "A View near the Hague"—very fine.

The private galleries of England contain many of this artist's pictures; that of Sir Robert Peel possesses two, which are thus described by Waagen—1. "A Grand Waterfall," of such truth able, because it shows the influence which Hobbema sometimes had over Ruysdael. In the intention and treatment it so much resembles him, that it is ascribed to him in the catalogue. 3. "A Flood-gate," with a windmill and other buildings; a picture which is particularly pleasing by the brilliant sunlight, the clear water, and the powerful colouring. 4. By the side of a wooded hill a stream flows, in which two fishermen are drawing their net; the coolness of the wood and water is particularly attractive in this picture, the tone of which is dark. 5. A rapid stream rushes through a dark forest. Some charcoal burners and wood-cutters heighten the feeling and solitude which predominate in this dark toned picture, which was formerly an ornament of the Laperiere collection.

In the collection of Sir Abraham Hume is Ruysdael's "Corn-field" (p. 117), a nearly flat country, with a number of cows and sheep, admirably executed by Adrian Vandervelde.

There are five Ruysdaels in Lord Ashburton's collection, one of which, representing a village, is of great merit; the others are genuine and pleasing pictures, but not of the first class.

In Mr. Hope's collection there is only one, which represents a stream rushing between two pine-clad hills. In the foreground a that you could fancy you heard it roar; of a force and freshness in the tone, and care in the execution, as we very rarely meet with in such subjects by this master. His model of such scenes was evidently Everdingen, who was rather older, and, during a residence in Norway, drew from the fountain of nature. This picture, which came originally from the celebrated Brentano collection in Amsterdam, was purchased by the late Sir Robert Peel from the collection of Lord Charles Townshend. 2. "A Winter Landscape," with a view of a canal, along which runs a road. The feeling of winter is here expressed with more truth than I have hitherto seen; at the same time, the drawing, light and shade, and gradation are masterly, and the touch wonderfully light and free.

The Bridgewater Gallery contains five Ruysdaels—1. "View on the plain near Haarlem," which is covered with trees; a ray of light falls between dark shadows of clouds. The picture, which is extremely well executed, inspires a feeling of deep melancholy. 2. "A Wood," through which a road leads to a village, the church of which appears. The numerous figures of horsemen, a cart, and other figures, are by Philip Wouvermann. This fine picture, in which the feelings of country life are vividly expressed, is remarkable, because it shows the influence which Hobbema sometimes had over Ruysdael. In the intention and treatment it so much resembles him, that it is ascribed to him in the catalogue. 3. "A Flood-gate," with a windmill and other buildings; a picture which is particularly pleasing by the brilliant sunlight, the clear water, and the powerful colouring. 4. By the side of a wooded hill a stream flows, in which two fishermen are drawing their net; the coolness of the wood and water is particularly attractive in this picture, the tone of which is dark. 5. A rapid stream rushes through a dark forest. Some charcoal burners and wood-cutters heighten the feeling and solitude which predominate in this dark toned picture, which was formerly an ornament of the Laperiere collection.

In the collection of Sir Abraham Hume is Ruysdael's "Corn-field" (p. 117), a nearly flat country, with a number of cows and sheep, admirably executed by Adrian Vandervelde. There are five Ruysdaels in Lord Ashburton's collection, one of which, representing a village, is of great merit; the others are genuine and pleasing pictures, but not of the first class. In Mr. Hope's collection there is only one, which represents a stream rushing between two pine-clad hills. In the foreground a bridge crosses it, over which a woman on a gray horse, a dower and some cattle, by Adrian Vandervelde, are passing. Admirable in composition and execution.

There are two Ruysdaels in Mr. Sanderson's collection—1. In the foreground of an extensive, rich plain, where villages, groves, meadows, and cornfields alternate, the ruins of a castle are reflected in a piece of still water, the surface of which is partially covered with leaves. A bright sunbeam from the cloudy, stormy sky—one of the finest, perhaps, that Ruysdael ever painted, falls in the middle distance. A profound, serious, and unholy feeling powerfully impresses the beholder of this picture, which is the finest of the kind by Ruysdael. The figures are by Adrian Vandervelde. 2. A grand waterfall rushes between rocks in a wild country, equally distinguished by its noble composition, and careful execution.

In Mr. Hays's collection there are two Ruysdaels—1. A woody and well-watered country, with a dark, cloudy sky, and a illuminated by the beams of the evening sun. A very poetical, carefully executed picture, in the style of his etchings. 2. A wood on the water-side, with a small fall; the figures by Adrian Vander-velde.

There is a small and very pretty landscape by Ruysdael in Sir John Soane's Museum; and one in the collection of the late Lord Dudley, which represents an extensive plain, with all the attractions which this artist knew how to give to such subjects, by correctness of drawing, delicate gradation, and striking lights. It is marked with the name of Ruysdael, and the year 1660.

The Marquis of Lansdowne possesses, at Bowood, a magnificent "Tempest," by Ruysdael, for which he paid £557 5s. We also find pictures by this master in the possession of Mr. Beckford, Lord Searsdale, and the Marquis of Bute; the latter possesses, at Luton, the "Interior of the New Church at Amsterdam," with figures by Wouvermann. This unique painting comes from the Bramcamp collection, and deserves particular notice, as differing from all the other known productions of the artist. Waagen remarks, that as this great master in his few sea-pieces rivals the best pictures of the greatest marine painters, so in this he equals the most celebrated painters of architectural subjects. The perspective and chiaroscuro are admirable.

There is a very fine Ruysdael in the collection of Mr. Wells. "Few landscapes," says Waagen, "so thoroughly express the peculiar turn of mind of this master. A still, dark piece of water, on the surface of which the lotus, with its broad leaves and yellow flowers, flourishes in the refreshing coolness, is overshadowed by the gigantic trees of a forest; in particular, an already-decayed and dying beech leans its white stem far over it. On the right side of the picture are some hills in the distance; the bright daylight of the scarcely clouded sky cannot penetrate into the mysterious gloom of the water protected by its trees. The artist has felt, and represented with rare perfection, the sense of solitude and quiet repose, which at times so refreshes the human mind in nature itself."

Ruysdael left a great number of drawings in crayon and Indian ink; the Museum of the Louvre possesses three—"An Effect of the Sun;" a "Landscape," and a view of a "Road crossed by a Brook." In 1775, at the sale of the rich cabinet of Mariette, the celebrated amateur, a "Landscape," in the foreground a trunk of a tree, and in the background a village spire, sold for £187 19s. Two other drawings, one representing a "Cottage," the other a "Mill," sold for £400.

At the sale of Count Rigal's remarkable cabinet of prints, which took place in 1817, ten etchings by Ruysdael—all that are known to exist—were sold for £97 1s. 8d.

Of all the great Dutch masters, Ruysdael was one whose talent was the slowest in being appreciated by amateurs; it is but very lately that his pictures have begun to command a price worthy of them. In 1745, at the sale of the Chevalier de la Roque's collection, directed by the celebrated valuer, Gersaint, two "Landscapes" by this master were sold at £120 5s. Another, like the preceding two, in a carved and gilded frame, produced only £37 2s. A fourth, with figures by Wouvermann, rose to £72 18s. Twenty-five years later, at the sale of the Duke of Choiseul's collection, the "Entrance to the Wood" was sold at £900; a "View of the Sea-coast of Schevelingue," and a "Sea-shore bordered with Downs," brought £70 17s. Five years afterwards, at the sale of the Prince de Conti's collection, in 1777, these same pictures were sold at £2,401. In 1801, at the Robit sale, a "Cascade," by Ruysdael, rose to £133 6s.; but at the Rouge sale, in 1818, a "Landscape," with figures by Vander-velde, was pushed up to £1,208 6s.; and another, equally admirable, with figures by the same talented ally, to £520. In 1823, at M. Lapérière's sale, a "Marshy Forest" obtained £304 3s.; and a "Snow Scene," £181 9s. At the Duchess of Berri's sale, in 1837, the "Great Oak" was sold at £152 10s.; and a "Wooded Landscape" at the same price. When the collection of Cardinal Fesch, at Rome, was sold, in 1845, the "Torrent" was sold for £145 5s.; a "Cascade" for £208 6s., and the "Entrance to a Wood" for £291 13s.

Ruysdael almost always signed his etchings and his paintings in the manner represented below.

Of all the vexed questions upon art, that of cleaning and restoring pictures is the most vexed. Of other questions ecclésiastiques some get a solution, or are pushed from public notice; but every now and then this again arises. When the pictures of the National Galleries are nearly spoilt through dirt and neglect, they get removed and undergo the process of cleaning. Then it is that the smouldering vengeance and anger abounding against picture-dealers and cleaners burst forth. The "Claude" has been, not cleaned, but "skinned;" such was the name invented some few years ago. "The beautiful middle tone, the divine aerial perspective, has been entirely destroyed by the ignorant and bungling persons employed upon it."

The unfortunate person who gave the very necessary order for cleaning the "Claude" was of course assailed as much, or more, than the unknown operator. The leading journal contains, day after day, oblongations upon him; the other papers take up the subject; the monthlies, which should know, if we believe their professions, something about art, revile him; and the comic journals, not wishing to lose so good an opportunity, bring ridicule at last to overwhelm him.

We propose, in a short paper, to consider, therefore, what this picture-cleaning is, upon which so much has been said, without producing at all a clear idea in the minds of any.

The non-education of the general public in matters of taste led, some fifty years ago, or perhaps earlier than that, some hundred years ago, to a state of things very hurtful both to the artist and the buyer, and eventually to the seller also. A class of rich people, much ridiculed by caricaturists, sprang up, who called themselves connoisseurs. We need not say that these people had no canons of art, had no taste, and that they were very sorry and silly people. They perpetrated the most egregious blunders, as all people will who pretend to know that which they do not know. They filled their country mansions with great rubbish, and made the name of a rich Englishman synonymous with that of a gull throughout Italy. Their rage was to buy up Italian masters. Age seemed to them to confer every merit; and next to age, foreign extraction seemed to please them. Hence meritorious artists of our own country starved. Vile copies of "Claude" were passed off as originals, whilst Richard Wilson, for his daily bread, was compelled to paint picture after picture, and take it to the pawnbroker, till, indeed, that constant friend failed him, and took him to a room where lay piled his unsold works.

We have seen what effect the connoisseurs had upon the country; their taste led to some mistakes in our own national collection, but it did worse than this—it created that pest of art, the dishonest and ignorant picture-dealer, who joined to his vocation that of "picture-cleaner." The false glows which the manufacturers of Italy had spread upon their Claudes were liable to fade; the very excellent laking which produced the curious and antique cracks—marks of antiquity looked for so earnestly by the connoisseur—were apt to make, after a time, the paint fall off entirely, and leave a great hiatus, alas!—marime deficiente—which the restorer's art alone could re-patch. The branch of trade was lucrative; when the restorer once got into a gentleman's gallery, he seldom went out without cleaning the whole lot, and perhaps taking the order for a few other pictures which he had by him, perfectly genuine.

Well might honest William Hogarth, compelled to rattle his immortal works, rave at such a fate. Connoisseurs could see no merit in William, and he hit them too hard with his pen and pencil for them to relish his productions. Yet he had hopes of some day seeing the ancients defeated, and his "Battle of the Pictures," wherein the "Modern Midnight Conversation" had worsted an old master's group of bacchanals, gives a shrewd hint of what he would like to have seen.

William Hogarth died, however, long before the reign of Madonnas, saints, St. Sebastians, and Magdalens, and the thousand classical pendants which accompanied them did not out. Apollo never flayed Marsyas with more perseverance than did the connoisseurs the moderns. The school also of the moderns was a bad one. There was little or no study in it. What cared Barry or Northcote about costume? What cared Sir George Beaumont about truth in landscape, so long as he could stick in his inevitable "brown tree?" Looking at a green and fresh study of a landscape of early summer, by a rising artist, the illustrious amateur, Sir George, makes this immortal query: "Ah, it is all very well, young man—very pretty, very pretty; but where do you put your 'brown tree?'"

These dark days were glorious times for picture-dealers, and even later than that many have made fortunes. Latterly they have been driven from town, but seem, for some time, to have gained a standing in provincial towns. Manchester was once a glorious place for them. The mill-owners, immersed in business, had not the slightest idea about pictures; and these gentry "worked" the town. It is upon record that one of them, in the course of a fortnight, sold more than twenty thousand pounds' worth of pictures—we should word the phrase differently—pictures the price of which amounted to that sum; not one of which pictures was genuine! Now, indeed, honest sellers find a difficulty in getting rid of their paintings in that town. The cotton lords have been once bitten and are twice shy.

It was to the interest of such sellers to cry up the old masters. Upon the works of modern artists they could not get so great a profit, nor could they sell fictitious pictures if the artist was alive to deny it. They, therefore, still kept to the old masters, and to cleaning.

The latter art, which, if properly carried out and taken at a proper time, is one of the easiest and simplest imaginable, they made into a mystery. A portrait of a lady—generally, it would seem, by Lely, or some copyist—hung up at their door, divided with much precision in two halves, whereof one is white and the other black, or nearly so. The light half represents that cleaned by an "entirely new" process; it is generally of brilliant colour, and frequently by no means badly painted; so well done, indeed, that people are rather apt to wish that the whole of the picture were cleaned.

The art of cleaning has been termed by some of its professors a "mystery;" and a professor of the art, who has published a very insufficient and puffing pamphlet upon it, has told us that "a picture-dealer remarked the other day, that an artist could not restore a painting; and this has been carefully instilled into the minds of the public." We will not follow Mr. Watkins any further in the half-dozen pages which form the pamphlet, but we must remark that Mr. Watkins gives not the slightest solution of the difficulty. The mystery, which he tells us truly enough is no mystery, merely consists in the common fear of fools having rushed in.

"Where angels fear to tread."

The artist has been too timid to attempt to restore the work of a great master; the dealer, therefore, has boldly offered to do his work, and has carried off the job and has spoilt the picture.

The dirt which collects upon the face of a picture and which obscures the subject, arises from various causes. If it be only simple dirt, the best way to clean it is to wash it with clean water, rubbing it with a soft piece of leather. The picture ought then to be rubbed in a circular manner with the fingers of the hand, to get the dirt off in small patches, and thereby to render visible the contrast between the true colour and the dirt. If it has been varnished with resin, which has hardened and thus has become dirt and mixed with it, the surface of the picture will be covered with a white resinous dirt, and a new oil varnish may be used. This process is a very delicate but a very safe one, and is most judiciously proceeding in the manner described, the light and delicate touch of the master need not be interfered with.

Opal varnish, which is often used, and is so named as to have absolutely used ophthalmic varnish, is not a better kind. It requires a very different treatment. It is removed by rubbing with India-rubber or with sea or river sand, the particles of which are round, and which do not scratch. Sometimes this even fails to remove the opal; the method then employed is to use spirits of wine, which, being applied lightly to the picture, in a short time softens the varnish, so that it can then be removed. Oil, also, is used in softening the varnish; but the methods of cleaning are almost as numerous as the professors of the art. Two certain results arise from any picture that is cleaned.

Firstly, the contrast will generally be so great upon the immediate exhibition of the picture to the owner's eyes, that the colours will look raw, and the picture will appear crude, as is the case with the Claudes which have been cleaned scientifically.

Secondly, if the artist has, as Sir Joshua Reynolds did, painted with bad colours, or has himself produced unfair effect with resinous gums and varnish, the spirits of wine will, with the varnish, remove these effects also, and the picture will be, so far, spoilt. The injurious effects of tampering with colours is seen in Hilton's picture of "Sir Calphurn rescuing Scruan," formerly in the National Gallery; but the eye of the lady and part of the face having given way, and absolutely moved, the picture was removed for repair; since which, we believe, the public has not seen any more of it.

In restoring a picture, the surface must first be rendered flat, the inequalities ironed or pressed down, and the cracks and injuries filled up. This is generally done with立德石 and flake-white in powder, which, when dry, is rubbed even with the surface with pumice-stone. The next process is to restore the parts by painting over them, which requires, of course, an artist of ability to match the colour and to catch the tone.

Such are a few of the difficulties of picture-cleaning, which, on consideration, resolve themselves into those easily got over by care, knowledge, and industry, and which art has about it none of the mystery, only solved by cabalistic performances, with which its ignorant professors have hitherto, to the detriment of art, surrounded it.

EXHIBITION OF THE FINE ARTS IN BRUSSELS.

THE first exhibition of the works of the fine arts in the Belgian capital will, we trust, live in the memories of the people of the fine arts in a country which has not at all forgotten the principles of its traditional glory, as yet, and which has not, as at the present day, as regards the production of works of art and their appreciation, seen the close of the eighteenth century. Belgium has produced several very superior painters of colour. During the first half of the eighteenth century Belgian artists followed the bold mannerism which prevailed in France at the same period, and in the latter half they followed David with equal docility, and with no better success. The romantic school of France still influences Belgian art to a considerable extent, though some of the pictures recently exhibited show a tendency to "strike into" new paths in the same land, and to revert to the style of the old Flemish school on the other. One of the most striking pictures in the recent exhibition was a very fine one by M. Alexandre Lamens, who is distinguished known by his pictures of "Judith" and "Hagar in the Wilderness." In every review of the exhibition, a notice of this picture occupies the first place, and the admiring allusions are everywhere made of the artist's previous labours. The subject is one of the grandest that ever occurred to the imagination of painter or poet: it is "Judas wandering by night, after the Condemnation of Christ." The evangelists tell us in a few words that the apostate who betrayed the Saviour was struck with remorse when his Master was condemned to the cross, and going to the temple, cast down the thirty pieces of silver—the reward of his treachery—at the feet of the high priest, and went out and hanged himself. The choice of the subject, no less than the manner in which it is executed, shows that the artist possesses genius of no common order. M. Thomas has selected an incident marking a moment of time during the agony of remorse and despair which drove the wretched apostate to fill up the measure of his guilt with the crime of suicide. He has placed the horror-stricken and despairing wretch on the summit of Golgotha, in presence of the cross on which his Master has yielded up catastrophe recorded by the evangelists; for the state of mind so forcibly depicted on that haggard countenance there can be no rest—annihilation would be preferable. The thought which inspired this picture is just and profound, and the execution is equal to the conception. Brute strength in repose has never been represented in a more masterly manner than in the figures of the two sleeping carpenters. The entire picture is conceived in that style of blended simplicity and grandeur, which belongs to the narrative from which its subject is taken. The effects of the two lights, the clear and silvery moonbeams and the red glare of the fire, are managed with great skill, and notwithstanding the contrast, a profound harmony reigns over the whole picture.

A picture of totally different character, and of much smaller dimensions, is "The Imprisoned Family" of M. Gallait, which his soul in form at. At the foot of the cross, two men, the builders of the horrible apparatus of death, are sleeping near a fire made on the ground, which throws a red and sinister light over the scene. It is night, and the clear moonlight falls on other parts, and brings into relief the figure of Judas, whose pale and haggard countenance, disordered hair, and wild eyes indicate a soul rent with anguish and borne down by the weight of an intolerable remorse. With his left hand he supports himself against a rock; in his right he holds the thirty pieces of silver for which he rendered his name for ever infamous. The extremity of remorse and despair have never been depicted with greater power than by M. Thomas in the countenance of Judas. All around him is the tranquillity of nature; he is alone on the scene of his crime's sad result, for the two workmen of Pilate sleep, and profound silence reigns around. It is easy to foresee the exhibits a considerable improvement on that artist's former efforts. It contains three figures, a young man, a woman, and an infant, who are placed in the light which falls up in the centre of the picture from the grated window of the prison. To soothe their depressed spirits and troubled minds, the prisoner is playing on his violin a favourite air of their happier days. The sentiment is good, but critics discern in the picture some of those defects of execution which M. Gallait has displayed before. The same artist also exhibits a "Croatian Sentinel," which is a fine study, but has no pretension to be called a picture.

The most prolific artist of the modern school of Belgium, if such can be said to exist, is undoubtedly M. Slingsmeier. Arrived at an early age at those distinctions which are ordinarily accorded to the veterans of the art, he has not slept under his laurels, but produced a constant succession of works. Andacity and perseverance are qualities which he possesses largely, and which are important elements of success. He is not uniformly happy in his attempts, but all his works show that he possesses the chief qualifications which constitute the master—genius, enthusiasm, and boldness. M. Slingeneyer exhibits this year a picture of the insane mother of Charles V. holding in her arms the corpse of her husband. History affords some curious details bearing upon this not very pleasing subject. Joanna of Spain was the victim of a monomaniacal passion, a fever of the senses and the brain, which displayed itself during the life of her husband, the Archduke Philip of Austria, in alternations of frenzied ardour, devouring melancholy, and causeless jealousy. When he died, this diseased amativeness, as the phrenologists would call it, was displayed in manifestations of the same wild passion that had preyed upon her while he lived. The painter has depicted one of the melancholy scenes which and prostitutes drink brandy, and the man who has been in the street, but Hogarth's picture conveys an impressive moral, while M. Slingeneyer only ministers to a morbid taste. Next year we hope to see a more pleasing subject, treated with equal skill. His "Zaunikin," the heroic fisherman of Flanders, who fell in the war between Flanders and France, is a very fine study, somewhat monotonous in colour, perhaps, but drawn with the energy and vigour which characterize all his production.

M. Hamaun exhibits several pictures, of which the principal is "The Mass of Adriaen Villart," which possesses all the qualities that have distinguished the artist of this name. Adriaen Villart, a musician of Bruges, composed at the Academy of St. Mark, in Venice, a grand mass, which he performed and conducted. The artist has represented the scene of the solemn inspiration of genius as seen in the face of the saint, who finger-touch the keys with the grace and energy of a genius. Near him followed; Joanna is seated on the foot of the bed, holding in her arms her husband's corpse, on which she lavishes the caresses that were his in life. The infant Charles is present, whose innocent face contrasts strongly with the horror of the scene; one of his hands caresses the livid hand of his father, the other plays with the crown, under which he was destined to domineer over Europe. This picture elicits expressions of opinion the most conflicting; some praising it with as much vehemence as others condemn it. The execution is of the finest order: the head of Joanna is happily conceived, the body of Philip is vigorously painted, and all the accessories are traced with the hand of a master; but the taste which led to the selection of such a subject is very questionable. We are forcibly reminded, in looking at it, of the last picture of that pictorial comedy of Hogarth's—the "Harlot's Progress;" in which the innocent child of shame is winding up his top, while courtizans sit three monks, who are engaged in the same occupation, and the third is playing a flute. In the foreground, a man is seated in a chair of state, surrounded by the members of the Council of Ten, and on the left are two figures, one of whom listens to the demonstration of the operation, while the other, in a glance that the performer seems to feel, looks on. All the actors are interested in the act, and the man in the chair is listening evidently able to the whole, and not very much. The heads of the two singers are especially good. The colouring of this picture is more beautiful than usual, and the use of the gray tone which characterizes some of the artist's best productions. "The First of June," a miniature of the "Family of the Executive Council," is a very interesting picture of the nautic school, is a very fine piece of drawing.

We find in the exhibition the works of three young men distinguished by very diverse qualities, but all affording promise of a brilliant career. The first, M. Verlat, has already achieved no small success in Paris; the second, M. Cermak, announced himself by a very remarkable work in the exhibition of 1851; the third, whose genius has now for the first time revealed itself, is M. Jules Pecher. M. Verlat made his début in Paris three years ago, when he produced "Pepin the Short overcoming a Lion in the Circus," a remarkable work for so young an artist; but his subsequent works have less of the style and manner of the modern French or romantic school, and approach more to the old Flemish school. The picture in the exhibition is a commission from the Belgian government; the subject, "Godfrey of Bouillon at the Assault of Jerusalem." It is a fine composition, treated with boldness and vigour; the figures evince the hand of a master. The present production of M. Cermak is "The Propagation of the Roman Catholic Faith in Bohemia," an interesting phase of the history of his country; for this young artist, though long resident in Brussels, and a pupil of Gallait, belongs to the heroic race which produced John Huss, Procopius, and Ziska. The incident is taken from the period when Austria was engaged in purifying Bohemia from the taint of heresy, giving her for apostles the monk and the soldier. The artist has represented the interior of a miserable hut, at the moment that the missionary monk is leaving it, after exchanging the images of orthodoxy for the symbols of the Hussite heresy, leaving the inmates plunged in gloomy reflections. The eyes of the old man, whose gray beard falls upon his broad chest, are fixed upon the ground; the countenance of his son has a menacing expression, though he plays with a noble-looking dog, as if to hide his feelings. The little children play joyously with the images which remind their elders of the martyrdom of Jerome and Huss, and the persecution of their disciples. There are in this picture a profound philosophy and a maturity of thought and execution, which place the artist in the first rank among living painters. The third of the constellation, M. Jules Pecher, exhibits a "Christ bearing his Cross," which reminds the spectator of the manner of Crayer and the pupils of Rubens. The suffering expressed in the attitude of the principal figure, and the serene majesty which beams from his countenance, are conceived and executed in a manner beyond all praise.

There are in the exhibition a number of very large pictures, many of which are not above mediocrity, and may therefore be well passed over without notice. "The Battle of Gravelines," by M. Van Severlenek, is one of these vast compositions; but, unlike many of this class, it is drawn with vigour, and though, perhaps, too full of details, is a work which will repay the time spent in examining it. "Christ calling little Children," by M. Dellaqua, is not without some good points, but rather monotonous in colour, and inferior, on the whole, to his "Christ on the Mount;" but the best picture by this artist is undoubtedly "Mary Stuart insulted by the Populace of Edinburgh." The unfortunate queen is on horseback, surrounded by an angry and menacing mob, whose aspect fills her soul with terror. The cavalier near her is drawn with a masterly hand, and the architecture is treated with remarkable skill; altogether, it is one of the best historical paintings which have been exhibited in Brussels for some years. M. Stalheert, the present director of the Academy of Tournay, also exhibits a commendable historical painting, representing the death of the popular hero, Everard de R'sserelens.

That strange phantasy of the last days of Charles V., when, after having resigned the imperial crown, and lived for years in the solitude of a cloister, he celebrated his own obsequies, lying down in his coffin, and joining in the penitential hymns of the monks, has found a pictorial record in the studio of M. Robert. But it is not the funeral which the artist has depicted: when that solemnity was concluded, Charles sat long before the "Last Judgment" of Titian, and then was carried to his bed, which he never quitted till the day he was finally carried to his last resting-place. M. Robert, who has executed this picture for the Belgian government, has adopted the idea that the feeling which influenced Charles, in his abjection and retirement into solitude, was remorse; he has represented him, not as the man of suffering, devoured by religious melancholy, but as the tyrant trembling at the admonitions of conscience. Apart from the interest given to it by this new idea, the picture is a very creditable one; the artist likewise exhibits a well-executed portrait of the Prince of Ligny.

"The Virgin of the Afflicted" is the title of a grand picture by M. Dobbelaere, the harmony and brightness of the colours in which remind us of the old masters of the Venetian school. "The Confederates of the Compromised Nobles" is a composition full of merit, from the studio of M. Huysmans, the subject being taken from an episode of the revolution in the Netherlands in the sixteenth century. M. Gerard exhibits an episode of the Belgic conquests of Julius Caesar, "The Hostages," in which the two oxen attached to the car containing the hostages are remarkably well drawn, and the whole picture marks M. Gerard as an artist of considerable promise.

M. Leys, one of the most poetic of modern painters, has sent to the exhibition four pictures, all possessing great merit, though the most beautiful is indubitably his "Faust and Wagner," in which he has thoroughly identified himself with the genius of the immortal Goethe. It is the scene before the gate of Nuremberg, the festival of Easter, which M. Leys has chosen for his subject; and one more pleasing could scarcely have been selected. Faust and Wagner are seated on a bench, and before them pass the burghers and artisans of the city, with their wives and sweethearts, clad in their holiday attire.

"Forth from the arched and gloomy gate,
The multitudes, in bright array,
Stream forth, and seek the sun's warm ray!
Their risen Lord they celebrate,
For they themselves have also risen to day!
From the mean tenement, the sordid room,
From manual craft, from toil's imperious sway,
From roofs' and gables' overhanging gloom,
From the close pressure of the narrow street,
And from the churches' venerable night,
They've issued now from darkness into light."

A middle-aged burgher and his wife, with their two children, and a pair of lovers, are the principal figures in the foreground of the picture; the young girl with the book under her arm, and the poet cross on her bosom, is much more like the Marguerite of the læta than was the ideal creation of M. Ary Scheffer. The Faust, too, differs from the common type; there is an air of deep thought in the countenance which accords with the character of the daring student at that period of its development. The sentiment and colouring of the picture are equally good, and the character given to the figures shows that the artist has well studied the poem from which the subject is taken.

We have now passed in review the principal works of Belgian artists in the departments of history and poetry, and must reserve our notice of the genre painters, and also of the French, Dutch, and German artists, for a future occasion.

SIR THOMAS LAWRENCE.

THE early history of this eminent artist is mingled with the varied fortunes of his father, who had been educated for the law, but, from a fatal unsteadiness of character, became successively an attorney, a dabbler in literature, a counsellor, an excise officer, a farmer, and an innkeeper, without prospering in either of these various vocations. The future court painter was the youngest of sixteen children, most of whom had died in infancy, and was born on the 4th of May, 1769, at Bristol, within a few doors of the birthplace of Southey. Shortly afterwards his parents removed to Devizes, where for several years they kept the Black Bear public-house. Being a fine child, with full dark eyes and a very melodious voice, his father taught him to recite passages from Shakespeare and Milton for the entertainment of his customers; and his talent for declamation won praises from such competent judges as Garrick and Mrs. Siddons.

At the age of seven, young Lawrence began to sketch portraits with singular fidelity, and two years later, having read Rogers's "Lives of Foreign Painters," and seen the paintings at Corsham House, the seat of the Methuens, he produced some pictures which, together with his portraits, were thus spoken of at the time by the Hon. Daines Barrington: "As I have mentioned so many proofs of early genius in children, I cannot pass unnoticed a Master Lawrence, son of an innkeeper, at Devizes, in Wiltshire. At the age of nine, without the least instruction from any one, he was capable of copying historical pictures in a masterly style, and also succeeded amazingly in compositions of his own, particularly that of 'Peter denying Christ.' In about seven minutes he scarcely ever failed of drawing a strong likeness of any person present, which had generally much freedom and grace, if the subject permitted."

When young Lawrence was ten years old, his father, having failed in business once more, removed to Oxford, where the juvenile artist was announced as a portrait-painter. His fame had gone before him, and there was a rush to his studio; though of course his sitters must have been actuated only by the same curiosity and love of novelty that prompted so many persons to run after Tom Thumb. He was an infant prodigy, and therefore the rank and fashion of the place looked to see him. When the excitement was over, and no more money was to be made in Oxford, the Lawrences removed to Bath, where they hired a large house, sent the sisters of the young artist to boarding-school, and raised his price from a guinea to a guinea and a half. His portrait of Mrs. Siddons, as Zara, was admired and engraved; and his fame spread far and wide. His studio, before he was twelve years old, was the favourite resort of the rank, fashion, and beauty of Bath; young ladies loved to converse with the handsome prodigy, and men of taste purchased his crayon heads, which he produced in great numbers, and circulated them all over the country, and even the continent.

He was seventeen years of age when he first dipped his brush in oil colours, and began to free himself from the captivating facilities of crayons. He aspired to become a great painter, and studied in succession the works of Rembrandt, Reynolds, and Titian; but in the meantime it was necessary to live, and this he accomplished satisfactorily by painting portraits. His fame had hitherto been wholly provincial, and he longed to obtain distinction in the metropolis. A copy of "The Transfiguration" of Raffaele, painted on glass at the age of fifteen, was sent to the Society of Arts, who awarded the young artist a gilt silver palette and five guineas; and shortly afterwards he came to London, and opened an exhibition of his works in Leicester Fields, a situation which had been rendered popular by the fame of Sir Joshua Reynolds. But the attraction of juvenility was gone, and money came slowly in at first. Fortunately, he had stopped at Salisbury on his way to the metropolis, and had there reaped a harvest by no means insignificant, so that he could afford to wait. After a time, he removed his studio to Jernyn-street, and entered himself at the Royal Academy, where his drawings of the "Fighting Gladiator" and the "Belvedere Apollo" surpassed all competition.

Satisfied with his success in this instance, he was now desirous of being introduced to Sir Joshua Reynolds, a pleasure which was procured for him by Prince Hoare, one of his earliest patrons. The great artist spoke encouragingly to him, and young Lawrence was much pleased with the interview. Persons who had heard of his fame at Bath now began to employ him, and in a short time, though he lived expensively and was very charitable, he was able to allow his parents the sum of three hundred a year. He spent much of his leisure, at this time, in the society of Smicke, the architect, and Fuseli, the great painter; and when the conversation flagged, he would jump up and recite passages from Milton, with a softness of voice and gentleness of manner, "very much," as Fuseli said, "like Bial, but decidedly unlike Bezelub."

One of the first works he executed in London was "Homer Reciting the Iliad to the Greeks," a command from Payne Knight; the picture was well drawn, and had considerable display of colour, but it was wholly deficient in sentiment. Indeed, the whole strength of his genius lay in portrait-painting; and though he seems to have been impressed with the idea that he would have become a great historical painter, his studio prove that he had not the genius necessary to succeed in that lofty branch of the art. His next picture, however, was in his own field, and laid the foundation of his fame; this was the portrait of the beautiful and fascinating Miss Farnon, afterwards countess of Derby. The resemblance was striking; and Fuseli pronounced the eye copied to any painted by Titian, than which there could be any other present; but by a strange sort of fate and caprice, the charming subject was repugnant to, though not in a bad character, with unranked names. This cut of the picture to be severely criticised, but the public received it with freedom, and Lawrence's portrait, in oil of the queen and the prince of Anhalt, which appeared at the Royal Academy Exhibition of 1783, secured that he had won royal patronage and favour.

George III. having been obliged to recommend to the Academy, conveyed the strongest idea that he had the right to nominate its associates, and proposed Lawrence; but the latter was only twenty-one years of age, and the Academy had hitherto approved and sanctioned the rule that no candidate should be admitted until he had attained his twenty-fifth year. The difficulty was met by the suggestion that Lawrence should be made a sort of supplementary associate until he had attained the necessary years; and this proposition was supported by Reynolds and West; but the majority opposed it, and elected an artist. Wholly, in spite of the royal recommendation, Lawrence was again proposed on the occasion of another vacancy; and, notwithstanding the opposition of several members, who pronounced the election of their laws a subversion of order and an attack on their independence, he was elected a supplementary associate, a favour which no one has enjoyed either before or since.

In the following year, 1792, on the death of Sir Joshua Reynolds, Lawrence received the appointment of Painter in Ordinary to the king. The portrait of Miss Farnon had done much for his fame, but this mark of royal distinction did more. His preference excited some envious murmurings; for Opie, Hoppner, and Romney were then in the zenith of their reputation, and nothing but the gentle and conciliatory nature of the young artist prevented him from making many enemies. He had now become a person of a rank and consideration, took splendid apartments in Old Bond street, and made his friend Farinon, the artist, his secretary and chamberlain, all which led him to charge twenty pounds per week for domestic expenses. His usual price at this period was a half-length, and for a full-length, fifty for a half-length, and twenty two for the head only. His first commission from royalty was to whole-lengths of his Majesty and the Queen, to be presented by Lord Macartney to the Emperor of China; and many persons of distinction were led by this circumstance to have their portraits painted by him.

The envy which his success had excited now found vent in an audible whisper; artists were not wanting who insinuated that he could copy, but not create, that it was well for his time that the Follies of England were flying, and that other great painters were annoyed by these remarks; but when he had taken to his powers as a painter of his own, he was sensible that the artist who paints from his imagination, or paints by conjecture, will, those who minister to man's vanity, by flattery and flattery, receive a reward more substantial. He therefore engaged himself with renewed diligence to painting portraits of poets and historic subjects in the manner of the long detested and detestable monuments. At length, however, it began to be generally reported that he was engaged on a grand poetic composition, which only his intimate friends were permitted to see during its progress. The solemnity of the conception, the grandeur of the outlines, and the splendour of the colouring, were all but of a nature of the highest praise. The subject, however, remained a secret until the exhibition of 1797, when it proved to be "The Landing of the Fallen Angels."

"Awake, arise, or be forever fallen!"

Fuseli, who was so successful in attacking and ridiculing him to think the picture an intrusion on a much more popular subject, complained that the figure of Satan, which was that Lawrence had copied some one of his designs. The following account of the matter, however, was given by Lawrence in a conversation with Cunningham, and seems a sufficient explanation. "Fuseli, sir, was the most satirical of human beings; he had also the greatest genius for art, of any man I ever knew. His mind was so essentially poetic, that he was incapable of succeeding in any ordinary subject. That figure of Satan, now before you, occasioned the only interruption which our friendship, of many years' standing, ever experienced. He was, you know, a great admirer of Milton, from whom he had made many sketches. When he first saw my Satan, he was nettled, and said, "You borrowed the idea from me." "I did take the idea from you," I said; "but it was from your person, not from your painting." When we were together at Stackpole Court, in Pembrokeshire, you may remember how you stood on your high rock which overlooks the bay of Bristol, and gazed down upon the sea which rolled so magnificently below. You were in raptures; and while you were crying,—"Grand! grand! Jesu Christ, how grand! how terrific!" you put yourself in a wild posture; I thought of the devil looking into the abyss, and took a slight sketch of you at the moment: here it is. My Satan's posture now, was yours then."

rival. Owing to his gentleness of disposition, the rivalry continued for a time in good temper; but when the tide of public opinion turned in favour of Lawrence, his rival vented his envy in spiteful remarks. "The ladies of Lawrence," said he, "show a gaudy dissoluteness of taste, and sometimes trespass on moral as well as professional chastity." That there was some truth in the remark must be allowed; and it was observed by the poet Rogers, who said, "Phillips shall paint my wife, and Lawrence my mistress." These comments were repeated in fashionable coteries, and proved more injurious to Hoppner than to his rival. "All men laughed," says Cunningham, in his biography of the former, "and then began to wonder how Lawrence, hinner to perhaps the purest court in Europe, came to bestow lascivious looks on the meek and sedate ladies of quality about St. James's and Windsor, while Hoppner, hinner to the court of a gallant young prince, who loved mirth and wine, the sound of the lute, and the music of ladies' feet in the dance, should, to some of its gayest and giddiest ornaments, give the simplicity of manner and purity of style which pertained to the Quaker-like sobriety of the other. Nor is it the least curious part

ENTRANCE TO A FOREST. — FROM A PAINTING BY RIJSDAEL.

The sublime conceptions of Milton, however, required for their embodiment a degree of talent in the upper walks of art which Lawrence did not possess. His "Satan" wants the majesty and stern defiance, the mingled pride, bitterness, and melancholy of the fallen archangel. But Lawrence was satisfied with his picture, as he usually was; for perhaps no artist was ever better disposed to be on civil terms with himself. But he did not trust his fame for the season to "Satan." He exhibited a very fine portrait of Mrs. Siddons, which excited the admiration of all who saw it. About this time, in the midst of the vexations caused by the criticisms on his Miltonic picture, he lost his mother, whom he dearly loved, and shortly afterwards his father, who, with all his faults, was never unamiable of the blessing he enjoyed in such a son.

A rivalry had sprung up between Lawrence and Hoppner; the latter was portrait-painter to the Prince of Wales, a circumstance which led all the court beauties of the day to flock to his easel. Lawrence turned his attention to the alluring graces and gentle delicacies of his art, and at length began to gain ground upon his

of the story, that the ladies, from the moment of the sarcasm of Hoppner, instead of crowding to the easel of him who dealt in the loveliness of virtue, showed a growing preference for the rival who "trespassed on moral as well as professional chastity."

Lawrence's next exhibition picture was "Coriolanus at the hearth of Aufidius," in which John Kemble sat for the stern Roman soldier. This picture was more successful than the "Satan;" the fine figure and posture of Coriolanus, and the magnificence of the colouring, charmed the public, and nearly disarmed criticism. His "Chief of Kintail," for which Lord Seaforth sat, was less happy; the costume displayed some errors in the details, and the Highland bonnet seemed out of place on a powdered head. These deficiencies of taste and propriety show that Lawrence's true walk was portraiture, and the portraits of Mrs. Angerstein and other ladies, exhibited at the same time, were deservedly admired on that simplicity of style which is the most difficult to attain of all the charms of art.

"Coriolanus" was the first of a series of what Lawrence called

"half-history" pieces, and was followed by "Rolla," "Cato," and "Hamlet," John Kemble sitting for the whole series. Of these pictures "Cato" is the weakest, and "Hamlet" decidedly the best. "Rolla" is a splendid picture, almost faultlessly drawn, and finely coloured; but "Hamlet" is a work of the highest order—sad, thoughtful, melancholy—a perfect realisation of the finest of the great dramatist's conceptions. This picture, which most of our readers have probably seen in the National Gallery, the artist himself placed above all his works, except the "Satan;" but it far surpasses the latter in propriety of action, truthfulness of expression, and grandeur of colouring. The light touches the head and breast, and falls on

Among the ladies of distinguished beauty or of high rank, whom he painted at this period, were the Princess of Wales, the Princess Charlotte, the Marchioness of Exeter, Lady Gunningham, Lady Claude Hamilton, Lady Templeton, Mrs. Byng, Mrs. Thellusson, Mrs. Williams, and Miss Lauder. Of the male portraits of this time, the most remarkable was that of Curran, the story of which is thus told by Cunningham: "Under mean and harsh features, a genius of the highest order lay concealed, like a sweet kernel in a rough husk; and so little of the true man did Lawrence perceive in his first sittings, that he almost laid down his palette in despair, in belief that he could make nothing but a common or vulgar work, the skull of Yorick, which the prince holds in his hand. It is a noble picture, and many have wished that Lawrence had painted more of the kind; but it is very doubtful whether he would uniformly, or even in a majority of instances, have been as successful as in this.

Portraits continued, however, to employ most of his time, and constituted the main source of his fortune, if not even of his popular fame. He excelled in female portraits, which is saying not a little for his ability in this branch of art, the softness and delicacy of woman's lineaments being no difficult to catch and transfer to canvas than the bolder expression of a masculine countenance.

The portrait, however, and with it one great Irishman burst out in all his strength. He discoursed on poetry, on Ireland, his eyes flashed and his colour heightened, and his rough and swartly visage seemed, in the sight of the astonished painter, too meagrely within his own narrowest neatly beauty. "I never saw you till now," said the artist, in his softest tone of voice; "you have at to me in a mask; do give me a sitting of Curran the orator, Curran completed, and a fine portrait of Curran on its brow, was the consequence." About the same time, Lawrence painted portraits of Sir James Mackintosh, Lord Erskine, Lord Thurlow, Mr. Wynnham, and Sir William Grant.

While in the height of his professional reputation, a charge was made against him which moved him deeply, and seriously affected his practice. For some time he had been a frequent guest at Montague House, Blackheath, the residence of the Princess of Wales, and as he continued his visits to that unfortunate lady after he had completed her portrait, scandal soon began to be busy with their names. Lawrence was a very handsome man, and possessed a considerable share of vanity; but that he was either a libertine or a male flirt has never been proved, though the charge of being the latter was more than once brought against him.

This foolish affair injured Lawrence considerably for the time; probably no one believed the calumny that had been spread about, but it left its reptile trail behind, and there was a falling off of lady visitors to the painter's studio. The only female portraits which he exhibited for four years after the "delicate investigation" of 1806, were those of Lady Elizabeth Foster, afterwards Duchess of Devonshire, in the character of a Sybil among the ruins of the temple at Tivoli; and Lady Hood, afterwards Mrs. Stewart Mackenzie, of Seaforth. But the number of his male sitters increased, and among them were Lord Amherst, Sir Joseph Banks, William Pitt, Lord Melville, Lord Ellenborough, Lord Castlereagh, George Canning, Earl Grey, and the Earl of Aberdeen. In all these he has displayed considerable talent, but the last-named is perhaps the best.

As he advanced in fame he had gradually raised his prices. In 1802 his charge for a quarter-size was thirty guineas, for a half-length sixty guineas, and for a whole-length one hundred and twenty guineas; in 1806 his prices were respectively fifty, one hundred, and two hundred guineas; in 1808 they rose to eighty, one hundred and sixty, and three hundred and twenty guineas; and in 1810, when the death of Hoppner removed all rivalry out of the way, to one hundred, two hundred, and four hundred guineas. The opulent love to possess what is rare and beyond the means of the less fortunate to purchase, and the increased number of his sitters justified his advances. Yet these high prices, and the crowd who resorted to his easel, failed to enrich him; improvidence, prodigality, and generosity combined to keep him poor all his life. One of his intimate friends, who possessed largely the faculty of observation, and had abundant opportunities for its exercise, said of him: "With wealth and honours flowing in upon him, he was, during the last years of his life, a depressed, a saddened, and a failing man. His talent brightened, indeed, and his honours increased to the last hour; but the wealth, great as it was, was too little to meet the claims he had allowed himself to be involved in, and inadequate to afford his benevolence all his heart desired; and—it is a pain to know—too scanty to extricate him, at times, from an immediate pressure for money. He had many friends, and no real enemies; but it was his misfortune to have no confidential friend, with ability and influence enough to do that for him which incessant occupation deprived him of all courage to attempt."

On the restoration of peace in 1814, Lawrence visited Paris, and explored the treasures of art in the Louvre; but he was soon recalled to London to paint the portraits of the Emperor of Russia, the King of Prussia, Marshal Blücher, and the Hettman Platoff. These pictures were exhibited in the following year, together with portraits of Prince Metternich and the Duke of Wellington, the latter holding the sword of state, as he appeared on the day of thanksgiving for the return of peace. The portraits which he produced about this time are almost too many for enumeration; we can only mention the most remarkable:—The Duchesses of Gloucester, Leinster, and Sutherland; the Countesses of Charlemont, Grantham, Grey, and Auckland; Ladies Ellenborough and Wigram, Lady Emily Cowper, Lady Elizabeth Leveson Gower, Lady Selina Meade, Lady Mary Oglander, and Mrs. Arbutnot; the Prince Regent, the Duke of York, the Bishops of London and Durham; the Marquises of Londonderry, Wellesley, Anglesea, and Abercorn; the Earl of Lonsdale, Lord Lynedoch, Sir Henry Englefield, Sir Henry Poteris, James Watt, and Canova, the sculptor.

The public honours which began to shower upon Lawrence, after he had painted the heroes of the war, increased until he had as many titles as the great champion of England himself. He received the honour of knighthood from the Prince Regent in 1815, and shortly afterwards was elected a member of the Academy of St. Luke, in Rome. Two years later, he was enrolled in the American Academy of the Fine Arts, an honour which he repaid by sending the society a full-length portrait of Benjamin West. The Academy of Florence thought a picture by Lawrence a prize worth angling for, and instantly elected him a member of the first class; but Lawrence saw through the motive, and sent nothing. The Academies of Venice, Bologna, and Turin accorded him a like honour; he was elected a member of the Imperial Academy of Vienna; and got the diploma of the Royal Academy of Copenhagen, through the personal recommendation of the Danish monarch. Finally, he was made a Chevalier of the Legion of Honour by Louis XVIII. of France.

The European reputation which Lawrence had achieved by his portraits of the personages who had figured so prominently in the long war, caused his talents to be called into requisition when the rulers of the destinies of Europe assembled at Aix-la-Chapelle to parcel out territories according to their sovereign will and pleasure. The Prince Regent was desirous of decorating his gallery at Windsor Castle with portraits of those royal and illustrious personages, and Lawrence was commissioned to paint them. The portraits were to be painted at the usual price, and a thousand a-year was allowed him, in addition, for contingent expenses. Advances were made with magnificent liberality; and when the painter's commission was finished at Aix-la-Chapelle, he was to go to Rome, on the same terms, and paint the pope and two or three cardinals. The first-fruits of this splendid commission were portraits of Louis XVIII. and the Count of Artois, the Emperors of Russia and Austria, the Archduke Charles, the King of Prussia, the Duke of Cambridge, the Marquis of Londonderry, the Earls of Liverpool and Bathurst, Prince Metternich, Barons Hardenburg and Gentz, Count Nesselrode, Generals Chernicheff and Oubaroff, and George Canning. The Emperor of Austria presented the painter with a superb diamond ring, and he received a similar present from the King of Prussia.

From Aix-la-Chapelle he went to Vienna, to paint the portrait of Marshal Schwartzberg, and while there he painted those of the Duke of Reichstadt, Count Capo d'Istria, and some other celebrities. He worked very hard at this period, and was often exhausted by his unremitting labours and late hours. His portraits gave great satisfaction, and the artist himself was popular. From Vienna he proceeded to Rome, where he visited the Vatican Palace and the Sistine Chapel, and mused over the glories of Michael Angelo and Raffaele. His continental letters had hitherto been filled more with descriptions of fêtes and balls than with notices of the fine arts; but at Rome he was warmed into enthusiasm. In comparing the two great Italian masters, he awarded the palm of excellence to Michael Angelo. "Truth and elegance," said he, "cannot withstand the sublime. There is something so lofty and abstracted in those deities of intellect with which Angelo has peopled the Sistine Chapel, which converts the noblest personages of Raffaele's drama into an audience, silent and awestruck. Raffaele never produced aught equal to the "Adam and Eve" of Michael Angelo. Though the latter is the mother of mankind, there is nothing heavy or masculine—all is elegant as the lines of the finest flower."

Lawrence was introduced to Pius VII. at the Quirinal Palace, and produced a very fine portrait of that pontiff; but that of Cardinal Gonsalvi is considered to surpass all that he painted during his continental tour. While at Rome, he repainted the portrait of Canova, which he presented to the pope; it was a striking likeness of the great sculptor, as well as a magnificent piece of colouring, and thousands flocked to the artist's studio to see it. He was as favourably received in the papal capital as he had been in Vienna, and remained longer than he had intended; his continental tour extended over eighteen months, and wherever he went he inspired admiration of his talents and respect for his character.

During his absence from England, the Royal Academy had lost its president, Benjamin West; and Lawrence was proposed for his successor. George IV., who had succeeded to the throne in the interim, in confirming the election, presented Lawrence with a gold chain and medal, the latter bearing his portrait, and the inscription—"From his Majesty, George IV., to the President of the Royal Academy." His elevation gave general satisfaction; for his munificence and conciliatory manners were equal to his genius; and he was ever ready to assist the poor artist, or the youthful aspirant, with his advice, his patronage, or his purse. His generosity, indeed, often compelled him to be importunate in money-matters himself, and having received one moiety of his price for a portrait with the commission, he was often obliged to ask for the other before the work was done.

"I may say with safety," wrote one who afterwards became famous as an artist, "that Sir Thomas Lawrence was one of the best friends I ever had. I found him at all times most ready and liberal in his advice and visits; and when the oppressive number of his engagements would not allow him to go out of the house, he would always see the humblest student at home. I had the pleasure of making him a great number of drawings in water-colours, always sketches done on the spot; and I know he frequently conferred this honour upon me, more to assist and encourage my exertions than from any wish to possess the drawings themselves; and for all I did for him in this way he paid me at the moment, and always handsomely; generally more than any one else who encouraged me. He never lost an opportunity of recommending my drawings and paintings among his distinguished friends; and I am even now feeling the effects of this generosity."

It was at this time, while he was at the full height of his professional and personal reputation, that Lord Byron thus notices him in his diary: "Jan. 5, 1821. The same evening I met Lawrence, the painter, and heard one of Lord Grey's daughters play on the harp so modestly and ingeniously, that she looked music. I would rather have had my talk with Lawrence, who talked delightfully, and heard the girl, than have had all the fame of Moore and me put together." Lawrence was engaged at this time in painting a series of portraits of eminent men for the gallery of the late Sir Robert Peel. Of this series the finest is unquestionably that of Lady Peel; for Lawrence always succeeded best with the fair sex; and Cunningham relates that, looking on this portrait, and then on those of Canning, Huskisson, &c., he could not help thus adapting the words of Burns:

"His 'prentice han' he tried on man,
And then he made the lasses!"

Among the portraits of fair and noble women which he painted during the last ten years of his life, we find the late Queen of Portugal, the Princess Sophia; the Duchesses of Gloucester and Richmond; the Marchionesses of Lansdowne, Londonderry, Stafford, and Salisbury; the Countesses of Durham, Mexborough, Blessington, and Jersey; Ladies Vallecourt, Bereford, McVillo, Lyndhurst, Dover, and Belfast; Mesdames Baring, Barrow, Harford, and Locke; and Misses Peel, Macdonald, and Murray. All are in his best style; but the most exquisitely beautiful are those of the Countess of Blessington and Mrs. Barrow. Notwithstanding the much greater success of the painter in female portraits, the number of his male sitters was very great, and among them were some of the most illustrious men of the three kingdoms, both in rank and genius. The list of those which he exhibited is alone very great, and comprises the eminent names of the warrior Wellington; the statesmen Aberdeen, Liverpool, Canning, Durham, Brougham, and Grey; the lawyers Stowell and Eldon; the surgeons Abernethy and Astley Cooper; the philosopher Pavy; the novelist Scott; the architect Nash; the poets Moore and Campbell; and the painters Fuseli and himself. Of this list, those of Scott, Campbell, and Moore are considered the finest pictures; the last-named was executed for Murray, the publisher, and was his latest finished production. Brougham was a difficult subject, the expression of his countenance is so strange; but Lawrence succeeded in producing a portrait which has been admired for its fidelity. The portraits of Fuseli and himself were left unfinished; and the latter, though inferior to most of his works, was purchased after his death by the Earl of Chesterfield for 170 guineas. It is worthy of remark, that at the time of his death he had commissions for his own portrait from George IV., Sir Robert Peel, Lord Francis Leveson Gower, and the municipality of Bristol.

During this latter period of the artist's life, he supplied the annual exhibition of the Royal Academy with a number of fine portraits, including those of William IV.; the Dukes of York, Bedford, and Devonshire; the Archbishops of York and Armagh; the Earls of Harewood, Clanwilliam, and Hardwicke; Count Woronzow; Lords Bexley, Francis Claydonham, Robert Manners, and Francis Leveson Gower; Sir William Knighton, Sir William Curtis, Sir Ralph James Woodford; Mr. Anson, and Mr. Clarke, chamberlain of the city of London. Sir Thomas was now nearly sixty years of age, and in addition to the satisfaction with which he could look back on his long professional career, no man ever received a larger share of the world's favour and rewards. The King of France sent him a present of magnificent porcelain; the Irish Academy elected him an honorary member; and his native city conferred upon him its freedom. But so true is it that perfect happiness is unattainable in this world, that from this almost unexampled felicity there were many and sad drawbacks. His brothers, to whom he was much attached, were dead; he was Flaxman, the sculptor, whom he loved for the fine genius and gentle disposition that harmonised so well with his own; so also was Fuseli, in whose society Lawrence delighted, notwithstanding his roughness. Mrs. Wolfe, a Danish lady of great beauty and rare accomplishments, between whom and the painter a warm friendship existed for many years, had also departed this life; and so affected was he by her death that he did not paint for a month after he received the news. His pecuniary difficulties were increasing, and to sum up the sad catalogue of his infelicities, his health began visibly to decline. Such is the balance of human happiness and woe, even among mortals the most happily favoured.

Sir Thomas was sensible of his decline, and with it increased the religious feeling which he had always possessed in a certain degree, and which displayed itself even in his correspondence with Mrs. Wolfe. During the autumn of 1829 his health failed rapidly, and he declined many invitations; on the 2nd of January, 1830, however, he dined at the house of Sir Robert Peel, where he felt himself at home. "I sat opposite to him at the table," says Washington Irving. "He seemed uneasy and restless; his eyes were wandering; he was pale as marble; the stamp of death seemed on him. He told me he felt ill; but he wished to bear himself up in the presence of those whom he so much esteemed as his entertainers. He went away early." He had medical aid on reaching home, and recovered so far as to be able to paint for an hour on the 5th, and attend a committee at the Athenæum club-house; but on the following day he experienced another attack, and had to be bled and bled. On the morning of the 7th he seemed better, but his physicians did not consider him out of danger; and in the evening, when only his manservant was with him, he slipped suddenly from his chair, stretched himself out on the floor, and died without a groan.

The funeral procession of this eminent painter was an imposing one. The pall was held by the Earl of Aberdeen, Earl Gower, Sir Robert Peel, Lord Dufferin, Sir George Murray, the Right Hon. J. W. Croker, Mr. Hart Davis, and Earl Clanwilliam; the carriages of the Lord Mayor and the Sheriff preceded the hearse; all the members of the Royal Academy accompanied it; and sixty-four carriages of the nobility and gentry—friends of the deceased artist and patrons of the arts—closed the mournful cortege. In this manner were his remains borne to St. Paul's cathedral, and there laid in the vaults, beside those of his predecessors in the Academic chair—Reynolds, Barry, and West.

As a portrait-painter, Lawrence possessed all the merits of the highest order. In the exquisite grace and loveliness of his female portraits—in the rare skill with which he represented the expression of human thought and feeling, and in the freedom and elegance of his attitudes—he has never been surpassed. A generation of the great men, and the courtly beauties of England, live to posterity on the canvases to which he has given all but life. There is vigour and often dignity in his male heads, but his women seem about to burst into glowing vitality; the eyes ray forth tenderness and love, and the mouths want only the Prometheus touch. His pictures are to be found in every private gallery; there are forty in the royal collection, and fourteen in that of Sir Robert Peel. The National Gallery contains only four—John Kneller, as Quaker, Beaumont Newhall, Mr. Anson, and Mrs. Robertson of Brighthelm. The first three are in Lawrence's best style; the last is one of his earlier productions, and is very inferior.

THE ÆNEAS GROUP, BY PIERRE LEPAUTRE.

THE group of Æneas and Anchises is placed at the entrance of the Grand Walk at the Tuileries, at the side of the chateau. It is a piece of sculpture which attracts universal attention, not only from its admirable execution, but for the subject which it represents. Æneas is armed, and clothed with the skin of a lion; he bears his father in his arms, and treads upon the ruins of a temple. Anchises faithfully represented. But the principal merit of the group consists in the general effect of the whole. If the spectator stands on one side, the composition concentrates all his interest on the figures of Æneas and Anchises, and one feels the filial tenderness of the warrior as he embraces the feeble frame of the old man. On the other side, the effect is completely changed: the attention is concentrated on wears the Phrygian bonnet, indicative of his Trojan origin, and carries in his left hand the sacred Palladium, or image of Minerva; his right arm is thrown over the shoulder of Æneas, and he holds the boy Ascanius by the hand. The feebleness of the old man, his relaxed frame, his venerable appearance, contrast strikingly with the strength and vigour of Æneas, and with the infantine and delicate beauty of the child. Childhood, maturity, decrepitude are the form of the boy, as with a wild and terrified expression he looks about him; one hand is stretched out as in surprise, and the other is clasped by the old man, Anchises. It is impossible to convey an accurate idea of this piece of sculpture without representing the effect produced by both sides. We have, therefore, given the general appearance in the forms of the warrior and the old man, and presented a sketch of the boy separately.

NICHOLAS BERGHEM.

In passing through a gallery of the Dutch masters, the landscapes of Berghem may be recognised at a glance. Among these pictures of villages, and of marine and canal scenery, under the cold, gray sky of the North, those of this master may be distinguished by the poetic character with which his genius has invested them, the truthfulness of his foliage, the brightness of his skies, and the lightness of his clouds, which seem to be really floating through the atmosphere. While Everdingen, Ruysdael, Isaac Ostade, Hobbema, and Van Goyen, are sparing of their light, and paint their dark pines and oaks against a sombre and gloom-inspiring sky, such as characterises the cold regions of the North, Berghem has striven to make his gray tints more warm and his bright ones more vivid. A sombre sky did not accord with the gaiety of his disposition; the scenes of wildness and gloom, which had such an attraction for the melancholy nature of his friend and associate, Ruysdael, had no charm for one of so cheerful a temperament as Berghem. Melancholy was unknown to him, and he has imbued his landscapes with the joyousness and warmth of his own nature.

Few painters have had more masters than Berghem. He received his first lessons in the art from his father, an artist of mediocre ability, who chiefly painted fish, fruit, silver vases, and similar objects of still life. This was a poor school for an artist of such intelligence and genius; but he acquired under his father only the first rudiments of the art. The various masters under whom he afterwards studied perfected his knowledge of painting and developed his talent. From Van Goyen he learnt to paint marine scenery; Peter Grebber, a good painter of history and portraits, taught him how to group his figures and give expression to their countenances; under Nicholas Moyaert and John Wils he acquired proficiency in landscape painting; and the example of John Baptist Weenix, his uncle, inspired him with the taste for painting the ships and boats, the merchandise, and the Oriental figures that are shown in his views of seaports.

With regard to the right name of this artist, the opinions of authors who have treated of art are much divided. Descamps says that the family name was Van Haarlem, but the assertions of this writer are little to be depended upon. The Chevalier Karel de Moor gives the same name, however, and relates the circumstance from which he received the name of Berghem, by which he is commonly known. During the time he studied under Van Goyen, his father, irritated by some juvenile indiscretion, pursued him into the house of his master, with the purpose of chastising him; Van Goyen, perceiving his father's purpose, and being desirous of screening his favourite pupil, called out to his other scholars, "Berg hem! Berg hem!" which signifies "Hide him! hide him!" This is, according to the Chevalier, the origin of the name by which he was afterwards known. Stanley, in his additions to Bryan, says that the family name was Claas or Klaas, and that his father was called Peter Claas Van Haarlem, probably to distinguish him from another painter of the same name.

Born at Haarlem, in 1621, Berghem had for contemporaries the most eminent landscape-painters of Holland—Ruysdael, Barth, Everdingen, Wouvermans, and Weenix. He lived on terms of intimate friendship with all of them, and married the daughter of Weenix, but without adding thereby to his happiness. His wife was imperious in her manners, avicious and niggardly in her disposition; and the artist's character was so different, that harmony was impossible between them. Berghem passed his time before his easel, or in the society of his friends. Pastoral subjects were those which he most frequently painted, because they harmonised with the tendency of his genius to the ideal and the poetic. Some of his pictures represent shepherdesses with their flocks reposing among ruins, or wading through shallow streams, or dancing to the music of the flute; in others he painted travellers in some wild country, struggling with dangers, or alighting at houses of entertainment; occasionally, too, his figures are taken from the higher kind of poetry, or from scenes in the Old Testament. As a rule, his paintings are composed of forms derived from southern nature, and are rarely based upon the scenery of his own country: in all of them, however, these forms are treated in that ideal and brilliant style which we have described: the eye rejoices in the harmony of his lights, and in the richness and power of his pencil; yet his compositions seldom possess the freedom and simplicity which might be desired in such scenes: they are frequently sensible that the artist has desigingly contrasted the pastoral feeling of his scenery with the prosaic circumstances of ordinary life.

Less natural than Paul Potter, he is more spiritual, more varied, and more rich. He has imbedded common objects with the poetry which he felt in his soul, and yet painted them with a truthfulness to nature which has seldom been surpassed. His animals—oxen, asses, sheep, goats, dogs—are painted with remarkable fidelity. He had a clearness and strength of judgment which, combined with his appreciation of the poetic in nature, led to a judicious selection of subjects; and he possessed remarkable power and ease in expressing the ideas which he wished to transfer to the canvas. His manner of painting was easy and rapid, and he gave to all his works as much of beauty and gracefulness as the subject would admit. Elegance of composition, correctness of design and perspective, just gradation of distances, brilliancy and harmony of colour, nice distribution of the lights, are the characteristics by which the works of this master may be recognised. Though he painted with such ease and rapidity, every part of his pictures is so well done that it is difficult to say in which of the details he chiefly excelled. The truth and beauty of his foliage, each tree having that which is proper to it, and of the clouds that seem to move slowly across his bright skies, have never been excelled.

If the world picturesque had not previously existed, it would have been necessary to have invented it to characterise the genius of Berghem. There is not a picture of this master, heroic or familiar, which does not charm the eye by an agreeable disproportion, more pleasing in a landscape than perfect symmetry. Berghem avoided with care, perhaps only with the instinct of his genius, the parallel figures, the continuation of the same lines, the equal contours, which are seen in the works of some of the older painters. For example, if a drove of oxen are crossing a river, as in the charming little "Ford" in the gallery of the Louvre, their uniformity is broken by a herdsmen astride on one of them, and by the capricious course which two or three have taken towards the other bank. The smaller compositions of Berghem, those which his brush or his etching-point dashed off in a moment of happy inspiration, bear the impression of an exquisite sense of the picturesque. When he would express the heat of the summer sun, the cattle are stretched upon the grass, but the monotony of the horizontal lines presented by their crunched forms is interrupted by an ass, standing up and erecting his ears. In colouring, too, he always kept in view the effect to be produced; thus, in a drove or group of cattle, he opposed the black-and-white sides of one to the fawn-coloured coat of a neighbouring animal, or to the lighter-coloured wool of a sheep. It was not without reason that Berghem manifested so marked a predilection for the oak in his landscapes. "The bark of the oak," says M. Lemonnier, on the subject of this painter, in his "Essai sur le Paysage," is rough to the sight; it is dark gray, wine-coloured, or brown, according to the nature of the soil in which it is planted. Its surface is furrowed in the form of interlaced coils, which gives it a rough and hard character. Very often a hoary appearance relieves the sad colour of the bark, and is sometimes extended over the outstretched branches, which, little resembling those of other trees, are nearly always fancifully twisted and distorted."

In the management of light and shade, the delicate gradation of aerial perspective, and the treatment of water, Berghem was eminently happy. His masses of rocks and trees are skilfully arranged with a view to scenic effect, in the production of which he never fails. The grouping of his cattle, the contrast of their colours, the manner in which the lights are made to fall on them, have all the same object. His water has the transparency which is so hard to obtain in painting, and the manner in which the waving trees and the passing clouds are reflected on its surface has a degree of reality which nearly approaches that of nature.

That this eminent landscape-painter visited Italy in his youth, there can be little doubt, though Descamps claims for him the merit of never having been out of Holland. It is scarcely conceivable that Berghem, if he had seen only the level meadows, low sand-hills, flat marshes, and sluggish canals of his native country, could have painted his pastoral and heroic scenes, aided only by his imagination and engravings of the scenery of more southern lands. Where could he have found in Holland the noble architecture, the imposing ruins, the blue mountains, that he has represented in his pictures? Instead of the sand-hills of the environs of Haarlem, which give such a dreary aspect to the landscapes of Wynants, Berghem borders his seas with green terraces; and his clear skies and pellucid waters have more of Italy in them than of the more northern clime of his birth. It is scarcely credible that his "Ancient Harbour of Genoa," his "View of the Coast of Nice," and his "Gulf of Tarento," were painted from engravings, or from the descriptions of travellers. Those bright skies and sun-dyed clouds must have been seen before the artist could have represented them with such marvellous truthfulness. Under the title of "The Labours of the Sheepfold," who would expect more than humble cottages and a wild country? Berghem gives us a picture of a lofty promontory, on the summit of which are the pillars of a circular temple, dedicated to Venus, surmounted by mutilated statues; under the ruined peristyle some figures promenade, while the wild rustics pursue their pastoral labours in the foreground. The colouring is warm, and a bright light is diffused over the picture. It has all the characteristics of Berghem's style, its poetry, its brilliance, and its warmth.

In the grand style, Berghem did not attain pre-eminence in his figures. One day, he wished to paint the "Rape of Europa." But the lady had more the air of a Dutch farmer's wife, than of a nymph whom Jupiter had thought worthy of his love. The buskin in vain replaced the shoe; the drapery, raised by the wind, showed the familiar bodice of a Zeeland village girl. This is only another instance of the difficulty of achieving distinction in two separate branches of the art. It has happened that historical painters of the highest eminence have produced landscapes of the first order of excellence, as Amalbate Caracci, Domenichino, Rubens, and Nicholas Poussin did; but to arrive at eminence in historical painting, a considerable degree of ability in both landscape and portrait painting is necessary, and thus the fact is accounted for. But for an artist possessing an admirable genius for landscape painting to obtain equal renown as a painter of history is a very different matter, and Berghem was no exception to the general rule.

There is at the bottom of the human soul a sentiment, which certain aspects of nature have the power of evoking from the depths in which it dwells; it is melancholy. Under the sun of Italy, for example, this sentiment is never developed, and we find no trace of it in the great masters of that country. The landscapes of St. Ivo Rosa are frightfully rude and savage, conveying the idea of wildness and desolation; but they are never melancholy. Those of Claude Lorraine have the sunshine which belongs to the land of the artist, and, however various in their subjects and the aerial gradations of their tints, have, as Mrs. Jameson has remarked, "something almost cloying in its perpetual and delicious beauty, 'breathing on earth the air of Paradise.'" Melancholy is the fruit of the North—of lead-coloured skies, and fogs and mists which the sun does not penetrate. Though no painter of the northern schools has expressed this feeling so largely as Ruysdael, the works of most of them bear traces of the influences of those sombre skies. The exceptions are those who travelled and resided some time in Italy: as Berghem, Karel Dujardin, and John Both. The soul of Berghem was never agitated by those profound reveries into which we are plunged by gazing on the dark groves of Hobbema, the rushing floods of Ruysdael, or the wild torrents and sombre pines of Everdingen. Even the season of darkness and sleep is invested in his pictures with an air of gaiety and cheerfulness. Under light fleecy clouds, which half hide the moon, whose beams silver and enliven their edges, travellers journey through a woody country, or cattle ruminant and rest. Or it is a coast scene which is thus partially illumined, and two peasants have kindled a fire of brush-wood to catch crabs or lobsters by its light. Sometimes the moon shines feebly; and while the summits of the distant mountains reflect its pale light, the red glare of a fire in the foreground or the middle distance is thrown upon the waters of a river or marsh. This contrast of two lights, so difficult to treat with success, is seen in several of the works of this master. The silvery radiance of the moon is diffused over the distant scenery, while the red light of the fire is confined to some of the details of the foreground. In one of the pictures in which Berghem has exhibited these double effects of light, a lady and gentleman advance on horseback from a mass of trees, touched by the moonbeams, while the light of a torch is thrown upon an ass loaded with paniers, and a dog playing with his shadow. Here we have the deep tranquillity of Elshout, united with the agreeable lightness of Van Lair.

Berghem has displayed his peculiar turn of mind in the vigorous-ly painted picture, so full of beautiful effects, which one of the brothers Wischer has engraved under the name of "Night." Other painters, in representing the season of repose, have displayed the sleep of nature. Their moonlit lakes and rivers, half-shaded by trees, their humble cottages by the side of silvery streams, just touched by the beams of the orb of night, convey the idea of solitude and profound stillness. Of this character are some of the landscapes of Van der Neer, which represent a lonely canal, whose tranquil surface reflects the light of the moon; or a city in repose, steeped in the quiet moonlight. Berghem, on the contrary, has given animation to his picture of night, and diffused over it an air of gaiety; a belated herdsmen plays cheerfully on his pipe of reeds, and awakens the echoes of the rocks, and cattle and horses give the scene the life and animation which is wanting in the still moonlight of Van der Neer.

The pictures which Berghem produced in the early part of his life have some resemblance to those of his master Weenix, but are touched with more delicacy. Most of these represent seaports and embarkations. His later manner—that which may more properly be called his own—was different and more interesting: it is to this period that those delightful landscapes belong, which present us with classical ruins and charming groups of figures and cattle. The landscapes which he painted in this manner are superior to those of any other painter of the Dutch school, except, perhaps, those of his contemporary, John Both, between whom and Berghem there appears to have been a certain degree of rivalry, which did not interrupt the friendship in which they lived.

Concerning this rivalry, it is related that M. Vanderhulck, the burgomaster of Port, who was a munificent patron of the arts, engaged Berghem and Both to paint each a picture, for which he gave them a liberal remuneration, and stipulated at the same time to award a handsome premium to the artist whose picture should seem to him the most worthy of it. Animated by a spirit of friendly emulation, both the great painters exerted themselves to the utmost. Berghem produced a picture of great beauty, representing a grand mountainous landscape, with a great many figures, oxen, sheep, and goats, drawn in his best manner and beautifully coloured. His rival painted a charming Italian scene, glowing under the clear, warm sky of that sunny land, and painted with that brightness for which he was so distinguished. Berghem had produced a masterpiece, and the effort of Both was no less successful. When the two artists submitted their works to their patron, he pronounced his judgment upon them in terms as honourable to himself as they were creditable to the talents of the artists. After an attentive examination of both pictures, and praising them in terms of the warmest admiration, he assured the two painters that the display of talent on both sides was so equal as to deprive him of the possibility of preference, without being unduly partial; and that, as they had both exhibited a degree of eminence which he regarded as the perfection of the art, they were both entitled to the premium, the reward of genius.

In the retirement of the seaport of Bredam, the eminent painter lived peacefully and happily, for the continual activity of his disposition and a philosophic serenity of temper enabled him to triumph over the ill of life, to which he felt happily and contentedly exempt. From the window of his studio he had an extensive view of the green meadows, in the midst of which the chateau was situated, which afforded him, did not on the other hand, afford an opportunity of watching the groups of cattle which he had introduced into a variety of all of his landscape, as they lay or waded in the by-lanes, or stood in the shade of the projecting eaves, or drank at the stream that sparkled in the sunlight.

His pictures were so well received that he was continually paid for them before he could finish them, and though he was conscientious that very often in the evening he would be obliged to go to bed, in the morning he could not sleep, his pictures were seldom to be met with, and always commanded high prices. His wife, whose avocations have not been known, but who painted old prints, would not allow him to retain the money he received for his pictures, and aware of the fidelity with which he painted, whether the subject was a woodland scene, a marine view, the passage of a ford, a seaport, or a skirmish of cavalry, she allowed him an instant of undisturbed relaxation. Sated in a chamber adjoining his studio, he was in the habit of striding against the wall to create this most industrious and prolific of artists to renewed exertions. Tranquil and resigned, Berghem laboured on, single and solitary at his easel the long day through, and often when his wife thought he was sleeping, he was doubtless occupied in describing the changing forms of the clouds, as they floated over the radiant meadows outspread before him, and the varied effects of light and shade which they produced in the landscape, as they intercepted in their course the beams of the sun.

Berghem purchased a great number of the finest prints and designs of the Italian masters, as a means of improving his taste; and after his death the rich collection which he had formed was sold by his wife, and realised a considerable sum. Among the prints in this sale was a proof of the "Massacre of the Innocents," engraved by Mark Antoine, after the picture by Raffaele, and for which Berghem had given sixty florins.

Although the manner of Berghem is easily recognised, he could imitate that of other artists, as well as to deceive even connoisseurs, and sometimes made a free excursion in the manner of Philip Wouwermans. For example, the "Surprise of a Convoy by the Cavalier," which is now in the museum at the Hague, and which was sold for £555 10s. 8d., can only be recognised as the work of Berghem by the lightness of the touch and the manner in which the light is thrown in broken masses over the scene of combat.

Berghem had a great many pupils, of whom the most distinguished were Peter de Hooch, J. de Ghaen, Abraham Bova, Dick Maas, who engraved some of his pictures; S. Leender, and Carver, who have imitated him; Theodore Visscher, John Suckert, Van der Meer, and probably also the great painter, Karel Dujardin. In the number of his pupils, and singing cheerfully as he worked, the great landscape painter lived till 1683, having attained the age of eighty-nine. The ingenious Haerlem has called him the Titian of the Netherlands, and with no doubt, if we may ascribe to painting with poetry, another artist of the Dutch school has imitated as successfully the style of the Greek poet.

It was not only an admirable painter, but possessed considerable skill and ability as an engraver. The name of his prints is therefore to be found engraved in a number of the best American libraries, many presented by the gift of a painter, and, with his name as engraver, he has amply contributed to the reputation of a Dutch artist. There is a list of his engraved works in the "Bibliographie de la France," published at Amsterdam in 1762. The following is a list of the most celebrated.

There is a picture by this master in the Royal Council-Chamber at Windsor Castle, representing a landscape, with figures and cattle. In the foreground, near the centre of the picture, two men, one of whom is mounted on an ass, are driving four cows and six sheep over a road. Blue mountains are seen in the distance, and light fleecy vapours rest in their hollows, conveying the effect of early morning.

There is another in the Royal Gallery at Hampton Court; the subject—"A Woman Milking a Goat."

The Dulwich Gallery contains five Berghems:—1. "A Farrier Shoeing an Ass." A woman mounted on a mule, and a ruined building in the background: a very brilliant picture. 2. "A Wood Scene;" very rich and beautiful. 3. "A Landscape," with figures. A woman milking a red cow, and another washing linen in a stream; a small picture, which has become very dark and dingy. 4. "A Landscape." A woman crossing a brook, with a child at her back; a woman on an ass, with a man near her; and a group of cattle. 5. "A Landscape." A woman washing linen at a stone fountain; in the foreground are two other women, one of whom is milking a goat; two cows, three CONVERSATION ON A JOURNEY.—FROM A PAINTING BY BERGHEM.

The designs left by Berghem are done in Indian ink or in bistre, and display remarkable vigour and a fine taste. He painted both on canvas and wood, and sometimes, though rarely, on copper; his works are oftener of small than of large dimensions.

The pictures of Berghem are to be found in all the principal galleries of Europe; but no collection has a great number of them—a circumstance which shows the high estimation in which they are held. The gallery of the Hermitage, an imperial palace at St. Petersburg, contains the greatest number—eighteen, which are all hung in one room, called by the painter's name. Among them are "The Rape of Europa," some fine Italian landscapes, and the picture which, according to Descamps, is the chef-d'œuvre of Berghem—"A Halt of Chasseurs."

Some of the finest pictures of this master are contained in the Imperial Gallery at Vienna; and the Royal Galleries of Berlin, Munich, and Dresden, also possess a number of his beautiful pastoral subjects and views of the scenery of Italy.

The Gallery of the Louvre contains twelve, among which are "The Ferry," which has been valued at £960; "The Ford;" and "The Return to the Farm;" all veritable chefs-d'œuvre.

sheep, two goats, a kid, and a dog, complete the composition: a brilliant and beautiful little picture. The last two have been engraved by Dequevauviller.

Six pictures by this master, which, we believe, have since been removed to Buckingham Palace, are thus described by Dr. Waagen, as forming part of the collection of George IV.:—1. A group of peasants with cattle, among whom a woman on a gray horse is the most conspicuous, cross the foreground of an extensive landscape, traversed by a river. The impression of evening distance is admirably expressed in this bright, clear picture, which is subdued in the colours, and lightly, yet carefully executed. 2. A hilly landscape, enlivened in the foreground by animals and figures; three women with rushes, and two cows, particularly attract notice. A carefully-finished, pretty picture, in a warm evening light. 3. A very mountainous landscape, with a stream. In the foreground, three shepherds, one of whom is on horseback, with their flock. A carefully-executed picture, of brilliant colouring and clear gradations of the mountains. 4. A bare country, with an extensive prospect. In the foreground, a herd of four cows, an ass, and a sheep, with a herdsman on horseback and two on foot; groups of cattle also in the middle distance. A picture of his later period; the animals admirably coloured. 5. In a very mountainous landscape, a shepherdless, accompanied by a goat and a dog, wades through a piece of water, in which two cows are standing. A picture of striking effect; more true to nature than usual, and great elegance of execution. 6. A landscape of beautiful leading lines; the distance closed by blue mountains. In the foreground, a peasant woman on horseback, a drover, and some cows. An elegant little picture, charmingly fresh, clear, and cool.

The Duke of Devonshire possesses four Bergheims, two of which are at Devonshire House:—1. "A Landscape." A river flows at the foot of mountains; the setting sun produces very defined lights and shades. Among the numerous figures which adorn the picture the most striking are two gentlemen on horseback, and a girl on an ass. The design is remarkably rich and poetical, and the impasto admirable; the shadows have become dark. 2. "A Scape." In the foreground, a gentleman and a lady on horseback, with falcons on their hands; in elegance of form approaching Wouvermans. It is admirably touched, and of brilliant effect. A duplicate of this three cows. Singularly clear and brilliant, in a glowing evening light. 3. By the side of a cool piece of water, which runs along wooded rocks, are a satyr and two nymphs; near them two cows, and goats, which are more true to nature than is often the case. Very delicate in the execution—the distance in particular softly mellowed off. 4. In a landscape with rich, verdant rocks, herdsmen with their cattle, among whom a woman riding on an ass is the principal figure, are returning home along a road. The picture is admirably impasted in a warm evening light, the effect of which, however, is rather injured by the too dark mass in the foreground. 5. A river runs along a range of lofty, rocky mountains. Among the numerous figures, are returning home along a road, a woman riding on an ass. In this picture, the cold, blue, and heavy tone, which is no favourite, and the motley effect, predominate.

The collection of the Marquis of Westminster contains only a single specimen of this master, a rich, rocky landscape, with a meadow in the foreground, in which two women and a man are dancing to the tambourine. Though the execution is very careful for the size (for this is one of Bergheim's largest compositions), it is, picture is in the collection of M. Steengracht, at the Hague. The other two are at the duke's villa at Chiswick:—1. "A Ferry." Cattle about to pass a river, which winds through a landscape, where a ruin is seen. This is thought to be one of the artist's finest productions, but, unfortunately, it is much damaged. 2. "A Landscape." Cattle by the water-side; the time evening; painted with great care in a blueish tone.

The Bridgewater Gallery contains five Bergheims, which are thus described by Dr. Waagen:—1. A long bridge is thrown over a piece of water which traverses a flat country, with an extensive distance. A hawking party, and country people animate the landscape, illumined with the warm glow of evening, and all nature sunk into a calm. The cleanness and force of this effect, the delicacy of the touch, admirably impasted, the refined taste in the disposition, the correct drawing, show the master in the highest perfection of the qualities for which he is so greatly esteemed. This gem formerly adorned the Slingelandt and Colonna collections. 2. In a bare landscape, in which rises a mass of rocks, there is in front a woman upon an ass, with its foal, and a herdsmen with both in tone and feeling, one of his oddest pictures. It was formerly in the collection of W. A. Ellis, Esq.

Mr. Hope also possesses a single Bergheim, a waterfall between high rocks, on which stands the temple of the Soly. Among the figures in the foreground, a woman, a cow, and some sheep, are the most striking. The execution is particularly careful and elegant, but it is rather complicated in the composition, and cold and heavy in the tone.

Lord Ashburn's collection, at his mansion in Finsbury, contains three Bergheims:—1. At the feet of the ruins of a stately edifice, a herdsmen with cows, by the side of a piece of water, in which a woman is engaged in washing. The warm evening sun fills all with its rays. In the glow and depths of the colouring, and in elegance of treatment, this is one of the artist's finest productions, and excites in the beholder the poetic feeling of a warm evening. Purchased from the Dijon collection for £397 10s. 2. "The lobster-catchers." Four men are engaged in the lobster-fishery on a sea-coast, surrounded by lofty rocks; the beams of the rising sun give a warm tinge to the vapours rising from the waters against the rocks; the foreground breathes the freshness of early morning. The delicacy of the execution, and the magical effects of light in this picture, are indescribable. Purchased at the Tallyrand sale for £262 10s. 3. In the foreground of a bare country, the remote distance of which is closed by blue mountains, a man is carrying a bundle of wood; at his side is a woman on horseback, driving some cows. The time of day is a cool afternoon. Few pictures excite, like this, the yearning after distance, and are at the same time so attractive by the energy of the colouring, and the spirit and precision of the touch. It is in pictures such as this, that we see what Berghem was capable of doing. It was purchased at the Tallyrand sale for £600.

The Marquis of But's collection, at Luton House, contains three pictures by this master—1. A very rich landscape, with steep rocks and lofty trees, beneath which a woman is riding on a mule. Though the sun is already low, and forms large masses of shade, the general tone of the picture is cool. It is a large picture, but superior to most of the artist's productions of similar dimensions in cleanness and careful execution of all the parts. 2. In a mountainous landscape, animated with numerous figures of men and cattle, a stream rushes between broken rocks. A warm, harmonious, evening tone is diffused over every object. This rich picture is very carefully finished in all its parts. 3. A winter landscape. Many figures and two horses are on a frozen river, over which there is a rustic bridge. The cold wintry tone is as admirably carried through as in Berghem's "Winter Landscape," in the Royal Gallery at Berlin.

The pictures of Berghem have been engraved by Lebas, Allinot, the brothers Wischer, Danckers, Laurent, Martenasi, &c. The prices which they have obtained, in every instance when they have been submitted to public competition, affords a good criterion of the estimation in which they are held. It will be seen that their value is increasing in proportion as they are less frequently brought to auction.

At the sale of the collection of M. de Lorangère, directed by Gersaint, in 1744, a very fine landscape, on panel, by Berghem, was sold for £24; while another produced only £6. At that of the Chevalier la Roque, in 1745, a very beautiful landscape, with figures and animals, in the best style of Berghem, was sold for £7; another for £10 10s.; and a third for £12. It was not only the pictures of Berghem which were sold at such low prices at that period; the works of other masters of the Dutch school obtained only proportionate amounts. But as the taste of amateurs underwent a change, Berghem's pictures commanded prices commensurate with their merits. The charm of their composition, the brightness of the colouring, and their usually small dimensions, now cause them to be much sought after by wealthy amateurs.

At the sale of M. de la Live de Jolly, in 1770, a picture of this master, representing a woman riding on a horse, a man on a mule, and another woman with a child, was sold for £442 10s. Another, engraved by Allinot under the title of "The Travellers," obtained £85.

At the sale of the Lempereur collection in 1773, a Berghem, representing a man playing on a guitar, to which two women are listening, was sold for £275. At that of the Marquis of Brunoy, in 1776, a landscape by Berghem, engraved by Lebas under the title of a "View in the Environs of Siena," was sold for £100.

When the rich collection of M. Blondel de Gagny was brought to the hammer in 1776, "The Château of Bentheim," which Gersaint recorded as one of Berghem's finest productions, realised £575. At the sale of the Prince of Conti's collection, in 1777, two views of seaports, enriched with figures, ships, and animals, which have been engraved by Lebas, were sold for £150 each. Another landscape, of the richest composition, formerly in the cabinet of the Duke of Choiseul, sold for £74 10s. A fourth, "The Bird-catcher," engraved by one of the brothers Wischer, was sold for £75.

At the Tallyrand sale, in 1817, a picture by Berghem, representing a peasant accompanied by his dog, bending under the weight of a large faggot, followed by a villager on horseback driving two cows, was pushed up to £600. At that of M. Lapeyrière, in 1823, "A View of a Village in Holland," a beautiful landscape, formerly in the cabinet of M. de Tolazan, obtained the still higher price of £800. "The Passage of the Mountains" reached £570, and "Morning," a landscape, enriched with figures, £605.

When the Duke of Choiseul's rich collection was sold, in 1823, a marine view by Berghem was purchased by Mr. Beckford, of "Vatic" and Fonthill celebrity, for £813 15s. This picture, which has been engraved by Lebas, is thus described by Dr. Waagen:—"Several persons are engaged on a sea-coast in embarking fish, while others are variously employed. A bay is animated with vessels of different sizes. In the background a chain of mountains. In richness, precise and spirited touch, and carrying through of the warm tone of a summer evening, this is one of the finest works of Berghem."

"The Ancient Harbour of Genoa," which we have reproduced in one of our illustrations, was formerly in the same collection, and was sold for £880. It was purchased for the Duke of Berri, and resold, in 1837, at the reduced price of £600.

At the sale of the Chevalier Erard's collection in 1832, "A Stag Hunt" was sold for £750; and "A Seaport" for £330 10s. At that of Cardinal Fesch, at Rome, in 1844, "The Passage of the Mountains," a landscape of beautiful execution, was sold for £450. A pastoral landscape, a very admirable specimen of this master, produced £328; a winter scene, somewhat feeble in effect, £325; and a "View in the Mountains," in Berghem's best manner, £312.

Berghem always signed his pictures, and nearly always his plates, sometimes Berghem and sometimes Berchem. His various signatures and monograms are faithfully represented below.

EXHIBITION OF THE FINE ARTS AT BRUSSELS.

WE cannot take leave of the Belgian artists without noticing a very fine historical picture by M. Lies, called "The Court of Margaret of Austria," a composition full of talent, spirit, and brilliant local colouring. It is a good specimen of what Sir Joshua Reynolds calls the composite style, in which a certain elegance and grace are blended with grandeur, rather than of the grand style proper, the aim of which is to act on the mind, through the eye, by simplicity and completeness—by the uniformity of the leading lines and soberness of colouring, rather than by ornament and brilliancy.

"The Willow," painted by M. Willems, appeared last year in the Paris exhibition. It is a small composition, revealing the poetry of art, and nicely executed. It is destined, we understand, to adorn a gallery which is already one of the finest in Brussels, that of M. Van Praet, who holds an important appointment in the royal household.

M. Madon contributes one of the most amusing pictures in the exhibition; it is called "The Trouble-Fêtes." Two young men, very poor, if we may judge from their appearance, have arrived at a village during the celebration of a fête, and have the temerity to ing the tangled path a long time without finding its termination, or seeing the sky, except by snatches, we reach an opening on the borders of the forest, where the light breaks through the trees, producing varied effects, and behold a stream rushing swiftly along the bottom of a wild ravine, while the distance discloses a varied panorama of blue hills and wooded valleys, we behold such a scene as this master has often painted. Most of his landscapes, indeed, are of this character: dark streams rushing between rocky banks, venerable oaks and beeches bending over them, with cattle grazing or wading in the stream, at spots where the banks are shelving. Sometimes he presents us with sombre ravines, across which lie the trunks of trees, torn from their foundations by the force of a torrent; at others, with a lonely mountain pass, with the distant country seen through the opening.

The scenery which Huysmans has represented is more Italian in its character than Flemish; his ravines and mountain passes resemble those of the Apennines, rather than anything which can and Claude, of Weynants and Poussin. The feeling for ideal beauty, which had been developed by Claude, had called forth many imitators, and excited many similar efforts on the part of the artists of the Netherlands. By the full effect of light, by the brilliancy of the air, and the liquid mistiness of the distance, they endeavoured in a similar manner to produce a higher tone, and to embody those forms of nature which they saw around them. By adhering partly to the clearness and freedom of Claude's compositions, and partly to the more elevated forms of Poussin's style, they succeeded in producing works of very great beauty. It may be regarded as a distinctive mark of these imitators, that some trace of that feeling for the individual realities of nature which characterised Flemish art, and which was developed in the landscapes of Rubens, is always more or less perceptible in the single features of their works.

The landscapes of Van Artois were in high estimation at that time, and Huysmans went to Brussels for the purpose of studying be discovered in the level and comparatively tame scenery of Belgium. They have, generally, a striking effect of light on the foreground, where the artist has introduced various wild plants, pencilled with remarkable correctness and elegance of form. The foliage of his trees is light and spirited, and the colouring rich and harmonious.

This painter is commonly called Huysmans of Malines, not having been born there, for he was a native of Antwerp, but because he resided in that town during the greater part of his life. He was born in 1648, and was the son of an eminent architect, who intended to bring him up to his own profession; but having the misfortune to lose his father while very young, the responsibility of his education devolved on one of his uncles, who placed him under the tuition of Gaspar de Witte, a landscape-painter of some eminence, though not of the degree subsequently attained by his pupil. The period in which he was born, the middle of the seventeenth century, was a brilliant epoch in the history of landscape-painting—the epoch of Ruysdael and Berghem, of Everdingen under that master. The fine forest of Soignies, which is in the neighbourhood of that city, afforded him opportunities of studying the features of woodland scenery, and the designs for his finest landscapes were made on its borders. Van Artois imitated the manners and deportment of a gentleman with the enthusiasm of an admirer of the picturesque and a lover of his art; he received young Huysmans very graciously, gave him an apartment in his own house, and employed him in drawing from nature the most picturesque spots in the neighbourhood. These drawings were doubtless very useful to Van Artois, and served to improve the style of his pupil, whose boldly-drawn landscapes soon surpassed those of his master.

On leaving Brussels, Huysmans took up his abode at Malines, where he continued to reside the remainder of his life.

The great merit of the landscapes of this master, as of those of Van Artois, and those also of Louis de Waddler, is the sentiment of grandeur he has infused into them. His spreading oaks, with their masses of dark foliage, have an air of majesty; and his rocks have the aspect of mementoes of the antediluvian epoch. What separates this master from Berghem and Claude is the manner in which he has treated his skies. Claude paints the forms of earth, indeed, but he veils them in an ethereal drapery, such as is only at moments visible to our eyes; he paints that worship of the Creator which nature solemnises, and in which man and his work are only included as accessories. Hills, trees, ruins are but the external features of his pictures, and they form only the framework by means of which he sets before us the true creative power of nature, shown in the effects of air, and in the brilliant and vivid workings of light. In the landscapes of Huismans, the sky and the clouds are made subordinate to the rocks and trees, and are painted so as to increase the effect of the latter. The delicate shades which distinguish the hours of the day, the silent sweep of clouds along the clear sky, the soft mists of evening, and the phenomena of solar light, were on his landscapes, in spite of the beautiful form of his trees, and the grandeur of the scenery amid which they are represented. They have a character which resembles neither the joyousness of Berghem, the melancholy of Ruysdael, nor the solemn grandeur of John Bull. At the first glance, we may believe that his rustic and sombre woods conceal in their deep shades one of those temples of the olden times from which the inspired priests have gathered their mysterious oracles; but, instead of the circular edifice, and the fountain which invites to repose the nymphs of the train of Diana, we discover only a rude and simple hut, the lonely dwelling of a hermit.

The figures of Huismans, though all of this rustic character, were drawn so naturally, and with such facility and ability, that the other landscape-painters of his country had recourse to him for the figures with which they animated their woods and heaths.

not, in the mind of this master, essential to the production of a grand and striking picture. He relied for effect on the boldness of his masses of foliage, the deep shadows of his forests, and the strong light which he throws on his foregrounds. Yet we have in his ravines and forest-glades abundant evidence of his powers of managing light and shade, of which the picture we have engraved above is an admirable example.

One of the characteristics of Huismans, which distinguishes him from nearly all other painters, is the entire absence of other than rustic figures in his landscapes. Under the spreading boughs of his majestic oaks, he has introduced only the herdsmen who drive their cattle through the glen, and the labourers who rest or pursue their rustic occupations on the borders of the forest. His figures and cattle are well drawn and pleasingly grouped. The prevailing rusticity of the former impresses their peculiar character

Anthony Van der Meulen, the celebrated painter of the battles and sieges of the reign of Louis XIV., was introduced to Huismans while on a visit to Brussels, his native city. Seeing that the landscapes of Huismans were characterised by an air of grandeur, he thought that the talent of the artist could not fail to be appreciated at the court of Versailles, and proposed to introduce him there, that he might paint the landscape portion of the more extensive of battles, sieges, encampments, and other similar scenes, which they were then engaged in executing. But the artist, probably thinking that such an arrangement would place him in an unobtrusive position, declined the offer, alleging as his motive that he was ignorant of the French language, and did not wish to leave Meuse. However, at the request of Van der Meulen, he painted the castles, with astonishing freedom and vigour, the views of Luxembourg and Beaumont, and the environs of those places. Being taken from an elevated position, these views spread out like a panorama, and the charm of art has not robbed them of their topographical accuracy. These pictures, which now adorn the gallery of the Louvre, have been much admired; and so perfect is the harmony between the landscapes of Huysmans and the charging squadrons and opposing battalions of Van der Meulen, that it is difficult to believe that both were not painted by the same hand.

The pictures of this master are not numerous, and unfortunately they have become very dark, and now exhibit a reddish brown appearance, which has considerably diminished their value. Otherwise they are masterly productions. On this account it is difficult, at the present day, to form an estimate of his merits as a colourist, though he has been praised for them by writers who had seen his pictures in their pristine condition. Their chiaroscuro recalls productions of Rembrandt, and the effect of his landscapes is imposing, owing to their boldness and grandeur. He has shown that the perfection of the art is the correct representation of the forms of nature, however great may be the differences of manner resulting from the individual temperaments of different masters.

Huysmans died at Malines in 1727, having attained the venerable age of seventy-nine.

As already stated, the pictures of this master are not numerous, either in public galleries, or in the collections of private individuals. There are several of his compositions in the museum and the churches of Malines; and the Royal Gallery at Brussels possesses a landscape, enriched with figures. The Munich Gallery contains a seaport and several landscapes, and the Louvre possesses four fine landscapes, in addition to the pictures which he painted in conjunction with Van der Meulen.

There is a small landscape by this master in the writing-closet at Hampton Court, and another in the collection of the Duke of Bridgewater; but neither of them can be considered as a favourable specimen of his style and manner.

The pictures of Huysmans have seldom commanded a high price; while they preserved their original beauty, works of that character were not appreciated as their merits entitled them to be, and now their value is depreciated by the darkening of the colours. At the sale of the Chevalier Laroque, at Paris, in 1745, two landscapes by Huysmans, in frames elaborately carved and richly gilt, were sold for £3; and two others, in the same style, produced only eighteen shillings. Two landscapes, enriched with figures and animals, from the cabinet of M. de Mesnard, were sold for the sum of £4 the pair.

Justice was rendered to Huysmans, however, at the sale of M. de Calonne, in 1788, when a landscape, enriched with figures and animals, realised the sum of £120. His pictures did not long retain the favour of amateurs, however; for in 1823, at the sale of M. de St. Victor, a landscape of warm tone, with figures and animals, was sold for £2. At that of M. Brun, in 1841, a magnificent landscape by this master, considered one of the best he ever painted, was sold for £9. In the following year, one of his landscapes was sold for £6, at the sale of M. Etienne Leroy; and in 1845, at the sale of M. Meffre, two others were sold for £6 10s.

The works of Huysmans have never been engraved. None of them have either signature or mark.

THE BEGINNINGS OF ART.

To find the rude beginnings of the arts of design, we must go back to a very early age, to the monuments of Assyria and Egypt—so soon did the human mind aspire to the representation of the things which occupied it, and which excited the imagination into action. The faculty of imitation is evidenced remarkably in those arts, in which the images that fill the mind are exhibited to the eye in all the reality of form and colour. While society was yet in the pastoral stage, Adam had his sculptured god; and the walls of the buried palaces of Nineveh, the oldest city of the world, show that the arts of design were known and practised at a very early period. The researches of Botta and Layard have made us acquainted with the degree of proficiency attained by the Assyrian artists, which all who have seen the reproduction of a portion of the palace of Sennacherib in the Sydenham Palace, or the original bas-reliefs in the British Museum, must acknowledge to have been remarkable for the period.

The human-headed bulls which adorned the portals of the Ninevite palaces, the statues of their gods and departed kings, and the bas-reliefs which covered the interior walls of the royal chambers, were all coloured; and this with pigments so bright and enduring, as to be perceptible after the lapse of more than three thousand years. We find mention also, in profane history, of colossal statues of Nimus and Sardanais, in gold and brass; and in sacred history of the golden statue, sixty cubits high, which Nebuchadnezzar set up in the plain of Dura, to compel the captive Jews to bow down before and worship it. The walls of Babylon appear also to have been decorated with bas-reliefs, representing hunting scenes, which were executed and painted on the surfaces of the bricks before they were burnt, and consequently must have been vitrified—the earliest approach which we can trace to enamelling.

The ancient Egyptians practised the sculptor's art extensively, and in a style similar to that of the Assyrians, which shows the first rude efforts of man to embody his feeling of the beautiful and sublime. The works of art belonging to the earliest ages are analogous to the first attempts of children—inperfect in conception, rude in execution, without any attention to perspective, and appealing to the eye by bright and strongly-contrasted colours. The constant aspiration to represent the human form, and the use of colours before the art of tracing with correctness any of the forms of nature has been acquired, also remind us of our own juvenile attempts. The general proportions of the human form are roughly given; but there is no attempt at elegance, or to portray individual differences of character. An evidence of their ignorance of the true principles of drawing may be seen in the kneeling figure of the large Egyptian fragment in the British Museum, where, amongst other errors, the eye, but half of which can be seen in profile, is shown in full, the same as it would appear in a front view. As a general rule, it may be observed, that their animals are more correctly represented than their human figures, and that, among the latter, their female forms are superior to those of the other sex. The most comprehensive view of Egyptian art is seen in the plates to Rosellini's great work on the monuments of Egypt and Nubia; but the collection of Egyptian antiquities in the British Museum is now quite adequate to convey a correct idea of its style and characteristics.

The Greeks, who received their first ideas of painting and sculpture from the Egyptians, attained the greatest proficiency in the latter art, as a walk through the Greek court of the Sydenham Palace, where the finest emanations of the sculptor's genius are reproduced in plaster, will convince every observer. But their first attempts were as crude and imperfect as those of their teachers. The figures on the early Grecian vases are characterised by the same stiffness and conventionality as those which appear in the Nineveh bas-reliefs and the sculptured obelisks of Egypt. The first essays of the artist were simple outlines, such as are now known as silhouettes; the next step was to add the parts within the outline, but still without light or shade, which Pliny says was first done by Cleophrastus of Corinth; and from this an advance was made to monochromatic painting, such as may be seen on the vases in the British Museum. Eumarus was, according to Pliny, the first who gave to each sex its characteristic style of design, so as to illustrate the attributes of each by the figure and complexion, giving a robust and vigorous form to the males, and making the females lighter and more delicate.

Cimon of Cleone, whose period was anterior to that of Polygnotus by at least a century, improved upon the method of Eumarus by giving variety to the attitudes of his figures, and exhibiting the muscular articulations, the veins, and the folds of the drapery. The most ancient paintings extant are the four on marble tablets discovered at Herculaneum, and now in the museum at Naples; the designs are defaced in some parts, and the colours have been nearly destroyed by heat. The same museum contains two other pictures from Herculaneum, two from Stabia, and one from Pompeii, but these are of later date; the subjects are all taken from the Greek mythology. The Vatican contains a stucco painting, discovered on the Esquiline mound; this is a work of considerable immediately opposite to St. John. That apostle is Judas Iscariot. The figure of this man is boldly relieved, and separated from the rest of the group; one of his hands rests on the table, and with the other he holds the bag of money--the means of his temptation. His head is averted from the penetrating glance of the Master, and is turned fully towards the spectators. There is an expression of the intensest malignity, baseness, and disquietude, exhibited in the features of this betrayer. The contrast of these two principal figures is peculiarly striking; and the faces brought thus close together—one so full of highest virtue, the other so vicious and depraved—demand particular attention. The figures of the other apostles are all boldly designed, and are thoroughly characteristic of the men. St. Peter sits to the right of the Saviour; St. Andrew, St. James the Greater, and St. Bartholomew, have their glances fixed upon Judas. St. Peter holds a knife in his hand, and the strongest indignation is written on his countenance; the expression of St. Andrew is severe, of St. James melancholy, St. Bartholomew resentful yet full of pity. The rest of the apostles are, for the most part, calm and indifferent; two, however, should be carefully regarded. The first, St. James the Less, sits at the extreme engraved by Perugino upon the folds of the gown of the Madonna, in the picture painted for Lorenzo Neri, upon the robes of "The Holy Family," in the Piles, Kimbolton; and also upon various frescoes. In the last year of his life, Raffaele signed his name in full. The figure of St. James the Less is said to be a portrait of Raffaele, and the same as that in the celebrated picture called "The Contest at the Holy Sacrament."

In 1505 Raffaele was at Florence. At that time he painted left of the table; his profile is gracefully turned towards the spectator, and is remarkably beautiful in its design: the other, St. Thomas, is not less fine; he is represented pouring wine into a cup or glass.

A vast number of connoisseurs were admitted to view the fresco, and, for the most part, they agreed with Zotti and Della Porta, as to the picture being the production of Raffaele himself. Some of portraits of Angelo and Madeline Poul. A member of this family, early in that year, became superior of the Convent of St. Onofre. This circumstance explains how the young painter obtained the commission to paint "The Last Supper" on the convent walls.

Among the heads of the saints represented on the moulds which adorn the foliage is to be noticed a portrait of St. Bernard, for whom Raffaele professed particular devotion.

the reasons which led them to this conclusion may not be uninteresting.

On the collar of the tunic of St. Thomas are the following letters in gold:—R A, P and L united, V, N and S, O a little effaced, A M M D V. This is translated: "Raphael Urbinas, Anno Domini 1505."

Raffaele was, it is well known, in the habit of thus signing many of his pictures. It is thus written on the robe of the Virgin,

The names of the artists, placed by the painter under the figures of the apostles, are written in the dialect of Urbino, where Raffaele was born.

The foliage and other ornaments which surround the picture resemble those to be met with in other works of the same master; and the delicate painting of Onofre and Gheris name, together with the figures which are introduced, render the spectator of those beautiful compositions of Raffaele which adorn the walls of the Vatican.

A painter, M. Giulio Patti, and the sculptor Emilio Santarelli, possessed for a long time designs which were always attributed to Raffaele, and which represented several of the figures—St. Peter with a knife in his hand, St. James the Less, and St. Andrew—the same in every particular as they appear in the fresco.

Upon these proofs, it has been generally concluded that "The Last Supper" of St. Onofre is the undoubted work of Raffaele. But, as we have presented our readers with the evidence in favour of its authenticity, it is but fair to represent the other side of the question.

An Italian writer, named Gargani, believed that he had discovered the author of the painting to be none other than Neri di Bicci, on account of a manuscript, bearing date 1461, declaring that a picture of "The Last Supper" was painted on the walls of the refectory of St. Onofre by that artist. On further examination, however, it appears that there were two refectories, the old and the new, and that the one in which the fresco was discovered is certainly more modern than the other. Besides this, there is evidence of the other painting having been destroyed. But, if no other evidence existed but the painting itself, the grouping of the design, the style of the whole, the delicacy of finish, would be enough to prove that it was not painted at the period of Neri di Bicci—there being a vast difference between pictures of 1461 and 1505. In the interval between those two epochs, painting made immense progress, and a complete revolution in art took place; and a more positive contrast can scarcely be imagined than exists between the productions of those two ages.

A celebrated German artist, having seen and greatly admired the picture, wrote to MM. Della Porta and Zotti, assuring them that he had no doubt of the authenticity of the painting; that the construction of the piece, the expression of the various faces, all pointed out Raffaele as their author. The objection urged on the ground of its not being mentioned in any of the catalogues of Raffaele's works was easily met by the fact, that many well-attested works of that master were omitted in these lists; that at the period when Raffaele must have executed this work, he was a young and comparatively unknown man; and that the silence of his biographers on this particular work was not to be taken into account.

A great deal of controversy was originated by the discovery of the picture; but at length the critics came to an almost unanimous conclusion that the painting was the work of the great Raffaele. However plain and simple the sketches may be, this fact is, we think, enough to warrant us in presenting our readers with the designs.

The picture was with great difficulty removed from the convent wall. It was sold to the Tuscan government for £13,000.

FINE ART EXHIBITION AT GENEVA.

THE biennial exhibition of works of art at Geneva was established, some years ago, by a society of artists and amateurs, whose efforts to promote the study of the fine arts, and to encourage and reward those devoted to them, have caused the subject to be taken into the serious consideration of the government. Pleased, as it is, amid the romantic scenery which has given birth to one of the most celebrated schools of landscape-painting, represented by such able artists as MM. Diday and Calame, Geneva, so famous for the intelligence and commercial activity of its citizens, promises to become one of the centres of art. In the sublime scenery of their fatherland, and no less in the heroic achievements of their forefathers, the artists of Switzerland have a fertile and, indeed, inexhaustible field for the exercise of their talents. Among the most promising artists of the Genevese school, we may enumerate M. Gleyre, the painter of that poetical composition, "The Night of Life," which has been so much admired in the Luxembourg Gallery; M. Lugardon, the interpreter of Swiss history; and Leopold Robert, one of the meditative school of landscape-painters, which had its best exponent in Ruysdael. But what has been wanting to Swiss art has been appreciation and encouragement, for want of which the beautiful and the picturesque have to be pursued amid difficulties, and fame alone has rewarded the success that has been attained by self-denial. The times are past when such munificence was displayed as that of the senate of Basle, which offered Holbein an annual pension of 1,200 florins to induce him to fix his residence in his native town. Yet, with all these discouraging circumstances, we feel assured that, one day or another, the landscape school of Geneva will acquire renown; and, with this feeling, it was not without disappointment and regret that we walked through the saloon of the exhibition without observing a single picture by Calame—an artist too enthusiastic, and too truly Swiss in his nature, not to have contributed, with all the force of his genius, to the honour of his country.

M. Diday, however, has the honour of giving to the exhibition the écot of his great talent and high reputation as a landscape-painter, by sending two pictures of the highest merit. "The Aur at Handeck" is a beautiful view, full of grandeur, and drawn with truthfulness and vigour. The foaming torrent bounds from rock to rock, and rushes angrily through the sombre valley; the dark branches of the tall pines are shaken and distorted by the wind; and the clouds, black and heavy, cast their shadows on the sides of the mountain. It is a grand picture, showing nature in a wild and stormy mood, and bears internal evidence of having been sketched on the spot, when dark clouds have rolled over the mountain, and the stream has been swelled by rain into a torrent. The other picture, "Lake Lemán," is of a character entirely different. In this the calmness and serenity of nature are depicted, and the artist has shown great ability in producing two pictures of such diverse character, and at the same time of so much truthfulness and beauty. It is a rich composition, drawn with equal freedom and vigour, and evincing a profound study of nature, and knowledge of her varied forms. The brushwood and wild plants growing on the borders of the lake are drawn with wonderful fidelity to nature. The colouring is clear, but somewhat deficient in warmth; otherwise it is a masterly composition.

Near these two pictures we perceive several landscapes by M. Saltzman, a young artist of Absacc, who has acquired in Italy, where he resided some time, a manner of composition and execution full of boldness and vigour. "A Souvenir of Provence," the best of the three pictures which he exhibits, is marked by those qualities in a high degree, and the clearness and harmony of the colouring deserve the praise which is freely bestowed. The composition is simple: a heath, a rocky bank, and some fine trees, form the landscape, which is animated by some figures evincing a taste for the antique, and drawn with the freedom and vigour which are characteristic of the whole design. The other two productions of this artist are of inferior merit, and have a reddishness of tone which gives them an unpleasant effect.

M. Humbert contributes to the exhibition a series of landscapes, with figures of animals, which do credit to himself and to the school to which he belongs. Lightness and beauty, truthfulness to nature, and splendour of colouring, are their characteristics. His skies are bright and clear, recalling those of Claude; his distances correct; and his animals richly coloured, and grouped in a picturesque and effective manner. His best picture represents "A Mountain Pasturage," with a goat and several cows; it is of large dimensions, and characterised by all the qualities we have ascribed to him. The light clouds which sweep slowly across the sky, the cool misty air of early morning, and the glistening dew upon the herbage, are finely represented. The picture derives a grand effect from the transparency of the shadows; and nothing can be better than the grouping and colours of the cattle, by which the effect of contrast is obtained, without injury to the harmony of the composition. "A Landscape" with animals, is somewhat similar in design, and resembles it in the transparency of the veil of mist and the truthfulness to nature of the animals.

M. Thuiller, a distinguished landscape-painter, contributes a grand view of the "Lake of Annay." This picture has a pleasing effect at first sight, but on a more attentive view, the spectator is struck by a peculiarity in the treatment of the sky. It is possible that the scene represented, may, in certain conditions of the atmosphere, present a similar aspect, but its representation evinces a want of taste on the part of the artist. The effect produced is far from good; and the figures and animal, moreover, are executed with reprehensible negligence.

M. Albert Langeron, a young Genevese artist, in his "Corman of Verrier," has made his debut as a painter of animals, in which class he is fairly entitled to a place in the first rank, by the vigour and truthfulness of his delineations. The subject is a simple one: one of the hardy and adventurous cormorans of Verrier, near Geneva, is leading down a very steep path two oxen attached to a loaded stone-car, used to convey stone from the quarry. The chained wheel, the attitudes of the oxen and of the man, who looks anxiously down the steep path before him, show the difficulties and dangers of the descent. In the background, a man is seen at work with a pick-axe, and masses of rock rise on both sides. The same artist exhibits several other pictures of animals, all displaying the same truthfulness and vigour.

The exhibition is particularly rich in landscapes, and few of them are without merit; but we are compelled to confine our notice to the best, and we must pass on to the painters of history and genre. We ought not, however, to pass over "A Torment in the Upper Alps," by M. Cusan, an agreeable picture, painted with great care.

The historical pictures are comparatively few in number, and none of them display a high order of talent. M. Fluman exhibits a scene from "The Martyrs" of Charlembriand. "Velloha and Eudora," a picture harmonious in design and colouring, but with many defects. In the figure of Velloha there is a want of taste in the proportions, and the posture of Eudora has too much anachronisme; neither does the countenance sufficiently reflect the feelings that should be inspired by affection for Velloha.

In passing through the saloon, the attention of the spectator cannot fail to be arrested by a charming little composition of M. Gleyre; it is called "A Bacchante;" but the artist has used mythological forms to convey a moral. His conceptions are always happy, and in the present instance he is particularly so. The picture represents a beautiful female riding on a goat, which is led by a faun bearing a torch, while Cupid flies from her, covering his face with his hands. The meaning which is intended to be thus allegorically conveyed is, that when the fair sex suffer themselves to be carried away by bad passions, they repel love, and the better feelings of our nature lose their empire over their hearts. The idea is well carried out, and, both in composition and execution, the picture merits the admiration it elicits. Another production of this artist, "Ruth the Moabitte," though not without merit, is scarcely equal to the little circular composition we have described.

M. Favas exhibits a portrait of General Dufour, which is a striking likeness of that officer, but not remarkable as a work of art. Its defects in this respect, however, are amply compensated in the portrait of an old man, by the same artist—a vigorous and striking picture, deserving the highest encomiums. Before passing from portrait to genre painting, justice and gallantry alike require us to notice a beautiful portrait of a lady, executed in pastel, by Madame Archinard; and another by Mademoiselle Durand, a very tasteful and praiseworthy production.

A PORTRAIT, BY LEONARDO DA VINCI.

THIS magnificent portrait hangs in the gallery appropriated to the works of the Italian masters in that unrivalled collection, the Louvre at Paris. Its beauty as a work of art is not seen at the first glance; it is a picture which requires to be surveyed with attention. It is not by the grandeur of the outlines, nor by the beauty of the colouring, nor by the elegance of the costume, that this head fixes the attention of the spectator. It is by the expression of deep thought which is read in those delicate features, and which Leonardo da Vinci, the greatest of the producers of Raffaele, was the first to excel in representing.

It is uncertain whether this portrait is that of Charles VIII. or of his successor, Louis XII. The artist did not take up his residence in France, at the invitation of Francis I., until 1515, and only survived the change of able five years, during which he suffered almost continually from ill health. Both the monarchs,

M. Hebert is known here as the painter of several pictures, which may be described as holding an intermediate place between history and genre. He has in the exhibition "The Family of a Condottiero," one of those hardy soldiers of fortune who figure so conspicuously in the history of Italy during the middle ages; the composition of the picture is good, but in the article of colour it is very deficient. In the same category with M. Hebert we may place M. Gaudry, who exhibits a charming military scene; and M. Zuber Buhler, who has sent a picture called "First Education," which marks him as an artist of considerable promise.

"The Separation," by M. Kunkler, is a sweet and pleasing picture, representing a butcher offering to purchase of a peasant the pet sheep of his little daughter, who implores her father not to deprive her of her favourite. The innocent face of the child, full of solicitude and apprehension, is exquisite; and all that the picture requires to render it perfect is a little more vividity in the lights.

Among other pictures of this class, we must not forget "The Love of Study," one of several beautiful compositions by M. Paget; "The Indigent Family," by M. Gressbach, a picture full of sentiment and interest; and "The Prisoner's Wife," a beautiful conception of M. Van Muyden, painted with extreme care. Nor must we pass over in silence the beautiful specimens of painting in enamel, which the watch and jewellery trade of Geneva has fostered and encouraged, and for which that city has become as famous as Lyons is for its fruit and flower painters. M. Baud exhibit a copy of "The Sirens" of M. Meun, of the highest finish; and his miniature portraits are remarkable for the truth and vigour displayed in their microscopic proportions. The beautiful landscape designs of MM. Delapleine, Fontanesi, and Prévost, attract attention by their fidelity to nature and delicacy of finish. The fine groups of fruit and flowers, done in water-colours by M. Lays, a Lyonsese artist, are also deserving of notice.

Sculpture forms a comparatively small portion of the exhibition, and there are only a few contributions which call for special notice. M. Dorcière exhibits three groups in marble: "Hagar and Ishmael," "Maternity," and "Confidence," in all of which the sentiment is good, and evinces considerable knowledge of human nature, and ability in representing the softer feelings of the heart. "A Bacchante," by M. Fitting, is conceived with taste; but designs of this kind do not appeal to the heart, like the productions of M. Dorcière, though the eye is gratified by their ideal beauty. Among a series of Swiss subjects in terra-cotta, we observed "A Chamois Hunter," full of character, and executed in a very good style.

The Genevese exhibition has this year created considerable interest, both in and out of Switzerland; and its effect in promoting and encouraging the study of the fine arts cannot fail to be proportionately felt. Swiss artists need not leave their own country in search of the picturesque; on the shores of their own lakes, in the valleys which resound with the roar of the torrent, and in the passes of their mountains, they will always find both subjects and inspiration.

When it has been supposed this portrait may represent a Sardinian, but in the character of hostile invader, Charles VIII. was at Florence, where Leonardo da Vinci then resided, in 1494, and at which period the artist may have painted his portrait. Charles died in 1498, and though his success rivalled Italy, in order to carry out his ambitious designs in the kingdom of Naples, it does not appear that he ever resided at Florence. Moreover, he was held in excommunication by the Italians, on account of the calamities which he brought upon that country, the horrors of the storming of Brescia, the cruel execution of Count Arcofieri, and his two sons for their patriotic resistance to the invader, and other atrocities. For all these reasons, it is much more probable that the portrait is that of Charles VIII. than of his cruel and ambitious successor.

Leonardo da Vinci may be regarded as the first painter who attempted to reconcile minute and elaborate finish with grandeur of idea and dignity of form. In the expression of character, and the just delineation of the affections and emotions, he surpassed every painter who had preceded him; and it detracts nothing from his merit to acknowledge, that he was excelled in this sublime department of art by Raffaele, who rose into celebrity as Leonardo disappeared from the stage which he had trod so worthily.

The story of this great artist having died in the arms of Francis I. is now discredited. He died at the Château of Cloux, near Amboise, on the 2nd of May, 1519; and, according to the journal of Francis, preserved in the Royal Library at Paris, the court was effectually to court the various graces he pursued. His line was free from meagreness, and his forms presented volume; but he appears not to have ever been much acquainted, or to have sedulously sought much acquaintance, with the antique. Character was his favourite study; and character he has often raised from an individual to a species, and as often depressed to caricature. The strength of his execution lay in the delineation of male heads; those of his females owe nearly all their charms to chiaroscuro, of which he is the supposed inventor; they are seldom more discriminated than the children they fondle; they are sisters of one family." Some of the best works of this master were executed at that day at St. Germain-en-Laye. His intimate friend and former pupil, Francesco Melzi, to whom he bequeathed his drawings and manuscripts, wrote a letter to Leonardo's relations immediately after his death, in which he makes no mention of the circumstance, as he would assuredly have done, if it had occurred; and Lomazzo distinctly says, that it was from Melzi the king first learnt that the artist was dead.

Fuseli thus sums up the character of Leonardo as a painter:—"The universality of Leonardo da Vinci is become proverbial; but though possessed of every element, he rather gave glimpses than a standard of form; though full of energy, he had not powers during his second residence in Florence, which was probably the period when he painted the portrait we have engraved. His execution is elaborate and careful; and he left many of his works in what he considered an unfinished state, though others could see no defect in them. In subjects which he undertook to complete, he not only imitated the brightness of the eyes, the roots of the hair, the pores of the skin, and even the beating of the arteries, but portrayed each separate garment and every accessory with the same minuteness. At the same time he led the way to a more enlarged and dignified style, and smoothed the path, so to speak, for the appearance of Raffaele.

SIMON MATHURIN LANTARA.

LANTARA has acquired a certain name in France, through the notoriety of having passed his life in a tavern and died in a hospital. Men of his stamp, the Bohemians of art, experience the frowns of society while living, but posterity accords its pardon to all their faults, except that of indolence, and their genius obtains for them the respect and sympathy of the critics.

In this little group of improvident artists, however, there have been some who, more than others, perhaps because more largely like the Iazzaroni of Naples, he yet retained unimpaired, throughout his life, the love of nature and the sentiment of art.

Simon Mathurin Lantara was born in 1745, in the environs of Montargis, or more probably at Fontainebleau. His father was a sign-painter, perfectly incapable of giving him lessons in the higher branches of art. Animated by an ardent admiration of the sublime phenomena of the universe, Lantara passed the greater part of his youth in wandering about the forest of Fontainebleau, following one path or another as fancy dictated, and sleeping on the moss and soft herbage, to contemplate the glorious spectacle of the rising sun, and the warm perspectives of the evening twilight. Those promenades, teeming with inspiration, which Claude Lorraine had enjoyed before him in the environs of Rome, Lantara imitated, but under a sky less epic; and between his works and those of the great master whom he unconsciously took for his model, there is all the distance which separates the romantic Campagna of Rome from the familiar neighbourhood of Paris. Lantara was a dreamer, a man afflicted with that restlessness of spirit, that vague disquietude agitating the mind without ceasing, which we find revealed in the life and in the works of Rousseau. Men of this temperament pursue all their life's the happiness which flies before them. Some seek it in love, others in work. Lantara sought it in the tavern.

Lodged in the garret of a miserable inn in the Rue du Chantre, Lantara sometimes went out in the morning to walk about in the fields, far from the noise and confusion of Paris, and breathe a freer and purer atmosphere. When night came, he carried back his hunger to the city, and, returning to his wretched lodging, sat down to drink, to cease drinking only when he became thoroughly intoxicated. At other times, shut up in his garret, he remained the whole week without going out. This was the life of Lantara; when he worked, and how he worked, are among its undivulged mysteries. One thing is certain, for the rarity of his works proves it—that he worked no more than he was obliged to do. He had to get a living, however; and pressed by necessity, sold landscapes to greedy dealers, to amateurs, and to some shopkeepers of the neighbourhood in which he lived.

gifted by nature, retain the poetry of their art amid privations and misery, and the scintillations of whose genius are not extinguished even by the gross pleasures of the debauch. Lantara, who is the type of the painters of the tavern, and whose improvidence and misery have become proverbial among the artists of his country, was one of these favoured children of nature. Steeped in poverty, addicted to the degrading vice of intoxication, and idle by nature, "Lantara," says Alexander Lenoir, "was always poor, yet happy in his poverty; his crayons, his palette, his brushes, and a favourite bird comprised all his moveables. The pet bird was the charm of his miserable habitation." M. Lenoir attributes to Lantara a mixture of good and evil qualities, and thus apologises for the latter: "He had vices, but it is to his want of education, rather than to an inherently evil nature, that we must attribute them; with goodness of heart he combined a simplicity of soul which induces us to pardon all, even his indolence and his epicurism."

An artist so organised ought to be a good landscape painter. For artists who are without care, whether for glory, for fortune, or for honours, are more likely than others to be influenced by that ardent love of nature which is the true inspiration of their profession. The scenery of the woods, the hills, and the heaths, is to them in the place of family and possession. They live in the rays of the sun, and comprehend the glory and the poetry of its rising and its setting. For them the radiance of the sunbeams is gold, and the moon-tinted edges of the white clouds are silver. They love the splendour of the stars, the mysteries of twilight, and the silence of night; they are enraptured with the beauty of the skies. Thus it was with poor Lantara. Thus he often stood at night, immovable, on the Pont Neuf, contemplating in a holy ecstacy the sun sinking behind the other bridges, and reddening with its slanting beams the waters of the Seine. Afterwards, in a coffee-house, or in his miserable lodging, he painted from memory the effects which had excited his admiration, portraying on blue paper, with the lightest touches of a white crayon, sometimes the tranquil and mysterious effects of moonlight, sometimes those of the sun, the tints, the contrast, and the accidents with which he had made himself familiar in his ramblings.

The name of Lantara is not to be found in the dictionaries of Bryan and Pilkington, nor in any of the French works on art, with one single exception. But in the month of October, 1899, a one-act drama was produced at the Theatre du Vaudeville, having for its title "Lantara, or the Painter of the Tavern." As the character of the artist is very ably treated, an analysis of the piece will not be out of place here, and may interest our readers.

Like some of the sages of Greece, Lantara carries all his wealth about him. He is first introduced at a suburban tavern, to which is attached one of those numerous tea-gardens still so much frequented by the working classes of Paris, as in the days of Louis XV. The scene changes to a restaurant kept by the porter of the Jardin des Plantes, where the painter has an appointment with a picture-dealer named Jacob. The simple artist has always thought that to effect a marriage it is sufficient for the parties to love each other, and hopes for the union of his daughter Therese with Victor, the son of Jacob. But the rich picture-dealer is indignant at the idea of such a mesalliance, and thinks it beneath his dignity even to dine with one so wretchedly poor as Lantara; so he goes off, to dine with some other picture-dealers, leaving the angry and humiliated artist alone. To dissipate his vexation and disappointment, he sits down to dinner, and commences by drinking to the health of all mankind. Having thus raised his spirits, he gives them vent in a Bacchanalian song, in the midst of which a model named Belletête enters. Lantara makes him sit down, and dine with him; and here the authors have well marked the difference which separates the gluttonous model from the artist, who maintains even in the tavern some sparks of politeness and good taste. On the second course being called for, the restaurant brings in the bill, and refuses to serve the roast fowl that should form it until his demand has been liquidated, for he has formed a shrewd guess that Lantara is entirely without resources.

The artist, upon this, calls for paper, and makes a crayon drawing of the head of Belletête, in the character of Silenus; during the execution of which he sings a song on the variety and opposite characters of the heads which his crayon has at different times produced. He sends the drawing to Jacob, and fixes the price at twenty francs. The picture-dealer offers twelve, which Lantara, who, in the meantime, has added by sundry potatoes to the length of the bill, angrily refuses to accept. He now makes a spirited drawing of his daughter and Victor, holding each other by the hand, and looking on each other with eyes beaming with love. This he also sends to Jacob, requiring for it forty francs. The picture-dealer is willing to purchase; but his friends admire the drawing so much, that they bid against each other until the price rises to fifty crowns. But Lantara declares that Jacob alone shall have it at the price he himself fixed upon it. Vanquished by this noble trait of character, the picture-dealer consents to the marriage, and Lantara assigns to his daughter the sum of twenty thousand francs, the price of a beautiful moonlight picture.

The character of Lantara seems to be correctly drawn in this vaudeville. Simplicity, frankness, and disinterestedness, form his moral portrait. Respecting the artist's love of wine, the picture drawn by its authors is not in accordance with the brief notice of M. Alexander Lenoir, who says, "Lantara has been reproached with drunkenness; the charge is false; he loved a cup of biere (an infusion of tea and capillaire) or chocolate better than a bottle of wine. His pictures were obtained at a low price by practising on his simplicity and good nature. He would paint a landscape for an almond-cake, a tart, or any other kind of pastry. Dabot, the keeper of a café near the Louvre, obtained a number of the finest drawings of Lantara by supplying him with biere and coffee."

But what was the character of the pictures and drawings which the artist exchanged so freely for tarts and coffee? It might be expected that they were tavern-scenes—card-players and brawlers—sketches made in the low haunts of vice and dissipation. But not the most beautiful aspects of nature—luminous horizons, moonlit waters, skies empurpled by the sun—these were what Lantara painted in preference. The obscure frequenter of Dabot's café took nature for his model, and had all the poetry of nature in his soul. Lantara is the Claude of a more temperate climate. It is not on the banks of the Seine that we meet with grand ruins, colonnades of circular temples dedicated to Venus, and marble tombs tinged with roseate hues by the declining orb of day; but, in default of these august souvenirs, which fill up the landscapes of Claude, and impress them with a character of solemn poetry, our poor Bohemian of the Rue du Chantre drew from his poetic temperament and his observant love of nature those purple sunsets, those silver-edged clouds, which seem to float across his moonlights, and those magical effects of light, in the representation of which he is inferior only to the great landscape painter whom we have named. "It would be difficult," says a most competent judge, "to carry skill in aerial perspective further than Lantara has done. All his pictures and drawings are characterised by the same pure and refined taste; and if, upon a close examination, disproportion may be observed in some of his compositions, it is a fault which takes nothing from his merits as a colourist. The careful study of his works will singularly facilitate the imitation of the grand and beautiful effects of nature."*

It was from the ingenuousness of his nature that Lantara drew the sentiment of harmony. Of colour and simplicity he possessed as much as it is possible to imagine. M. Lenoir relates that Lantara, having borrowed four-and-twenty shillings, was not ashamed to offer four shillings on account. In his dealings with amateurs he was as simple and as scrupulously honest as in settling with his creditors. An amateur had ordered of the artist a landscape, in which there should be a church and figures. Lantara finished the picture, but introduced no figures, which he was not skilful in drawing. On his taking home the picture, the amateur was struck with its truthfulness, with the brilliancy of the colours, and with the lightness of the touch; but when the first transports of admiration had subsided, he perceived that the artist had not introduced the desired figures.

"Monsieur Lantara," said he, "you have omitted the figures in your picture."

"Sir," replied the artist with an air of simplicity, "they are at mass."

"Ah, well," returned the amateur; "wish the picture when they come out."

The awkwardness of the artist in drawing figures led him to avail himself of the brush of some obliging brother of the art. Among the pictures of this master in the gallery of M. Delorsart, there are three in which the figures are by Nicholas Tannay and Demarne. In the figures which enrich other landscapes by Market," which we have engraved (p. 152), is the property of Dr. Ronx.

M. Didot is the possessor of three pictures by Lantara:—"A Water-mill," with animals by Berré; a "Sunset," and a "Rising of the Moon," with figures by Nicholas Taunay.

Lantara left a great number of drawings, executed with ease and sentiment: they are done with crayons, in black and white. Some of the moonlight scenes are described by those who have seen them as exquisitely beautiful. The effects of mist, and of the moon shining through a haze, are portrayed with wonderful correctness. There is one of these beautiful designs in the gallery of the Louvre.

In the cabinet of engravings belonging to the National Library, at Paris, there are preserved, between two sheets of paper, some indifferent lithographs, two or three engravings by Mouchy, Née, Beaugeon, Madame Massard, and Couché; and a landscape, with a bridge, etched with aquafortis by Lantara himself.

was valued at his sale, in 1817, at £32; the two others, both representing landscapes with figures, at £23.

At the St. Victor sale, in 1823, "A Tempest," by this master, produced £35, and "A Moonlight" £7. "A Landscape," representing the sun breaking through the haze of early morning, with three figures by Bernard, was sold for £25.

At the Vignerot sale, in 1829, a landscape by Lantara produced the comparatively large sum of £120.

M. Alphonse Giroux formerly possessed a landscape by Lantara, representing a sheet of water; on the sale of this gentleman's collection, which took place in 1851, this picture was valued at £16.

Lantara signed all his pictures and drawings; we annex a fac-simile of his signature.

At the sale of the collection of Count de Dubary, in 1774, four years before the death of Lantara, a beautiful landscape by this master, with figures, was sold for £2. Two others, enriched with figures by Casanova, rose by competition to £15.

In 1776, at the sale of M. Blondel de Gagny, treasurer-general to the sinking-fund office, two pictures by Lantara were sold for £5.

The Prince of Conti had four pictures by this master, of very small dimensions, which were sold, in 1777, for £22.

At the sale of the Castelmoré collection, in 1791, a fine landscape by Lantara, with some figures and a cow by Casanova, was sold for £15.

A picture by this master, representing a rocky coast, and ornamented with figures by Nicholas Taunay, was sold by the Duke of Choiseul-Praslin, in 1809, for £13.

At the Solirène sale, in 1812, a snuff-box, ornamented with two miniature landscapes by Lantara—one representing daybreak, the other sunset—was sold for £7.

M. Laperrière, receiver of the finances of the department of the Seine, had three pictures by Lantara; one, with figures by Taunay, PICTURES IN SPAIN.

THE unfortunate civil dissensions to which Spain has been a prey for so many years have not only, by impoverishing the country, deprived the arts of the patronage necessary to their progress, but diverted the attention of the people from the elegancies and refinements of life to the means of preserving their lives and property. Owing mainly to these causes, Spain has produced no great artist since the death of Velasquez and Murillo, with whom the glory of Spanish art may be said to have departed. The efforts of the academies, and the patronage of Charles III., who had acquired a taste for the fine arts while reigning at Naples, were insufficient to rekindle the light that had once shed splendour on the schools of Seville and Valencia. The later artists of the Spanish school degenerated into feebleness and mannerism, and foreign invasions and intestine wars at length caused even imitators and copyists to be without patronage, and the works of the old masters to be neglected and forgotten.

Notwithstanding the abstraction of a great number of pictures from the churches and monasteries during the French occupation, it is known that there must be an immense number of good pictures still in the country, which would furnish materials for valuable national collections, could they be discovered. But public as well as private property has been subjected to such repeated outrages in the course of the wars and revolutions that have so long distracted the country, that every picture of value has been secreted to await the restoration of tranquillity. A great number of private families are known to possess pictures which have been handed down as heirlooms, and are hidden to prevent their loss in the political convulsions that have been of such frequent occurrence. Whenever a brief period of tranquillity has supervened, a number of paintings have been brought from their hiding-places in vaults and closets, and exposed for sale at the shops of the brokers and picture-dealers of Madrid. All are declared to be by Murillo, Velasquez, Zurbaran, or some other great artist of European reputation; but the majority check existed upon the destruction or abstraction of pictures to any extent. In nearly every place the local authorities threw obstacles in the way of the commissioners, sometimes, no doubt, from jealousy of interference, but often, it is feared, in order to conceal their population, or the loss of their properties in other ways.

At Albuera, for instance, the existence of any local collection was denied, but a catalogue was accidentally discovered containing a list of 193 pictures, which had been collected in 1807, and had unaccountably disappeared. At Ciudad Real, again, the commissioners could get no account of the works of art which were known to have existed, especially in the neighbouring monastery of the Hieronymites, at Gaudalope, near Bejaran. On proceeding to a certain what still remained within the walls of the monastery, they were refused by the local authorities, who pretended that everything there belonged to the public, and not to the state. At Cordiz, though a have been ascertained to be the works of the copyists of the 18th century.

Nothing can be more melancholy than the account presented in the report of the commission appointed by royal ordinance in 1844 to make inquiries relative to the works of art contained in the suppressed monasteries. A hope had been entertained of finding a gallery of painting and sculpture in the principal town of each province, but the royal commissioners, Don Jose Madrazo and Don Valentin Carderera, were soon convinced of the hopelessness of such an undertaking. In some provinces the pictures had found their way into the possession of foreign dealers and amateurs; in others, "many of the most esteemed works of art, the glory and ornament of the most sumptuous churches, had perished in their application to the vilest uses; in others, scarcely any record was preserved of what had been in existence at the time of the dissolution of the monasteries, and no inventory or catalogue of any kind had been made." It must be evident that, under such circumstances, no catalogue had been made, prints had been mixed up with pictures, so that it was found impossible to detect those, though many were gravely misquoted. Plunder had been carried on to a most disgraceful extent at Ciudad Real, and the investigations of the commissioners were resisted by the supporters of the party of Sr. Jacinto Flores. At Valencia, several pictures had disappeared within the last three years. A number of paintings had been abstracted from the museum of Orihuela within a short period, and the collector could tell what had become of them. In the Kingdom of Valencia many pictures were missing, which was ascribed to the depredations of the Carlist insurrection. The report says, "it would be very difficult to destroy in the present hands, on the other the state of affairs has thrown a small over the sea, who have printed and are refusing, and have unjustly appropriated to the property of the state. Exact portraits of kings were known to exist in the Benedictine monastery of Leriz, near Pontevedra, but the authorities asserted positively that no works of art whatever existed there." At Seville, during the night pictures which, according to a catalogue made in 1835, had then existed, had since disappeared, and no explanation could be obtained from the authorities.

In some other towns the commissioners were more successful. At Alava eighty-six pictures were collected, but there was no place for their reception. At Alabaete forty-six pictures, mostly by native artists, with a few specimens of the Italian masters, had been preserved. At Barcelona some pictures were obtained, and placed in the museum; and some by Vandyck, Zurbaran, and other celebrated masters, were found in the Carmelite convent, near Castellon. Twenty pictures of the Italian schools had been rescued from the Benedictine convent at Cornuba; and no less than 180, among which were works of Ribera and Zurbaran, were collected at Guadaluara. Eighteen were collected at Lerida, twenty-nine at Teruel, and a few others at Zamora and Huelva.

In some places museums have been established, where the pictures were numerous enough, and local funds existed, which were available for the purpose; in others the pictures have been placed in convents still existing, or other public buildings. A museum, containing 200 pictures, was opened at Orilueka in January, 1845, and the work of collecting was still going on. At Badajoz a museum was about to be formed in the old Franciscan convent. A collection of 252 pictures, mostly of the Spanish schools, had been deposited in the College of the Assumption, at Cordova. At Huesca 120 pictures had been collected, and placed in the building belonging to the Economical Society. At Jaen 238, including some by Murillo, Zurbaran, Cano, Titian, and Albano, had been placed in the old Jesuit convent. The local commission of Orseze had succeeded in securing as many as 120 pictures and some pieces of sculpture, and it was intended to establish a museum. Fifteen pictures were placed in the university of Oviedo; and thirty-six were collected at Palencia, including some attributed to Vandyck, Carlo Maratti, and Guido, which were to form the nucleus of a local museum. In Salamanca as many as 1,061 pictures were ascertained to exist as public property, which were in various convents and other buildings until a proper place for a local museum could be obtained. This object has not, however, been yet attained, owing to the want of funds, which, in Spain, cripples every undertaking. At Sevelia 186 pictures were deposited in the episcopal palace.

The Seville museum is without doubt the richest in Spain, for there Murillo shines in all his glory; but the commissioners were unable to obtain a complete and satisfactory catalogue, of which they complain bitterly in their report. Some of the pictures from the suppressed convents and churches of Toledo had been transferred to Madrid, and an accurate inventory of these, or of the pictures originally in those buildings, could not be procured; such as remained were deposited in the old convent of St. Pedro Martir. The rich museum of Valencia is established in the old Carmelite convent, and contains as many as 600 pictures, mostly by native artists. The collection of portraits of celebrated Spanish poets, which was formerly in the monastery of Murta, was transferred to the academy of St. Carlos. The works of art existing in the suppressed convents of St. Benito el Real, the Merced Calzada, and St. Diego, at Valladolid, have been removed to the museum of that city, which already contained 947 pictures and 229 pieces of sculpture, and is one of the most important in Spain. The little museum of Vizcaya contains thirty pictures, the catalogue of which is mentioned in the report as the only one which fulfilled all the conditions required by the commission—that is to say, it set forth the subjects, the schools, and the names of the artists, the supposed merits of the pictures, their state of preservation, and the convent whence each came. A few pictures were collected at Saragossa, and it was proposed to establish a museum in the old convent of Santa Fé; but the want of funds and the indifference of the local authorities have hitherto prevented the proposition from being carried out.

Of the neglect which works of art have long experienced in Spain, and the manner in which so many of the best have disappeared, a striking picture has been presented by Madame Hahn-Hahn. "It is wretched," she says, speaking of the museum of Seville, and the custody of pictures there in 1841, "to see how these invaluable jewels of pictures are preserved! Uncleaned, without the necessary varnish, sometimes without frames, they lean against the walls, or stand unprotected in the passages where they are copied. Every dauber may mark his squares upon them, to facilitate his drawing; and since these squares are permanent in some pictures, in order to spare these admirable artists the trouble of renewing them, the threads have, in certain cases, begun to leave their impression on the picture. The proof of this negligence is the fact, that we found to-day the mark of a finger-nail on the St. Augustine, which was not there on the first day that we saw it. We can only thank God if nothing worse than a finger-nail make a mark on the picture. It stands there on the ground, without a frame, leaning against the walls. One might knock it over or kick one's foot through it. There is to be sure a kind of ragged custole sitting by, but if one were to give him a couple of dollars he would hold his tongue; he is, moreover, always sleeping, and yawns as if he would put his jaws out. He does not forget, however, on these occasions to make the sign of the cross with his thumb opposite his open mouth, for fear the devils should fly in—such is the common belief. You see clearly that, with this amount of neglect and want of order, the fate awaits all the Murillos here which has already befallen the Leonardo's "Last Supper," at Milan. These are all collected in two public buildings, in the church of the Ciudad, and in the Museum.

"The Ciudad was a hospital or charitable institution. The pictures were brought hither from Murillo's own studio; there are five—'Moses,' 'the Freeing of the Five Thousand,' the 'St. Juan de Dios,' a little 'Salvator Mundi,' and a small 'John the Baptist;' the sixth, the pendant to the 'St. Juan de Dios,' the 'St. Elizabeth with the Sick,' has been carried to the Museum at Madrid. It is very questionable whether these five pictures will be still in the Ciudad in ten years time. Nothing would be easier than to smuggle out the two small pictures. A painter comes—copies them—does not stand upon a few dollars more or less—takes off the originals, and leaves the copies behind in their places, which are high up and badly lighted—the pictures are gone for ever! This sort of proceeding is not impossible here, and Baron Taylor's purchases for Paris prove the fact. It cannot of course be done without corruption and connivance on the part of the official guardians; and, after all, one has hardly the courage to lament it. The pictures are, in fact, saved—they are protected and duly valued."

Seville was formerly renowned for its riches in private collections of works of art: these have all disappeared, but the influence of the clergy has been sufficient to preserve such a number of fine pictures in their splendid cathedral that it forms one of the best collections in Spain. It possesses twelve Murillos, and many of the best productions of Ribera, Zurbaran, Cano, and Henera. At Madrid the royal gallery contains a greater number of chefs-d'œuvre, with a smaller proportion of inferior works, than any similar collection in Europe. It contains some of the finest productions of Titian, Rubens, and other artists who visited Madrid in the reign of Charles V. and his successors; and since the suppression of the monasteries, it has been further enriched by the addition of the splendid collection so long the boast of the Escorial, including some of the best works of Raffaele. There are also some fine specimens of Tintoretto, Paul Veronese, the Bassanos, and all the celebrated masters of the Roman, Florentine, and Bolognese schools. Its specimens of Claude and Poussin are both numerous and excellent; and the productions of the Dutch and Flemish schools are also of the first order. With respect to the Spanish schools, the collection is not so complete as it might be, which, considering the number of pictures by native artists that exist throughout Spain, is somewhat surprising. The best Spanish painters are well represented, however, and Velasquez, in particular, can there alone be truly appreciated.

The qualities which chiefly distinguish the works of the Spanish masters are correctness of design and beauty of colouring; a rich, dark tone and strong contrast of light and shade characterise nearly all their great works. But in composition they are not equal to the great Italian masters, nor are their figures equal to those of the latter in ideal grace and beauty. The early painters seem to have taken those of Italy for their models, but under Murillo, Velasquez, and Zurbaran the Spanish school acquired a national character, the and that there are few collections in Paris in which a specimen of his style is not to be found. The same writer says that he had seen a picture by Kalf which would bear comparison with the finest productions of Adrian Van Ostade.

Kalf united much amiability of disposition and kindness of heart with an expanded and cultivated mind and no ordinary ability in his profession. He was equally estimable as a man and admirable as an artist. He was always willing to render a friend or neighbour any service in his power. He possessed a fine figure; and his deportment and manners were refined and dignified,—a rare circumstance in an epoch and a country the artists of which passed the greater part of their time in the noise and smoke of taverns.

poet, wrote an epitaph for his monument, warmly eulogising his talent as an artist and his amiability as a man. It records that Kalf was an admirable painter of golden cups and silver vases, and all the treasures of opulence, but that earth had no treasure sufficient for the reward of his virtues.

Descamps says that the chef-d'œuvre of this master is to be seen at Leyden, in the cabinet of M. de la Court. It represents a melon cut in two, and behind it a handsome vase. How great is the power of art! The travelling amateur, who has surveyed the galleries and museums of Europe, stops at Leyden on his return through Holland, and is shown the chef-d'œuvre of Kalf. He gazes upon it with admiration; the more he looks at it the more he becomes

THE RETURN FROM MARKET. FROM A PAINTING BY KALF.

Kalf died on the 31st of May, 1693, his death being the result of a deplorable accident. Houbracken and Weyerman relate that the artist went to the house of one Cornelius Hellemans, a dealer in objects of art, for the purpose of offering for sale a series of engravings; the bargain was concluded, the dealer agreeing to give the artist the price which he had asked, and the money was to be paid on the following day. With the morrow, however, the news was brought to Hellemans that Kalf was dead. After leaving the house of the dealer, he had fallen over the bridge of Bantem; he was taken out of the water and carried to his own abode, where he died in a few hours afterwards. William Van der Heeven, a Dutch enraptured with the truthfulness of the execution and the brilliancy and harmony of the colouring. Yet the object which the brush of Kalf has rendered so admirable is only the representation of what he has a hundred times seen upon his own table without surprise and without rapture—a melon cut in two!

If we except the gallery of the Louvre, which contains an admirable picture by this master, and those of Amsterdam, Dresden, and Copenhagen, the vases and brass pots of Kalf are not met with in the royal galleries of Europe. Artists and amateurs, however, have rendered ample justice to him, and his works occupy a prominent place in their collections.

Descamps speaks of a great number of pictures by this master in private collections in Holland and Belgium. Lebrun states that the country are, a large picture of dead game and still life in the apartment called Queen Mary's Closet, at Hampton Court; and works of Kalf were to be found in most good collections in Paris, but that they were rare in other countries. This celebrated amateur remarks that the pictures of this master have been often copied, and with considerable success, but rarely with that delicate and elaborate finish which gives such an appearance of reality to the originals.

The only specimens of this master in the public galleries of this an "Interior of a Dutch Cottage," in Dublin, the genuineness of which cannot, on any account, be attributed to Kalf in the original, however it may be by him. It represents a woman preparing coffee, and the accessories and objects of still life are painted with

A few of the works of William Kalf have been engraved; thus by F. Rasin, "The Chamber," "The Breakfast," and an "Interior of a Cottage." Velbrud has engraved, in a similar manner, an "Interior of a Kitchen," formerly in the collection of Lebrun. The "Interior of a Kitchen," which we have engraved, formerly adorned the Pezain collection.

By a contradiction which seems inexplicable, the works of this artist, notwithstanding their insupportable merit, have not, at any epoch, been much in favour at public sales. Lebrun, whom we have so frequently quoted, estimated the value of a Kalf, in 1791, at from £50 to £60. This sum, however, has very rarely been obtained.

In 1715, at the sale of the Chevalier de Lutzel, two beautiful pictures by Kalf, representing fish, vegetables, and kitchen utensils, were sold for 47; at that of M. de Julienne, in 1797, two other pictures, of similar composition, but enriched with figures, realised only £4; and at the sale of the collection of M. Randon de Boissat, in 1777, an "Interior of a Kitchen," by Kalf, was sold for 100, and another picture of still life for 120.

The value of this master's productions has not undergone much modification. At the sale of Cardinal Feltre, at Rome, in 1815, an "Interior of a Rustic Chamber" was sold for 150; an "Interior of a Cellar" for the same price; and a picture, representing a mark in a dish for 41.

Kalf painted both on canvas and on panel, but most frequently in the latter. None of his pictures bear his signature. Others are hea on this point agree in their results with those of Brulliot, the compiler of "The Dictionary of Monograms." He points out, however, some catalogues in which it is stated that Kalf has traced, at the bottom of his pictures, his name and the year in which it was painted. We annex the mark indicated by Brulliot, but without vouching for its correctness.

ARTISTS AND THEIR PATRONS.

IN these days of art, anything relating to it is received with interest. Now-a-days every one has a taste for painting, and can criticise more or less correctly the works of our eminent masters. Every house is in some degree adorned with them; cheap engravings have educated all of us to some degree of taste.

It is only latterly that art has been thus developed. Naturally we were not an artistic race. In the good old times but few cared for pictures, and few, indeed, in our humble opinion, were worth caring for. The oldest description of an English work of art is by Sir Thomas More. Describing a portrait he had seen of Jane Shore, he says: "Her stature was mean, her hair of a dark yellow, her face round and full, her eyes grey; delicate harmony being between each part's proportion and each proportion's colour; her body fat, white, and smooth; her countenance cheerful, and like to her condition. The picture which I have seen of her was such as she rose out of her bed in the morning, having nothing on but a rich mantle cast under one arm and over her shoulder, and sitting on a chair on which one arm did lie." This description, however, must be received with caution. Taste was not then in a very advanced state; and yet the reign of Henry VIII. was auspicious for English art. The artist was painter, carpenter, carver, and did everything, as appears by the following memorandum from a book belonging to the Church of St. Mary, Bristol.

"Memorandum, that Master Cumings hath delivered, the 4th day of July, in the year of our Lord 1470, to Mr. Nicholas Betties, Vicar of Rodehille, Moses Conteryn, Phillip Bartholomew, and John Brown, Procurators of Rodehille before-said, a new sepulchre, well carved, and cover thereto; an image of God rising out of the said sepulchre, with all the ordinance that longeth thereto; that is to say: Item: A bath made of Barber and ironwork thereto. Item: Thereto longeth Heaven, made of timber and stained cloth. Item: Hell, made of timber and ironwork, with devils, in number thirteon. Item: Four knights armed, keeping the sepulchre with their weapons in their hands; that is to say, two axes and two spears. Item: Three pairs of angels' wings; four angels, made of timber and well painted. Item: The Father; the crown and visage, the hall with a cross upon it, well gilt with fine gold. Item: The Holy Ghost coming out of heaven into the sepulchre. Item: Longeth to the angels four chevaliers." Scarcely less ludicrous are the instructions which Henry VIII. left for his own monument, but which was never completed, owing to the parsimony of his celebrated daughter. He writes: "The king shall appear on horseback, of the stature of a goodly man; while over him shall appear the image of God the Father, holding the king's soul in his left hand, and his right hand extended in the act of benediction." Yet that the bluff monarch had some appreciation of art appears in the well-known anecdote of Holbein, who, when painting the portrait of a lady, threw a lord, who had found his way into her chamber, down stairs. The courtier, of course, made a complaint. "By God's splendour!" exclaimed the monarch, "you have not to do with Hans, but with me. Of seven peasants I can make seven birds, but I cannot make one Hans Holbein."

Queen Elizabeth had not her father's appreciation of art. Walpole sarcastically observes: "There is no evidence that Elizabeth had much taste for painting; but she loved pictures of herself. In them she could appear really handsome; and yet, to do the profession justice, they seem to have flattered her the least of all her dependants. There is not a single portrait of her one can call beautiful. The profusion of ornaments with which they are loaded are marks of her continual fondness for dress; while they entirely exclude all grace, and leave no more room for a painter's genius than if he had been employed to copy an Indian idol, totally composed of hands and necklaces. A pale Roman nose, a head of hair loaded with crowns and powdered with diamonds, a vast ruff, a water farthingale, and a basket of pearls, are the features by which everybody knows at once the pictures of Queen Elizabeth."

Charles I. was the first kingly patron of art. His gallery in Whitehall contained four hundred and thirty-seven pictures, by thirty-seven different artists. Under his patronage Rubens came over, and Vandyck took up his residence here. Mr. Cunningham tells the following anecdote in connexion with Charles and the arts. The king wished to employ Bernini, the sculptor, and tried in vain to allure him to England. Not succeeding in doing this, and still desirous to have one of his works, he employed Vandyck to draw those inimitable profiles and full-face portraits now in the royal gallery, to enable the sculptor to make his majesty's bust. Bernini surveyed these materials with an anxious eye, and exclaimed: "Something evil will befall this man; he carries misfortune on his face." Tradition has added, in the same spirit, that a hawk pursued a dove into the sculptor's study, and rending its victim in the air, sprinkled with its blood the finished bust of King Charles. Mr. Cunningham adds: "I have also heard it asserted that stains of blood were still visible on the marble when it was lost in the fire which consumed Vauxhall."

Lely painted the gay beauties of the Restoration, but he had a different class to do with at one time. Cromwell said to him: "I desire you will use all your skill to paint my picture truly like me, and not flatter me at all; but remark all those roughnesses, pimples, warts, and everything as you see me; otherwise I will never pay one farthing for it." Poor Lely was eclipsed by the vainest and wittiest of painters, Kneller. Many of Sir Godfrey's good things have been preserved. "Dost thou think, man," said he to his tailor, who proposed his son for a pupil—"dost thou think, man, I can make thy son a painter? No; God Almighty only makes painters." Kneller's servants once quarrelled with those of Dr. Ratcliffe about a door. Kneller sent word that he must have the door shut up. "Tell him," replied the doctor, "that he may do anything but paint it." "Never mind what he says," retorted Sir Godfrey; "I can take anything from him but physic." His reason for preferring portraiture was a good one. "Painters of history," said he, "make the dead live, and do not begin to live themselves till they are dead." Arguing with an Oxford doctor about the legitimacy of the unfortunate son of James II., he exclaimed, with much warmth: "Mein Gott! I could paint King James now by memory. I say the child is so like both, that there is not a feature in his face but what belongs either to father or mother. This I am sure of, and cannot be mistaken: nay, the nails of his fingers are his mother's—the queen's that was. Doctor, you may be out in your letters, but I cannot be out in my lines." Yet all these men were foreigners. Sir James Thornhill, born at Weymouth, knighted by George I., and M.P. for his native town, was our first English artist. His chief works are—the dome of St. Paul's, an apartment at Hampton Court, the altar-piece of the Chapel of All Souls at Oxford, another for Weymouth, the hall at Blenheim, the Chapel at Lord Orford's, Wimpole, Cambridgeshire, the saloon of More Park, and the great hall at Greenwich Hospital.

The English school of art is remarkable for drawings in water colours. It is quite of recent growth. The founders of the school were Alexandre Cozius, by birth a Russian, his son John Cozius, Edwards Dayes, the pupil of Moonlight Peter, and Thomas Girtin, the pupil of Dayes. These men flourished between 1780 and 1804. The elder Cozius followed a mode of composing his landscapes which Turner imitated on many occasions. His process was to dash out in dark brown or bistre, and on several pieces of paper, large blots and loose flourishes of effects, such as may or may not be seen in nature. From them he would select certain forms and combinations which led at times to very grand ideas, though it is said that his Eustre Lesueur studied under Vernet. He was born in 1627, and died in 1655. He was never out of France. The story of his life has been already told in these pages (vol. i. p. 16): how he was the son of a sculptor; how he exhibited precocious talent; how the world applauded his illustrations of "The Dreams of Poliphilus;" how, like a dark cloud over a beautiful summer sky, a settled melancholy cast its shadow over the artist's life; how he loved where love was vain, but kept his secret close and hid it in the tomb. This event has thrown around him an air of romance, and furnished a style of Guido and Caravaggio. Lesueur, however, lost much of the style of his master in a careful study of that far more illustrious man, Nicholas Poussin, whose compositions he imitated and whose friendship he gained. But throughout his works there is that steady, calm, melancholy character, that sober gloom, which tells so unmistakably the working of the man's mind. No matter whatever the subject may be, the man of blighted hopes paints his own sad imaginings on the canvas; and Lesueur is fully entitled, if indeed he has not a superior claim, to be called, like Ruysdael, the painter of melancholy. It tinges every composition; is seen in the face of the reclusive beggard with age and austerity, and in the rich tone of the French novelist. Schlegel says: "We find in his works neither the howling ostentation of Lebrun, nor the affected pomposity of Poussin. He has a feeling even for colour, and there is generally something tall of mind about his works." There is throughout them all an intense melancholy, a solemnity, and a repose, that his own calm but gloomy thoughts most naturally suggested.

Vernet, under whom Lesueur studied, is generally regarded as the father of French art, as he was indeed the founder of a new school. He had passed fourteen years in Italy, and, having his mind strongly imbued with the peculiarities of Italian art, he produced pictures of great force and vigour, but strongly influenced by the blooming beauty of womanhood; it marks every picture—stamps it with a sorrowful stamp.

Moreover, in the mind of Lesueur there was a fixed and steady faith. He was a man of deep feeling, a man of a thoroughly devotional mind, and the religious sentiments of his heart are seen in all his varied productions. He paints monks, but they are men of abstinence and prayer, not monks of Melrose. He could understand the simple piety and sincerity of those who, right or wrong, quitted the Vanity Fair of the world and devoted themselves to works of faith and love; and never was he more happy in the style and composition of his paintings than when he set himself to portray these men—men of the cowl—in acts of devotion or in works of mercy. One of his finest productions represents a number of people listening to a sermon; and the interest thrown into every face, the deep feeling exhibited by every figure in the group—from the beautiful woman who listens as though the words of the preacher were vital breath to her, to the young man in a half negligent attitude, missal in hand, whose glance is still fastened on the monk—there is the greatest harmony, both in expression and general design; and both in preacher and in auditory there is something an ambassador from the One who preaches for all. There is the eagerness of the crowd is seen, the words of the apostle are falling like sparks on gunpowder, and the passions of the people are blazing heaven-high. And the result is seen in the heeds of sorcery cast away, in volumes upon volumes committed to the flame, the peevish catchers catching nothing of the excitement of the scene, and coming to hear the mighty voice of God's messenger.

In the accessories of his picture, Lesueur was a careful painter that engages and fixes the attention. So it is in the picture which in a former volume we presented to our reader, "The Preaching of Paul at Ephesus." The attitude of the preacher stands out boldly, clearly, majestically as Michael Angelo's "Moses;" the calm, determined expression of countenance, the fall of the drapery, the uplifted hand—all command respect; we feel the presence of the great and potent and pure taste which is in the mind of detail of his composition. He was not content with a good picture; he knew that there was no such thing as a fine true art; that success depended upon the most scrupulous care. He adapted the scenery of his pictures to the subject which they represented, with great energy and skill.

The four-and-twenty pictures representing the life of St. Brigid constitute his great works. Of these compositions Professor Wagon remarks: "The single pictures vary very much in merit; as the most remarkable, I will cite the following:—(No. 125), 'Raymond, a Canon of Notre Dame, preaches before St. Bruno,' full of meaning and dignity, quiet in its motion and expression, and with a softness in the keeping and chiaroscuro, the tone, like that of the rest, is yellowish and transparent. (No. 127), 'The Hypocrite Raymond raises himself from his Coffin during the Masses for his Soul, to the terror of Bruno and the other Persons present.' The expression and attitudes are forcible without being exaggerated, and the whole is transparent and sunny, whilst it is effective and in good keeping. (No. 129), 'St. Bruno teaches Theology in the Schools of Rheims.' The light in this picture again is bright, and the effect striking; the action is true and expressive. (No. 137), 'Pope Victor III. confirms the Foundation of the Carthusian Order.' The tone of light and of colour especially warm and powerful; the story is well told. (No. 138), 'St. Bruno receives a number of Novices into the Order.' This is one of the best of the whole series with reference to composition, dignity in the heads, depth and clearness of tone, and variety of colour. (No. 141), 'St. Bruno refuses the Archbishop's Mitre offered him by Pope Urban II.' This is the best of all the set in respect of the depth and judiciousness of its colour and chiaroscuro, as well as the transparency and softness of its execution. The attitude of the pope is dignified; that of St. Bruno is rather theatrical. (No. 145), 'St. Bruno, having confessed, dies in his Cell, surrounded by the Monks of the Order.' The expression of the heads, which are fine in themselves, and have much variety, is full of feeling and pathos; the figures are well arranged, but the candle-light effect is not true to nature, and the shadows and background are too black. (No. 146), 'St. Bruno departs to Heaven.' The lines are not pleasing, but the heads have dignity and expression; the colouring is especially golden in tone; the keeping is good, and the execution careful. One cannot overlook certain recollections of Raphael."

The works of Lejeune, unlike those of most other painters, are not scattered all over Europe, France containing the greatest number and the best. Besides the paintings at the Louvre, there are to be found a very considerable number, nearly 170, of the drawings of this master. They are traced with a bold and skilful hand in blue chalk, lightened here and there with white, upon coloured paper; sometimes, however, pen and ink have been employed. There are twelve very beautiful allegorical subjects. The original design for the life of St. Bruno may also be found there, forming a very extensive collection. Three of them are signed in the hand-writing of this master, two with the Christian name Eustache preceding that of Lejeune.

ART-EDUCATION.

IN the recent Educational Exhibition at St. Martin's Hall, a department was appropriated to works of art in connexion with education, the specimens consisting chiefly of engravings, drawings, and models, mechanical contrivances to aid the practice of drawing, and books of instruction for the same purpose. As illustrating the progress made in art-education by the various European states, this part of the exhibition was highly interesting; and, in offering a few remarks upon the subject, we shall avail ourselves largely of the report of the committee to whom the duty of examining the works of art in the exhibition was referred.

Works of the description indicated above were contributed by France, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Prussia, Austria, Switzerland, Spain, and the United States. Italy, so long the principal seat of the fine arts, was not represented in this department—a circumstance the more to be regretted, as we believe that the methods of instruction in some of the Italian schools for drawing could be found worthy of notice. In the drawing academy of Venice, the students, after having completed a copy of an object, are required to draw the same subject again entirely from memory; and the utility of this system, in promoting a knowledge of form, together with facility of hand, has been demonstrated by experience.

Institutions for the study of the higher branches of design were very sparingly represented, and the few foreign examples of the kind cannot be cited as very remarkable. On the other hand, some establishments in this country and in France, while professing only to impart such a knowledge of design as may be useful in the industrial arts, have promoted the cultivation of drawing to an extent which would do honour to academies for the study of the fine arts. We allude more particularly to the contributions from Paris. Various works produced under the direction of the Department of Art at Marlborough House might be placed in the same class; but, with regard to these, it must be observed, that the specimens exhibited appear to have been selected rather with the view of showing the methods and varieties of art-instruction sanctioned by the department, than of displaying the proficiency attained by the students. Having had some opportunities of knowing what the department has produced, we are decidedly of opinion that, had the object been to exhibit the attainments of the students as well as the nature of their studies, the result would have placed this portion of the exhibition in a much higher position than it actually held. Judging solely from what was exhibited, we must agree with the committee in awarding the palm of excellence to the Municipal School of Paris, directed by M. Lejeune. There were contributions from other French schools of the same kind, but those referred to were the best.

"So satisfactory a result," says the report, "induces a wish to be acquainted with the methods of instruction; on this point, however, the materials are scanty. The communications from M. Lejeune contain a few general regulations, and a notice of the description of artisans who frequent the school, or for whom it is intended; but the system of teaching can only be gathered from the examples exhibited. Among those for whom the school is intended, and who, it seems, attend in the evening, are mentioned bronze-chasers, designers for paper-hangings, designers for textile fabrics, porcelain painters, wood-carvers for furniture, sculptors for buildings, engravers, jewellers, lithographers, and decorative painters. The age at which students are admitted is twelve. This appears to be a more judicious regulation than that adopted in some other continental schools. Among the contributions from the communal schools at Brussels and other parts of Belgium, are some drawings of architectural foliage, from the inscriptions on which it appears that the students began at the age of seven. It must be confessed that, judging from the specimens, the progress, after several years, is not remarkable."

The directors of schools for drawing appear to be agreed as to the expediency of teaching the beginner first to copy simple forms from a flat surface, then to copy from intricate objects in relief, and lastly to copy from the life. In general, however, the system of copying from drawings or engravings appears to be carried too far, not only in this country, but in some of the industrial schools on the continent. "In better-conducted schools," says the report, "the copying from the flat is limited to the acquisition of a due flexibility of hand, and what may be called elementary habits, analogous to those formed in the first lessons in writing. But the exercise of the eye cannot be too clearly taught by the observation and comparison of the forms of simple real objects. In this practice again the ingenuity of teachers, as exemplified in the present exhibition, appears to be sometimes too refined. The best authorities agree in recommending that simple geometrical solids should be first placed before the beginner, and when a certain power of seeing and imitating them is acquired, the pupil will feel a satisfaction in copying any ordinary objects that have some analogy with the forms which he has previously learnt to copy. Such real objects, if not too complicated, are preferable to elaborate toys, representing ivy-grown castles and towers, such as are sometimes constituted as aids for teaching drawing. Any artificial varieties from the plain geometrical solids should be of the simplest description, since natural objects of the requisite size, equally applicable, and more interesting to the student, because they are real, can be readily found. Among some useful contrivances, specimens of which have been sent from Marlborough House, may be mentioned some skeleton squares, circles, and cubes, made of metal rods or tubes. These, placed in different views, are calculated to familiarise the eye with perspective appearances, and to render the study of perspective itself more intelligible."

With regard to the execution of chalk drawings, we observe that great faults of costume, and as regards the hands, etc., some few in the drawing. But in fine, free, dashing execution, in broad daylight effect, and in colour, the picture is worthy of the name of the artist. The heads are also finely painted.

No. 156, the last of Vanlyck's in the collection, is a subject scarcely to be expected from him, being but a "Study of Horses." The chief is a white horse, finely, freely and boldly painted. The colour rich and clear, the action and drawing very good.

Of Chyp we have but one specimen, a landscape with horses, cattle, and figures, but the picture is in itself, perhaps, as noticeable as any picture in the gallery, from the contrast of the red coat of the man with the sunny sky against which it stands out. The sunny sky, the reflection in the water, the calmness of the scene, and the repose of the animals, make it a delightful and calm picture, and one also which has a great and soothing effect on the mind. But it is perhaps overrated. It is one of those pictures which have been cleaned by the authorities in the National Gallery, and it is doubtful whether the sunny effect has not suffered in the process.

Of Paul Potter, who would at once rival and surpass Chyp, we have not a single picture.

Of Both we have two, Nos. 71 and 209; of Backhuysen but one, 204; of Breenberg but one, 208.

The Backhuysen, a picture of Dutch shipping, has motion and air, but is heavy, and compared with his other productions, the water is very inferior.

Of Breenberg, the "Finding of Moses," called in the catalogue "A Landscape with figures," must perforce satisfy the visitor. The picture is third-rate, and hurt by affectation and a bad manner. The execution is soft, and the colour by no means bad.

Both, than whom, in conjunction with Poelenberg, no master of his school has produced finer pictures, has one called "The Judgment of Paris." The figures, which, by the way, are entirely subservient to the landscape, but, at the same time, are most skilfully painted, are by Poelenberg. The sky and every part of the picture is finely painted, the execution very skilful, the arrangement such as only a most practised artist would effect. This picture, the bequest of Richard Simmons, Esq., is of its kind one of the most valuable pictures in the kingdom.

We must here bring our short notices of this gallery to an end. The few criticisms which we have given are offered with the hope that our readers will judge for themselves, and will, when the proper time comes, use their influence on the government both for a finer gallery, and for a fuller and more brilliant collection of pictures. There is not the slightest reason, for instance, why pictures already belonging to the nation should not be collected in one gallery, and so classified as to form not only a gallery but a school of art. The pictures, for instance, at present in the British Museum cannot be seen, and are thrown away where they are. At present, as a gallery, the National Gallery in Trafalgar Square is below that of any other kingdom in Europe.

THE VERNON COLLECTION.

The space usually occupied by this article will not allow us to say much upon this latter subject. Till Mr. Vernon bequeathed his pictures to the nation, the government, which had been so lavish upon their houses of parliament and upon other conveniences belonging to themselves, as it were, or purposely constructed for their own ease, had been ever chary of purchasing pictures for the nation. Those so purchased were, of course, of foreign masters, and in many instances, as we have shown, of very doubtful origin. The bequests of different individuals were very churlishly received; that forming the Dulwich Gallery, to which we shall ere long repair, entirely lost to London, because government were not wisely generous enough to build a proper receptacle for the pictures. The very splendid collection of Mr. Vernon, which will form the nucleus of the best collection of artists of the English school, was so churlishly received, that Mr. Vernon more than once repented of his gift, and was, as all know, at first exhibited in the cellars of the National Gallery, at the same time that the Royal Academicians were enjoying perfectly gratis the other wing of the building, and charging people for admission to see their pictures.

From the cellars of the gallery in Trafalgar-square, after affording innumerable jests to the comic writers of the day, the Vernon collection migrated to Marlborough House, whence it will most probably not remove till the new gallery is built for the nation at Kensington Gore. We purpose hastily to run through it.

The two first rooms of Marlborough House are occupied by English pictures removed from the National Gallery, and ranging from Nos. 78 to 220. They are by Wilson, West, Gainsborough, Reynolds, Lawrence, etc.; and amongst them are those celebrated paintings of the "Marriage à la Mode," by Hogarth, together with his portrait.

The Vernon collection, then, as bequeathed by Mr. Vernon, commences in the third room, and is, almost without an exception, formed from the pictures by modern artists, and is extensively known, both by those who have and those who have not visited it, by the engravings of the gallery which have been published.

The first picture, the "Study of a Greek Girl," by Sir Charles Eastlake, the president of the Royal Academy, is a very fine study, much superior to his present productions. "The Wooden Bridge," by Calcott (No. 5), is also a beautiful landscape, full of repose, worthy of any master and of any school.

(No. 6), "The Dangerous Playmate," by Etty, a girl playing with a Cupid, is one of eleven pictures by Etty, none of which perhaps rank amongst his best productions, and some of which are very inferior works of art. These are the conversational pieces, scenes in Venice, "The Lutist," etc., which appear to have been studies by the artist, merely done to exhibit a variety and contrast in colour. (No. 12), "Bathers surprised," exhibited in 1841, and (No. 94), "Youth at the Prow and Pleasure at the Helm," are perhaps the best specimens of Etty in the collection.

Of J. W. M. Turner, of whom our notice in the National Gallery will preclude any notice here, we have two very fine pictures, (No. 54), "A View of the Grand Canal, Venice," and (No. 71), "The Landing of the Prince of Orange at Terbay." Both of these are very fine productions.

Of Maclise, there are two very fine pictures—(No. 9), "Malvolio and the Countess," exhibited in 1840, and (No. 135), "The Play Scene in Hamlet," from the Academy in 1842. The latter picture is one of the best, if not the very best, of Maclise's productions. Shakspeare has had the misfortune to suffer very severely at the hands of his illustrators. What, for instance, can be much worse than the pictures by the Rev. W. Peters, by Opie, and by Northcote, which profess to illustrate him? Nor, it must be confessed, are modern illustrators more successful. The play scene before us is the most worthy of all, and its highest praise is, that it is a worthy illustration of one of the finest plays of Shakspeare. The weak points are—the colour, the figure of Ophelia, although repainted from the lady as originally exhibited, and the figure of Horatio. The face of Hamlet, the disturbed guilt of the king, and the arrangement of the whole, are worthy of every praise. This picture has not been worthily engraved.

Of Sir Edward Landseer five specimens are here presented to the visitor, and each of them is worthy of the artist. Nos. 17 and 21, are "War" and "Peace," two pendants, which, by their genius, preach deep morality to the beholder. The taste of the artist is shown in the method of treatment in these pictures. Peace represents a quiet coast scene, where a lamb is cropping the grass, which has grown about the muzzle of a rusty and dismounted cannon; War, the still smouldering ruins of a cottage, the roses and flowers of which are torn and trodden down, whilst a dying and dead soldier with their horses form the foreground of the picture. These scenes are in the simplest and best forms of the allegory, and their execution is as admirable as their conception.

No. 28, by the same artist, "a Highland Piper and Dog," is admirable, but has not the high qualities of the preceding.

No. 92, "King Charles's Spaniels," represents two dogs of this kind curled up on a table, near a cavalier's hat, the whole forming a picture wonderful for its colour and execution, but wanting the mind displayed in

No. 145, "High and Low Life," which, although only the portrait of two dogs, a butcher's dog and a Scotch deer-hound, is something Hogarthian in the social satire which it conveys.

We may at an early period have to return to the consideration of the magnificent bequest of Mr. Vernon.

SIR DAVID WILKIE.

On the 1st of June, 1841, the steamer "Oriental" was in sight of Gibraltar, when, at half-past eight in the morning, orders were given to stop the engine, and muster the crew on the deck for the burial of the dead. The impressive service of the English liturgy was read by the Rev. James Vaughan, and under a splendid sun, tempered by the sea breeze, and amid profound stillness both of the winds and of men, a corpse was dropped solemnly into the sea, there to await the resurrection of the dead.

It was that of Sir David Wilkie. The man whose inanimate remains were thus consigned to the keeping of the Hebrides of the Mediterranean had been the most popular and celebrated painter of his country. The son of a humble Presbyterian minister, the painter of humble incidents in Scottish life, his career had been one long study, a continued and modest progress. And he had had his reward; he died full of honours, a member of the baronetage, painter to the king, and the friend of Sir Robert Peel, and his death caused a greater sensation than that of many a royal reign has done.

He was born on the 18th of November, 1785, in a quiet Scottish manse, on the banks of the Eden-water, and was the third son of the minister of the small parish of Cults, in Fifeshire. The stipend of the worthy minister was small, and his family large; there were five children, and he had to support his aged father. The Wilkie family was one of the best in the parish, having tilled the same fields for more than two centuries, during which their possessions had not diminished in an inch. A simplicity almost unparalleled marked the domestic arrangements of the manse and the manners of its inmates; but the most integrity, an exemplary industry, energy, and diligence, and industry, were the traits which distinguished the father and son, and indeed all the family. To these was added a perseverance and strength of devotion that few of his contemporaries of the 18th century possessed, and to which the high moral and stern morality gave birth. It should be noted, however, that the education of David Wilkie was not a very liberal one, and the most favourable opinion that can be held in behalf of his talents and piety are inculcated by a fatal example that too often the faults of our nature are not so readily overcome. The talents of this superior moral man were checked and ruined by Wilkie were never effaced; we regret that any public notice was given to his life.

The death of the artist was a great loss to the world by a possible first-class and accomplished painter, but the opportunity for learning anything else. But all laws of probability will be in a cold road, and in the five years preceding his twelfth birthday, during which time he attended a school in the neighbourhood of his father's manse, he learnt nothing. He was then removed to the grammar school at Kettle, of which Dr. Stoneham, afterwards Bishop of Toronto, was then master; but here, also, neither threats nor entreaties could win his attention to anything but drawing. His father and grandfather saw this strong predilection with much regret and many fears. Mingled with a strong dash of disdain for everything that partook of worldly vanity, was a feeling of solicitude arising from a knowledge of the straits to which the artists of that period were often reduced. They knew that Wilson, one of the best landscape painters of his time, had lived and died in obscurity, indigence, and dejection, sometimes wanting money to purchase canvas and colours, and often reduced to consigning his finest works, fresh from the easel, to the keeping of the pawnbroker. Pictures were a luxury restricted to the nobility, and they were neither very discriminating nor very generous in their patronage. There was not then, as there is now, a numerous middle class, wealthy and educated, and as distinguished for its encouragement of the beautiful as for its devotion to the useful. There is little room for wonder, therefore, that the father and grandfather of Wilkie should have suffered much anxiety and mental inquietude through his desire to be a painter, and have urged him, by all the arguments at their command, to devote himself to the church as the surest means of earning a comfortable and respectable livelihood. But arguments and remonstrances were all unavailing, and his mother at length won a reluctant consent from his father for him to be allowed to follow the bent of his genius.

Wilkie was fourteen years of age when he went to Edinburgh, and presented himself before the trustees of the Academy for the Encouragement of Manufactures, with some specimen drawings, and a letter of introduction from the Earl of Leven to Mr. Thomson, the secretary. The drawings were not considered satisfactory, and it was only at the earnest request of the Earl of Leven that he was admitted. He now made great progress in acquiring a knowledge of drawing and the principles of composition. Everything he attempted was executed with the greatest correctness and fidelity to leading principles. He showed himself a keen observer of nature, and gave early indication of the excellence he displayed in after years as a painter of tableaux de genre. He was a constant frequenter of scenes likely to furnish subjects for pictures of this kind, such as the markets of Edinburgh and the fairs and trysts of the neighbouring villages. Sometimes he went out in the dusk of the evening, and looked through the windows of the humble abodes of the labouring classes, to observe how the inmates grouped themselves around the fire, and in what way they were engaged.

Those singularities and accidents of human life which had awakened and nourished the genius of Hogarth were also the secret aliment of that of Wilkie; but the genius of the one differed greatly from that of the other. Both stand prominently forward as the representatives of English life and manners, but Hogarth loved to lash the vices and follies of the age, and has truthfully and forcibly portrayed the passions that debase mankind, dwelling upon the details with a minuteness which sometimes looks like an inclination to exaggerate; while Wilkie chose subjects of a more pleasing character, and delighted to portray the virtues of humble domesticity and the manners and customs of rural life. His pictures are no less truthful than those of Hogarth, and much more pleasing; the style of the latter displays the cynicism of art, while in that of the Scottish painter we recognise the philanthropist and the Christian.

Of the two great subdivisions in the history of the art of design, one comprehends beauty of form and colouring, the other character and expression. The first is represented by the schools of Italy; the second, which displays less of beauty and voluptuousness than of observation and philosophy, belongs to the North. These two domains are not, however, separated by insurmountable barriers; there is a neutral ground between them which exhibits modifications and minglings of both. Leonardo da Vinci had power over expression and character; Rembrandt joined colour to expression; Hogarth was a master of expression without excelling as a colourist.

Owing to a complication of causes which philosophers have essayed to analyse, the intellectual independence and profound respect for the individuality of mankind which formed the original character of the nations of the Teutonic race have never been effaced, but are still preserved in their manners and modes of thought. Among the masters of the northern schools two tendencies dominate—to sacrifice beauty to expression, and to reproduce individuals rather than types.

While the men of regions more favoured by nature fix their eyes on a supreme type of ideal beauty, the profound observation of human character, and of the accidents and caprices of human life, constitutes for the men of the North a second species of ideal. Rembrandt, Rubens, Albert Durer, Hogarth, are the representatives of the latter school, in which Wilkie took an important place as the exponent of a more modern phase. Depth of feeling and a pure morality are the characteristics of his style; and it is these qualities which distinguish him from Brauer and Jan Steen.

At the Edinburgh academy Wilkie was a most diligent student. He was always one of the earliest in attendance, and invariably the last to depart: his assiduity, in fact, sometimes drew upon him the ridicule of his fellow students, who would amuse themselves by pelting him with pellets of bread. When the hours of study were over, he returned to his lodgings, and there laboured during the remainder of the day to carry out what he had commenced in the forenoon, by sitting before a looking-glass and copying his own face and hands, and thus endeavouring to blend the impression drawn from the antique with those derived from the earnest study of nature. He understood at an early period of his academic studies the importance of the action of the hands in telling a story, and whenever he was unable to obtain a model which pleased him, he invariably introduced his own.

In 1803, being then in his eighteenth year, Wilkie won the ten guinea prize which had been offered for the best picture of "Callisto in the Bath of Diana," which, at the sale of his effects after his decease, was sold for £48 6s. In the same year he made his first sketch of "The Village Politicians," which excited a great sensation among the students, and called forth the warm commendations of Mr. Graham, the teacher of the academy; but it differed materially, in many respects, from the well-known picture which he afterwards executed (p. 169). Another production of this early period was a "Scene from Macbeth," in which the murderers sent by the usurper to the house of Macduff encounter his wife and child. The expression of the latter's countenance was so excellent, that Mr. Graham, on its being shown to him, predicted that his pupil would one day attain the highest eminence in his profession.

In 1804, Wilkie left the academy and returned to the venerable manse at Cults. At the neighbouring village of Pitlessie an annual fair is held, to which resort all the dwellers within ten miles, old and young, for business or for pleasure. The young artist thought this a good subject for his peculiar genius, and reproduced the scene in a masterly manner, introducing no less than one hundred and forty figures, all of which are portraits of the villagers and residents in the neighbourhood. Some of these were sketched in the village street, and some in the parish church, without any of the persons being aware of his intention. The portrait of the elder was thus taken with a red crayon on a fly-leaf of the artist's Bible, during a sleep in which the elder indulged in the course of the service. The rigid piety of the elders was much shocked, for the stratagem which Wilkie had employed to obtain the portrait was discovered, and only the high character of his father and grandfather for piety saved him from disgrace. His venerable grandfather succeeding in proving that all painters are not necessarily lost; and that while the eye and the hand may be engaged in tracing a design, the ear and the mind may be none the less attentive to the preacher; a subtle distinction, with which the minister and elders of Pitlessie were content. As for Wilkie, he avenged himself in artist's fashion, by making a general sketch of the sleeping congregation, in which the various degrees of sleepiness were represented with remarkable skill and knowledge of human nature. One was snoring, another yawning, a third taking a pinch of snuff to keep himself awake, and a fourth leaning over his open Bible to conceal the fact of sleeping under the appearance of devotion. It is singular that Hogarth, who differed from Wilkie in being more satirical and less tender, should have had the same idea; but his picture of "The Sleeping Congregation" made him many enemies, while Wilkie had the prudence to consign his sketch to the flames.

"Pitless Fair" was sold to a gentleman named Kimour for £25. Wilkie also painted several portraits of the neighbouring gentry, at five guineas each; but none of his productions of this kind evince a very high order of excellence. A friend of the family, struck with the promise displayed in the artist's first productions, purchased for him, in London, a lay-figure; and another lent him some pictures by Sir Joshua Reynolds and Allan Ramsay. His picture of "The Village Recruit," which was his next production, was defective in colouring, but in the composition and grouping he greatly excelled his former efforts; and the encomiums which were bestowed upon it by his friends induced him to proceed to London, and enter upon the race of which the prizes (gained by few) are fame, wealth, and distinction.

On his arrival in London, he took lodgings at St. Norton street, and immediately obtained admission as a student in the Royal Academy. He does not appear to have been very much struck on entering with the proficiency or taste of his fellow-students; for he remarked, in a letter to a friend in Scotland, that they knew a good deal of the art of criticism, and were very seldom disposed to regard as meritorious any picture which was not at least two hundred years old. He had brought with him his picture of "The Village Recruit," and had it exhibited in a window at Charing Cross, where it was soon sold for £6, the price marked upon it.

Wilkie was at this time a tall young man, somewhat pale, with light hair, and keen blue eyes; mild and gentlemanly in his manners, peaceful and quiet in his actions, immovable in his resolutions, and of a delicate sensibility of temperament. His patience in striving after excellence was equal to his diligence in studying and working. When he was unsuccessful in the treatment of a subject, he painted it again. He did not believe himself a genius, nor did he experience those vigorous and passionate flights which carry men of vivid imagination beyond the earth. He did not, in fact, possess a large share of that faculty; but he made up the deficiency by observation, study, and diligence. He was content to treasure up his souvenirs; and it was thus that his maturity was more prolific than his youth. As slow to create as Salvator Rosa and Spagnoletto were ardent and quick, he recovered in his thirtieth year the image, the attitude, the position, or the profile, the special character of which he had observed in his twentieth. Every recollection of the past returned and took its place in his mind,—the blind man's violin, the old family trunk, the cock's feathers in the hut of the rustic Adonis. He had in reserve a multitude of little details of this kind impressed upon his mind with vividness and precision, and treasured up, as it were, for future use. The infinite variety and dramatic interest of his compositions arose in a great measure from this faculty of observation and retentiveness of memory. His mind, stored with the recollections of Scottish rural life, furnished him in after-years with a kaleidoscopic variety of pictures of rustic manners. The same chamber displays many various scenes: the fire sparkles, the infant cries, the father does not return, the mother is anxious, the old uncle moralises or sleeps, the young man thinks of his amours or his pursuits, the hope of supper calls the old dog toward the hearth, and the servant who has opened the window to fasten the shutter, resigns her hand to the boldness of a rustic gallant. The genius of Wilkie was not contented with the souvenirs which sufficed for Van Ostade and Bega; he rose to the comedy and the domestic tragedy. The humble furniture is seized, the bed is about to be carried off, the labourer stands opposite the bailiffs like a figure of stone; this picture tells a tale replete with dramatic interest; and the same may be said of "Dance in Gray," (p. 115), and most of his earlier compositions.

In order to investigate more deeply the phenomena of real life, Wilkie was indefatigable in his researches. At the same time he worked hard, going to his task every day with imperturbable patience and the monotonous exactitude of a workman. He retouched, listened to all opinions, and called all his tools to his aid to the aid of his personal sagacity. He had the slow penetration, philosophic rather than brilliant, which characterises the Scottish genius. If there is one quality peculiar to his countrymen, it is that "the evening" blends its "morning" into a continuous stream of bitumens, which we find in the works of the Scotch House, in the elegiac lines of Burns, and even in the poetry of James Watt.

Soon after his arrival in the metropolis, Wilkie was fortunate enough to obtain the patronage of a lady, the celebrated porcelain manufacturer, who had married a relative of the artist, and ever afterwards proved his fast friend. He sent her a picture, and ordered two pictures of him, and introduced him to the Earl of Mansfield, who examined him in a particular picture which he had made at Edinburgh of "The Village Politician" (p. 107). The artist required fifteen guineas for the price of his work, but the earl desired him to consult his friends on this subject. When finished, the picture was exhibited at the Royal Academy, and excited such general admiration, that George David, Esq. had studied it, called him, determined to raise the price of that picture. Lord Mansfield remonstrated, upon which Wilkie remained true to his promise, and said that he was now writing upon it. This circumstance established the reputation of Wilkie as an artist of colour. It was impossible not to recognise in him the legitimate descendant of Van Ostade and Melow, of Terborch and Bauldwinck, of Heilbrun and Heilbrun.

England was well disposed at that time to receive such an artist with favour; the pictures of rural life presented to the eyes of Crabbe, and still more in the novels of Sir Walter Scott, had raised the public taste to gravitate towards that region of art. Wilkie's pictures of rustic manners in the North coincided with the feelings and sentiments of that generation, which was led by the patriotic exclusiveness engendered by the war with France, to regard the beauty and the classical school of David with a scornful contempt.

At the time when "The Village Politician" was exhibited, there was a prepossession in favour of pictures of domestic manners, which amounted almost to a passion. Wilkie's humble and indifferently-furnished studio was thronged every evening with amateurs. Commissions came pouring in upon him in a deluging profusion, and he now determined upon definitively taking up his residence in London. The aristocracy accorded their patronage to the humble adventurer who had created a new order of art, the elegiac satire, and become to painting what Burns had been to poetry. Sir George Beaumont gave him more than patronage—friendship, regard, and the assistance of his cultivated taste. There is something extremely beautiful in the long friendship of Wilkie and Sir George Beaumont. Their correspondence is characterised by a tone of perfect equality; the picture of the baronet is without assumption, and the dignity of the artist without pride. Sir George offered the advice which he was so well qualified to give in the kindest manner, and Wilkie received it with attention, examined it, and profited by it. His introduction into high quarters, in which favoured artists made an easy fortune, was the work of Sir George; and it was for this excellent friend that Wilkie painted his "Blind Fiddler," which is now in the National Gallery. Sir George lent him a very fine specimen of Teniers, which he kept before him the whole time he was engaged on the work, that he might acquire the softness of touch which distinguishes the Flemish master.

A number of other pictures of the same kind followed in rapid succession. "Alfred in the Herdman's Cottage" was a commission from Mr. David; "The Circus Players" was painted for the Duke of Gloucester; and "The Boat Day" for the Earl of Melburn. "The Sick Lady" and "The Old House" picture was also painted in the period. The picture now commemorated had already taken its position. "The Old House" and "The Jew's Harp," and "The Circus Players" pictures were the principal works of this period, and formed the chief of Wilkie's early success. The picture of "The Old House" is a fine allegorical but representative picture. The old man and the young man are the artist and the patron, the old woman and the young woman are the artist's wife and the artist's daughter, the old dog and the young dog are the artist's dog and the artist's cat, the old man and the young man are the artist and the patron, the old woman and the young woman are the artist's wife and the artist's daughter, the old dog and the young dog are the artist's dog and the artist's cat.

* "Christ's Kirk on the Green" is an example. of a blind fiddler, to whom they have given hospitality, and whose wife and child sit near the cheerful fire; or a doleful-looking urchin, whose mind is evidently seaward, if we may judge from the tiny vessel he has launched on a pan of water, has cut his finger while engaged in his ship-building essays, and regards the bleeding limb most lugubriously, while his grandmother applies some simple remedy. In painting these pictures, Wilkie had no other inspiration than his knowledge of rustic life, and his experience of a morality purified by labour and ennobled by independence. Voluptuous grace seldom occupied him; even when he addresses himself to the senses, he neither excites like Boucher nor offends like Brauer. His works are the offspring of a sound and healthy air of touching poverty pervades the little group, though attempted to be concealed by the decent pride of the mother.

In 1809, Wilkie was elected an associate of the Royal Academy, and in 1811 he became a member. He continued the same humble and laborious life, and his close application at length had a visible effect on his health. At this time he received a strong proof of the friendship and generosity of Sir George Bannant, which constitutes a noble trait in the character of the latter. The state of the artist's health requiring relaxation and change of air, the baronet, thinking that, under such circumstances, a supply of money would be very acceptable, sent him a draft for £100, delicately taking from the act the character of a gift by representing that, as state of society. He belongs to the eighteenth century by his love of his kind, by that calm and enthusiastic devotion to humanity—a devotion sincere and involuntary—which is evinced in his works. If he loved to paint interiors, and has seldom ventured into the open air, it is in order to portray the incidents of domestic life more completely, to exhibit man at home, where he is less under the influence of nature, less absorbed in her vast bosom.

In "The Sick Lady," a poor dog, with an expression of sadness in its eyes, which are fixed on its bedridden mistress, awaits with drooping ears the judgment of the physician, who is feeling her pulse. In "The Rent Day," a veritable chef-d'œuvre of the artist, a young widow brings her two children, the youngest of whom, seated in her lap, nibbles a key in lieu of a coral garnisher; and he had paid only £100 for a picture, "The Blind Fiddler," which, now that the artist's reputation was established, was worth at least £200, it was only the difference between the real value of the picture and the price which he had paid. Wilkie accepted the welcome offering, not, he said, as a remuneration to which he had a just claim, but as a touching proof of Sir George's friendship and regard. After the death of Sir George, the late Sir Robert Peel patronised Wilkie with the same noble generosity and equal delicacy.

The artist determined to seek health by a short sojourn in his native country, and remained there from August to October. Upon his return to the metropolis he took apartments at Kensington. In the following May he opened an exhibition of his pictures, twenty-nine in number, in Pall Mall, a speculation which extended his reputation, but caused him a pecuniary loss of £114. His father died in December, and he then took a house at Kensington, and invited his mother and sister to take up their abode with him. Previously to this period he had painted "The Village Festival" for Mr. Angerstein, and received for it the munificent sum of £840. In 1813 he painted "Blind Man's Buff" for the Prince Regent, and two small pictures, "The Letter of Introduction" (p. 172), and "The Refusal," for which he received £272 10s., and £315 respectively.

The success which had rewarded Wilkie's labours, and the style of his works, excited some envy among less fortunate artists, and attention to the Dutch and Flemish schools, and was much struck with the works of Ostade and Terburg. Of the French painters, he admired only Poussin and Claude. His ideas of art were confined to the truthful expression of character; the ideal and classical did not come within the circle of his appreciative powers. He confessed himself unable to comprehend the works of David, whom the Parisians held in such high esteem. The distance between them was too great; it was Turner examining the works of Charles Lebrun.

Upon his return to England his style became somewhat altered, and was evidently modified by that of the models which he had been examining. In "Peppercorn's Rent," purchased by the criticisms and epigrams were numerous and sometimes severe. "You have made a perilous step into the vulgar, my dear friend," said Fuseli; "either your fortune is assured, or you are ruined." Northcote observed that he had created a new school—the school of beggary. Hazlitt, who was a great admirer of Northcote, repeated his words, and enlarged upon them. Wilkie heard these remarks without anger or anxiety, and public opinion justified his confidence, and gave him its support. The beggars of Wilkie live, while the gods of Northcote and Fuseli are forgotten.

In 1814, during the brief interval of peace, he accompanied his friend Baydon to Paris, for the purpose of studying the works of the great masters in the gallery of the Louvre. He paid particular attention to the Dutch and Flemish schools, and was much struck with the works of Ostade and Terburg. Of the French painters, he admired only Poussin and Claude. His ideas of art were confined to the truthful expression of character; the ideal and classical did not come within the circle of his appreciative powers. He confessed himself unable to comprehend the works of David, whom the Parisians held in such high esteem. The distance between them was too great; it was Turner examining the works of Charles Lebrun.

Upon his return to England his style became somewhat altered, and was evidently modified by that of the models which he had been examining. In "Peppercorn's Rent," purchased by the British Institution for six hundred pounds, "The Peppercorn," and the "Rabbit on the Wall," carried away the trophies of the sharp eyes and precision of Turners and Mitford. In 1816 he paid a visit to Holland, accompanied by Rindby, the engraver. He visited the mansion at the Hague, which he called the Dutch paradise in English; the artist's article. The works of Turners and Van Ostade excited his special admiration. It is said that the trustees of England refused to purchase the early French paintings had been copied from Paul Peter, rejoicing that the painter had copied them from nature. While viewing the pictures so wonderfully idealized by Ribbels and Karl Dürer, he became sensible of all that he was deficient in himself.

In 1817, Wilkie once more visited his native land, where he painted a large picture of Sir Walter Scott and his family. The artist was much less successful in his portraits than in his admired tableaux de genre, upon which alone his fame must always rest. The severity and minuteness of his style became a defect when applied to portrait-painting. Not only was the sharpness of his manner apt to displease his sitters—especially ladies whose charms were on the wane—but he represented all the accessories with a fidelity that was not always agreeable. Instead of imitating the flattering manner of Lawrence, whose women are always beautiful, he followed the example of certain German masters of the fourteenth century, and his portraits, though carefully finished and exceedingly truthful, have not the elegance and grace which is generally desired.

Shortly after his return to London, he painted "The Reading of the Will," for the late King of Bavaria, for which he received £417 10s., and which, on the death of its possessor, was purchased by his successor for £1,000. He next received a commission from the Duke of Wellington for "The Chelsea Pensioners," which is considered the masterpiece of Wilkie, and the last of his really great works. It represents a group of Chelsea pensioners reading the Gazette, containing the duke's despatches after the battle of Waterloo, and is carefully and elaborately finished. The duke himself furnished the necessary particulars, approved or modified the arrangement of the groups, and remunerated the artist with almost unexampled liberality; the sum which Wilkie received for this great national picture being no less than twelve hundred guineas.

Laboriously, without interruption, in a continued progress from his fifteenth year, Wilkie had advanced from study to study, from masterpiece to masterpiece, from success to success; and fame and easy circumstances had been the reward of his industry. The happiness arising from the contemplation of a life passed so honourably was all at once interrupted by a series of domestic misfortunes. His sister Helen, a very beautiful girl, was on the point of marriage, when her intended husband died suddenly under their roof; and scarcely had they recovered from this shock when they lost their mother, that amiable woman whose example had been so useful to them in early life. In the same month they lost two of their brothers, one in the East Indies, the other on his return from Canada; and, in the latter case, the artist suffered, as the responsible agent of his brother, a further loss of a thousand pounds, payable by the deceased. The third brother of Wilkie, established in business in the metropolis, fell into difficulties, and became insolvent; and, at the same time, the bankruptcy of Messrs. Hurst and Robins, the booksellers, which sapped the fortunes of his friend and compatriot, Scott, carried off from Wilkie £1,700, the fruits of his labours. He received this last stroke of adverse fortune with the same serenity as Sir Walter Scott; but these calamities, following so closely upon each other, brought on a nervous disorder which rendered him unable to work.

Struck in his health, his fortune, and his affections, the artist, by the advice of his friends and medical advisers, determined upon making a lengthened tour on the continent. He travelled over southern and central Europe, seeking health and peace, receiving new lessons in his art, finding new objects of study, observing points of comparison, and acquiring information on the aesthetics of painting and the processes of the great masters. His correspondence and the journal of his travels were written in a vigorous and expressive style; his notes on subjects connected with art are judicious and useful, and his general remarks are equally agreeable and instructive, and evince habits of close observation and a love of art, only equalled by that which he felt for mankind. His remarks on the great masters show that his life was one continued study, and also reveal the springs of his talent and of the two manners which characterize his works.

Passing through France and Switzerland, he reached Italy, where he remained eight months, engaged in the study of the great masters. At Rome, Raffaele and Michael Angelo attracted his observation without winning his admiration; at Venice he studied the works of Titian and Giorgione. In writing from the former place he gives the result of his observations in a sentence deserving of deep consideration. "From Giotto to Michael Angelo," says he, "expression and sentiment seem the first thing thought of, while those who followed seem to have allowed technicalities to get the better of them, simplicity giving way to intricacy; they seem to have painted more for the artist and connoisseur than for the untutored apprehensions of ordinary men." On leaving Italy he travelled into Germany by Innsbruck, and was much pleased with the scenery through which he passed, and the character and manners of the people. Tyrol reminded him forcibly of his beloved Scotland, and he was delighted to discover a similarity between the languages of the two countries. On inquiring his way in the mountains, the response was, "Der recht," the word for right being pronounced in the same manner as in the Lowlands of Scotland. Among the Tyrolean peasants, too, he was pleased to find the same strict propriety of morals, the same cheerfulness and frugality, and the same grave and dignified hospitality as in his own country.

Having surveyed the treasures of art in the galleries of Dresden, and visited Toplitz, Carlsbad, and Prague, he at length arrived in Vienna, where he had the somewhat dubious honour of dining with that arch-plotter against the liberties of nations, Prince Metternich. From thence he set out to return to Italy, and, on arriving in Rome, was invited to a banquet given in his honour by the British artists resident in that city, at which the Marquis of Hamilton presided. His health was now considerably improved, and he forthwith began to paint. He finished three pictures in Rome and a fourth at Genoa; and, travelling through the South of France, crossed the Pyrenees into Spain. He arrived at Madrid in 1827, painted four pictures while residing there, and in the following summer set out for Paris, and from thence returned to England. To the exhibition of the Royal Academy in 1829 he sent eight pictures, five of which were purchased by George IV. These pictures indicated a total alteration in his style; and those painted in Spain differed very materially from those painted in Italy. The former possess much less serenity of composition than the others, but all have great breadth of colour and largeness of composition.

In the earlier part of his career, while he made the Flemish and Dutch masters his models, most of the figures were too small for the interiors, as in the "Blind Fiddler" and "Blind Man's Buff;" but in his later works they fill up the canvases. The difference between his style before leaving England and after he had studied the Italian and Spanish masters, is clearly shown in his "Entry of George IV. into Edinburgh," which was begun before he left England and was finished after his return. No one would imagine from looking at it that one artist had painted the whole. The first part has all the minuteness of finish and detail of the Dutch school, while the latter is painted in the full, flowing style of the Spanish masters. In a letter to one of his friends in England, he speaks of having acquired a bolder and more effective style, and that the result was rapidity of execution. Titian and Correggio were his great authorities for colouring, and he seems to have aimed at combining in his own pictures the softness of the latter with the strength and serenity of Raffaele.

The picture which we have just noticed was a work of great labour, and caused the artist much vexation. It was a commission from royalty, and not a subject of his own choosing. The first design which he submitted to the king did not receive the royal approbation; the attitude of George IV., who is represented receiving the keys of the palace of Holyrood, had to be altered; and when he had succeeded in pleasing the monarch, he had to encounter numerous vexations arising out of the rivalries and egotism of the noblemen who had to be represented in the procession. Each one claimed the most honourable place—one on account of his ancestry, another because of his high position at court—and he found it impossible to please one without offending some other one. To a truthful and independent spirit like Wilkie, all this was very annoying; but his patience and assiduity enabled him to triumph over every difficulty, and the picturesque effect of the old palace pleased even those who were not satisfied with their own portraits or their situation in the procession.

In 1830, after the death of Sir Thomas Lawrence, he was appointed Painter in Ordinary to his Majesty,—an appointment with which his native pride was considerably gratified. At the same time he became a candidate for the presidency of the Royal Acadeny, but had only one vote in his favour, the successful candidate being Sir M. A. Stoe. In 1831 he exhibited portraits of Lady Lyndhurst and Lord Melville; and soon afterwards commenced his great national work, "John Knox preaching the Reformation in St. Andrew's." George IV., who had seen his drawing of the subject, had disapproved of it; and Wilkie, in a letter to the Earl of Liverpool, begged that he would not mention the work to his majesty. He painted it with great care, and sought on all sides for the historical evidences necessary to the development of the subject. The discovery, in a cellar at Edinburgh, of the old and worm-eaten chair from which Knox fulminated his anathemas against Romanism, had just been made as the subject of Wilkie's picture transpired; and the popularity of the latter among the Scottish presbyterians caused the artist to receive from all sides drawings and engravings, portraits of the old puritans, and portions of their wardrobes, which had been preserved as heirlooms by their descendants. The pride and pleasure with which Wilkie painted this picture were a gratifying contrast to the vexations he had encountered in the production of the picture executed for the king, and the success which he attained was proportionately great. The picture was exhibited in 1832, and was purchased by the late Sir Robert Peel for twelve hundred guineas. It remains, we believe, in the possession of the present baronet.

After this he painted several portraits, among others those of William IV. and Queen Adelaide; and in 1835 he exhibited his grandly coloured picture of "Columbus explaining his plan for the Discovery of America," and portraits of the late Duke of Wellington and Sir James Macgregor. Dr. Waagen, who was in England at the time, thus speaks of these works: "Of the higher class of historical painting there is nothing here. Among the pictures which approach that department, however, some are distinguished much to their advantage. Among these is Wilkie's Columbus, who explains to a monk in the Spanish convent of Santa Maria de Rabida his plan of discovery on a chart. This is not a happy subject for painting, which is not able to represent the demonstration itself, in which the interest properly lies. In the execution, the decisive influence appears which the pictures of the great Spanish masters, Velasquez and Murillo, had upon Wilkie during his residence in Spain. By the deep masses of chiaroscuro, the full colours of the dark red and purple draperies, contrasted with the bright lights, the effect of the picture, painted with great breadth and mastery, is very striking. The heads, about two-thirds the size of life, are indeed dignified and animated, but have not the refinement and decided character of his earlier pictures. . . . The Duke of Wellington, a whole-length by Wilkie, is distinguished by able conception, powerful colouring and masterly keeping. I was, however, more pleased with the portrait of Sir James Macgregor. The head is admirably modelled in the details, in a broad and free manner; the deep, full colouring is of great elegance and peculiarly attractive."

The artist's sister, who had never recovered from the shock of her lover's sudden death sufficiently to form another engagement, still kept his house; and he enjoyed the friendship of his brother artists, Eastlake, Eddy, Calvert, &c., as well as that of some of the most illustrious men of the day, including the Duke of Sussex and Sir Robert Peel. Dr. Waagen thus speaks of him, on his first introduction to the artist, at Kensington Palace, where the royal duke just named entertained a distinguished party of artists and literary men: "He is a fine looking man, and has such frankness of expression in his countenance, and such openness and simplicity of manner, that I was quite taken with him at the first sight. There is no trace in his features of that refined humour which gives us so much pleasure in most of his works, which is frequently the case with such humorists of the first rank, in whom the fundamental tone of their character is pure benevolence and real love of mankind. This fundamental tone alone manifests itself externally, while the requizit spirit within is hidden in the recesses of the bosom. It is not needful to converse long with Wilkie to discover that he is not one of that numerous class of artists who only put in their art, as a foreign element, for a season, for his whole delight seems to be in the arts. He expresses himself in a very plain manner, and with great propriety, on all their important problems; and his genius, as an artist, shows itself in the manner in which he takes an interest in other things. Thus when he looks at the foot of an remarkable foot immanently assumes a form in his fancy."

The pleasure which Wilkie had experienced in finding so many points of resemblance between the national character of the Germans and that of his own countrymen, and the feelings of respect and admiration for him with which Dr. Waagen had been inspired at this first meeting, seem to have combined to form a bond of sympathy between them which results in a close friendship while the latter remained in London. On a dinner at the artist's house for this purpose, I found myself surrounded by congenial elements. Besides Calvert and Eastlake, I there met with Mr. Eddy, the painter, who, by the genuine spirit of an artist, attracted me; Mrs. Wilkie, the artist's sister, favoured me with some Scotch songs, which she sang with much taste, in the simple manner adapted to them. Wilkie's unobtrusive conversation, and his good nature and humorous subjects, that he has hardly a moment for his go-cart and humorous subjects. He showed me a picture of a school which he has begun, where the mischievous try play sad tricks with the pedantic pedagogue; full of ingenious, merry conceits, stolen from nature herself. I am sorry to say that it has already remained a long time in this unfinished state. When I saw the masterly engravings of his most celebrated works, the choicest impressions of which grace the walls of his apartment, I felt a great desire to see the originals. He told me that very few of them were in London, but promised to show me the most considerable of those that are in the capital. Accordingly, in a few days he called for me, and we drove to St. James's, where, in an apartment belonging to the queen, there are six pictures which he painted for his great patron, George IV. The oldest was painted in 1827, at Rome, and was his first production after he had been prevented by sickness from working for two whole years. The conception is very spirited, the colouring warm and harmonious, but the execution slight. A picture painted in the same year at Genoa is more important. A Princess Doria washes the feet of some female pilgrims. The noble gracefulness of one who has just received this benefit, the beautiful attitude of another who is putting on her shoes, something affecting in the whole scene, make this picture very pleasing. To this must be added the deep, full harmony of the colouring, of which this picture is the first example that I am acquainted with in Wilkie's career.

The next two pictures, likewise of the year 1827, but painted at Madrid, are proofs of the great impression which the picturespe- sible of the character, and the self content of the Spaniards, the heroic defence against the French invasion under Napoleon, and the astonishing force and glow of the colouring of their old masters, made on Wilkie. One of them represents the Abad of Saragossa, who, during the siege of that city, when her liver had fallen at her side near the cannon which he served, fired it off herself. The conception is very expressive and dramatic, the colouring glowing, the impeto admirable. In the other is a guerilla fighting a gladiator from a priest before setting out on an expedition. A boy calls to mind those of Murillo, and the whole is of great truth, force, and harmony. "The Visit of George IV. to Blythe House," painted in London in 1829, is one of the great public transactions in which we are attracted rather by the skillful arrangement, the powerful effect, the careful execution, the many portraits, than by their intellectual interest. The principal Scotch peers, the Dukes of Hamilton and Argyll in their original costume, the former presenting to the king the Cross of Edinburgh, have a very stately appearance. "The Return of the Wounded Guerilla," painted in London in 1829, is another of his masterpieces. In Scotland, true in the characters, powerful in the colouring, but the woman in the foreground is not so carefully modelled.

From St. James's we drove to the celebrated engraver, D. G. who is now engaged in engraving the last capital work of Wilkie, the "Summit of the Scotch Pever," John Knox, before the House of Lords in 1560. In this picture, which he finished and the initials of the composition, is one of Wilkie's greatest works, I fancied that I could have found some thing of the kind in Walter Scott's admirably described, and was again aaving of the equality between him and Wilkie. It is not only the deep feeling, the vessel of living truth, which the preacher pours forth in full measure, the enthusiasm of the scholars, the resigned devotion of the women, the suppressed rage of the Catholic clergy, and of an opponent who lays his hand on his sword, that attract us in this picture; but likewise the accuracy with which the whole transaction, even to the details of the costume of that remote period, is placed before our eyes. The keeping, too, is admirable, and the effect, by the contrast of great masses of light and shade, striking. The engraving, which is already pretty far advanced, promises to be extremely fine. It seems to me, that no painter has hitherto had the good fortune to see his works engraved with so much delicacy and fidelity as Wilkie, for even Marcantonio does not so nearly approach Raffaele, and Vostermann and Bolsworth Rubens. This picture is the property of Sir Robert Peel. Lastly, we visited Apsley House, the palace of the Duke of Wellington, where there are several of Wilkie's works. . . . The capital work among the pictures by Wilkie in this place relates to the final, hardly-earned victory over and vigorous, painted in 1833; and a 'Bust of Lady Lyndhurst, a charming picture, in the full deep tone of the Spanish school.'

In 1836, in which year he received the honour of knighthood from William IV., the artist visited Ireland, and after his return painted "The Peep-o'-day Boy's Cabin," and "Napoleon and the Pope in conference at Fontainebleau." In the following year appeared his "Mary Queen of Scots escaping from Loch Leven Castle;" "The Cotter's Saturday Night," the subject of which is taken from Burns, a poet whose genius was so near akin to that of the artist; and "The Empress Josephine and the Fortune-teller," which represents the well-known story of Josephine, when in her fifteenth year, and residing with her father in the West Indies, having had a crown predicted for her by a fortune-telling negress. In 1838 he painted the "First Council of Queen Victoria," and a portrait of "Daniel O'Connell," who was then in the zenith of his fame and the Titan, when he, for the last time, had displayed his prodigious strength in all its terrors. 'The Chelsea Pensioners reading the Gazette containing the description of the Battle of Waterloo.' The impression made on the aged veterans is expressed with great variety, spirit, and humour, in this rich composition; the execution is careful, but the effort is not so great as in his other works, because the general tone is very light, and in parts weak. It was painted in the year 1822, and is known to amateurs from the engraving by John Burnett. Here, too, are three portraits by Wilkie; 'George IV.,' whole length, the size of life, in the magnificent Scotch national costume; a very stately figure; the colouring of astonishing force and effect. It was a present from that king to the duke. 'William IV.,' likewise whole length, very animated popularity. The great work of the following year, was "Sir David Baird discovering the body of Tippoo Saib, after the storming of Seringapatam," which was purchased by Lady Baird for fifteen hundred guineas, and is regarded by some as the greatest of Wilkie's historical works. In 1840 he exhibited eight pictures, the most remarkable of which was "Benvenuto Cellini presenting a silver vase of his own workmanship to Pope Paul III."

Wilkie had long had a desire to visit the East, and in the autumn of the same year he set out on his pilgrimage, accompanied by Mr. Woolburn. They travelled through Holland and Germany, and descended the Danube, from which river they proceeded to Constantinople, where the artist painted a portrait of Sultan Abdul Medjid, and two other pictures: "A Public Writer of Constantinople," and a "Tartar bringing the news of the capture of Acre." The travellers left the Turkish capital in the beginning of 1841, and journeyed by way of Smyrna and Beyrout to the ancient city of Jerusalem, which, he says, "struck me as unlike all other cities; it recalled the imaginations of Nicholas Poussin—a city not for every day, not for the present, but for all time." In the middle of April they left Jerusalem, and journeyed by the sea-coast of Syria into Egypt. At Alexandria the artist complained of ill health, but he commenced a portrait of Mehmet Ali, and towards the end of May embarked on board the "Oriental" for England. While at Malta he imprudently ate a large quantity of fruit and indulged freely in iced lemonade, which increased his illness; and on the 1st of June he died. His body was committed to the deep the same evening, as related at the commencement of this article. The sale of his effects, among which were many unfinished works, realised a very considerable sum. An unfinished sketch of "The School," mentioned by Dr. Waagen in the passage we have quoted, was sold for £750.

have in common that genuine, refined delineation of character which extends to the minutest particulars. In the soul of both there is more love than contempt of man; both afford us the most soothing views of the quiet, social happiness which is sometimes found in the narrow circle of home life, and understand how, with masterly skill, by the mixture of delicate traits of good-natured humour, to heighten the charm of such scenes; and at the same time should be able to do both in language and colour, they show a man in his manifold weaknesses, errors, affections, and distresses, yet their humour is of such a kind that it never excites our feeling. Wilkie is especially to be commended that, in such scenes, "The Distress for Rent," he never falls into caricature, a vice often happened to Hogarth, but with all the energy of expression remaining within the bounds of truth. It is admitted that the deeply impressive and touching character of this picture excited an extraordinary sensation in England when it first appeared. Here we first

THE VILLAGE POLITICIANS. FROM A PAINTING BY WILKIE.

"Wilkie," says the German critic, "is in his department not only the first painter of our times, but, together with Hogarth, the most spirited and original master of the whole English school. In the most essential particulars, Wilkie has the same style of art as Hogarth. With Lin, he has great variety, refinement, and acuteness in the observation of what is characteristic in nature; and in many of his pictures the subject is strikingly dramatic. Yet in many respects he is different from him. He does not, like Hogarth, exhibit to us moral dramas in whole series of pictures, but contents himself with representing, more in the manner of a novel, one single striking scene. His turn of mind is besides very different. If I might compare Hogarth with Swift, in his biting satire, with which he contemplates mankind only on the dark side, and takes special delight in representing them in a state of the most profound corruption, of the most frightful misery, I find in Wilkie a close affinity with his celebrated countryman, Sir Walter Scott. Both learn duly to prize another quality of his pictures, namely, their genuine national character. They are, in all their parts, the most spirited, animated, and faithful representations of the peculiarities and foibles of the English. In many other respects, Wilkie reminds me of the great Dutch painters of the golden age of the seventeenth century, and likewise in the choice of many subjects—for instance, "Blind Man's Buff," but particularly Lythe, careful and complete making out of the details, in which he is one of the rare exceptions among his countrymen. If I do not mistake for David and Franz Meiss, he is nearly on an equality with the most fully executed painting of Pannier and Jan Steen. His colouring, often approaches that of the latter, and too I am, especially in his earlier pictures.

"One of them, "The Blind Fiddler," is in the gallery. You know this admirable composition from the masterly engraving by Burnet. The effect of the colouring is by no means brilliant; yet the tone of the flesh is warm and clear. The colours, which, as in Hogarth, are very much broken, have a very harmonious effect, the light and shade being very soft, and enriched through with great skill. From the predominance of dead colours, the whole has much the appearance of distemper, as well in the above respects as in the manière and close observation of nature, and the good-natured humour of the subject. This picture is a real masterpiece, which deserves the more admiration, since we find, by the date affixed, that it was painted in 1806, when Wilkie was not more than twenty-one years of age. Another picture, where a countryman, who has indulged too freely, is led home by his family, is indeed highly humorous in the expression of the heads, and masterly in the keeping and chiaroscuro; yet the figures appear too small for the size of the picture, and too scattered; and the house and other accessories are too slightly handled to make up for this defect. The faces, too, in the rather indefinite forms, and the cold, reddish tone of the flesh, bear no comparison with the preceding picture."

The greater part of the interior subjects treated by Gerard Douw, the Ostades, Terburg, and Teniers, have been reproduced by the Scotch artist. Compare his "Village Politicians" with the same subject by Adrian Van Ostade. There are only three figures in the picture of the Dutch painter; but they are admirably grouped and carefully drawn, especially the old man in spectacles. Pass to Wilkie's picture. He has represented a Scottish village ale-house, where in a room which serves at once for parlour, tap-room, and kitchen, as well as for the sitting-room of the family, blacksmiths, carters, and ploughmen meet to smoke and drink. The time represented is the period of high political excitement which followed the outbreak of the first French revolution. The principal group surrounds a table placed in the middle, on which are a whiskey measure and glass, a pipe, and a large piece of cheese, which one of the disputants is cutting. An old man, whose countenance expresses a good deal of quiet sagacity, has been reading the newspaper, and listens calmly to the solution of some important political problem propounded by the young man opposite to him, whose features and action express irritation and excitement. The labourer who is helping himself to the cheese, is evidently interested in the discussion, and listens with eagerness; while his neighbour appears to be offering an angry interruption. Around the fire is another group, who discuss the topics of the day with less vehemence, while a woman, with a child in her arms, seems to be endeavouring to persuade one of them to accompany her home. Probably the artist had in his mind the "ale-cup commentators" of Macmill's ballad, when he painted this picture. The landlady, entering with a fresh supply of liquor, an old man who reads the newspaper alone, a dog who displays a hankering for the bread and butter of a child, and another who licks out a saucer in the right-hand corner, complete the composition.

His "Village Bridal," by the charmingly modest expression of the young bride, and the rustic elegance and grace of the girl who is dancing, and his "Duncan Gray" (p. 165), by the expression of the heroine's countenance, half serious, half capricious, at the moment when the resistance of her pride is vanquished by her lover's vexation, deserve to be placed among the more amiable creations of modern art.

Whatever may be the merits, in colouring and imitation of the old masters, which distinguish the works that Wilkie executed in his second manner, it is as the painter of "The Rent Day" and "The Blind Fiddler" that he recommends himself to posterity. He is the painter of moral philosophy—a philosophy cheerful and without bitterness—superior to Bega, Jan Steen, and Heuskiirk, not in free and vigorous fancy, but in varied knowledge of humanity. He is the painter of humble interiors, in which the household utensils are as correctly and vigorously represented as those of Kalf, and the whole scene is calculated to improve the heart, and widen its sympathies. Faithful to the rigour of Christian, and more especially Calvinistic, morals, Wilkie has introduced in his pictures none of the indelicacies of Teniers, the satiric obscurities of Hogarth, or the refined immoralities of Watteau. It is this class which makes him the Scottish painter par excellence, and places him at the head of his class in the school of the North.

Of that school Wilkie is the Leonardo da Vinci. The face of external nature afforded him no inspiration; the free air gave nothing to the painter of the humble homes of the Scottish peasantry. We seek in vain in his pictures for the forests with which Hobbema shaded his lakes, and the transparent distances of Teniers. Wilkie had studied from his fifteenth year the sturdy peasant, sitting in his cottage, with his eyes fixed on the scene of his labours and his joys, and the "bonnie lassie," with the blue eyes and high forehead—a countenance more intellectual than sensual. It is in the representation of the homes of his poorer countrymen that he has acquired the distinction that is now universally accorded him.

We may discover in his works a thousand traits which recall the delicacy of Holbein, the animation of Wouvermans, the energetic rusticity of Van Ostade, the high finish of Terburg, and the philosophic impress of Cornelius Bega. We see that he is of their family; but he has not imitated them. He has excelled them in many respects—in moral grace, in purity of sentiment, and rectitude of ideas.

M. Louis Viardot, an eminent authority, who has treated the English school with great severity in his "Musées d'Europe," notices Wilkie in the following terms:—"The painter of 'The Rent Day' and 'The Village Politicians' has followed Hogarth a little in his designs, and the Flemish masters a great deal in his manner, Adrian Van Ostade seeming, above all, to have been the model he has selected. He is humorous, animated, and playful; and in all his details the eye of a careful observer may be discerned. His execution is sharp and careful, but it has not the charming naturalness of the masters he has followed, being disfigured by a sad abuse of the reddish tone; and this defect or affectation has caused it to be said of Wilkie, with a sort of justice, that he is not an Ostade in colouring."

In opposition to this judgment of a French author, we may quote the opinion of an eminent French artist. Gérault, whose original talent arose more from a study of nature than from imitation of the great masters, thus wrote to M. Horace Vernet in 1821:—"I said some days ago to my father, that if anything was wanting to your talent, it was to be tempered in the English school; and I repeat it, because I know the little esteem that you have for its works. But how useful would be the study of the touching expression to be found in the pictures of Wilkie! In one of his more simple subjects, he has represented a scene at the Invalides; news of a victory has been received, and the veterans have assembled to read the despatches and rejoice over them. The variety of characters and sentiments is well expressed. I must speak of one figure, which appears the most finished; it is the wife of a soldier, who, entirely absorbed in anxiety for her husband, listens with an eagerness painful to contemplate to the reading of the list of killed and wounded. The imagination readily supplies all that her countenance fails to express. There is no crape, no mourning, and the sky is not clouded; the pathos is perfectly natural. I believe you will not tax me with Anglo-mania, for you know as well as I what we have, and in what we are deficient."

The pictures of Wilkie are only known on the continent by means of engravings. There is not a single Wilkie in the gallery of the Louvre. The catalogues of the richest collections do not contain his name. The Imperial Library at Paris contains a collection of engravings after Wilkie, by Beyer, Marris, Jazet, Joly, Moreau, Moille, Duboucourt, and other eminent French engravers, which, though incomplete, includes his best and most thoroughly English works.

Even our own National Gallery contains only two specimens of this master, but they are two of his most characteristic productions. They are thus described by Mrs. Jameson:—"The Blind Fiddler." An itinerant fiddler has arrived at a cottage, and is amusing its inmates with his violin; his uplifted foot shows that he is beating time; his wife sits near him nursing her infant; on the other side are the cottager's family, among whom, the father, snapping his fingers at the little baby, the child, who gazes with rivetted attention on the old musician, forgetful of her toy, and the mischievous urchin who is mimicking the gesture of the fiddler with a pair of bellows, are remarkable for felicitous conception and truth of expression. The whole picture is very dramatic, and treated in the manner of the Dutch masters. It has something of the silver met Fuseli at Mr. Angerstein's, thus writes of him: "His conversation was particularly animating, and, sitting beside him, I had my full share of it. He talked with great discrimination on the English versions of the great classic poets, and on the harmonious construction of our national poetry, in which he gave the preference to Shakspeare. He spoke of Haydon, and the historical picture he was then painting, and gave it his decided approbation."

It was seldom Fuseli was courteous, and when he was, he generally repented of it. In a good humour he gave a friendly reception to a young gentleman who had brought him a letter of introduction from an old friend. "I shall be very happy to see you whenever you are disengaged," said Fuseli. The ingenuous youth took this literally, and called next day. "Bless me," cried Fuseli, as he entered the room, "you must have plenty of spare time on your hands." The youth retired in confusion, and never called again.

One hears little of Fuseli now. His wild paintings are by no means in accordance with the taste of the present age. Never did such a painter appear amongst us before; but he is gone, and it may be Another artist, rough and rude as Nature's children sometimes are, was Opie. When he lived in Berners-street, Haydon went to see him. "I was shown," he says, "into a clean gallery of masculine and broadly-painted pictures. After a minute, down came a coarse-looking intellectual man. He read my letter, eyed me quietly, and said, 'You are studying anatomy; master it; were I your age I would do the same.' My heart bounded at this. I said, 'I have just come from Mr. Northcote, and he says I am wrong, sir.' 'Never mind what he says,' said Opie; 'he does not know it himself, and would be very glad to keep you as ignorant.'" He died a disappointed man. Opie had been brought up to London as the wonderful Cornish boy; and he was almost obliged, as he expressively said to Northcote, to plant cannon at his door to keep the nobility away. He had not foundation enough in his art to fall back upon when the novelty was over; his employment fell off, and he sunk in repente and excellence.

Mrs. Jameson gives Opie a better character. She says this distinguished and manly painter died in 1807. The Dulwich Gallery contains a portrait of him, painted by himself; and at Hampton long "ere we see his like again." The artist, perhaps, most resembling him in wildness and eccentricity was Barry. One new anecdote of him is thus told by Haydon. In his "Diary" he writes: "Mrs. Copping, the housekeeper at Adelphi, told me Barry's violence was dreadful, his oaths horrid, and his temper like insanity. She said he carried virtue to a vice. His hatred of obligation was such that he would accept nothing. Wherever he dined, he left one shilling and twopence in the plate, and gentlemen indulged him. The servants were afraid to go near him. In summer he came to work at five, and worked till dark; when a lump was lighted, he went on etching till eleven at night. She said, that when he could be coaxed to talk, his conversation was sublime. She thought the want of early discipline was the cause of his defects. He began his work at the Adelphi in 1780, and was seven years before he concluded it. She remembered Burke and Johnson calling once, but no artist. She really believed he would have shot any one who dared." There is a grasp of mind in that work, nowhere else to be found, as Johnson said; but no colour, no surface, beauty, or correct drawing. Still, as the only work of the kind, it is an honour to the country.

Court there is a portrait of Mrs. Delany, said to be by him. Allan Cunningham says of Opie, that his strength lay in boldness of effect, simplicity of composition, in artless attitudes, and in the vivid portraiture of individual nature. Where he failed was in imagination. He saw the common, but not the poetic nature of his subjects: he had no vision of the heroic or the grand. His intellectual powers were of a high order. Horne Tooke and Sir James Mackintosh alike testify to that. Horne Tooke used to perplex and quiz Fuseli by pressing him with definitions, and by the reductio ad absurdum; whilst of Opie he used to say, "Mr. Opie crowds more wisdom into a few words than almost any man I ever knew. He speaks, as it were, in axioms; and what he observes, is worthy to be remembered." Opie never was satisfied with himself. His widow says of him:—"During the nine years I was his wife, I never saw him satisfied with any one of his productions; and often, very often, have I seen him enter my sitting-room and throw himself, in an agony of despondency, on the sofa, exclaiming, 'I am the most stupid of created beings! I never, never shall be a painter, as long as I live.'" One who knew him well writes, "His manner and figure were bars to his ingratiating himself with his female sitters; but, like Vandyck, he was the painter of mind and character, not of passion. His uncouthness was the result of early habits; that of Fuseli, of a morose nature." Opie's funeral, however, showed that he was still honoured in the land. A public burial in St. Paul's is surely something, after all. A man who could have had that, must have had some fame in his day.

In spite of his manner, and an unattractive figure, Hopper, writes Haydon, was a man of fine mind, of openness of heart, and an exquisite taste for music; but he had not stored his originality. He imitated Gainsborough for landscape and Reynolds for portrait. We talked of art; and after dinner Hopper said, "I can fancy a man fond of his art who painted like Reynolds; but how a man can be fond of art who paints like that fellow Northcote, heaven only knows." "As to that poor mummiliner of a painter, Hopper," Northcote used to say to Haydon, distinguished for the beauty with which he endowed the female form. He was born in London in 1779, and educated as the child of a German domestic, under the direction of his Majesty's man which circumstance it was supposed he had royal blood in his veins.

Haydon then introduced us to one of the most artists of that day. He wrote, "The next day, at eleven, I went to the academy, saw a good number of King, in conversation with Fish and myself, whom I do not remember names. In the course of the morning we talked. He made a sawed French shaver two, and when we left the academy we walked home together. As he did in the Strand, farther from me, I showed him what I was trying. He said to me, 'Sir George Beaumont says you should always go to your studio.' 'Do you know Sir George, Sir Joshua's friend?' 'I do not, I do.' I was delighted. 'What is your name?' 'Jack'—'And I

THE CUT FINGER. BY J. H. WILKIE, ESQ.

"I hate him, sir; I ha-a-ate him!" Hopper was bilious from hard work at portraits and harass of high life. He was portrait-painter to the Prince; and one day, McMahon having ordered the porter at Carlton House to get the rails repainted, and to send for the prince's painter, the man, in his ignorance, went over to Hopper. When the prince visited Hopper one day, he popped suddenly into his gallery; there was his fine portrait of Pitt. "Ah, ah," said the prince, "there he is, with his obstinate nose." Hopper obtained fame before he was thirty years old. The Prince of Wales, afterwards George IV., was his great patron. Northcote gives a characteristic anecdote of him. "I once went with Hopper to the hustings to vote for Home Tooke; and when they asked me what I was, I said a painter. At this, Hopper was very mad all the way home, and said I should have called myself a portrait-painter. I replied, the world had no time to trouble their heads about such distinctions." Wilkie says he was where do you come from? 'Yorks'—'And I don't you know such a man?' 'Know him?' 'Just so,' answered, bursting into a laugh, 'why Lord Mulgrave is my patron, and Sir George Beaumont's friend.' 'Jack' now we can stay, and say no more about the matter, and had a little conversation. I was surprised that he did not draw with the cross, but with a great pointing instrument, and we became conversible in that way. I saw a fine specimen of the portrait of Wilkie's portrait was a portrait of a nobleman, Lord Mulgrave, and Sir George Beaumont's portrait of a nobleman, when Ackland's portrait of a nobleman was a portrait of a nobleman, and the portrait of a nobleman was a portrait of a nobleman. At this, I thought I was laughing, and I said, 'I am in the room where you are painting, and I am in the room where you are painting. This sketch he did in the room where you are painting. I can't be had ever painted, and up a hissing he had a great deal to say about George Beaumont, by Sir Joshua, at the castle. They had no colour but white-lead, and no brushes but house-painter's. However, with Sir George's advice and assistance he set to work. A Vandyck brown he obtained from the woods, a fine Indian red from the alum works, by burning yellow ochre in the grounds, and a blue-black, either from burnt vine-stalks, or soot, I forget which, and with these materials he set to work and made a really fine copy. The besetting sin of poor Jackson was indolence, and this soon became apparent. Lord Mulgrave once told us that when Jackson had finished a picture of Lady Mulgrave and her sister, he was requested to have it packed up immediately and sent off to the Exhibition, as the least delay would render it too late. The next day Lord Mulgrave finding that the picture had not been sent, went into Jackson's room and scolded him well, insisting on his immediately seeing the picture packed up and sent off. Jackson left the room apologising, and promising immediate attention to his lordship's desires. As soon as Lord Mulgrave had reached his own room, he bethought himself, 'But, I had better, perhaps, look after that fellow,' and out went my lord to see. On going down stairs, the first thing his lordship did see, was Master Jackson out in the court-yard playing battlesore and shuttle-cock with his lordship's aide-de-camp. It was impossible not to like Jackson, his very indolence and lazy habits engaged one. His eternal desire to gossip was wonderful. Sooner than not gossip, he would sit down and talk to servants and valets, drink brandy and water with them, and perhaps sing a song. He would stand for hours together, with one hand in his trousers' pocket, chatting about Sir Joshua and Vandyck, then tell a story in his Yorkshire way, full of nature and tact, racy, and beautiful, and then start off anywhere, to Vauxhall or Covent Garden, to study expression and effect. In time his carelessness became so apparent, that Lord Mulgrave, in a passion, cut off his income and threw him on his own resources. This brought Jackson to his senses." Jackson painted the portraits of the Rev. William Howell Carr, and Sir John Soane, architect, in the National Gallery.

We take another picture from Haydon - that of Northcote, who lived at 37, Argyle-street. Haydon writes:—"I was shown first into a dirty gallery, then upstairs into a dirtier painting-room, and there, under a high window, with the light shining full on his bald gray head, stood a diminutive wizened figure, in an old blue striped dressing-gown, his spectacles pushed up on his forehead. Looking keenly at me with his little shining eyes, he opened the letter, read it, and with the broadest Devon dialect, said: 'Zo you mayne tu bee a painter, doo 'e? What sort of painter?' 'Historical painter, sir.' 'Heestorical painter! Why, yee'll starve with a bundle of straw under yer head.' He then put his spectacles down and read the note again, but them up, looked maliciously at me, and said: 'I remember yer vather and yer grandvather tu; he need tu point.' 'So I have heard, sir.' 'Ees, he painted an elephant once for a tiger, and he asked my vather what colour the inside of's ears was of; and my vather told un rebblish; and your grandvather went home and painted un a vine vermillion. I see,' he continued, 'Mr. Hoare says you're studying anatomy; that's no use. Sir Joshua didn't know it; why should you want to know what he didn't?' 'But Michael Angelo did, sir.' 'Michael Angelo! what's he tu do here? You must point portraits here.' This roused me, and I said, clenching my mouth: 'But I won't.' 'Wou'n't' screamed the little man: 'but you must! Your vather is not a mouied man—is he?' 'No, sir; but he has a good income, and will maintain me for three years.' 'Will he; he'd better make 'ee mentein yerself.' There are ten portraits by him in the Dulwich Gallery.

In our great country, painters have had to look to the people rather than to kings. Smirke had been elected keeper of the Academy, but George III., being told that he was a democrat, refused to sign or sanction his appointment. West's income was taken from him through the hatred of Queen Charlotte, because he had visited and been honoured by Napoleon in 1802. Sir Joshua Reynolds never received a single commission from the king or his royal consort. He twice painted their majesties, but on each occasion at his own request and at his own expense. This neglect of Sir Joshua is said to have arisen from his refusal to sell a painting beneath its value. Hogarth seems to have fared little better at royal hands. When he had finished his picture of "The March of the Guards to Finchley," a proof of it was sent to George II. His first question, says Ireland, was to a nobleman in waiting. "Pray who is this Hogarth?" "A painter, my liege." "Painter!" exclaimed the indignant monarch, "I hate painting, and poetry too; neither the one or the other ever did any good. Does the fellow mean to laugh at my guards?" "The picture, an please your majesty," said the courtier, "must undoubtedly be considered as a burlesque." This only made matters worse. "What! a painter burlesque a soldier? He deserves to be picketed for his insolence. Take it out of my sight." And so the conversation ended. This may be a little exaggerated; nevertheless, it is true that Hogarth never basked in the royal sunshine. When monarchs have been the patrons, the taste of the patron has been seen. Charles I. was sober and virtuous, and the women of Vandyck all have a sober and virtuous air. At the Restoration, the whole seemed changed as if by enchantment. Art, writes Cunningham, in his life of Lely, was no longer grave and devout, as under the first Charles. Loose attire and looser looks were demanded now; no one was so ready to comply as Sir Peter Lely, and it must be confessed that no other artist could have brought such skill and talent to the task. With the chaste Queen Charlotte came a different order of things; and the skill of Reynolds was required to give grace to the pomatamed pyramids of powdered hair, and that dignity which beauty acquires from appearing the preserver of its highest quality.

Not very many years ago, a venerable man, named Silvio Piccolomini, who had formerly been governor of Rome, having been compelled by age to relinquish the employment in which he had long been engaged, was reduced to the painful necessity of gradually parting with nearly all his furniture, in order to obtain the bare means of subsistence. Among other articles was a small painting by Raffaele, which had been left him by his uncle, but of which he did not at all know the value. The smoke with which it was tarnished, and the dust with which it was covered, led him to think it worth very little. Being in want of money, he sent to a painter who was more skilled in buying and selling the pictures of others than painting any of his own. A very slight examination enabled him to discover by whom it was painted and how great a treasure it was. But wishing to take advantage of the old man's inexperience and neediness, he began to depreciate it as a thing of no value, and concluded by offering him a few shillings for it, rather, he pretended, as an act of charity than from any regard to the real worth of the picture. The poor old man, unable to see through the trick, thankfully accepted the paltry sum, and the impostor carried off his prize in triumph.

A few days afterwards an old friend having called upon Piccolomini missed the picture, and asked what had become of it. He said he had sold it, and told him to whom, and for how much. His friend, filled with indignation at the shameful fraud which had been practised upon his simplicity, urged him to bring the matter before the governor, assuring him the picture was the work of a master's hand, and offering to accompany him and render him every assistance in his power. The governor, having listened with attention to the statement of the case, took the dimensions of the picture and observed the subject, and then dismissed both parties. There were fortunately in his gallery two frames nearly corresponding in size to that of the picture in question. Taking out the picture which was in one of them, he sent for the painter, and asked him whether he happened to have a painting of that size which would match the other. "Yes," was the reply, "I have one that will suit admirably. It is an excellent production of Raffaele's, and seems to have been made on purpose to go in that frame." "Well, let me see it," said the governor; and the painter soon brought it.

The painting was a "Holy Family," executed in the happiest style of the illustrious master. Freed from the dust and smoke by which they had been obscured, the colours came out to perfection, and all the accuracy of outline, the softness of complexion, the charms of the drapery, the elegance of the figures, and the truth of désagrémens, not here to be mentioned, it excited a perfect shower of puns, lampoons, epigrams, and pasquinades, and brought down upon its head some much heavier, more sober and severer criticism. It is but justice to say that, as far as regards the artist, the figure is well executed. It is not one of the chefs-d'œuvre of Westmacott, but it is a nobly-conceived figure, only ridiculous, if indeed it be so, from the singular inappropriateness of its position, and its total want of adaptation to the subject it designs to commemorate.

The next work of art which the sculptor supplied, was the colossal statue of George the Third, which now adorns Windsor Castle.

But it is not to commemorative or to monumental art that we must look for the great excellence of Westmacott. In these certainly he has exhibited grace, dignity, and feeling. In his statues of Fox and of George the Third there is also no mean approach to sublimity; but it is in grace and in fancy that he excels, and it is in these that

Love's worshipper:

Seeking on earth for him whose home was heaven—
As some lone angel, through night's scattered host,
Might seek a star which she had loved and lost.
In the full city—by the haunted stream,
Through the dim grotto's tracery of spars,
Mid the pine temple on the moonlit mount,
Where silence sits and listens to the stars—
In the deep glade where dwells the brooding dove—
The painted valley and the scented air,
She heard far echoes of the voice of Love,
And marked his footsteps' traces everywhere.

If he has never exceeded this statue, Westmacott has done things equally worthy of immortality, such are the "Statue of a Nymph preparing for the Bath," which now adorns the ducal residence of Castle Howard; the statue of Euphrosyne, which is at Clumber; and the "Dream of Horace," which is at Petworth. We have the in our opinion, he equals if not surpasses Canova. The best works of Westmacott may be found perhaps in Woburn Abbey, where the dancing nymphs of Canova have also found a resting-place: these are the celebrated statue of Psyche, and one of Eros or Cupid.

When Psyche was first exhibited, its singular merit was at once acknowledged, and in those days of allusions and keepsakes, more than one "fashionable" poet hymned its praise. The verses by Mr. T. K. Hervey are so very well suited to the subject, that we are tempted to quote them. The statue represents Psyche more under her immortal than her earthly aspect, with her beautifully slight form bent forwards, so as to exhibit the wings which adorn her shoulders. She appears partly to be examining a golden box, the gift of the gods, and partly to be rapt in listening to something afar off. The figure is perfectly ethereal; no touch of gross humanity rests upon the pure marble. Well, indeed, might Hervey address it as one who was highest authority for saying that Sir Richard deems those we have mentioned as the most successful of his works.

In the course of a long and brilliant career honours have deservedly fallen upon the shoulders of the sculptor. In 1793, when only eighteen years of age, he had first visited Rome; in the next year, at the early age of nineteen, he received the first premium for sculpture given by the Florence gallery; in the following year he obtained the pope's medal, and was also elected a member of the academy of Florence. Honours in his own country followed at no distant period. In 1805 he was elected an associate of our own Royal Academy, and eleven years afterwards he was made a Royal Academician.

Sir Richard received the honour of knighthood in 1837; in addition to which, and his other honours, he is a D.C.L. and a member of the Society of Antiquaries. Of his family we know little, save that his oldest son, Mr. Richard Westmacott, has contributed to literature an essay upon Art-Education.

favourite object of his study," says M. Leon Gozlan, "he has painted that population, pale, sad, emaciated and suffering, of monks, Capuchins and Carmelites, shod and unshod. He has discovered to the world, better than if the walls of all the convents of Spain had been thrown down, the dark passions and gloomy thoughts of all these, the natural flow of whose feelings are checked by haircloth and exaggerated vows. Zurbaran is the Job of art—the painter of grief and resignation. None of his compatriots have reduced their genius to a harsher unity, or given to their conceptions a more lugubrious immobility."

Seville was in that day just the city for a painter of his peculiar predilections and talents. Nowhere else could he have found more devotion, a greater number of religious communities, or a greater variety of monkish orders. The city contained at that time no less than sixty convents of men and women. There were the Trinitarians, for the redemption of captives, who shaved their heads, except a circle of hair round the forehead and the nape, and wore robes of white linen, encircled at the waist by a black belt. There were the Carmelites, reformed by the patron saint of Seville, St. Theresa, whose vestments were of brown cloth, confined at the waist by a broad girdle; the Capuchins, with shaven heads, bare throats, and feet shod with sandals, who wore robes of brown cloth, girt at the waist by a thick cord, furnished with three knots, and used for self-flagellation; there were the Franciscans, who offered amulets, agnus deis, and chaplets for sale, or exchanged them for articles of food; and there was the terrible brotherhood of St. Dominic, devoted to the office of the Inquisition, and recognisable by their ferocious monk necks—than by their costume, consisting of a deep cowl and a long, black cloak, over a robe of white linen. At Seville—the privileged theatre of every imaginable religious observance—might be met at every step the future elements of the pictures which Zurbaran meditated: instruments of penance, scourges of leather or of twisted parchment, with or without knots, haircloth-shirts, human skulls, belts of metal, gags, padlocks, ash-s, rags; all, in fact, that a morbid imagination could suggest as additions to human suffering and degradation. Armed with a vigorous brush, and determined to attack these details in all their gloomy reality, the imitator of Caravaggio found all prepared to enable him to enact the part in the history of painting to which his temperament and his inclinations destined him. There was nothing wanting. But he did not stop at the cowl, the coarse tunic, and the knotted rope—at once a girdle and a scourge. He saw the repressed passions of the cloister agitating beneath the haircloth-shirt; he heard the heavy groans which emanated from souls troubled by strange visions or affrighted by menacing apparitions. He strove to render visible the mental tortures of the Cenobite, the terrors of the soul haunted by the phantoms of superstition, and sometimes the raptures of devotional ecstasy. He wished to embody the invisible in his representations of the visible.

The inauguration of the Spanish gallery at the Louvre caused a great sensation among the art-loving portion of the Parisian public, so impressionable and yet so blasé. That which excited their emotions the most profoundly was not, however, the scrupulous expression of the minds of Murillo, nor the astonishing likeness to life of the portraits of Velasquez; it was "The Monk in Prayer" of Zurbaran (p. 189), one of those pictures which, once gazed upon, it is impossible to forget. On his knees, wrapped in a loose garment of gray linen, torn and patched, his countenance half hidden in the shade of his cowl, a monk implores the mercy of God. Upon his bowed and emaciated hands he supports a human skull, and, with eyes raised to heaven, seems to cry, "O, profundis clamavit ad te, Domine." When the crowd of visitors, after having traversed the hall of Henry II., entered the grand apartment set apart for the works of the Spanish masters, and came opposite this awe-inspiring picture, there was among them a movement of stupor, and almost of terror. The murmur of voices became suddenly hushed; it seemed to them that they heard the solemn and subliming sounds of the Do-mine. Not only the entire Spanish school, but all Spain, so or peaks, seems to be cramped in that painting, so full of passionate devotion and mystic bloom. The name of Zurbaran, till then scarcely known in France, became popularised by the number of lithographs and engravings in which his "Moul in Prayer" was reproduced. Since that time the name of Zurbarán has been inseparable, in the minds of amateurs and the public, from the ideas awakened by the representation of that mysterious being, the Spanish monk.

The strong impression always produced by this picture proves that the sentiment is as profound as the execution is bold; it is a picture which appeals to the eye and to the heart with equal power. No other painter, in fact, not excepting even Murillo, has represented with more success the two aspects of the Spanish character, its passion for the real and its aspirations after the ideal, seduced by dazzling materialities, and yet carried away so easily into the most refined and exalted spiritualism.

At the age of twenty-five, the pupil of Rollas became a master; from all sides he received commissions for pictures, but always for devotional subjects, for he painted no others, and refused to employ his talents on familiar or grotesque subjects. The first pictures of any importance which he executed were those which decorate the altar-screen in the cathedral of Seville, the commission for which he received from the Marquis of Mahagon. The centre-pieces represent St. Peter in pontifical vestments, and his divergence from prison by the angel; and on the wings are painted the apotheosis of the saint, when he walked on the lake of Galilee with the Redeemer, and the vision of nuclear beasts and howls, typical of the emancipation from the ceremonial law of Moses by the Christian dispensation. This screen was finished in 1625, and about the same time he painted for the college of St. Thomas d'Aquin, at Seville, the picture which passes for his chef-d'œuvre, and which now hangs over what was once the high altar of the Friars of Mercy, in the Museum of that city. All the figures in this picture, which represents the apotheosis of the saint, are larger than life, and treated in the grandest manner.

Some of Zurbaran's works are marked by a vigour of execution which approaches closely to rudeness, for he needed to be a rapid painter to execute the numerous commissions which he received from the monastic orders. Every religious community in Andalusia was desirous of retaining his services to paint the history of their foundations, and the glorification of the saints who had edified them by their austerities, or illustrated them by their martyrdom. He had scarcely finished the "Apotheosis of St. Thomas d'Aquin," when he was summoned to the superb monastery of Guadalupe, to paint two altar-pieces representing St. Ildefonso and St. Nicholas Bari, and eleven pictures illustrative of the life of St. Jerome, the patron of the monastery. On his return to Seville, he was employed by the Carthusian monks of St. Maria de las Cuevas to paint three pictures, representing scenes in the lives of St. Bruno and St. Hugo. He also painted a number of pictures illustrative of the life of St. Pedro Nolasco for the Barefooted Friars of the order of Mercy; a remarkable and greatly admired "Crucifixion" for the church of St. Pablo; and a variety of works for the Carmelite convent of St. Roman, and the churches of St. Esteban and St. Bonaventura.

Notwithstanding his general tendencies, the taste of Zurbaran was not exclusively for scenes of misery and pain. His temperance, always grave, impelled him to subjects in accordance with it, but he did not always select the agony of the martyr, or piteous surroundings by their instruments of torture; he could sometimes paint the ineffable joys of religious ecstasy, and the radiance of the soul visited by celestial phantoms. There was formerly in the Spanish room at the Louvre, now dismantled, a picture by this master, representing the most distinguished of the innumerable female saints of the monkish legends, who appear to be defying past the spectator. Under the names of St. Cecilia, St. Catherine, St. Inez, St. Lucia, and St. Ursula, he has revived, in their most glowing colours, all the types of Spanish beauty. The slight and supple forms and impassioned countenances of the lovely brunettes, haughty like the Castilians, delicate and pretty like the Andalusians, seem about to start from the canvas. The costumes of the reign of Philip III. are adapted so singularly to the forms of the canonised beauties, that they seem to be seraphs who have descended from the skies, and donned the robes of the high-born ladies of the court of Toledo. A glowing sun has given a Moorish tint to their complexions; their feet are charmingly small. One, who, over a robe trimmed with lace, wears a green mantle embroidered with gold, we recognise as St. Catherine, whom the enemies of the Christian against his Dominican patrons of the college, and in spite of a certain harshness of outline, this picture is one of the grandest of altar-pieces. The colouring throughout is rich and effective, and worthy the school of Raphael; the heads are all of them admirable studies; the draperies of the doctors and ecclesiastics are magnifi-times which Zurbaran painted for the Cathedral, also in this Museum. In the first of these pictures, the Pontiff, in a violet robe, and the recluse in white, with a black cloak, sit opposite to each other, with a table between them covered with books; their heads are full of gravity, and all the monks' eyes are directed. cent in breadth and amplitude of field, the imperial mantle is painted with Venetian splendour; and the street-view, receding in the centre of the canvas, is admirable for its atmospheric depth and distance."

We extract from the same work a description of the three pic-the third, the strangeness of the subject detracts from the pleasure afforded by the excellence of the painting. The second is the best of the three, and is curious as a scene of the old monastic life of Spain, whence the cowed friar has passed away like the mailed knight. At a table, spread with what seems a very frugal meal, sit seven Carthusians, five of them, in their high peaked hoods drawn over their heads, the aged bishop Hugo, in purple vestments, and attended by a page, stands in the foreground, over the heads of the monks, there hangs a picture of the Virgin; and an open door affords a glimpse of a distant church. The venerable friars seem portraits of real laborers in faith; from the others, yet all bear the impress of long years of solitary and silent penance.

Monte Cassino, the seat of the monks, is a fine town, with a Lombard character, and some of the houses of the 15th and 16th centuries. The cathedral of St. Basil, the work of the Venetian architect Palladio, is a fine specimen of the style. On the right of the town life of St. Peter Nolasco, and another of the "Infant Jesus," graceful in design, but painted in the artist's best manner; the child, wrapped in a purple robe, is lying asleep on a cross, and the whole is painted with individual delicacy and beauty.

Under the reign of Napoleon I., the gallery of the Louvre was very rich in works of this master, one of the most admired being the "Monk in Prayer," which we have engraved (p. 180). The Spanish pictures in the Louvre were mostly obtained from the churches and convents of Spain during the French occupation of that country, and many more were in the collections of Marshal Soult and others, which are now scattered over Europe.

The best specimen of the master in this country is his "Virgin, with the infant Saviour and St. John," signed Fran. de Zurbarán, 1679, in the Duke of Sutherland's gallery at Stafford House. The infant, sitting on the lap of his mother, turns, as if afraid, from a golden fish, which his playfellow holds out to him. In the countenance of the Virgin, the softness and grace of Guido's Madonnas is blended with the warmth of Titian's Vielanda, the downcast eyes are soft and dark, and the hair is of a rich chestnut brown. The infant Jesus is delicately painted, and reminds the spectator of the graceful cherubs of Correggio. The figure of St. John is rather poor, but the truthfulness to nature of the plate of apples on the table is inimitable. This picture is a good example of what Zurbarán could accomplish in a style which he seldom attempted, while the mixture of the ideal and the natural is very characteristic of the Spanish school. In colouring, the picture stands very high. The drawing is very clear and warm, and the harmony of the whole truly admirable.

The Marquis of Lansdowne possesses, in his gallery at Bowood, a "Monk holding a Skull," attributed to Sebastian del Piombo; but it differs from the works of that master in the colouring and style of conception, and, in the opinion of Dr. Waagen, is a very well-executed and nobly conceived work of Zurbarán. There is also a single specimen of this master, "Judith and her Handmaid," in the collection of the Earl of Clarendon.

Three celebrated sales have established the commercial value of the works of this master, namely, those of M. Aguado, Marshal Soult, and the late King of the French. At the first, a "St. Rufine," clad in a gray robe, striped with black and yellow, and a green scarf, and holding in her hands two small vases, was sold for £35; "Taking the Habit of St. Clara," a work of nine figures, brought £20; and a "St. Martin," £55.

When the collection which the celebrated Marshal Soult had made during his campaign in the Peninsula was brought to auction at his death, some of the finest works of Zurbarán were submitted to public competition. "St. Peter Nolasco and St. Raymond de Peñaford," which was painted for the convent of the Fathers of Mercy at Seville, and represents St. Peter Nolasco sitting in the midst of the chapter of Barcelona, presided over by St. Raymond, was sold for £967. "A Franciscan showing a miraculous Crucifix to St. Peter Nolasco, and four Monks of his order," signed F. D. Zurbarán, 1629, attained the same price. "The Funeral Rites of a Bishop," representing the corpse lying in state, with a monk placing a crucifix in its hands, a pope, a bishop, and a King doing homage to the lifeless remains, and two monks kneeling at the foot of the bier, produced £250. "St. Romain and St. Basilus," in which the former wears a cape embroidered with gold, brought £280. "St. Lawrence," clad in sacerdotal vestments, and holding in his right hand the gridiron on which he suffered martyrdom, produced £150. "A Saint," wearing a rose-coloured mantle, over a robe of green silk, broaded with gold, was sold for £165. Another "Saint," wearing a diadem, and a violet-coloured mantle over a robe of gold tissue, realised £110. The "Communion of a Saint," who is lying on a bed, and receives the sacred elements from two Franciscans, produced £105. "The Angel Gabriel," in a solitude, clothed in a white surplice, and carrying a wand over his shoulder, was sold for £130.

At the sale of Louis Philippe's pictures, which took place in London, the prices obtained were not so high. "St. Francis, with the stigmata," formerly in the Franciscan convent at Seville, produced only £16. "Our Lady of Pity," with a cardinal and a Carthusian monk kneeling before her, formerly in a convent at Seville, sold for £63. "The Martyrdom of St. Julian," formerly in a convent in Estremadura, and very much esteemed in Spain, realised £70. A superb altar-piece, representing the "Virgin and Child," surrounded by angels, and with monks kneeling before them in prayer, was sold for £165. The "Virgin in Glory" produced £70, and another "Virgin and Child," £94.

HENRY VAN STEENWYCK.

HENRY STEENWYCK the younger is often confounded with his father, owing to their having the same baptismal name, and the similarity of their works. The painter of whom we now give the portrait and the history is Henry Steenwyck the younger, who was born at Antwerp in 1589, and died in London in 1638, or, according to other authorities, in 1640. Neither date seems to be correct, however, as there is a picture by this master in the royal gallery at Berlin, which bears the date of 1642. The portrait by Vandyck, engraved by the elegant burin of Paul Pontius, has preserved to posterity the fine, intelligent countenance of this most admirable painter of architectural perspectives.

At first sight, it seems that nothing could be more contrary to the genius of the painter than the representation of edifices, unless we regard them simply as necessities. In a secondary degree, in the landscapes of Claude, for example, or in the grave compositions of Poussin, buildings play an important part; they interrupt the undulating lines of the landscape, and impress it with the august character of the great peoples who have written their thoughts in marble. But if architecture is a rich and fertile element, when it is used with taste and propriety as an accessory to a picture, it still seems repugnant to the spirit of art to subject it to the imperious rules of the mathematician, by making a building or an interior the principal object in a picture. The distance between imagination and exactness is so great—the interval between the inspiration of the painter and the compass of the geometriean so immense! Artists have been found, however, capable of interesting us in simple perspectives, and investing with poetry the works of the square and the rule.

In the same manner as the opulent proprietor desires to possess views of his mansion and the scenery which surrounds it, the inhabitants of a Roman Catholic country in the seventeenth century would feel an affection and a veneration for the stones of their churches. Their piety would attach them particularly to the cathedral of their native city; to the font at which they had been baptized; to the chapel in which, full of the tender emotions of youth, they had been united to the object of their affection; and to the nave in which stood the monuments of their ancestors. To the fervent devotion of the Netherlands, always Spanish, the church of the parish became the church of the heart. It gave birth, without doubt, to that kind of painting which has for its object the perspective of Gothic temples. Pious amateurs wished to possess an exact view of the church of St. Gubula at Brussels, of that of St. James at Antwerp, of the chapel of the Dominicans at Malines, or of the choir of St. Bayon at Ghent. Without leaving his cabinet, the pious amateur could assist at the pompous ceremony of the benediction, at the vespers, at the sermon, or even at the modest homily which the humble vicar addresses to

In the latter collection are also a "St. Peter in Prison," in which the apostle is visited by a soldier beating a tub; and a repetition of the same subject, which is recorded by Mrs. Jameson as of doubtful authenticity.

excellent by its style and tone; and other Steenwycks of the first quality exist at Blenheim House, at Warwick Castle, and in the gallery of the Duke of Bridgewater.

The gallery of the Louvre possesses five works of this master, four of which are interiors of churches with figures; the fifth is the interior of a large and well-lighted apartment, opening into another at the back, with small figures representing the visit of Jesus to the house of Mary and Martha. CENSORSHIP OF THE ARTS IN SPAIN.

All who have walked the ultra-antiquatorial picture gallery in which the artists of Spain are well represented, must have noticed the pre-eminence of religious subjects, and the gloomy and sometimes terror-inspiring manner in which they are treated. The Greek mythology, which furnished the subjects of so many of the finest productions of the Italian schools, has been forbidden ground to the Spanish painters, and amatory subjects are almost as rarely met with. Monks are the figures which chiefly appear in their landscapes, and their historical subjects are mostly taken from the signals of the church, or represent scenes in which ecclesiastics are the most conspicuous actors. Even their religious pictures are frequently of the most gloomy character, and there are many which it is absolutely painful to contemplate.

The cause of this distinguishing characteristic of Spanish art is to be found in the fact, that the Inquisition exercised a censorship over the works of Spanish painters, whose studios were subjected to a periodical visitation by the black-robed familiars of that awe-inspiring institution. A code of regulations existed for the treatment of every imaginable subject, and from the conventional model pronounced orthodox by the venerated Dominicans, artists were forbidden to deviate. The painter's hand was guided by the hand of a monk; his imagination was fettered by inexorable rules. The Inquisition had an officer called Inspector of Pictures, whose duty it was to exercise a general censorship over works of art, and especially to take care that no profane or indecorous picture found its way into a church or a monastery, or was exposed for sale.

In the early part of the seventeenth century this appointment was held by Francisco Pacheco, a painter of some celebrity, whose brother had exercised its duties and privileges before him, and whose uncle was a canon of Seville. Shortly before his death, and when he was far advanced in life, Pacheco published a "Treatise on Painting," a most copious book, full of the legends of Spanish art, and written in a careful and elaborate style. In this work, which was the textbook of Spanish artists in those days, he gives minute directions for representing sacred scenes and personages in an orthodox and decorous manner, as approved by the Holy Office. Elaborate descriptions are given of the manner in which the more illustrious saints and martyrs should be painted, as to attitude and costume, the author's authorities being ancient portraits or contemporary records. But the Crucifixion is the subject on which he displays the greatest amount of research. Quoting from Anselm and Bede, he describes the instrument of the Redeemer's death with as much precision as if he had assisted in its construction. He informs his readers that it measured fifteen feet in height, and eight feet from extremity to extremity of the two arms; its timbers were flat, and not round, with four, and not three, extremities, as it has been sometimes improperly represented. The stem was made of cypress wood, the transverse bar of pine, the block beneath the Redeemer's feet of cedar, and the tablet for the inscription of box. He protests against the practice of representing the Redeemer's feet as fastened by a single nail, followed by some painters of the subject, as an heretical innovation; and supports that of giving a separate nail to each foot by the opinion of Francis de Rioja, who wrote an elaborate essay on the subject—also by a famous relic at Trier, called the nail which secured the Redeemer's right foot—the stigmata which appeared on both the feet of St. Francis—the crucifix which that renowned warrior, Rodrigo of Bivar, used to carry to the field, when contending against the Moors, and which is still revered in the cathedral of Salamanca—and other authorities equally weighty.

But the most complete code of pictorial law is that of Juan Interian de Ayala, who was a doctor and professor of theology in the University of Salamanca. This writer agrees with Pacheco as to the form of the cross, and severely reprobates the practice of representing it with only three extremities. Whether, in painting the visit of the Marys to the tomb of the Redeemer on the morning of the Resurrection, one or two angels should be represented seated on the stone which was rolled away from the mouth of the sepulchre, appears to have been a knotty question; for he does not decide it, but recommends artists to paint their representations of the scene conformably to all the Gospels, by following both accounts, alternately. The question, whether the devil should be represented with horns and a caudal appendage, is continual with the same care and anxiety. The first part of the question is settled on the authority of a vision of Santa Teresa, in which the Father of Evil appeared with the exorcismes popularly ascribed to him; and though the addition of a tail cannot be satisfactorily demonstrated, he allows that such an appendage is very pardonable.

Both Pacheco and Ayala severely reprobate any unnecessary display, however trifling, of the nude figure. The exposure of the naked feet in pictures of the Madonna is censured in the severest terms. In connexion with this branch of the subject, Pacheco relates a story of a Spanish artist, who was usually very decorous in his representations, but who was induced by a wealthy patron to paint him a picture which outraged decency in a very flagrant manner. For this transgression, the artist, happening to die shortly afterwards, was cast into purgatory, from the pains of which he was not released until his patron, in a moment of virtuous compunction, destroyed the picture, and performed a variety of acts of piety and goodness by way of atonement. The saints whom the unfortunate painter had depicted with so much beauty then interceded in his behalf, and obtained his admission into the congregation of the blessed.

This censorship of the arts operated injuriously, by cramping the powers of the Spanish painters, and repressing the ardour of their imaginations. Not only did it restrict them in a great measure to subjects taken from the Holy Scriptures and the lives of the saints, on account of the strong objection of the Dominicans to mythological subjects, and the difficulty of painting history in a truthful manner without giving offence to the brotherhood, but it also compelled them to paint their saints in the conventional attitudes and with the pre-eribed colours. To represent the Madonna with naked feet was held deserving the severest reprobation; to paint a Venus or a Leda was an offence punishable by excommunication, a fine of fifteen hundred ducats, and banishment from the country. A comparative examination of the pictures in Madrid and Seville will show that less rigour was exercised in the capital than in the provincial towns. Foreign pictures were subjected to a scrutiny before they were allowed to be exhibited; and Luca Giordano was employed by the monks of the Escorial to lower the robe of Titian's "St. Margaret," because she was considered to display her legs too much in her conflict with the dragon.

REMAINS OF MEDLEVAL ART IN ENGLAND.

THE first traces of painting, in the artistic sense of the word, in this country, are found in the existing records of the reign of Henry III. The piety of that monarch led him to found several churches and abbeys, and decorate them with painting and sculpture; and his instructions furnish us with some curious particulars of the state of those arts in his reign, and also of the condition of artists. The latter seem to have been considered and treated as mere mechanics, of whom pictures were ordered in the same manner as furniture of an upholsterer. The artist was usually a carver and gilder, a house-decorator, and heraldic painter; a carpenter, a mason, and sometimes an upholsterer. The first distinct reference to picture-painting occurs in a Roll dated 1233, which is a precept to the sheriff of Southampton, "that he shall cause the king's chamber-wainscot, in the castle of Winchester, to be painted with the same pictures as before;" but what the subjects of those pictures were is not known, nor are there now any means of ascertaining. In another Roll of the same year, however, the keeper of the king's palace at Woodstock is ordered to "cause the round chapel there to be painted with the figures of our Lord and the four Evangelists and of St. Edmund, on one part, and that of St. Edward on the other part."

In a Roll of the year 1236, referring to the decoration of the chancels of the Virgin and St. Peter, in the Tower Chapel, directions are given that they shall be "painted with a small figure of the Virgin Mary, standing in a niche; the figures of the Saints Peter, Nicholas and Catherine, the beam beyond the altar of St. Peter, and the small crucifix, with its figures, to be painted anew with fresh colours." And that ye cause to be made an image of St. Peter, in his pontificals as an archbishop, on the north side beyond the said altar, and the same to be painted with the best colours; and also an image of St. Christopher holding and carrying Christ, in the best manner that it can be painted and finished, in the said chapel. And that ye likewise cause two fair pictures to be painted, with the best colours, of the histories of St. Nicholas and St. Catherine, at the altar of the said saints in the said church." In a Roll of 1241, the sheriff of Southampton is enjoined to "cause to be painted in the chapel of our queen, at Winchester, over the great west window, the image of St. Christopher, as he is elsewhere painted, bearing Christ in his arms; and the figure of St. Edward the king, when he gave his ring to a beggar, whose figure should of the celebrated Strawberry Hill collection for £84. It is in good preservation, and measures three feet one inch in height by two feet ten inches in width. It contains eleven figures, of which the heads are well painted, but the draperies are hard and stiff. The king, richly attired, stands before the portal of a magnificent church, giving his hand to the queen; while Kemp, Archbishop of York, and afterwards of Canterbury, is performing the marriage rites by holding the pallium over their conjoined hands. Behind the king stands the Duke of Gloucester and a nobleman with a hawk on his hand, supposed to be the Marquis of Suffolk. Near the archbishop is Cardinal Winchester, the king's great-uncle, recognisable by the resemblance to the statue on his tomb in Winchester Cathedral; and a young man whom Walpole conjectured to be Sir Richard Woodville. Behind the queen is a lady with a kind of turban, probably her mother, the titular queen of Naples and Jerusalem; she appears to be speaking to a lady near her, supposed to be the Countess of Richmond, mother of Henry VII. Behind them are an abbess and a beautiful lady, in the mourning garb of a widow, supposed to represent the Duchess of Bedford, afterwards married to Sir Richard Woodville, by whom she became the mother of Elizabeth, the queen of Edward IV. The portraits of Archbishop Kemp and the Duke of Gloucester have been authenticated by two others which formed part of an altar-piece in the abbey of St Edmundsbury, now in the possession of the Duke of Sutherland.

Two portraits painted in oil, upon panel, of the age of Henry VI., exist at Canon's Ashby, the seat of the Marquis of Northampton. They represent the celebrated Earl of Shrewsbury and his countess. The earl is in his tabard of arms. At Hampton Court there are two portraits of Edward IV., one stiff and poorly painted, the other a whole-length, in a night-gown and black cap. At Donnington, the ancient seat of the Earls of Huntingdon, are portraits of this monarch and his brother, the Duke of Clarence. In the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford, there is a portrait of his queen, Elizabeth Woodville, and another is preserved at Queen's College, Cambridge; they convey no idea of her beauty, nor of any skill in the painter. At Eton College is a portrait of Jane Shore, which corresponds very closely to the description given of her by Sir Thomas More from a picture which he had seen, but which was not the one here mentioned. Another portrait of this lady is preserved in the provost's lodge at King's College, Cambridge; it is a half-length, without any drapery, though the golden hair is adorned with jewels, and a rich necklace glitters on her shoulders and bosom.

We come at length to a period in which we meet with the names of the artists by whom the pictures of the time were painted, and the first is that of John Mabuse, a Fleming, who painted the portraits of the children of Henry VII., now at Hampton Court. There is a repetition of these portraits at Wilton; another in the possession of the Duke of Leeds at Kiveton; and a third in the collection of Mr. Metuen. That at Wilton bears the date of 1495, and is painted with considerable taste and skill. The royal children, Prince Arthur, Prince Henry, and Princess Margaret, are dressed in black, and playing with fruit at a table covered with a green cloth. Though in the early dry manner, the faces are well drawn, and there is some good colouring, particularly in the head of Prince Henry, which, having a half-reflected light, must have presented a considerable difficulty to the artist. Each of these pictures is on panel, with a small difference in point of size. Mabuse also painted a picture of "Adam and Eve," which is now at Hampton Court, where there is also a picture of "The Virgin and Child," enthroned, with St. Michael and St. Andrew, which is attributed to the same artist.

There are several other works of this master in different private collections in this country. One of these represents "The Marriage of Henry VII. and the Princess Elizabeth of York." On one side are Henry and the Bishop of Lincoln, who performed the ceremony; on the other the princess, who has very agreeable features and golden hair, and an elderly man so strangely dressed that it is impossible to divine who or what he is intended for. He wears a green gown, like a monk's, except that none of the monastic orders wore that colour; his feet are bare, and in his left hand he holds a spear. Though in a hard manner, the picture is not without merit, and the perspective is very ably executed. This curious picture is now in the possession of J. Dent, Esq. There are also a "Virgin and Child," under a Gothic canopy, and surrounded by angels, in the collection of Sir Thomas Baring at Stratton; and a "St. Jerome" at Althorp, the seat of Earl Spencer.

In the library of St. John's College, Cambridge, there is a portrait of the Countess of Richmond, the mother of Henry VII.; it is much damaged, and the painter unknown. At Hampton Court is a tripartite picture, probably intended for an altar-piece in the royal chapel at Stirling Castle, which was painted after the departure of Mabuse from England, but by whom is unknown. The first division contains the portraits of James IV. and Queen Margaret; the second those of the same monarch and his brother Alexander, praying before St. Andrew; and the third that of the queen, kneeling before St. George, who is clad in the plate armour of the period. At Knowsley, the Earl of Derby has a portrait of the Countess of Richmond, supposed to be of the period; and at Oxburgh Hall, in Norfolk, the seat of Sir R. Bedingfield, are ancient portraits of William de la Pole, Duke of Suffolk, Edward IV., and Henry VII. All these are done in oil, and on panel. The best works of this period, however, are more curious than beautiful. Allan Cunningham, who calls the portraits we have enumerated "lumpoons upon human nature," says that "of true art there was none." It is not until the commencement of the sixteenth century that we meet with the names of artists of any celebrity, and the first, Holbein, was a foreigner. The first English painter of any eminence was Nicholas Hilliard, a painter of portraits in miniature, who died in 1619.

ART AND ARTISTS.

Bacon says, "That is the best part of beauty which a picture cannot express—no, nor the first sight of life." Sir Joshua Reynolds seems to have laboured to represent this inward excellence; and we can fancy the grace and charms of his females will remain when their colour has fled. Lawrence was the friend of the Prince Regent, and painted the women of his court. The result is seen at once. His women look too conscious of their attractions, and the feelings they inspire in the spectator are rarely of a pleasing character. Hence the superiority of the women of Reynolds over those of Lawrence.

After all, our best patrons of the fine arts have been the gentlemen of England—the noblemen and merchant princes, who are blessed alike with money and taste. Every artist has been indebted to such. Their name is legion. A few words concerning one of the most eminent cannot be out of place in our pages. Mr. J. J. Angerstein was of a respectable German family settled in Russia. He was born at St. Petersburg, in 1735, and was recommended to come to England by Mr. Thompson, the eminent Russian merchant. Mr. Angerstein arrived in London about the year 1749, and having acquired a knowledge of business in Mr. Thompson's counting-house, he became an underwriter at Lloyd's, and was very soon distinguished for his vigilance, acuteness, industry and integrity. To him the little world of underwriters, called Lloyd's, owes its present form and segregation, as well as the rooms and offices at the Royal Exchange in which the business has been for so many years conducted. Mr. Angerstein first procured an act of parliament to render penal the changing the names of ships, a practice by which great frauds used to be committed. In the distresses of 1793, he suggested to government the novel plan in this country of assisting trade by public advances of loans on Exchequer Bills; and he afterwards originated with ministers the certainly not less novel scheme of establishing lotteries in aid of the revenue—a scheme, however, which the government readily embraced, and continued long after the public sense of the immoral tendencies of lotteries was confirmed by fatal experience. Mr. Angerstein was not only a successful contractor for lotteries, but he became an equally fortunate participator in the government loans. His vigilance was inexhaustible. By his means alone that miscreant, Hendrich Williams, called the Monster, from his habit of wounding and maiming females in the streets, was brought to what in this country was called justice—that is, six years' imprisonment. Mr. Angerstein then pointed out to government an inconvenience and gross nuisance in Kensington Gardens, and finding the govern-to the prices of pictures. In this respect there have been great changes. When Charles I.'s collection of pictures was sold by order of the Commonwealth, they fetched the following prices: The Cartoons of Raffaele, £300; "The Royal Family," £150; "King Charles on Horseback," £200; "The Triumph of Julius Cæsar," £1,000; "The Twelve Cæsars," of Titian, £1,200; "The Muses," by Tintoretto, £100; "The Nativity," by Julio Romano, £500; "Sleeping Venus," by Correggio, £1,000; "The Venus del Pardo," by Titian, £600; "Venus attired by the Græcs," by Guido, £200; a little "Madonna and Christ," by Raffaele, £800; "St. George," by Raffaele, £150; "Our Lady, Christ, and others," by Palma, £200; "Brasuns and Erobinus," by H. Bein, £200; "Satyr Flayed," by Correggio, £1,000; "Mercury teaching Cupid to read in the presence of Venus," by Correggio, £800; "The Head of King Charles," a bust, by Bernini, £800; and "Christ washing the Feet of his Disciples," £300. For his first two pictures in "The Four Times of Day," Borzich got sixty-five guineas; for the last two, forty-six. The paintings of "The Harlot's Progress" produced only fourteen guineas each; those of "The Rake's Progress" were sold for twenty-two. "Morning" brought twenty guineas, and "Night" twenty-six. "The Claudestine Marriage" was sold for a hundred and ten guineas, and the frames were worth four guineas each. Gainsborough's wife got for his favourite picture, now unfortunately destroyed, "The Woodman and his Dog in the Storm," five hundred guineas. Boydell gave Reynolds a thousand guineas for his "Macbeth," for his Shakspeare gallery; and West a thousand for "King Lear," and Romney six hundred for "The Tempest." Copley refused fifteen hundred guineas for his great painting of "The Death of Chatham." Wilkie got for his "Village Politicians," from the Earl of Mansfield, only thirty guineas. His "Card Players" was sold to the Duke of Cambridge for a hundred and fifty. Mr. Dobree gave him two hundred and fifty for his "Letter of Introduction." The Directors of the British Institution gave him six hundred guineas for his "Distraining for Rent." The Marquis of Stafford gave him £100 for "The Breakfast." For "The Penny Wedding" the Prince Regent gave him £525. "The Reading of the Will" was bought by the King of Bavaria for £447 10s. "The Newsmonsters" was bought by the late General Plüppas for £120. The Duke of Wellington gave him twelve hundred guineas for "The Chelsea Pensioners." Hilton got five hundred guineas from the British Institution for his "Mary anointing the Feet of Christ." Haydon got six hundred guineas for "Solomon;" five hundred for his "Christ in the Garden." His "Lazarus" went for £300; and his "Christ's Entry into Jerusalem," which had brought him £3,000 in receipts of exhibition, went for £240. He got £525 for his "Mock Election;" £300 for his "Chaining the Member;" five hundred guineas for the "Reform Banquet." His "Xenophon," sold at a raffie, brought him £840; "Napoleon," £136; "Passover," £525; The Directors of the British Institution gave West £3,000 for his picture of "Christ healing the Sick." Frequently the purchasers have been very lucky in their purchases. Lord De Tabley's collection of English pictures sold for £8,000—£2,000 more than he gave for them. Constable speaks of having, when in the full zenith of his fame, sold two pictures to a Frenchman for £250. For a whole length portrait, Sir Thomas Lawrence had £600, of which a moiety was paid the first sitting. West received £2,100 for nine paintings of the Royal Family, some consisting of single portraits and some in family groups. His picture of "The Annunciation," which originally cost £1,000, was painted between the years 1817 and 1826, to occupy a large space in the centre of the splendid organ in Marybone New Church. It was thought to give the church a popish appearance, and was taken down. It was then placed in the Queen's Bazaar, where £100 was offered for it and refused; and, after lying fourteen years in a lumber-room of St. Marybone Court-house, it was sold to Mr. John Wilson, of Charles-street, Middlesex Hospital, for ten guineas. Sir James Thornhill, our first native artist, was very poorly paid. Horace Walpole says: "High as his reputation was, and laborious as his works were, he was far from being generously rewarded for some of them, and for others he found it difficult to obtain the stipulated prices. His drawings were contested at Greenwich; and though La Roche received £2,000 for his works at Montague House, and was allowed £600 for his five heads, Sir James could obtain but forty shillings a square yard for the cupola of St. Paul's; and, I think, no more for Greenwich." Reynolds' first portrait, which evinced sufficient talent to bring him into notice, was that of Captain Hamilton, painted in 1716, when the artist was twenty-three years old; and the earliest record of his price is in 1752, when he was in his twenty-ninth year, and his charge was then £5 5s. for a head, à la three-quarters. In 1755, the price was £12 12s.; in 1758, £21; soon after, 1760, £36 15s.; and in 1781, £52 10s., the highest charge he ever made. Van dyck, in 1632, when he was aged thirty-four, received but £25 for his whole-length portrait of Charles I. He was paid in the same year £26 for a half-length of the queen, and £100 "for one great piece of his majesty, the queen, and their children." Morland's extraordinary juvenile drawings from pictures and casts sold only for 7s. 6d.; and his odd finery-drawings from popular ballads and romances, prior to his attaining the age of sixteen, were sold in gilt frames for from three to five guineas. Gainsborough's price for a head in oils, when he was about thirty-five, was five guineas. He raised his price to eight guineas; and at his zenith he received £12 for a half, and £195 for a whole-length. Price's usual price for a portrait, when he was sixteen years of age, and in Cornwall, was 7s. 6d. The highest prices paid Sir Thomas Lawrence were, for a head-size or three-quarters, £210; for a bit-kat, £315; for a half-length, £120; for a bishop's half-length, £525; and for a full-length, £650; for an extra full-length, £735. As a proof of the admiration in which his talents were held by the affluent, Mr. Williams mentions that Lord Gower paid him fifteen hundred guineas for his admirable portrait of his lady and child; and that six hundred guineas were paid him by Lord Durham for his portrait of Master Lumdon. On leaving the Scotch Academy, Wilkie returned into Fife-shire, and commenced portrait-painting, at five guineas each. Wilson starved; yet many of his pictures now fetch a price which would have purchased him a comfortable annuity for life. It was not the other day that the committee of the British Institution purchased a picture by Gainsborough for eleven hundred guineas, and presented it to the National Gallery as an example of excellence; and yet this very picture hung for years in the artist's painting-room without a purchaser, though the price was only £50. The average prices Turner got from 1803 to 1815, were from one hundred and fifty to two hundred guineas. For his drawings from busts he received prices varying from twenty to twenty-five guineas. In 1810, Lord Yarborough gave him three hundred guineas for "The Wreck"—a long price for a landscape by a living artist. This same "Wreck," at Christie's, would now sell for £3,000. His "Blind Castle," a small water-colour drawing, for which he received twenty-five guineas, has sold since his death, at Christie's rooms, for £152 5s. We believe on two occasions he obtained more than £100 for a picture. Calvert, in his best days, was not much luckier in asking or getting good or reasonable prices. Morland painted for pedlars; and Patrick Nasmyth, our English Hebbana, for jaw-breakers. The swooping of Eity's study sold, after his death, for upwards of £5,000. For a rich man, the best speculation going is liberally to patronise rising artists. He will make more money so than in any other way. People will give any price for a man's works after he is dead; and so the patron of fine arts, if he will, may have a fair reputation and a splendid gallery, and, at the same time, a property which will become more valuable every day. In his case he will indeed find it to be true, that virtue is its own reward.

ORIGINALS OF SAINTS AND MADONNAS.

In the beginning of the modern schools of painting, when Art was the handmaid of Religion, nothing more was required of artists than that they should impress an air of holiness and serenity on the countenances of their saints and Madonnas, and represent them, as to costume and attitude, according to certain traditional types. It was only when a sense of the exquisite beauty of the ancient sculptures began to be felt, and artists arose whose genius could not be confined within the restrictions of tradition, that personal beauty was striven after in representations of glorified personages.

It has been the fortune of later days to see the sides considerably changed. The ancient painters, thanks to the vigorous onslaughts of learned and judicious critics, led on by Mr. Ruskin, have received a signal defeat, and are now apparently more in their true place than before. If they are not elevated to the height of art, they are not, on the other hand, wholly to be depreciated; the truth seems to be here, as it generally does elsewhere, in the middle course. That the earlier painters indeed the study of art, preserved certain rules of painting, and studied incompletely but arduously, is no doubt true; and we purpose at present to inquire what they have done, and what we especially owe to them.

That the biography of the Italian painters has been written by one of their countrymen, is perhaps one of the causes to which they owe so deep a popularity and appreciation. Thus Vasari ascribes to Cimabue (1240—1302) not only the merit, but the miracle of having revived the art of painting when utterly lost, and of having by his single genius brought beauty out of chaos. Yet this is so far untrue, that it is perfectly well known, that several painters were working in Italy previously to his birth, that Cimabue must have studied under one of these, and that moreover it is possible to trace back pictorial remains and names of painters even to the fourth century.*

It is to these painters, then, and not to Cimabue, that we must look for the types and signs which, delivered through various ages by the means of art, have not only influenced art itself, but have had their effect upon religion.

It would appear that the feeling which led the Puritans of the time of the Protectorate to destroy the various and beautifully painted windows which pictured the lives of saints, and to deface the tombs and statues in the churches, was no new thing. The early Christians had a decided hostility to imitative art. They had lived amongst heathens who, however civilised, had prostituted it to the basest purposes. The statues and the paintings which were to be seen in the public places, and upon the walls of the luxurious Romans, were in the highest degree immoral. Nay, they had descended lower than that. The vase, the cup, the domestic implements themselves, were ornamented by a lascivious art. "An early Christian," says an eminent author, "could not touch a knife, a spoon, or drink out of a cup, without having his moral sense degraded, nor without being contaminated." †

They moreover regarded all images of any sort, either carved or painted, as idolatrous, although the legend goes, that St. Luke himself was a painter. From these causes, and from the figurative language of the Jewish people, the representations of the sacred personages were confined to symbols, which have descended to us through the medium of the early painters.

Thus the cross, so frequently used in art, so often interwoven into architecture, which as an ornament itself crowns so many cathedrals or simple churches, signified redemption; the fish from its living in water, baptism; the ship or ark represented the church; and the serpent, frequently with a man's face, the spirit of evil, or Satan. Here then was the commencement of a new era in decorative art.

When Christianity had, in the middle of the fourth century, totally triumphed over Paganism, these types were received, but somewhat of the old models and forms began to be revived. The Byzantine school had preserved these models, and they were applied to Christianity, just as the heathen temples purified, but still the same, served as churches dedicated to the true God. The attributes of Orpheus and Apollo were applied to the Saviour, for he "redeemed souls from hell," and "gathered his people like sheep." Then came the combination of the Mother and the Son, at first incidentally, latterly more presumptuously; for the Virgin held the infant in her lap, and was, in the eyes of the untaught worshipper, the more potent of the two, because the more prominent.

Art was also called in to teach those who were otherwise untaught. In the villages and obscure towns, where Christianity had not penetrated till established by law, painted cloths were hung up where the people worshipped, representing the sufferings and final crucifixion of our Saviour; or else the artist, breaking out into a rude "Jubilate," would show how He rode triumphantly into Jerusalem, or called the dead to life, or walked upon the sea. No wonder then, as these pictures illustrated the glowing words of some early missionary, that they began to be revered by the untaught vulgar, and to intercept and absorb that devotion which was at first addressed only to God.

But it is to these early portraiture that our latest painters owe their ideal heads of Christ. "In the cemetery of St. Callixtus, at Rome, a head of Christ was discovered, the most ancient of any copy which has come down to us: the figure is colossal; the face a long oval; the countenance mild, grave, melancholy; the long hair parted on the brow, falling in two masses on the shoulder; the beard not thick, but short and divided. Here then, obviously imitated from a traditional description (probably the letter of Leontulus, supposed to be a fabrication of the third century), we have the type, the generic character, since adhered to in the representations of the Redeemer." ‡

That our artists have ever followed this faithfully and closely, no one can doubt. We have but to call to mind the various representations of the Saviour, from that in "The Last Supper" of Leonardo da Vinci, to that which was popular as a print some time ago, and is the best ideal head without dignity which we have, by Paul Delaroche. Nay, a further proof of the firm way in which the ideal of the early painters has been received, is, that none could contemplate a departure from the type without revolting from it. Who could imagine the Saviour with an aquiline nose and high forehead, and a cast of countenance belonging to the race of which he was born? The painter who should be so bold as to give him a Jewish expression would suffer for it, by making his picture universally odious.

But the head of the Saviour is not the only one which we have received from the early painters. In Leonardo da Vinci's picture, cited above, we have the whole of the received types of the various apostles. Thus St. Peter, who sits nearly at the end of the table, at the right of our Saviour, has a bold impetuous expression of countenance, marked with great acuteness and intellectuality. Near to his face, and thrown up by the contrast, is that of Judas, a Saturnine countenance of strictly Jewish caste. St. John, the beloved disciple, approximates in feature to our Lord, and has the hair parted on the forehead and flowing to his shoulders. St. Thomas, who doubted, has a refined Roman head, the hair curling and short, like that of Brutus, and his face shows that he requires conviction, but, when once convinced, will act. St. Andrew, on the contrary, sitting on the extreme left, is firm, manly and expressive, with the same determined look which St. Peter has—a look well becoming each of those disciples, one of whom made that affirmation which called forth the express approval of his Lord, and the other suffered on a new cross and with a more refined torture.

These types, therefore, we do assuredly owe to the early painters, and to them, moreover, we owe, however rude their works, that vitality of expression which in later artists degenerated into formalism. Let us be careful to guard that earnestness which we at present have. "Receive," says the quaint but deep-thinking John Ruskin—"Receive the witness of painting. John Bellini, and his brother Gentile, two years older than he, close the line of the sacred painters of Venice. But the most solemn spirit of religious faith animated their works to the last. There is no religion in any work of Titian's. . . . Nor is this merely because John Bellini was a religious man and Titian was not. Titian and Bellini are each true representatives of the school of painters contemporary with them; and the difference of their artistic feeling is a consequence, not so much of difference in their own natural characters as in their early education. Bellini was brought up in faith, Titian in formalism. Between the years of their birth, the vital religion of Venice had expired." §

Let us, therefore, act upon what we owe to the early artists; and though our own painters have far surpassed them in execution, let us try to revive that FAITH which lies in their stiff figures and formal draperies, whilst we yet improve in colour and in feeling.

DOMENICO ZAMPIERI.

Of all the pupils of the Caracci, the Bolognese master who is commonly known as Domenichino, and whose real name was Domenic

Zamperi, is, at the present day, the most universally admired. Algarotti preferred him to the Caracci themselves, and Passeri considered him second only to Raffaele. Poussin pronounced his "Continuation of St. Jerome" one of the three most beautiful pictures in Rome, the other two being "The Transfiguration" of Raffaele, and "The Descent from the Cross" of Daniel of Volterra. This opinion of the great French painter, which posterity has confirmed, is a direct contradiction to the detractors of Domenichino, and a condemnation of the works of his contemporaries.

Yet the works which have excited such warm eulogiums were once derided to a degree that is now scarcely credible. His faults were exaggerated, and even his excellencies made to appear defects. His genius was not of the brilliant order, and his power of invention was small; but these deficiencies were counterbalanced by the profundity and accuracy of his judgment, his admirable power of expression, and the carefulness of his execution. His poverty of invention led his enemies, of whom no painter ever had more, to ascribe to him an imitator and a plagiarist; but had he enjoyed the same advantages of party as the Caracci, he would soon have triumphed over his detractors, by showing the difference between imitation and servility. Domenichino, timid, retired, and master of few pupils, was destitute of a party equal to his excellence as a painter. He was constrained to yield to the crowd that trampled upon him, and thus the observation of Agueschi, that his worth would never be rightly appreciated during his life, was realized. The spirit of party having passed away, impartial posterity has rendered him justice, and his works are now not only in the public admiration of the great capitals, and the collections of the most distinguished amateurs.

Domenic Zamperi was the son of a bricklayer in the city of Bologna. Born in 1581, about the time when Ludovico Caracci, seconded by his cousins Augustino and Annibale, undertook that reform of art which had at bottom the seeds of its decay, he was inspired with a love of painting by the fame of their school; or rather than fine-nourished that love of the beautiful which nature had implanted within him, and gave it a direction. The most simple artisans of Italy are rarely indifferent to the beauties of poetry, music and painting; and the elder Zampieri was willing that his son should follow his inclinations, and become a painter. But he did not appreciate the endeavours of the Caraeci, or did not view them with so much enthusiasm as some of his fellow-countrymen, and he placed Domenic under Denis Calvart, an artist of Flemish descent and mediocre ability, who had been established in Bologna several years.

This choice of a master was not agreeable to Domenichino, to whose eyes the magnificent productions of the Caraeci were the supreme expression of progress in art, while Denis Calvart was the representative of its immobility. His master was, moreover, of a harsh and irritable temper, and having one day found him in admiring contemplation before an engraving after Augustine Caraeci, he chastised him so severely that the lad left his house, and returned to that of his father. There he had to endure new reproaches, and, according to Malvasia, additional harsh treatment. Moved by his urgent entreaties and those of his mother, his father at length consented to a change of masters, and the youth presented himself before Augustine Caraeci, to whom he showed his drawings. At the recommendation of that distinguished professor, he was admitted into the school of Ludovico Caraeci, among whose pupils were, at this time, Guido and Albano.

He was now free to avow his enthusiastic admiration of his masters, but trials of another kind awaited him. Timid to excess, and shy in his manner, which obtained him the name of Domenicchio (little Domenic), distrustful of his own powers, and quiet and reserved in his manners, he was untried by nature for the rude battles of the world. His infirmities received no indulgence from his fellow-pupils, who, according to accounts which have been handed down by contemporary authors, did not spare either sarcasms or outrages, to which they were emboldened, rather than dissuaded, by his patience and resignation.

His art was his only consolation and source of pleasure, and he applied himself to it with such devotion, that he advanced each day in knowledge and experience of the qualities essential to success. It was the practice of the Caraeci to excite the emulation of their pupils by proposing prizes for the best drawings, and one of those occasions occurred soon after Domenichino became their pupil. Full of modesty and timidity, and without hope of success, he was obliged, like the other pupils, to offer his design; and while his fellow-students gave in their drawings with confidence, regarding him with an air of conscious superiority, Domenichino approached with timidity, scarcely daring to present his drawing, which he would gladly have withheld. Ludovico Caraeci examined the productions of all his pupils, and declared Domenichino the successful candidate.

This triumph, instead of rendering him confident and vain, only served to incite him to greater assiduity and application. His genius seemed to develop itself slowly, because it was profound and accurate; and Passeri attributes his great progress more to his wonderful application than to his genius. From his acting as a continual censor of his own productions, he became the most correct and scrupulous designer in the Bolognese school, the most natural colourist, the most universal master of the theory of his art, and the chief painter amongst them all in whom Mengs found nothing to desire except a somewhat larger proportion of elegance. "That he might devote his whole time to art, he avoided all society, or if he occasionally sought it in the theatres and markets, it was in order to observe better the expression of the passions of human nature in the features of the people, and consult it living, as it were, to his artists." "This it was," says Bellori, "that he succeeded in delineating the soul, in colouring life, and arousing those emotions in our breasts at which all his works aim; as if he waved the same sand which belonged to the poetical enchanters, Tasso and Ariosto."

With Albano alone, of all his fellow-pupils, Domenichino formed an intimacy, and when they left together the school of the Caraeci, they visited Parma, Modena and Reggio in company, to study the works of Parmigianino and Correggio. On their return to Bologna, Albano went to Rome, where Annibale Caraeci was at that time engaged in the decoration of the Farnese Palace, and, owing to his declining health, was in need of some assistance. On the recommendation of Albano, he sent to Bologna for the pupil of his cousin Ludovico; and Domenichino shortly afterwards arrived in Rome, where he was intrusted with the execution of a portion of the work from the designs of Annibale.

This engagement led immediately to cabals and intrigues being directed against Domenichino, whose natural timidity invited to the attack all who had conceived feelings of envy or dislike of him. The unhappy painter took refuge in his patience and resignation, two words which comprise his entire life, which presents us with a picture of loneliness and suffering, without anger and without despair, which excites our commiseration and respect, and ought to have disarmed his enemies. Fortunately for Domenichino, Annibale Caraeci had powerful friends, and he obtained for him the protection of the Cardinals Farnese and Borghese, while Albano interested the Cardinal Agnelli and his brother in favour of his friend. In the loggia of the gardens of Cardinal Farnese he painted, from his own designs, the "Death of Adonis," choosing for the representation the moment when the Queen of Love springs from her chariot to succour her mortally-wounded lover. The health of Annibale Caraeci becoming every day more impaired, he was obliged to relinquish many of his commissions, and some of them he procured for Domenichino, some for Guido, who had attained fame much more rapidly. Both these eminent masters were engaged by the Cardinal Borghese, at his recommendation, to paint the celebrated frescoes in the church of St. Gregorio, of which the "Flagellation of St. Andrew," by Domenichino, is the most admired.

This picture was executed in competition with Guido, and placed opposite to that painter's "St. Andrew being led to Execution." It is said that an aged woman, accompanied by a little boy, was seen engaged in a long and careful contemplation of Domenichino's picture, pointing out every part of the composition to the boy; she then turned to the production of Guido's pencil, gave it a cursory glance, and passed on. It is also asserted by some, that Annibale Caraeci, becoming acquainted with the circumstance, was guided by it in forming his judgment of the two compositions, which was in favour of Domenichino's. Another story connected with this picture is, that, in painting one of the guards, he actually excited himself into a passion, using threatening words and gestures, and that Annibale Caraeci, surprising him at that moment, embraced him, exclaiming with joy, "To-day, my Domenichino, thou art teaching me!" So novel, and at the same time so natural, it appeared to him that the artist, like the orator, should feel within himself all that he is representing to others.

Domenichino was afterwards employed by Cardinal Farnese to execute some works in fresco in a chapel in the abbey of Grotto Ferrata, where he painted several subjects from the life of St. Nilo, one of which, "St. Nilo curing the Demoniac Boy," may be compared with his finest works at Rome. He was also employed, about the same time, by Cardinal Aldobrandini to decorate his villa at Frascati, where he painted ten pictures in fresco, the subjects taken from the mythic history of Apollo, by which he added greatly to his reputation. The next work of Domenichino was his well-known picture of the "Communion of St. Jerome," which we have engraved (p. 201), and which was long one of the principal ornaments of the Louvre, in which it was placed by Napoleon I. It was painted for the principal altar of the church of St. Girolamo della Carità, but now hangs in the Vatican, opposite to the only work at Rome which surpasses it, the "Transfiguration" of Raffaele.

The envious and malignant feelings with which some of Domenichino's contemporaries had long regarded him, were still further excited by the applause bestowed upon this famous production. Lanfranco, the prime-mover in the intrigues against him, took advantage of the resemblance between the "Communion of St. Jerome" of Domenichino, and Augustine Caraeci's picture of the same subject in the Certosa at Bologna, to assert that it was little more than a copy of the latter; and he employed Pericci, one of his pupils, to make an etching of Augustine's work, which was largely circulated. But this mode of attack, instead of proving the plagiarism, revealed the malevolence of its author; as it was evident there was no other resemblance than must necessarily ensue jealousy in the hearts of Lanfranco, Tacconi, and others, that they were received with the bitterest and most unjust criticisms. The frescoes with which he adorned the church of St. Andrew were spoken of by his detractors as a scandal and a profanation; and they denounced them to the sovereign pontiff as paintings which, whether owing to the ignorance or the audacity of the painter, outraged the sanctity of the edifice which they disfigured. Some went so far as to propose their destruction, and Lanfranco, who had his own reason for his moderation, insisted strongly on the necessity of having them retouched by a purer and more learned hand. There can be no doubt as to whose hand he intended.

A reason for these angry and injurious attacks is not easily found. When we examine, in the church of St. Andrew, either the scenes from the life of that saint, or the figures of the Evangelists which ornament the four corbels of the cupola, and consider them in the spirit which prompted all the religious pictures of the subordinate figures should be in harmony with the principal figure, which is the body of the work, of which the others are simply the members." This rule Domenichino has not acknowledged here; but in general he has observed it with an attention rather uncommon among the painters of his time, and even without leaving the church of St. Andrew, we may find more than one example of the care with which he has established an intimate accordance between all the parts of his compositions.

Notwithstanding the criticisms of his ungenerous enemies, the frescoes of Domenichino were not destroyed, nor even retouched as Lanfranco had advised. The mild disposition of the painter revolted so much against the incessant and unjust attacks of his malignant adversaries, which embittered his whole existence, that he thought at one time of abandoning painting, and transferring his talents to sculpture. He resumed his palette, however, but not to paint those large church pictures which had provoked the envy and malice of period in which they were painted, it is difficult to explain, otherwise than by the folly or malignity of his enemies, the violence of the reproaches with which Domenichino was overwhelmed. Will it be believed, for example, that he was seriously accused of having manifested disrespect for the saint by representing, in the "Martyrdom of St. Andrew," one of the executioners in the act of stumbling, and provoking by his fall the laughter of his comrades? The episode is not well chosen, perhaps, but to attribute to an error of taste the signification of a blasphemy, was as great an absurdity as it was a calumny. It is true that in France, fifty years later, this figure of the executioner was condemned by the Royal Academy of Painting and Sculpture, but this decision was based upon purely artistic considerations, and had no reference to its assumed impropriety in a religious sense. "It is necessary," says the reporter of their proceedings, "that the attitudes and expressions of the his rivals; he applied himself to works of a more humble kind, in which he thought his enemies would perhaps disdain to compete with him. He abandoned for a time religious subjects and fresco, and painted landscapes and mythological subjects with considerable success.

If we compare the landscapes of Domenichino with those painted in Italy towards the end of the sixteenth century, it is easy to recognise in both an entire conformity of principles and the same mode of execution. The Caracci and their pupils were, in fact, the creators of this branch of art, since before them the fields, the sea, the trees, were introduced into pictures merely as accessories, or as backgrounds to subjects from history; they were the first to think of representing the scenery of nature for itself, and as the principal object of interest. Annibale Caracci and Domenichino both painted landscapes admirably; but the glory of making this branch of art an exclusive study was reserved for French artists, a few years by anonymous letters, by displaying his pictures, and by mixing injurious ingredients with his colours. With the most insidious malice, they induced the viceroy to send some of his pictures to the court of Madrid, and these when little more than sketched were taken from his studio, and carried to the viceroy's palace, where Ribera ordered them to be retouched, and without giving the unfortunate painter time to finish them, hurried them off to their destination. This malicious fraud of his rival, the complaints of denunciations fulminated by Corenzio and Ribera, and to the calumnious insinuations of the wily Lanfranco. While he yet hesitated to put a period to Domenichino's labours, his perplexity was removed by the artist's death—a sinister and badly-explained event, which has been attributed to the troubles of which he had so long been the prey, but which was thought by some, with too much probability, to have been hastened by the nefarious means which Corenzio was known to be capable of resorting to. the painter, who thought themselves doomed to experience a constant succession of obstacles to the completion of the work, and the suspicion of some design against his life, at length determined Domenichino to depart secretly for Rome. As soon, however, as the news of his flight transpired, he was recalled, and fresh measures taken for his protection; upon which he resumed his labours, and decorated the walls and the base of the cupola, besides making considerable progress in painting the pictures.

The viceroy, however, had begun to give ear to the violent preparations taken by the unfortunate painter after his return to Naples, prove that he believed his life to be endangered by the machinations of his enemies. He prepared all his food himself, and if poison was given him, it must have been, as Malvasia and others of his contemporaries intimate, in water, of which he was accustomed to take a draught from the ewer every morning before washing himself.

Domenichino died in 1641, at the age of sixty. His enemy, Lanfranco, succeeded him in completing the frescoes of St. Janna.

rius; Ribera, in one of his oil-pictures; Stanzioni, in another. Caracciolo was dead. Corenzio was soon afterwards killed by a fall from a stage, which he had erected for the purpose of retouching some of his frescoes. The fate of Ribera is involved in obscurity, and various accounts are given of his latter days. Palomino and Cean Bermudez assert that he died at Naples in 1656, in the enjoyment of affluence and fame. Mr. Stirling, who expresses doubts as to the latter assertion of the Spanish writers, says, on the authority of a tradition current at Naples, that he left that city through violent or unhappy end; and impatience, as awarding to Domenichino the palm of merit, imputes to the maxim, that it is a delusive hope to attempt to establish fame on the destruction of another's reputation."

In this period of the decline of art, mediocrity was enthroned, and the living faces of Italian art exhausted in medals, in juggleries, and in a weak sensuality. Landino at Naples, Caracci at Florence, Susoferrato and Ricci at Rome, and Verini, were the men who were prohibited the worthy business of the great master. That noble shame and grief at the seduction of his daughter by Don John of Austria, and died at Posillipo in obscurity and disrepute. Landi says that, having committed a flagrant offence, and become insupportable even to himself, from the general odium which he experienced, he embarked on board a ship; and that no one knew whether he died, or how he ended his life. "Thus," he adds, "these ambitious men, who by violence or fraud had influenced and abused the generosity and taste of so many noble patrons, and to whose treachery and sanguinary vengeance so many professors of the art had fallen victims, ultimately reaped the merited fruit of their conduct: a triumph of which, to the world, was the name of Domenichino—the last descendant, had he not existed. Domenichino being dead, what remained of the Italian schools? A part being already decayed, and dejà-décadé, which is an never to be surprised. After him came some able practitioners, some good talents; but the work which they produced testify to the skill of their hand rather than to the imagination of the brain. Domenichino has the merit of having somewhat retarded that definitive invasion of the materialising spirit into the domain of Italian painting. The heinousness submitted to the evil influences of the period, that the defects which mark the decline of the art, which led to the neglect which was beyond him to posterity, cannot be denied. But should the derisive and prejudices of the world, he has not always forgotten in proof of his own industry. We are reminded in the world of a hundred illustrious and moral truths, and a kingdom of liberty of expression, which mark him as a veritable member of the family of the great masters, and which inspire in us a lively sympathy, in default of an unreserved admiration. In spite of the various uses of his style, of his false taste, of his numerous errors, Domenichino merits a place among the masters by the large degree of power which he possessed in the expression of the passions, in the nobility that, in the fine arts, sentiment is the principal agent, the moral impression the essential object, and that even where the form is imperfect, the elevation of the thought suffices to confer a profound satisfaction and a durable authority.

Notwithstanding the slowness with which he worked, and the difficulties of all kinds which he had to overcome, the works of Domenichino are almost as numerous as those of the master the most renowned for celebrity. In Italy, no collection, public or private, is without one or more of the productions of this industrious artist, whose works are now to be found in the galleries of every country in Europe. The Museum at Bologna contains three Domenichinos:—"The Martyrdom of St. Peter," the general disposition of which recalls Titian's picture of the same subject; "Our Lady of the Bosny," already mentioned; and "The Martyrdom of St. Agnes," which is considered as one of the best works of this master, and is a good specimen of his taste, judgment and genius. The head of the saint has an expression of grief and hope that is very noble; and the two female figures on the right are admirably designed, and have much elegance in their forms. The Brera Museum at Milan contains a "Virgin," "St. Petronius," and some other pictures of saints. Some figures of the master exist in the Cathedral of Ferrara and in the Nolfi Gallery, in that town, is his "David," of which Lazzari says, "that the figure of the Jew is more rich, as David's life is also sufficient to immortalise the painter's name." In the Museum of the Offices at Florence are "The Baptism of Christ," "The Descent of John the Baptist," and a portrait of Cardinal Azzolino, besides pictures in the Bonifazio Museum, a beautiful picture, entitled "The Guardian Angel," in the cathedral, three altar-pieces—"St. Januarius reconciling a Young Man," "The Descent of St. Januarius," and "St. Januarius curing the Sick;" and in the Palazzo Vecchio Torra, a "Dead Christ on the Knees of the Virgin, attended by Mary Magdalen and others." The composition of this picture is very good, and the design simple and true to nature, the head of the Magdalen is full of expression, but the coloring is somewhat cold. The Palazzo Galleggi at Genoa contains a beautiful composition of "Venus bewailing the Death of Adonis;" and in the Palazzo Sallustiana "St. Rocco offering up Prayers for the Conversion of the Heathen." The attitude of the saint, the expressions of those who see him, the struggle of the dying and the dead around him, a funeral procession passing an infant on the bosom of its dead mother, vainly seeking its wound miraculously all appeal strongly to the feelings of the spectator. In the Museum at Turin we find only an allegorical picture of agriculture, astronomy and architecture, represented by three children.

Rome, however, of all the cities of Italy, is richest in the works of this master. In the Gregorian, in the churches of the papal capital, have been already mentioned, nearly his entire work of the Vatican. In the Capitol Gallery is a picture of "St. Barbara" in the Barberini Palace; "The Christ of Piero;" and "The Omnipotent Angel," both works of considerable merit. The Duke of Bracciano possesses a landscape by Domenichino, and that of the Borghese family a very fine portrait, of "Adam and Eve."

The Royal Museum at Madrid contains two fine Domenichinos:—"St. Jerome in the Desert," which we have engraved (p. 196), and "A woman preparing to sacrifice herself."

In the gallery of the Louvre are thirty-five works of this master, formerly in the collection of Louis XIV. Among them are "The Triumph of Love," which we have engraved (p. 199), "St. Cecilia," "Heracles and Cronos," "The Crucifixion of Hercules and Achelous," "The Punishment of Adam and Eve," "David playing on the Harp," and "Timotheus brought before Alexander;" and in the Capitoline, at the Vatican, of Titian's "Peter preaching to the Gentiles," which we have engraved.

The Duke of Marlborough at Munich contains "St. Anna supported in the Temple by the Elders;" the Royal Gallery at Dresden, a charming composition called "Maternal Love;" the Museum at Berlin, "St. Deleage," "St. Jerome," "St. John," "St. James and St. Paul," "The Madonna," and a portrait of "Caracciolo," the architect; the Belvedere Gallery at Vienna, "The Death of Lucretia;" and the Gallery of Prince Bismarck, in the same capital, "St. Paul and his Disciples," "David before the Head of Goliath," "St. Andrew," and "St. Jerome."

The gallery of the Hermitage, at St. Petersburg, would appear from the catalogue to be very rich in the works of this master, but none of them are probably either copies or imitations, among those which M. Viatok regards as genuine, are a "Christ," and "St. Helena surrounded by the Instruments of the Passion;" in the Winter Palace there is also a very fine "St. John the Evangelist."

The Museum at Stockholm contains four Domenichinos:—"An Angel," "St. John and the Angel," "The Harp," and "The Christ of Piero."

Our own National Gallery contains five Domenichinos: 1. "St. Peter and the Angel," in a landscape, a charming little picture, which we have engraved (p. 201). 2. "St. George and the Dragon," a picture beautifully managed in the light and shade, clear and bright in tone, and carefully executed. The distance is charming. The figures are too small, but the story is nicely narrated, to the landscape. 3. "The sermon of St. Stephen," a small composition of one figure, and probably a finished study for an altar-piece. This picture has been criticised for the composition, which is strange and scattered, without any point of concentration; but the head of the martyr is very fine, the colouring good, and the general effect harmonious. 4. "St. Jerome," in which an angel is represented instructing the solitude-loving saint, and solving his doubts. The two figures were bought by Mr. Howard Chen. 5. "Emilia and the Shepherds," which, Dr. Waage says, "is conceived more in the spirit of Tasso than I have hitherto seen this subject represented. The expression of goodness and of maiden purity, the attention of the aged shepherd, the surprise of the three pretty children, are very attractive, and well accord with the blooming colouring and the cheerful landscape. This picture was brought from Italy to England under the name of Asseleto-Corona, but has been justly assigned to Domenichino." It was presented to the nation by Mr. Angerstein.

There are two specimens of this master at Windsor Castle:—"St. Catherine of Alexandria," a life-size figure, half-length, holding a palm-branch in her right hand; and "St. Agnes," a full-length figure, in an attitude of rapt devotion, with an angel descending with a palm-branch, and another in the foreground caring a lamb, the symbol of the saint, who, having suffered martyrdom at the age of thirteen years, is regarded as the peculiar patroness of innocence and purity of mind.

The Dulwich Gallery possesses a single Domenichino, the genuineness of which has been doubted; the subject is, "Venus gathering Apples in the Garden of the Hesperides." It is a small composition, and if really the work of Domenichino, must be reckoned among the least meritorious of his productions.

The Duke of Devonshire possesses, at Devonshire House, two specimens of this master: 1. "St. Anna and the Elders," very carefully painted in a warm, deep tone. It is only existing in London in company with the large picture in the gallery at Munich, but does not merit in many of the details. 2. A youthful female figure, in a more delicate and with much expression, resting on clouds of purple in the colouring, and carefully finished.

The Pitt Rivers Gallery contains six Domenichinos: 1. "Christ bearing his Cross," from the Orleans Gallery. The composition is scattered, and wanting in masses and leading lines; but in character, and in class of colouring this picture is one of Domenichino's most successful. 2. "The Rapture of St. Francis," from the Orleans Gallery. The expression of enthusiasm is here very necessarily given; the execution is careful, and the coloring very bright and clear. 3. "Head of a Female Saint," which combines that nobleness of character and expression which the master knew so well of rock and heads are repeated here from that picture, and the glowing tone of the flesh and the fresh green of the trees do not at all resemble the style of Annibale Caracci. 5. "A Landscape," from the Orleans Gallery. "In the fine form of the mountains," says Dr. Waagen, "which are interrupted in the middle distance by buildings in an elevated style of architecture, the amiable, poetical feeling of Domenichino is as clearly expressed as in the figures: a couple of lovers watched by an old woman, a flock of sheep led to drink at a piece of water, and fishermen crossing it in their boat. The treatment is broad and manly, and the general tone uncommonly fresh and clear. Such a picture is instructive, as tending to convince us what models Gaspar Poussin found ready to his hands." 6. "A Landscape, with fishermen, and women washing," is noble in design and carefully executed, but the colouring is somewhat hard and heavy; some portions of the picture have become dark, which has destroyed its harmony.

In the collection of Samuel Rogers, Esq., the celebrated author of "The Pleasures of Memory," &c., are three Domenichinos: "The Punishment of Meleager" and "Tobit with the Fish," which are very attractive, from the poetry of the composition and the delicacy of the finish; and "Bird-catching," a very fine picture, which has, unfortunately, turned quite dark. It was executed originally for Cardinal Borghese.

The Duke of Sutherland possesses, at Stafford House, a choice cabinet picture of this master; the subject is "St. Catherine," to whom an angel brings the palm of martyrdom. The expression of the saint is noble, the colouring very clear, especially in the draperies, the landscape poetical, and the finishing particularly careful.

In the collection of Lord Ashburton is "Moses before the Burning Bush," a small composition, but remarkably powerful and full in the colouring.

The Marquis of Westminster possesses, at Grosvenor House, a large kind of tape, with "The Meeting of David and Abigail," very poetical in the treatment, and lovely in the colouring and effect of light.

In Lord Cowper's collection is a "Cupid," ascribed to Annibale Caracci; but it has so much of the character and brilliant colouring of Domenichino, that we do not hesitate in assigning it to him.

Sir Thomas Baring possesses two Domenichinos: "The Finding of Moses," a rather large landscape, with the river in the middle distance, and blue mountains beyond; and a landscape, in a remarkably clear, full tone, representing a wide plain, with a building and a waterfall.

At Leigh Court, near Bristol, the seat of J. P. Miles, Esq., are two pictures of this master: a pleasing composition entitled "Youths looking at a Sleeping Nymph," and a large picture of "The Vision of St. John the Evangelist," in which the figures of the saint and two angels are full-lengths of the size of life. The elevated character, the careful drawing, the glowing colouring, and the admirable ingegno of this picture, which is in an excellent state of preservation, render it very valuable.

The Earl of Carlisle possesses a single specimen of this master, "St. John the Evangelist Looking up in Repose." The picture at St. Paul's is either a repetition or a copy of this, which is one of the most indispensable pictures of Domenichino in existence. The feeling is noble, refined and fervent, and the tone clear, fresh, and harmonious.

The Earl of Snowdon possesses, at Alton Tower, two rather fine compositions of this master: a portrait of a boy, and a book in a copy.

At Kesteven Hall, the seat of the Earl of Scarbrough, is a cabinet landscape by Domenichino.

The Earl of Leicester possesses, at Holkham House, "The Sacrifice of Isaac," in which a noble composition is united with refinement and beautiful chiaroscuro lighting.

In giving the prices which have been obtained at sales for pictures of this artist, we are necessarily obliged to confine ourselves to some of the most remarkable and valuable specimens very numerous. At the sale of the Earl of Albemarle, in 1768, "Finding the Cross," and "The River near the Cross," were sold together for £22,100, and a Portrait of a Boy for £11,100.

At the Prince of Orange's sale, in 1777, "St. Cecilia accompanied by two Angels" was sold for £18. At the Lebrun sale, in 1793, another picture of "St. Cecilia," in which she is represented playing the organ, and accompanying it with her voice, was sold for £458. At the Sommariva sale, in 1829, a small picture of "The Rapture of the Virgin" was sold for £12. When the collection of the Marquis of Les Marais was sold, in 1843, an allegorical composition, representing "Music," realised £46; and at the sale of Marshal Soult's pictures, in 1852, a landscape of this master was sold for £28.

None of Domenichino's pictures bear his signature.

ART AND ARTISTS.

IN the summer of 1805, Jackson wrote to Haydon: "There is a raw, tall, pale, queer Scotchman come, an odd fellow, but there is something in him; he is called Wilkie." When Haydon saw him, "he was tall, pale, quiet, with a fine eye, hoarse nose, vulgar, humorous mouth, but great energy of expression." At length they dined together at an ordinary in Poland-street, where Wilkie got that odd fellow in the "Village Politicians," reading the paper with his glasses on. "When the Academy closed in August, Wilkie followed me to the door, and invited me to breakfast, saying in a broad Scotch accent, 'Whare d'ye stay?' I went to his room rather earlier than the hour named, and to my utter astonishment found Wilkie sitting stark-naked on the side of his bed, drawing himself by the help of the looking-glass! 'Why, good gracious, Wilkie,' said I, 'where are we to breakfast?' Without any apology or attention to my important question, he replied, 'It's jest capital practice.' It was about this time, that, glad of any employment, Wilkie entered into an engagement with an engraver to copy Barry's picture at the Adelphi. In connexion with poor Barry, I remember an absurd anecdote. Wilkie had got tickets to see him lie in state, and had asked me to go with him." Now, a black coat at a funeral ceremony is a sin qua non, and Wilkie borrowed Haydon's. "I got first to the Academy, whence we went all to go to the Adelphi; and after waiting some time, at the eleventh hour Wilkie made his appearance in my coat, the sleeves half way up his arms, his long bony wrists painfully protruding, his broad shoulders stretching the seams until they cracked again, while the waist-buttons appeared anywhere but where their maker originally intended them to be. He caught my eye, and significantly held up his finger, as if to entreat me to be quiet, but with an expression so ribaldly conscious of his awkward situation, that I thought I should have died with laughing on the spot." On the Sunday after Wilkie's picture for Lord Mansfield had appeared at the Academy Exhibition, Haydon read in the Times: "A young man, by the name of Wilkie, a Scotchman, has a very extraordinary work." I was in the clouds, hurried over my breakfast, rushed away, met Jackson, who joined me, and we both bolted into Wilkie's room. I roared out, 'Wilkie, my boy, your name is in the paper.' 'Is it real-ly?' said David. I read the puff, and taking hands, all three danced round the table till we were tired. By those who remember the tone of Wilkie's 'real-ly,' this will be relished. Eastlake told me that Calvert said once to Wilkie, 'Do you not know that every one complains of your continued real-ly?' Wilkie mused a moment, looked at Calvert, and drawled out, 'Do they, real-ly?' 'You must leave it off,' 'I will, real-ly.' 'For heaven's sake, don't keep repeating it,' said Calvert, 'it annoys me.' Wilkie looked, smiled, and in the most unconscious manner said, 'Real-ly!'"

Of course Wilkie was looked down on. Haydon writes: "While we were at Bell's, his pale, anxious look, his evident poverty and struggle; his broad Scotch accent, had all excited the humour of those students who were better off," and so quiet Wilkie was the joke. "I remember he came one day with some very fine yellow drawing-paper, and we all said, 'Why, Wilkie, where in the world did you get this? Bring us a quire to-morrow.' He promised he would. The next day, and the day after, no drawing-paper. At last, we became impatient, and begged him, as he would so willingly bring us any, to give us the name and address. 'Well, well,' said Wilkie, 'jest give me the money now, and ye'll be sure to have the paper.'" Now that he was richer than he had been for some time, his first thoughts were do you get your frames, Mr. Thomson?" A good story is told of his skill in bargain-making. When arranging with Hurst and Robinson for a new work in numbers, the price of each drawing was settled, not without deliberation, at twenty-five pounds. He went away expressing full satisfaction. He came speedily back, thrust his head in at the door, and cried, "Guineas!" "Guineas be it," said the publishers. In a few minutes a hasty step was heard, and Turner put in his whole person, saying, "My expenses!" "Oh, certainly, sir," was the answer. But this was not all: a few minutes after he was a third time at the door, breathless and eager, with his whole body in the room for the

with him, and told that the cheque for the picture would then be ready. To this Turner consented. He took the picture in a hackney-coach, breakfasted, received the cheque, thanked the purchaser, and left. He had not been gone above five minutes, when a knock was heard at the door: the painter was back. "I must see Mr. Fuller." He was shown in. "Oh! I'd forgotten: there's three shillings for the hackney-coach." The sum was paid. Fuller, who was laughing all the while, loved to relate this story to his friends. Turner affected a mystery about his art, and never allowed any of his own brethren of the brush to see him at his work. At Petworth he worked with locked doors, and Chantry expected resistance to his new demand—"And twenty proofs! No resistance was made, and the drawings were set about with an ungrumbling reluctance. When George Cook, the engraver, told the story to Burnet's father, he added: "I am told that Turner's father, who was a barber, having been paid a penny for a shave, followed his customer down Maiden-lane to demand a halfpenny for soap." It is said the old man showed his son's pictures, and took money from the visitors, as if he had been a common vendor in the house. Another story of Turner is too good to be omitted. He had painted a picture for the famous Jack Fuller, and was asked by Fuller to breakfast with him next morning, to bring the picture was only enabled to see him at his easel by the aid of a trick. The sculptor, by a bribe, had taken care to ascertain from one of the servants of the house the peculiar knock which Lord Egremont was accustomed to give at Turner's door, when the patron was anxious to see the painter at his task. Possessed of this secret, he imitated Lord Egremont's step and cough, and gave with admirable similitude of sound the very knock which his lordship was accustomed to give. The door opened immediately, and in walked Chantry, much, at first, to the annoyance of Turner, who was subdued only to good humour by the recollection that his friend, though once a painter, was now living by sculpture.
